START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

July 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-040

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library

(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35 mm x 30.5 m · 100 ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 10/1996
1461-0347-071-10
CAT 840 3594
33-06
Kodak

REEL 40

Volumes 73-75

BSO 1943-1944 to BSO, Pops,
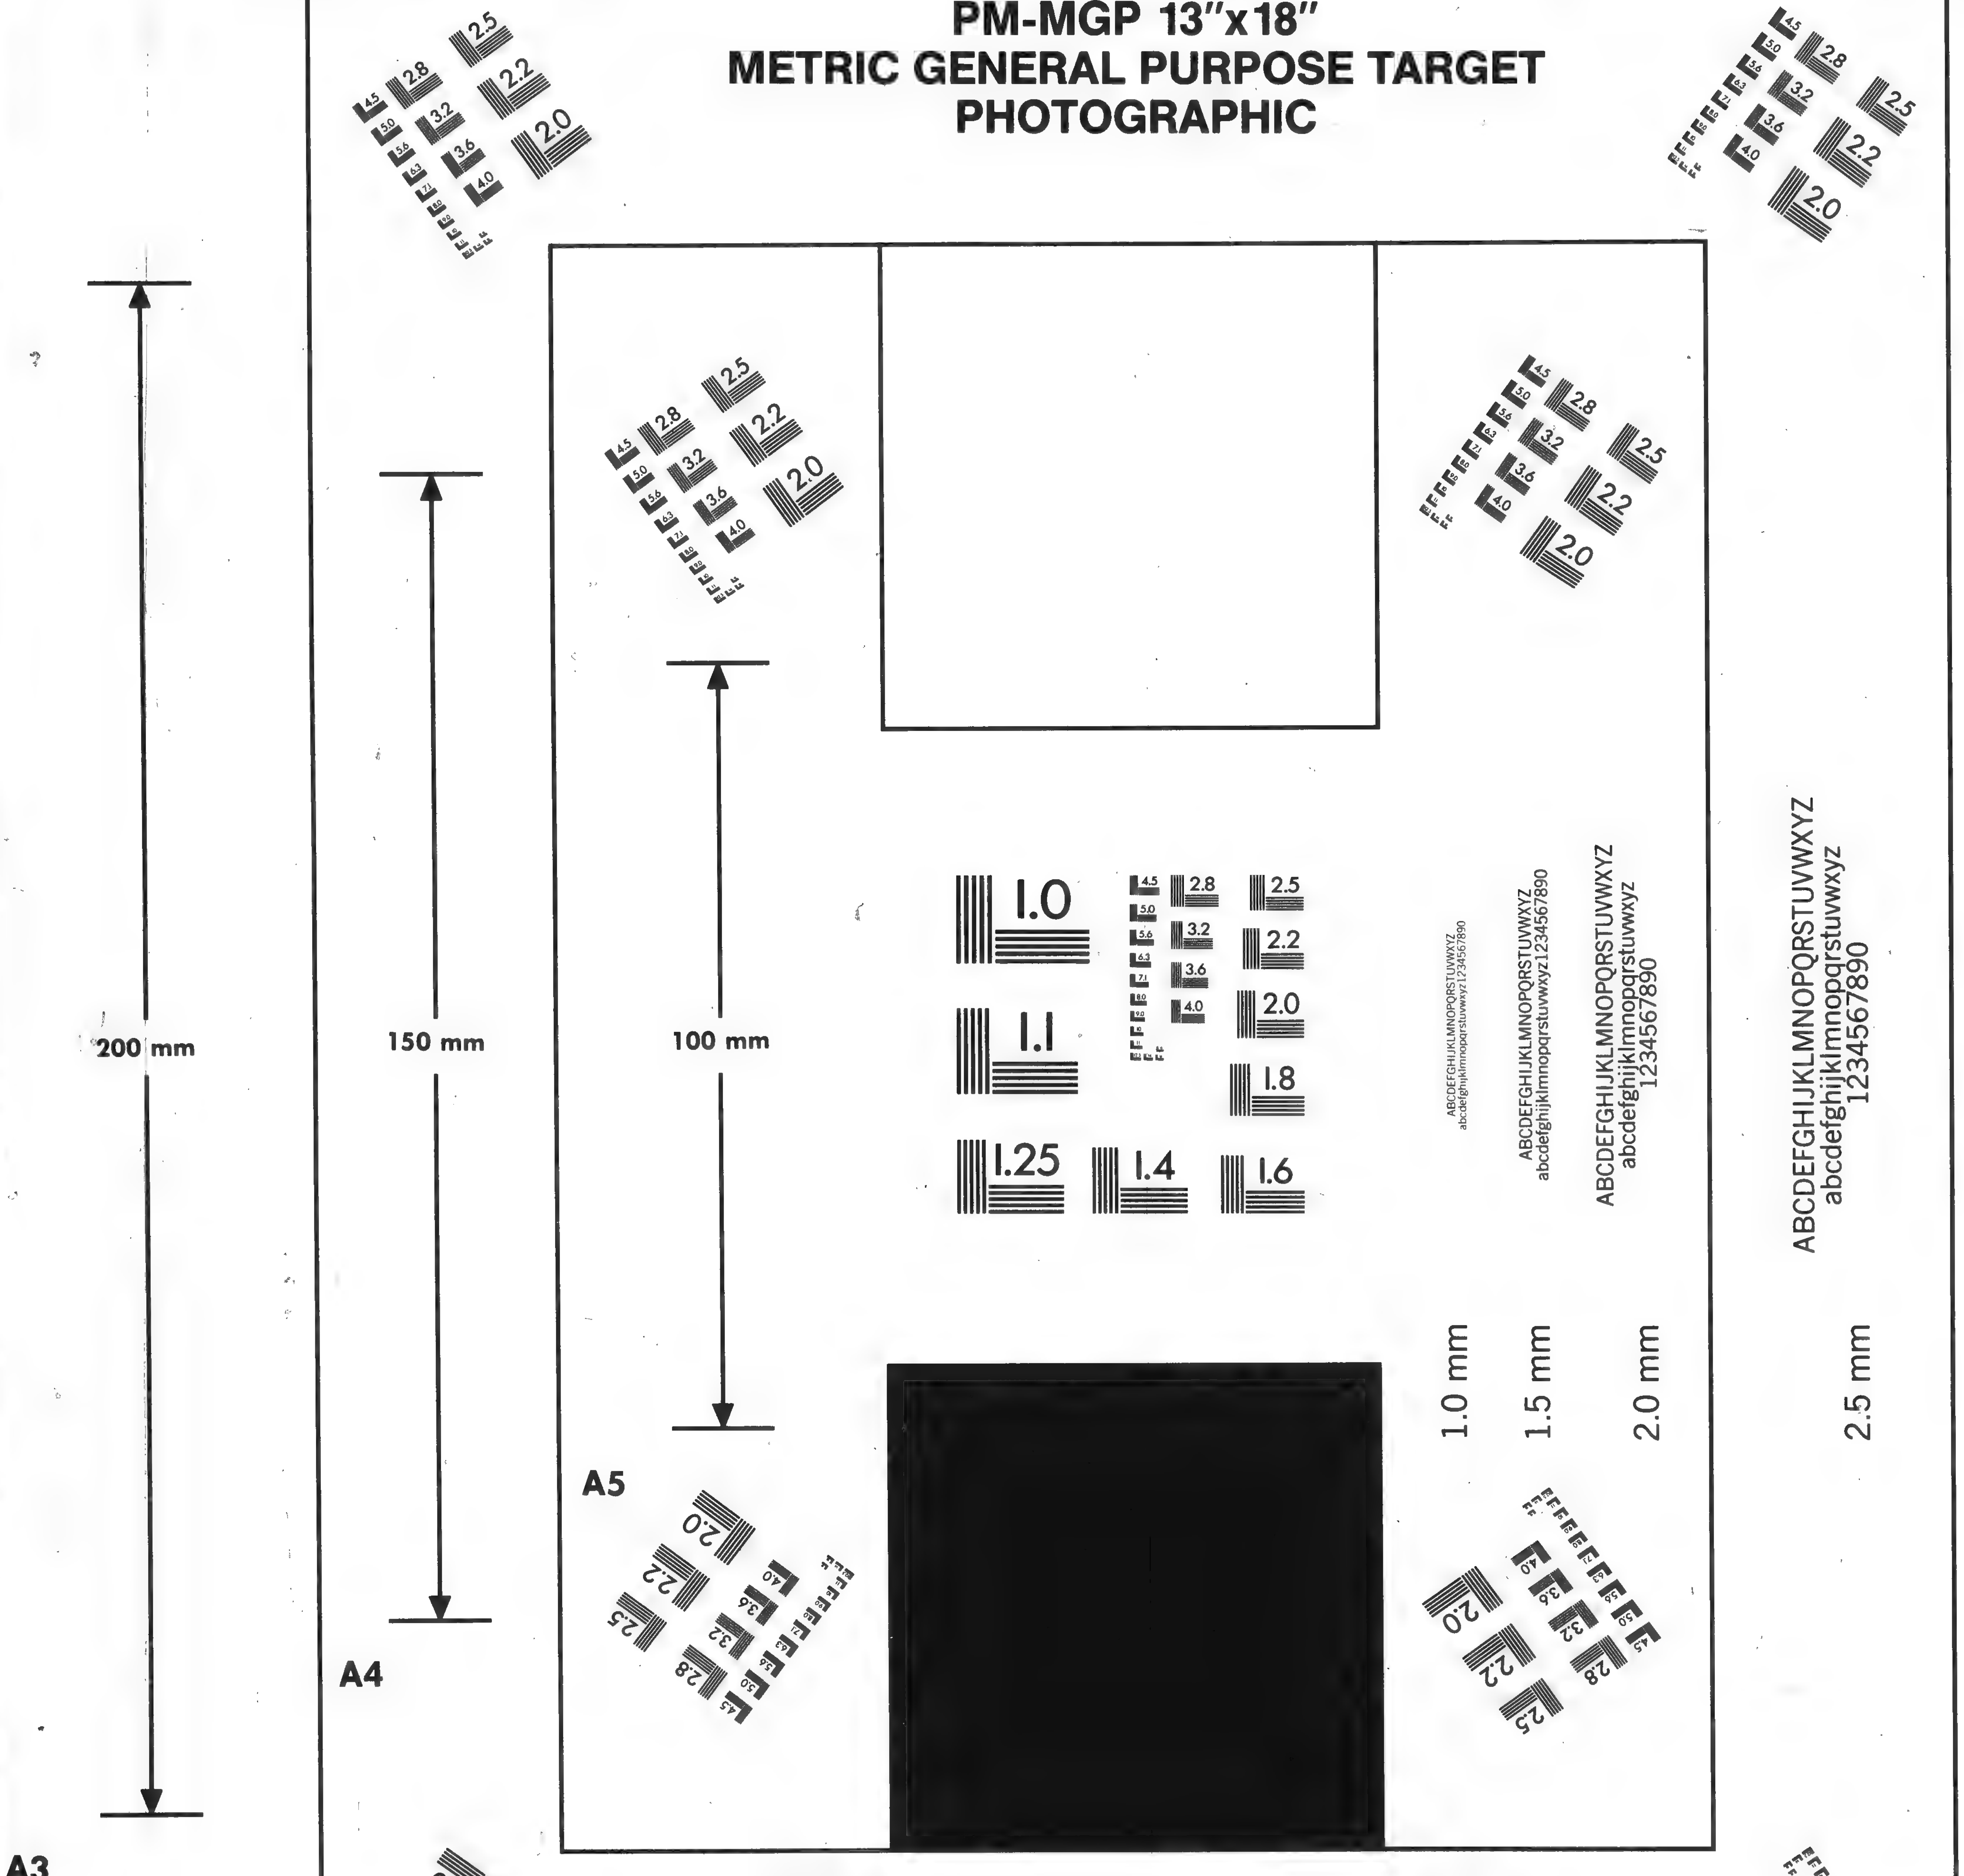
Tanglewood
1945-46

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 73

BSO

1943 - 1944

TIGHT BINDING
THROUGHOUT VOLUME

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER
Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

BLANK PAGE

RCHESTRA CONCERTS

Symphony Set Season's Record—Heard by 850,000

BOSTON, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every thirty hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

In place of the Berkshire festival this year, the Pops season was extended two weeks, the Esplanade season one week, and a new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

Symphony Plans Many New Works

A full schedule of concerts, new music of interest, music familiar and unfamiliar of the existing symphonic repertory, and a notable list of soloists will mark the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be the 20th year in America of Serge Koussevitzky. The season will open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 8 and include the usual four series of concerts in Boston, the series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and other cities, and a tour of the Middle West in December.

Dr. Koussevitzky has many plans for his 20th year. In addition to standard masterpieces of the repertory, he will perform less-known symphonies by the masters, such as the Sixth of Schubert in C major, the Third of Tchaikovsky, and the Fourth of Dvorak. The Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, which was that composer's last large scale composition, will have its first Boston performance. Three American composers, whose music Koussevitzky did much to make known, have each written a new symphony which is to have its first performance. They are William Schuman, with a new symphony for strings; Roy Harris, with his Sixth Symphony, and Samuel Barber, who since his induction into the armed forces has composed a symphony. For the spring Pension Fund Concert of the Orchestra, Bach's B minor Mass will be performed with the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

SEP 1 1943

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 1 - 1943

242 Concerts Given.

Boston, Sept. 1. (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 2 -

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 1 - 1943

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

SEP 1 - 1943

Boston Symphony Plays Record Concert Season

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63d season on Oct. 8.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63rd season October 8.

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP - - 1943

BOSTON

By JULES WOLFFERS

BOSTON. — Dr. Koussevitzky's new project to aid the American composer has, in general, met with a good response here. It is felt that possibly the plan may prove in itself to be the solution to the problem of the creative artist. At the very least, it is suggested, the idea is a step in the right direction, and has the effect of bringing to general notice the conditions under which most American composers work.

Difficulties of collection and disbursement are noted, but majority opinion believes these obstacles not to be insurmountable. At the same time, several comments express the opinion that no real constructive work can be done until music is officially recognized as an important factor in American life. It is pointed out that the United States is one of the few nations without a Ministry of Fine Arts.

Esplanade Season Ends

An audience estimated at 30,000 heard the final Esplanade concert and gave founder-conductor Arthur Fiedler an ovation. Ensign Herbert Donaldson, U.S.N.R., was recalled repeatedly for his excellent performance of the finale from Saint-Saëns' Second Piano Concerto. Eugene C. Hultman, Metropolitan District Commissioner, revealed the extensive police plans which had been made for protection of audiences at these concerts. Conductor Fiedler, at the intermission, reported that the series of 24 twilight and four children's concerts had been well attended. He stressed the large number of service men attending and pointed out that the weather had curtailed only four concerts.

The summer found the Boston Symphony providing not only the Esplanade season but also programs by its first-desk men of chamber music at Harvard's Sanders Theatre and at the New England Mutual Hall. Under the direction of Georges Laurent, first flutist and director of the Flute Players' Club, three new and artfully contrived works for flute, clarinet and basson by Walter Piston, were given at the fourth of the series of concerts. The fifth enlisted the services of G. Wallace Woodworth, Harvard conductor; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, and sections of both the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Outstanding was Mozart's cantata, Regina Coeli (K.108), which was splendidly performed. The high point of the sixth program was the Shostakovitch Piano Quintet in which the Burgin String Quartet and pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma distinguished themselves. Edgar Curtis conducted and showed many first-rate qualities.

Chamber Series Closes

The seventh and final program, for string orchestra, saw Richard Burgin leading about 25 players through Schoenberg's Verklärte Nacht; the Largo mesto movement from C. P. E. Bach's Concerto No. 3 for Cello and Strings; and Beethoven's String Quartet, in A minor, Op. 132.

Conducting with skill and deep-probing emotion, Mr. Burgin brought out the best in the performers. The Beethoven sounded surprisingly well in its massed strings arrangement, and soloist Jean Bedetti produced some beautiful tone and phrasing in the Concerto.

The series as a whole was distinctly worthwhile. No doubt the experiment of multiple conductorship pleased some persons, if not all. One hopes the series will be continued next summer.

Guest Leaders Announced

And as a herald of things to come, sign painters outside Symphony Hall were lettering in, the day before this was written, announcements that Stravinsky, Golschmann, and Kostelanetz were to be guest conductors this coming season with the Boston Symphony. It will be no scoop to divulge that Serge Koussevitzky's name also appeared.

Among the new works which Dr. Koussevitzky will bring out are the Second Symphony of Pvt. Samuel Barber, a Fifth Symphony for strings, by William Schuman, the Sixth Symphony by Roy Harris; a Violin Concerto bv Bohuslav Martinu, commissioned by Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist; and Stravinsky's recently completed Ode, which will be conducted by the composer.

The Symphony gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced, when 242 concerts were performed within 304 days and total attendance was more than 850,000. A number of volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the orchestra under Koussevitzky and "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

SEP 1 - 1943

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

SEP 1 - 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

SEP 1 - 1943

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST-JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SEP 1 - 1943

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

Symphony Completes 242 Concerts

Boston (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

THE HARTFORD TIMES, MONDA

MUSIC

Bostonians Active During Summer

By Carl E. Lindstrom

A summer without a Berkshire Festival should, it seems, result in fewer concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but the reverse is true. During the past year, the orchestra has played more concerts than in any season in all its history, a total of 242. This includes the Symphony Hall schedule, the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. The season lasted 304 days and thus, with a little simple arithmetic, we find that the orchestra played a concert every 30 hours.

Counting all seats occupied at all events, the total audience has been more than 850,000. How many of these were repeaters does not appear. That brings us into a field which has never been combed statistically, whether you take Boston, New York, Hartford or elsewhere. Just how many different persons attend concerts?

Adding up the "gate" at Bushnell for one season wouldn't give us the results at all, because, as everyone knows, the familiar faces are there night after night. Symphony audiences and the Sunday afternoon devotees are not entirely the same.

There is, no doubt, some overlapping in the Carnegie Hall crowd and the Metropolitan crowd, but it has probably been less than one might guess.

Can we say that there are 4,000 concert goers in Hartford? How many in New York? The Boston Orchestra's 850,000 listeners were not all Bostonians. Besides two dates here, concerts were given in Providence, New York, Brooklyn, New Haven, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

* * *

QUITE a number of concerts were devoted to the interests of servicemen or related benefits. At two concerts men and women in uniform were admitted free. There was a United Nations concert in Symphony Hall last October and a benefit for the United War Fund. "Pops" Conductor Arthur Fiedler and Concert Master Richard Burgin conducted a series of "jam sessions" at which all men in the service who could play any instrument whatever were invited to take part in impromptu performances. Members of the orchestra have played at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and the Naval Training Station at Newport.

The personnel has been little changed during the past season. Two men, Lawrence White and Willis Page, entered the service. Carl Stockbridge of the cello section died last December after 24 years of service.

The programs for the past season show interesting statistical data. Of 85 musical works heard, 16 were played for the first time at Symphony Hall concerts. Of the 47 composers represented, 13 either were born in this country or are living here.

* * *

THE 58th season of "Pop" concerts under Arthur Fiedler was extended to 70 nights. More than 100 special groups attended, including 32 schools and alumni associations, 64 clubs, relief groups, industrial and commercial organizations. On 13 nights, branches of the military service had special reservations.

The 15th season of Esplanade Concerts was performed in the Hatch Memorial on the Charles River Embankment from July 22 to Aug. 18, with performances each night (Mondays excepted). Certain nights were dedicated to the WAVES, the Coast Guard, the SPARS, the Marine Corps and the Spanish War Veterans.

The orchestra did get within hailing distance of its summer home. Four concerts were given in the library at Lenox under the auspices of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation Inc., for the benefit of the Red Cross.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

SEP 1 - 1943

SYMPHONY GAVE CONCERT ONCE EVERY 30 HOURS

Boston (AP)—Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

SEP 1 - 1943

242 CONCERTS

BOSTON —(AP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed — averaging one every 30 hours — George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

RCHESTRA CONCERTS

..l Symphony Set Season's Record—Heard by 850,000

BOSTON, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every thirty hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

In place of the Berkshire festival this year, the Pops season was extended two weeks, the Esplanade season one week, and a new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

Symphony Plans Many New Works

A full schedule of concerts, new music of interest, music familiar and unfamiliar of the existing symphonic repertory, and a notable list of soloists will mark the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be the 20th year in America of Serge Koussevitzky. The season will open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 8 and include the usual four series of concerts in Boston, the series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and other cities, and a tour of the Middle West in December.

Dr. Koussevitzky has many plans for his 20th year. In addition to standard masterpieces of the repertory, he will perform less-known symphonies by the masters, such as the Sixth of Schubert in C major, the Third of Tchaikovsky, and the Fourth of Dvorak. The Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, which was that composer's last large scale composition, will have its first Boston performance. Three American composers, whose music Koussevitzky did much to make known, have each written a new symphony which is to have its first performance. They are William Schuman, with a new symphony for strings; Roy Harris, with his Sixth Symphony, and Samuel Barber, who since his induction into the armed forces has composed a symphony. For the spring Pension Fund Concert of the Orchestra, Bach's B minor Mass will be performed with the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

SEP 1 1943

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP -- 1943

BOSTON

By JULES WOLFFERS

BOSTON. — Dr. Koussevitzky's new project to aid the American composer has, in general, met with a good response here. It is felt that possibly the plan may prove in itself to be the solution to the problem of the creative artist. At the very least, it is suggested, the idea is a step in the right direction, and has the effect of bringing to general notice the conditions under which most American composers work.

Difficulties of collection and disbursement are noted, but majority opinion believes these obstacles not to be insurmountable. At the same time, several comments express the opinion that no real constructive work can be done until music is officially recognized as an important factor in American life. It is pointed out that the United States is one of the few nations without a Ministry of Fine Arts.

Esplanade Season Ends

An audience estimated at 30,000 heard the final Esplanade concert and gave founder-conductor Arthur Fiedler an ovation. Ensign Herbert Donaldson, U.S.N.R., was recalled repeatedly for his excellent performance of the finale from Saint-Saëns' Second Piano Concerto. Eugene C. Hultman, Metropolitan District Commissioner, revealed the extensive police plans which had been made for protection of audiences at these concerts. Conductor Fiedler, at the intermission, reported that the series of 24 twilight and four children's concerts had been well attended. He stressed the large number of service men attending and pointed out that the weather had curtailed only four concerts.

The summer found the Boston Symphony providing not only the Esplanade season but also programs by its first-desk men of chamber music at Harvard's Sanders Theatre and at the New England Mutual Hall. Under the direction of Georges Laurent, first flutist and director of the Flute Players' Club, three new and artfully contrived works for flute, clarinet and basson by Walter Piston, were given at the fourth of the series of concerts. The fifth enlisted the services of G. Wallace Woodworth, Harvard conductor; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, and sections of both the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Outstanding was Mozart's cantata, Regina Coeli (K.108), which was splendidly performed. The high point of the sixth program was the Shostakovitch Piano Quintet in which the Burgin String Quartet and pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma distinguished themselves. Edgar Curtis conducted and showed many first-rate qualities.

Chamber Series Closes

The seventh and final program, for string orchestra, saw Richard Burgin leading about 25 players through Schoenberg's Verklärte Nacht; the Largo mesto movement from C. P. E. Bach's Concerto No. 3 for Cello and Strings; and Beethoven's String Quartet, in A minor, Op. 132.

Conducting with skill and deep-probing emotion, Mr. Burgin brought out the best in the performers. The Beethoven sounded surprisingly well in its massed strings arrangement, and soloist Jean Bedetti produced some beautiful tone and phrasing in the Concerto.

The series as a whole was distinctly worthwhile. No doubt the experiment of multiple conductorship pleased some persons, if not all. One hopes the series will be continued next summer.

Guest Leaders Announced

And as a herald of things to come, sign painters outside Symphony Hall were lettering in, the day before this was written, announcements that Stravinsky, Golschmann, and Kostelanetz were to be guest conductors this coming season with the Boston Symphony. It will be no scoop to divulge that Serge Koussevitzky's name also appeared.

Among the new works which Dr. Koussevitzky will bring out are the Second Symphony of Pvt. Samuel Barber, a Fifth Symphony for strings, by William Schuman, the Sixth Symphony by Roy Harris; a Violin Concerto by Bohuslav Martinu, commissioned by Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist; and Stravinsky's recently completed Ode, which will be conducted by the composer.

The Symphony gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced, when 242 concerts were performed within 304 days and total attendance was more than 850,000. A number of volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the orchestra under Koussevitzky and "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

SEP 1943

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

SEP 1 - 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

SEP 1 - 1943

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST-JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SEP 1 - 1943

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

Symphony Completes 242 Concerts

Boston—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 1 - 1943

242 Concerts Given.

Boston, Sept. 1. (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 2

28

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 1 - 1943

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

SEP 1943

Boston Symphony Plays Record Concert Season

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63d season on Oct. 8.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63rd season October 8.

THE HARTFORD TIMES, MONDA

MUSIC
Bostonians Active During Summer
By Carl E. Lindstrom

A summer without a Berkshire Festival should, it seems, result in fewer concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but the reverse is true. During the past year, the orchestra has played more concerts than in any season in all its history, a total of 242. This includes the Symphony Hall schedule, the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. The season lasted 304 days and thus, with a little simple arithmetic, we find that the orchestra played a concert every 30 hours.

Counting all seats occupied at all events, the total audience has been more than 850,000. How many of these were repeaters does not appear. That brings us into a field which has never been combed statistically, whether you take Boston, New York, Hartford or elsewhere. Just how many different persons attend concerts?

Adding up the "gate" at Bushnell for one season wouldn't give us the results at all, because, as everyone knows, the familiar faces are there night after night. Symphony audiences and the Sunday afternoon devotees are not entirely the same.

There is, no doubt, some overlapping in the Carnegie Hall crowd and the Metropolitan crowd, but it has probably been less than one might guess.

Can we say that there are 4,000 concert goers in Hartford? How many in New York? The Boston Orchestra's 850,000 listeners were not all Bostonians. Besides two dates here, concerts were given in Providence, New York, Brooklyn, New Haven, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

* * *

QUITE a number of concerts were devoted to the interests of servicemen or related benefits. At two concerts men and women in uniform were admitted free. There was a United Nations concert in Symphony Hall last October and a benefit for the United War Fund. "Pops" Conductor Arthur Fiedler and Concert Master Richard Burgin conducted a series of "jam sessions" at which all men in the service who could play any instrument whatever were invited to take part in impromptu performances. Members of the orchestra have played at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and the Naval Training Station at Newport.

The personnel has been little changed during the past season. Two men, Lawrence White and Willis Page, entered the service. Carl Stockbridge of the cello section died last December after 24 years of service.

The programs for the past season show interesting statistical data. Of 85 musical works heard, 16 were played for the first time at Symphony Hall concerts. Of the 47 composers represented, 13 either were born in this country or are living here.

* * *

THE 58th season of "Pop" concerts under Arthur Fiedler was extended to 70 nights. More than 100 special groups attended, including 32 schools and alumni associations, 64 clubs, relief groups, industrial and commercial organizations. On 13 nights, branches of the military service had special reservations.

The 15th season of Esplanade Concerts was performed in the Hatch Memorial on the Charles River Embankment from July 22 to Aug. 18, with performances each night (Mondays excepted). Certain nights were dedicated to the WAVES, the Coast Guard, the SPARS, the Marine Corps and the Spanish War Veterans.

The orchestra did get within hailing distance of its summer home. Four concerts were given in the library at Lenox under the auspices of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation Inc., for the benefit of the Red Cross.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

SEP 1 - 1943

SYMPHONY GAVE CONCE ONCE EVERY 30 HOURS

Boston (AP)—Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

SEP 1 - 1943

242 CONCERTS

BOSTON —(AP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed — averaging one every 30 hours — George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

[3]

PASTE OVER

RCHESTRA CONCERTS

,.. Symphony Set Season's Record—Heard by 850,000

BOSTON, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every thirty hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

In place of the Berkshire festival this year, the Pops season was extended two weeks, the Esplanade season one week, and a new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

Symphony Plans Many New Works

A full schedule of concerts, new music of interest, music familiar and unfamiliar of the existing symphonic repertory, and a notable list of soloists will mark the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be the 20th year in America of Serge Koussevitzky. The season will open in Symphony Hall on Oct. 8 and include the usual four series of concerts in Boston, the series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and other cities, and a tour of the Middle West in December.

Dr. Koussevitzky has many plans for his 20th year. In addition to standard masterpieces of the repertory, he will perform less-known symphonies by the masters, such as the Sixth of Schubert in C major, the Third of Tchaikovsky, and the Fourth of Dvorak. The Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, which was that composer's last large scale composition, will have its first Boston performance. Three American composers, whose music Koussevitzky did much to make known, have each writ n a new symphony which is to ha e its first performance. They are V'illiam Schuman, with a new symphony for strings; Roy Harris, with his Sixth Symphony, and Samuel Barber, who since his induction into the armed forces has composed a symphony. For the spring Pension Fund Concert of the Orchestra, Bach's B minor Mass will be performed with the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

SEP 1 1943

MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP -- 1943

BOSTON

By JULES WOLFFERS

BOSTON. — Dr. Koussevitzky's new project to aid the American composer has, in general, met with a good response here. It is felt that possibly the plan may prove in itself to be the solution to the problem of the creative artist. At the very least, it is suggested, the idea is a step in the right direction, and has the effect of bringing to general notice the conditions under which most American composers work.

Difficulties of collection and disbursement are noted, but majority opinion believes these obstacles not to be insurmountable. At the same time, several comments express the opinion that no real constructive work can be done until music is officially recognized as an important factor in American life. It is pointed out that the United States is one of the few nations without a Ministry of Fine Arts.

Esplanade Season Ends

An audience estimated at 30,000 heard the final Esplanade concert and gave founder-conductor Arthur Fiedler an ovation. Ensign Herbert Donaldson, U.S.N.R., was recalled repeatedly for his excellent performance of the finale from Saint-Saëns' Second Piano Concerto. Eugene C. Hultman, Metropolitan District Commissioner, revealed the extensive police plans which had been made for protection of audiences at these concerts. Conductor Fiedler, at the intermission, reported that the series of 24 twilight and four children's concerts had been well attended. He stressed the large number of service men attending and pointed out that the weather had curtailed only four concerts.

The summer found the Boston Symphony providing not only the Esplanade season but also programs by its first-desk men of chamber music at Harvard's Sanders Theatre and at the New England Mutual Hall. Under the direction of Georges Laurent, first flutist and director of the Flute Players' Club, three new and artfully contrived works for flute, clarinet and basson by Walter Piston, were given at the fourth of the series of concerts. The fifth enlisted the services of G. Wallace Woodworth, Harvard conductor; Margaret Codd Goldovsky, soprano, and sections of both the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. Outstanding was Mozart's cantata, Regina Coeli (K.108), which was splendidly performed. The high point of the sixth program was the Shostakovitch Piano Quintet in which the Burgin String Quartet and pianist Jesus Maria Sanroma distinguished themselves. Edgar Curtis conducted and showed many first-rate qualities.

Chamber Series Closes

The seventh and final program, for string orchestra, saw Richard Burgin leading about 25 players through Schoenberg's Verklärte Nacht; the Largo mesto movement from C. P. E. Bach's Concerto No. 3 for Cello and Strings; and Beethoven's String Quartet, in A minor, Op. 132.

Conducting with skill and deep-probing emotion, Mr. Burgin brought out the best in the performers. The Beethoven sounded surprisingly well in its massed strings arrangement, and soloist Jean Bedetti produced some beautiful tone and phrasing in the Concerto.

The series as a whole was distinctly worthwhile. No doubt the experiment of multiple conductorship pleased some persons, if not all. One hopes the series will be continued next summer.

Guest Leaders Announced

And as a herald of things to come, sign painters outside Symphony Hall were lettering in, the day before this was written, announcements that Stravinsky, Golschmann, and Kostelanetz were to be guest conductors this coming season with the Boston Symphony. It will be no scoop to divulge that Serge Koussevitzky's name also appeared.

Among the new works which Dr. Koussevitzky will bring out are the Second Symphony of Pvt. Samuel Barber, a Fifth Symphony for strings, by William Schuman, the Sixth Symphony by Roy Harris; a Violin Concerto bv Bohuslav Martinu, commissioned by Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist; and Stravinsky's recently completed Ode, which will be conducted by the composer.

The Symphony gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed, George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced, when 242 concerts were performed within 304 days and total attendance was more than 850,000. A number of volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the orchestra under Koussevitzky and "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 1943

242 Concerts Given.

Boston, Sept. 1. (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

28

SEP 2 -

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 1 - 1943

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

SEP 1943

Boston Symphony Plays Record Concert Season

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

A number of special volunteer programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the full orchestra under its noted conductor Serge Koussevitzky and a series of "jam sessions" for service personnel who could play instruments.

series of seven pairs of chamber concerts inaugurated, featuring the principals of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63d season on Oct. 8.

The Boston Symphony will open its 63rd season October 8.

THE HARTFORD TIMES, MONDA

MUSIC

Bostonians Active During Summer

By Carl E. Lindstrom

A summer without a Berkshire Festival should, it seems, result in fewer concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but the reverse is true. During the past year, the orchestra has played more concerts than in any season in all its history, a total of 242. This includes the Symphony Hall schedule, the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. The season lasted 304 days and thus, with a little simple arithmetic, we find that the orchestra played a concert every 30 hours.

Counting all seats occupied at all events, the total audience has been more than 850,000. How many of these were repeaters does not appear. That brings us into a field which has never been combed statistically, whether you take Boston, New York, Hartford or elsewhere. Just how many different persons attend concerts?

Adding up the "gate" at Bushnell for one season wouldn't give us the results at all, because, as everyone knows, the familiar faces are there night after night. Symphony audiences and the Sunday afternoon devotees are not entirely the same.

There is, no doubt, some overlapping in the Carnegie Hall crowd and the Metropolitan crowd, but it has probably been less than one might guess.

Can we say that there are 4,000 concert goers in Hartford? How many in New York? The Boston Orchestra's 850,000 listeners were not all Bostonians. Besides two dates here, concerts were given in Providence, New York, Brooklyn, New Haven, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

* * *

QUITE a number of concerts were devoted to the interests of servicemen or related benefits. At two concerts men and women in uniform were admitted free. There was a United Nations concert in Symphony Hall last October and a benefit for the United War Fund. "Pops" Conductor Arthur Fiedler and Concert Master Richard Burgin conducted a series of "jam sessions" at which all men in the service who could play any instrument whatever were invited to take part in impromptu performances. Members of the orchestra have played at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and the Naval Training Station at Newport.

The personnel has been little changed during the past season. Two men, Lawrence White and Willis Page, entered the service. Carl Stockbridge of the cello section died last December after 24 years of service.

The programs for the past season show interesting statistical data. Of 85 musical works heard, 16 were played for the first time at Symphony Hall concerts. Of the 47 composers represented, 13 either were born in this country or are living here.

* * *

THE 58th season of "Pop" concerts under Arthur Fiedler was extended to 70 nights. More than 100 special groups attended, including 32 schools and alumni associations, 64 clubs, relief groups, industrial and commercial organizations. On 13 nights, branches of the military service had special reservations.

The 15th season of Esplanade Concerts was performed in the Hatch Memorial on the Charles River Embankment from July 22 to Aug. 18, with performances each night (Mondays excepted). Certain nights were dedicated to the WAVES, the Coast Guard, the SPARS, the Marine Corps and the Spanish War Veterans.

The orchestra did get within hailing distance of its summer home. Four concerts were given in the library at Lenox under the auspices of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation Inc., for the benefit of the Red Cross.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL

SEP [illegible]

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES

SEP 1 - 1943

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

SEP 1 - 1943

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST-JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

SEP 1 - 1943

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

SEP 1 - 1943

Symphony Completes 242 Concerts

Boston—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

SEP 1 - 1943

SYMPHONY GAVE CONCERTS ONCE EVERY 30 HOURS

Boston (AP)—Boston Symphony orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today.

He said that a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

CORNING, N. Y.
LEADER

SEP 1 - 1943

242 CONCERTS

BOSTON —(AP)— The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed — averaging one every 30 hours — George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said a total of 242 concerts were performed within the season's length of 304 days and that total attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

PASTE OVER

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

SEP 3 - 1943

Our Town

by Arthur Peterson

Serge Koussevitzky On Musical Progress

A WEEK or so back the press reported that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, that Olympian personage in American music, had sent a personal message of congratulations to the Friends of Toledo Music.

What a remarkable honor for Toledo!—instant recognition by one of the greatest living masters of music; recognition of the import and potentialities of a community undertaking barely taking its first steps.

But the story was left only half told and for good reasons. This new-born Toledo group may be counted upon to lean over backwards to avoid becoming a mutual admiration society. It is conscious that much will need to be done; that the going-forward ought to be kept slow and thorough; that the first requisite is to convince the community that it is far from impotent musically and can have whatever it is willing to reach out for and take.

* * *

THE first step toward the third objective will be a musicale the evening of Sept. 28 in Macomber High School auditorium. An exceptional program has been planned and is being prepared. With one glittering exception which will be announced a bit later and which will give Toledo music another bright feather for its bonnet, all the musicians participating—about 30 in all—will be Toledo folk.

I am not at liberty yet to say who the conductor will be—he is the exception—but Toledo ought to sit up and take notice when it is told that the Man on Olympus, Dr. Koussevitzky no less, wanted the concert date arranged so that he could conduct the program himself when he comes to Toledo in December with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

EMMA ENDRES KOUNTZ, whose musical energy and vision made her president of the Friends, told Dr. Koussevitzky about the Toledo movement when she was in the east a few weeks ago on a concert tour.

Dr. Koussevitzky, she reports, crackled with excitement when she explained over luncheon what the Friends want to do and how they hope to go about it.

"But that is wonderful," he cried. "Nothing like it has been done before!"

His eager offer to conduct the debut musicale had to be declined because, of course, the problem of rehearsals would be left dangling. But there is little doubt that Dr. Koussevitzky's name will be among the first on the Friends' advisory committee.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S message to the Friends was routed through Mrs. Kountz and with it he sent some thoughts on underlying musical programs that I am authorized to present in this column.

Two questions in music, Dr. Koussevitzky says, are fundamental. One is, "How to listen to serious music not as an idle pastime, but so that the music will penetrate into the living consciousness of the people."

The other question, related, is "How and on what basis to bri about a fertile and creative conta between youth and their elders the field of professional musi activity."

* * *

ANSWERING himself, Dr. Kou sevitzky declares: "Insofar a practice of the work, and not th theory, is the essence of a livin culture, the solutions of these prob lems can be found only in th process of work itself.

"Let us say only in general term that reducing musical culture t basic lines, we divide it into tw main plans. In the first place the plan of general musical devel opment; that is to say, extra-professional musical education, within the reach of everyone and indispensable in some degree to all.

"The aim of the general musical development is to bring the wid masses closer to music and thereb introduce music into life, not in the accidental manner in which this happens in life, but in a cultural way.

* * *

IT IS AT this point that the general problems of culture attain a pre-eminent significance. I believe that general culture in a certain measure plays a more important role than even professional music education, just because of the participation of the masses which influences the course of culture and the very process of its development.

"In the sense in which we understand it, this problem is new in music and up to now has been little elaborated. It also requires new methods of work because it depends on the sensitiveness of the leader-professionals and on their ability to bring music closer to the general public, not through the simplification and impoverishment of art, but remaining at all times on that higher level on which art at the given moment stands.

* * *

IN WHAT does the active drawing of the wide masses nearer to music consist? It consists, with due regard to native creative ability, in breaking down the artificial barriers between the 'initiated' and the 'non-initiated'; in making the musical language as accessible to the general understanding, and emotion as is the spoken language; in exposing the meaning and evolution of all musical styles; in giving a feeling for and an understanding of the development and structure of music forms; in an invitation to practical participation in instrumental and vocal ensembles and so on.

"But the most important is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of vulgar amusement and musical diversions.

* * *

ONE of the greatest vices of European culture has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, we do not have this here to any such extent as in Europe.

"We well know that a man of action, in the true sense of the word, can only be called one whose actions are linked with the progress of the masses. It depends a great deal on us, therefore, to act in such a way as to make a severance between culture and the people quite impossible in the future."

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

SEP 2 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

SEP 2 - 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

SEP 2 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS (B'klyn Section)

SEP 2 - 1943

Orchestra Sets Concert Record

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said th a total of 242 concerts were performed in 304 days and that attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

arruments.

PETERSBURG, VA.
PROGRESS INDEX

SEP 5 - 1943

Berkshires Turned Back To First Owners By War

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Sept. 4—The war has turned back the Berkshires to their original owners. For more than a century the belt of western Massachusetts of which Pittsfield is the capital has been one of the few American resort areas where the "important" people were in control.

Then came the motor car, and the hordes. Inch by inch this invasion, with taxes and depression, forced back the men and women who used to drive the quiet roads in sway-backed carriages. "For Sale" signs began appearing in the middle 'thirties on even the most impressive estates.

Highway 7 became a bedlam. A trailer camp opened south of Pittsfield, roadside stands intruded, ye olde antique shoppes took over elm-shaded New England houses, and it was as much as a beagle's life was worth to try to cross a street.

Yet the staid "old crowd" was still prominent. Many of these objected seriously to the Berkshire Playhouse at Stockbridge, and even Serge Koussevitzky's festival at ~~Tanglewood offended~~ some, who thought Koussevitzky's music not worth the words and the fuss. These were partly placated by shrewd management — box-holders entered the grounds by a separate gate, and entered the music shed from a different side.

Quiet Now

Now things are quiet. There is no Festival, and the Playhouse has been closed two summers. The roadside stands, most of them, bear signs reading "Closed for Duration," and even the antique shoppes outside the charmed villages of Lenox, Stockbridge, Great Barrington and so on have mostly faded away.

Only one artistic venture of national reputation still runs—Ted Shawn's dance school and modest festival at Jacob's Pillow, near Lee. Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution this summer is only a short series of chamber concerts at the Lenox library, and the big parties that once brought together the people-who-matter simply do not exist.

Only about two-thirds of the really big places are open, and the life there is so reduced as to be like a scene viewed backward through a telescope.

Tea consumption has dropped, too. The "important" villages seem peculiarly empty through the day, as indeed they are. The youth is in service, some a few miles north in Williams College, now altogether in the hands of the Navy. Their fathers are reservists called up, or are tied to their war plant desks, or are in Washington or abroad for civilian war jobs. Their mothers and sisters are doing a great job in nurses' aid, Red Cross, the Motor Corps, or on the line in the Pittsfield General Electric plant. Some of them are taking over gardens—vegetable, not flower. Nobody has much time for chit-chat.

Old Inns

One of the sights of the Berkshires has been the clientele of the great old inns in the district—the Red Lion and Heaton Hall at Stockbridge, the Curtis at Lenox, the Berkshire Inn at Great Barrington, and such places. Most of the patrons are on the dark side of 50, and many have been returning each summer to their favorite porch chair for three or four decades.

They were not happy when thousands of tourists invaded their domain. Luggage being dragged in and out, and espacially the hordes that besieged the dining room on week ends—during Dr. Koussevitsky's festival, proved pretty distracting.

Now the hundreds of sugar bowls and tea pots that line the walls of the Red Lion no longer jiggle to hurrying boots. The patrons who used to have two or three rooms and lately were forced into one, again have their extra space. Heaton Treadway estimates that the loss of the Tanglewood festival has cost his Red Lion $20,000, and the other inns proportionately. But the space is taken, the inns are full, and the managers need not worry about how to feed the extras.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

SEP 5 -

"Go-as-you-please symphonies" as the Esplanade concerts in Boston have been termed could happen only in America. Gov. Leverett Saltonstall sat down on the grass along with thousands of others to hear the first of these informal concerts on the bank of the historic Charles river. The concerts began at 7 o'clock and closed at 9 o'clock before the dim-out rules should go into effect. They are on what is known as the Embankment with the Cambridge shore and the Memorial drive seen across the waters—once a twinkling array of lights reflected in the waters—now dimmed in black-out laws. The concerts began this season at 7 o'clock and clos at 9.

The most successful season in the history of the series inaugurated by Boston's pop conductor, Arthur Fiedler in 1929, the concerts have included composers varying from Bach to Sousa—and Alec Templeton. Playing every night but one Wednesday mornings featured children's concerts. The concerts are not subsidized, but are supported by voluntary contributions, many generous donors adding to the daily chance to drop coins in a spot at the entrance.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish advocate - Sept 2, 1943

By JULES WOLFFERS

Summer Series Closed

With Richard Burgin conducting a group of about 25 string players, the summer series of chamber concerts by principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a close last Monday evening at New England Mutual Hall. The same program had been heard the previous afternoon at Harvard's Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Three varied and absorbing numbers were performed: Schoenberg's string sextet, "Verklarte Nacht," played by the massed strings; Largo Mesto, from the Concerto No. 3 for cello and strings, by C. P. E. Bach, with Jean Bedetti the soloist; and Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 132, arranged for string orchestra. Two pieces for string octet by Shostakovich were to have opened the program but a mix-up in the music parts intervened.

It is evident that the musicians respect Mr. Burgin's musicianship and authority. Next to Dr. Koussevitzky, they play best for their concertmaster. As a result, the concert went off very well indeed, with Mr. Bedetti producing some beautiful tone in the Bach and with the Beethoven quartet sounding remarkably effective with the full body of strings.

As a whole, the entire series of seven concerts was most enjoyable. Each program was distinctly worthwhile and if some were better than others, that's only to be expected. If, however, the question were put, did the concerts as a whole come up to the standards set by the sponsoring group in its regular concerts, the answer would have to be a decided negative.

After all, here we have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the greatest orchestras (at very least) in the world, initiating and sponsoring a group of chamber concerts utilizing its leading players. We therefore have the right to expect a level of performance at least equal to that of the regular season; conducting of a sort to leave no question in mind; and ensemble of a distinctly superior kind. Unfortunately, these were not always present to the degree we had the right to expect.

Now, one can not altogether blame the musicians. Surely the policy of multiple conductorship wreaked enough havoc with the New York Philharmonic for sponsors of the chamber series to have realized its dangers. In its own way these concerts should have had all the distinction and eclat of the regular series. Only a conductor thought worthy to conduct a regular Boston Symphony concert should have been chosen. To do otherwise immediately meant the relegation of the chamber series to second rank. Of course, one or, at most, two conductors should have been used. This would have given an opportunity to the players, some of whom were in every program, to become a cohesive unit. This is not to decry the talent of any of the conductors; Mr. Burgin and Mr. Zighera are first-class, while others showed rare promise. But one wonders how many, in addition to Mr. Burgin, would have been chosen to guest-conduct the Symphony in the winter season.

As for ensemble and performance, shortcomings noted were probably due at times to conductor trouble and perhaps also to insufficient rehearsal. It is axiomatic that the smaller the group, the more rehearsals are needed. While a symphony orchestra can put on a modern work with perhaps three or four rehearsals, a string quartet, say, will lavish hour upon hour of rehearsal and study before daring to perform publicly a new quartet, or even an old one, for that matter. True, there are practical difficulties involved, but two rehearsals or so are not enough to put on a really fine program of chamber music, the musicians' opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. Something will have to be done about this matter of rehearsal time for serious music. Such concerts must not be restricted by commercial standards and by red tape. But whatever the difficulties, more rehearsal time would have been to great advantage.

One must not get the impression from the foregoing that the concerts were not a success. This they were, decidedly, and, as said previously, every concert was interesting and most worthwhile. If we expect a great deal from any musical venture under so direct a sponsorship of our Boston Symphony, it is only because the Symphony itself has set these high standards.

Concert

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 5 - 1943

Boston Symphony Season

Organization Presented 242 Concerts During Last Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which completed its sixty-second season last week, reports record number of concerts given during the last year. Taking summer performances and those given for the armed forces into account 242 concerts were given throughout the season. The total attendance is estimated at more than 850,000 persons.

The orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave sixty concerts in its regular Boston season, and forty-five concerts in other cities, plus seven concerts in connection with other activities. Members of the orchestra have played in seventy "Pop" concerts, twenty-eight Esplanade concerts, fourteen chamber concerts, twelve service or benefit concerts in camps and other places, and six youth concerts.

PASTE OVER

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

SEP 3 - 1943

Our Town

by Arthur Peterson

Serge Koussevitzky On Musical Progress

A WEEK or so back the press reported that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, that Olympian personage in American music, had sent a personal message of congratulations to the Friends of Toledo Music.

What a remarkable honor for Toledo!—instant recognition by one of the greatest living masters of music; recognition of the import and potentialities of a community undertaking barely taking its first steps.

But the story was left only half told and for good reasons. This new-born Toledo group may be counted upon to lean over backwards to avoid becoming a mutual admiration society. It is conscious that much will need to be done; that the going-forward ought to be kept slow and thorough; that the first requisite is to convince the community that it is far from impotent musically and can have whatever it is willing to reach out for and take.

* * *

THE first step toward the third objective will be a musicale the evening of Sept. 28 in Macomber High School auditorium. An exceptional program has been planned and is being prepared. With one glittering exception which will be announced a bit later and which will give Toledo music another bright feather for its bonnet, all the musicians participating—about 30 in all—will be Toledo folk.

I am not at liberty yet to say who the conductor will be—he is the exception—but Toledo ought to sit up and take notice when it is told that the Man on Olympus, Dr. Koussevitzky no less, wanted the concert date arranged so that he could conduct the program himself when he comes to Toledo in December with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

EMMA ENDRES KOUNTZ, whose musical energy and vision made her president of the Friends, told Dr. Koussevitzky about the Toledo movement when she was in the east a few weeks ago on a concert tour.

Dr. Koussevitzky, she reports, crackled with excitement when she explained over luncheon what the Friends want to do and how they hope to go about it.

"But that is wonderful," he cried. "Nothing like it has been done before!"

His eager offer to conduct the debut musicale had to be declined because, of course, the problem of rehearsals would be left dangling. But there is little doubt that Dr. Koussevitzky's name will be among the first on the Friends' advisory committee.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S message to the Friends was routed through Mrs. Kountz and with it he sent some thoughts on underlying musical programs that I am authorized to present in this column.

Two questions in music, Dr. Koussevitzky says, are fundamental. One is, "How to listen to serious music not as an idle pastime, but so that the music will penetrate into the living consciousness of the people."

The other question, related, is "How and on what basis to bring about a fertile and creative contact between youth and their elders in the field of professional music activity."

* * *

ANSWERING himself, Dr. Koussevitzky declares: "Insofar as practice of the work, and not the theory, is the essence of a living culture, the solutions of these problems can be found only in the process of work itself.

"Let us say only in general terms that reducing musical culture to basic lines, we divide it into two main plans. In the first place is the plan of general musical development; that is to say, extra-professional musical education, within the reach of everyone and indispensable in some degree to all.

"The aim of the general musical development is to bring the wide masses closer to music and thereby introduce music into life, not in the accidental manner in which this happens in life, but in a cultural way.

* * *

IT IS AT this point that the general problems of culture attain a pre-eminent significance. I believe that general culture in a certain measure plays a more important role than even professional music education, just because of the participation of the masses which influences the course of culture and the very process of its development.

"In the sense in which we understand it, this problem is new in music and up to now has been little elaborated. It also requires new methods of work because it depends on the sensitiveness of the leader-professionals and on their ability to bring music closer to the general public, not through the simplification and impoverishment of art, but remaining at all times on that higher level on which art at the given moment stands.

* * *

IN WHAT does the active drawing of the wide masses nearer to music consist? It consists, with due regard to native creative ability, in breaking down the artificial barriers between the 'initiated' and the 'non-initiated'; in making the musical language as accessible to the general understanding, and emotion as is the spoken language; in exposing the meaning and evolution of all musical styles; in giving a feeling for and an understanding of the development and structure of music forms; in an invitation to practical participation in instrumental and vocal ensembles and so on.

"But the most important is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of vulgar amusement and musical diversions.

* * *

ONE of the greatest vices of European culture has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, we do not have this here to any such extent as in Europe.

"We well know that a man of action, in the true sense of the word, can only be called one whose actions are linked with the progress of the masses. It depends a great deal on us, therefore, to act in such a way as to make a severance between culture and the people quite impossible in the future."

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

SEP 2 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

SEP 2 - 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

SEP 2 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS (B'klyn Section)

SEP 2 - 1943

Orchestra Sets Concert Record

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said th a total of 242 concerts were performed in 304 days and that attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

struments.

PETERSBURG, VA.
PROGRESS INDEX

Berkshires Turned Back To First Owners By War

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Sept. 4—The war has turned back the Berkshires to their original owners. For more than a century the belt of western Massachusetts of which Pittsfield is the capital has been one of the few American resort areas where the "important" people were in control.

Then came the motor car, and the hordes. Inch by inch this invasion, with taxes and depression, forced back the men and women who used to drive the quiet roads in sway-backed carriages. "For Sale" signs began appearing in the middle 'thirties on even the most impressive estates.

Highway 7 became a bedlam. A trailer camp opened south of Pittsfield, roadside stands intruded, ye olde antique shoppes took over elm-shaded New England houses, and it was as much as a beagle's life was worth to try to cross a street.

Yet the staid "old crowd" was still prominent. Many of these objected seriously to the Berkshire Playhouse at Stockbridge, and even Serge Koussevitzky's festival at ~~Tanglewood offended~~ some, who thought Koussevitzky's music not worth the words and the fuss. These were partly placated by shrewd management — box-holders entered the grounds by a separate gate, and entered the music shed from a different side.

Quiet Now

Now things are quiet. There is no Festival, and the Playhouse has been closed two summers. The roadside stands, most of them, bear signs reading "Closed for Duration," and even the antique shoppes outside the charmed villages of Lenox, Stockbridge, Great Barrington and so on have mostly faded away.

Only one artistic venture of national reputation still runs—Ted Shawn's dance school and modest festival at Jacob's Pillow, near Lee. Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution this summer is only a short series of chamber concerts at the Lenox library, and the big parties that once brought together the people-who-matter simply do not exist.

Only about two-thirds of the really big places are open, and the life there is so reduced as to be like a scene viewed backward through a telescope.

Tea consumption has dropped, too. The "important" villages seem peculiarly empty through the day, as indeed they are. The youth is in service, some a few miles north in Williams College, now altogether in the hands of the Navy. Their fathers are reservists called up, or are tied to their war plant desks, or are in Washington or abroad for civilian war jobs. Their mothers and sisters are doing a great job in nurses' aid, Red Cross, the Motor Corps, or on the line in the Pittsfield General Electric plant. Some of them are taking over gardens—vegetable, not flower. Nobody has much time for chit-chat.

Old Inns

One of the sights of the Berkshires has been the clientele of the great old inns in the district—the Red Lion and Heaton Hall at Stockbridge, the Curtis at Lenox, the Berkshire Inn at Great Barrington, and such places. Most of the patrons are on the dark side of 50, and many have been returning each summer to their favorite porch chair for three or four decades.

They were not happy when thousands of tourists invaded their domain. Luggage being dragged in and out, and espacially the hordes that besieged the dining room on week ends—during Dr. Koussevitsky's festival, proved pretty distracting.

Now the hundreds of sugar bowls and tea pots that line the walls of the Red Lion no longer jiggle to hurrying boots. The patrons who used to have two or three rooms and lately were forced into one, again have their extra space. Heaton Treadway estimates that the loss of the Tanglewood festival has cost his Red Lion $20,000, and the other inns proportionately. But the space is taken, the inns are full, and the managers need not worry about how to feed the extras.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

P 5

"Go-as-you-please symphonies" as the Esplanade concerts in Boston have been termed could happen only in America. Gov. Leverett Saltonstall sat down on the grass along with thousands of others to hear the first of these informal concerts on the bank of the historic Charles river. The concerts began at 7 o'clock and closed at 9 o'clock before the dim-out rules should go into effect. They are on what is known as the Embankment with the Cambridge shore and the Memorial drive seen across the waters—once a twinkling array of lights reflected in the waters—now dimmed in black-out laws. The concerts began this season at 7 o'clock and clos at 9.

The most successful season in the history of the series inaugurated by Boston's pop conductor, Arthur Fiedler in 1929, the concerts have included composers varying from Bach to Sousa—and Alec Templeton. Playing every night but one Wednesday mornings featured children's concerts. The concerts are not subsidized, but are supported by voluntary contributions, many generous donors adding to the daily chance to drop coins in a spot at the entrance.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish advocate - Sept 2, 1943

By JULES WOLFFERS

Summer Series Closed

With Richard Burgin conducting a group of about 25 string players, the summer series of chamber concerts by principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a close last Monday evening at New England Mutual Hall. The same program had been heard the previous afternoon at Harvard's Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Three varied and absorbing numbers were performed: Schoenberg's string sextet, "Verklarte Nacht," played by the massed strings; Largo Mesto, from the Concerto No. 3 for cello and strings, by C. P. E. Bach, with Jean Bedetti the soloist; and Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 132, arranged for string orchestra. Two pieces for string octet by Shostakovich were to have opened the program but a mix-up in the music parts intervened.

It is evident that the musicians respect Mr. Burgin's musicianship and authority. Next to Dr. Koussevitzky, they play best for their concertmaster. As a result, the concert went off very well indeed, with Mr. Bedetti producing some beautiful tone in the Bach and with the Beethoven quartet sounding remarkably effective with the full body of strings.

As a whole, the entire series of seven concerts was most enjoyable. Each program was distinctly worthwhile and if some were better than others, that's only to be expected. If, however, the question were put, did the concerts as a whole come up to the standards set by the sponsoring group in its regular concerts, the answer would have to be a decided negative.

After all, here we have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the greatest orchestras (at very least) in the world, initiating and sponsoring a group of chamber concerts utilizing its leading players. We therefore have the right to expect a level of performance at least equal to that of the regular season; conducting of a sort to leave no question in mind; and ensemble of a distinctly superior kind. Unfortunately, these were not always present to the degree we had the right to expect.

Now, one can not altogether blame the musicians. Surely the policy of multiple conductorship wreaked enough havoc with the New York Philharmonic for sponsors of the chamber series to have realized its dangers. In its own way these concerts should have had all the distinction and eclat of the regular series. Only a conductor thought worthy to conduct a regular Boston Symphony concert should have been chosen. To do otherwise immediately meant the relegation of the chamber series to second rank. Of course, one or, at most, two conductors should have been used. This would have given an opportunity to the players, some of whom were in every program, to become a cohesive unit. This is not to decry the talent of any of the conductors; Mr. Burgin and Mr. Zighera are first-class, while others showed rare promise. But one wonders how many, in addition to Mr. Burgin, would have been chosen to guest-conduct the Symphony in the winter season.

As for ensemble and performance, shortcomings noted were probably due at times to conductor trouble and perhaps also to insufficient rehearsal. It is axiomatic that the smaller the group, the more rehearsals are needed. While a symphony orchestra can put on a modern work with perhaps three or four rehearsals, a string quartet, say, will lavish hour upon hour of rehearsal and study before daring to perform publicly a new quartet, or even an old one, for that matter. True, there are practical difficulties involved, but two rehearsals or so are not enough to put on a really fine program of chamber music, the musicians' opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. Something will have to be done about this matter of rehearsal time for serious music. Such concerts must not be restricted by commercial standards and by red tape. But whatever the difficulties, more rehearsal time would have been to great advantage.

One must not get the impression from the foregoing that the concerts were not a success. This they were, decidedly, and, as said previously, every concert was interesting and most worthwhile. If we expect a great deal from any musical venture under so direct a sponsorship of our Boston Symphony, it is only because the Symphony itself has set these high standards.

Concert

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 5 - 1943

Boston Symphony Season

Organization Presented 242 Concerts During Last Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which completed its sixty second season last week, reports record number of concerts given during the last year. Taking summer performances and those given for the armed forces into account 242 concerts were given throughout the season. The total attendance is estimated at more than 850,000 persons.

The orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave sixty concerts in its regular Boston season, and forty-five concerts in other cities, plus seven concerts in connection with other activities Members of the orchestra have played in seventy "Pop" concerts, twenty-eight Esplanade concerts, fourteen chamber concerts, twelve service or benefit concerts in camps and other places, and six youth concerts.

PASTE OVER

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

SEP 3 - 1943

Our Town

by Arthur Peterson

Serge Koussevitzky On Musical Progress

A WEEK or so back the press reported that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, that Olympian personage in American music, had sent a personal message of congratulations to the Friends of Toledo Music.

What a remarkable honor for Toledo!—instant recognition by one of the greatest living masters of music; recognition of the import and potentialities of a community undertaking barely taking its first steps.

But the story was left only half told and for good reasons. This new-born Toledo group may be counted upon to lean over backwards to avoid becoming a mutual admiration society. It is conscious that much will need to be done; that the going-forward ought to be kept slow and thorough; that the first requisite is to convince the community that it is far from impotent musically and can have whatever it is willing to reach out for and take.

* * *

THE first step toward the third objective will be a musicale the evening of Sept. 28 in Macomber High School auditorium. An exceptional program has been planned and is being prepared. With one glittering exception which will be announced a bit later and which will give Toledo music another bright feather for its bonnet, all the musicians participating—about 30 in all—will be Toledo folk.

I am not at liberty yet to say who the conductor will be—he is the exception—but Toledo ought to sit up and take notice when it is told that the Man on Olympus, Dr. Koussevitzky no less, wanted the concert date arranged so that he could conduct the program himself when he comes to Toledo in December with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

EMMA ENDRES KOUNTZ, whose musical energy and vision made her president of the Friends, told Dr. Koussevitzky about the Toledo movement when she was in the east a few weeks ago on a concert tour.

Dr. Koussevitzky, she reports, crackled with excitement when she explained over luncheon what the Friends want to do and how they hope to go about it.

"But that is wonderful," he cried. "Nothing like it has been done before!"

His eager offer to conduct the debut musicale had to be declined because, of course, the problem of rehearsals would be left dangling. But there is little doubt that Dr. Koussevitzky's name will be among the first on the Friends' advisory committee.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S message to the Friends was routed through Mrs. Kountz and with it he sent some thoughts on underlying musical programs that I am authorized to present in this column.

Two questions in music, Dr. Koussevitzky says, are fundamental. One is, "How to listen to serious music not as an idle pastime, but so that the music will penetrate into the living consciousness of the people."

The other question, related, is "How and on what basis to bring about a fertile and creative contact between youth and their elders in the field of professional musical activity."

* * *

ANSWERING himself, Dr. Koussevitzky declares: "Insofar as practice of the work, and not the theory, is the essence of a living culture, the solutions of these problems can be found only in the process of work itself.

"Let us say only in general terms that reducing musical culture to basic lines, we divide it into two main plans. In the first place is the plan of general musical development; that is to say, extra-professional musical education, within the reach of everyone and indispensable in some degree to all.

"The aim of the general musical development is to bring the wide masses closer to music and thereby introduce music into life, not in the accidental manner in which this happens in life, but in a cultural way.

* * *

IT IS AT this point that the general problems of culture attain a pre-eminent significance. I believe that general culture in a certain measure plays a more important role than even professional music education, just because of the participation of the masses which influences the course of culture and the very process of its development.

"In the sense in which we understand it, this problem is new in music and up to now has been little elaborated. It also requires new methods of work because it depends on the sensitiveness of the leader-professionals and on their ability to bring music closer to the general public, not through the simplification and impoverishment of art, but remaining at all times on that higher level on which art at the given moment stands.

* * *

IN WHAT does the active drawing of the wide masses nearer to music consist? It consists, with due regard to native creative ability, in breaking down the artificial barriers between the 'initiated' and the 'non-initiated'; in making the musical language as accessible to the general understanding, and emotion as is the spoken language; in exposing the meaning and evolution of all musical styles; in giving a feeling for and an understanding of the development and structure of music forms; in an invitation to practical participation in instrumental and vocal ensembles and so on.

"But the most important is to introduce into the consciousness of listeners the truly spiritual essence of music, which stands high above the level of vulgar amusement and musical diversions.

* * *

ONE of the greatest vices of European culture has been that art was detached from the people. Fortunately, we do not have this here to any such extent as in Europe.

"We well know that a man of action, in the true sense of the word, can only be called one whose actions are linked with the progress of the masses. It depends a great deal on us, therefore, to act in such a way as to make a severance between culture and the people quite impossible in the future."

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

SEP 2 - 1943

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

SEP 2 - 1943

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

SEP 2 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
S (B'klyn Section)

SEP 2 - 1943

rchestra Sets Concert Record

Boston, Sept. 1 (AP).—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a record number of concerts during the season just completed—averaging one every 30 hours—George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, announced today. He said th a total of 242 concerts were performed in 304 days and that attendance was estimated at more than 850,000.

struments.

PETERSBURG, VA.
PROGRESS INDEX

Berkshires Turned Back To First Owners By War

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Sept. 4—The war has turned back the Berkshires to their original owners. For more than a century the belt of western Massachusetts of which Pittsfield is the capital has been one of the few American resort areas where the "important" people were in control.

Then came the motor car, and the hordes. Inch by inch this invasion, with taxes and depression, forced back the men and women who used to drive the quiet roads in sway-backed carriages. "For Sale" signs began appearing in the middle 'thirties on even the most impressive estates.

Highway 7 became a bedlam. A trailer camp opened south of Pittsfield, roadside stands intruded, ye olde antique shoppes took over elm-shaded New England houses, and it was as much as a beagle's life was worth to try to cross a street.

Yet the staid "old crowd" was still prominent. Many of these objected seriously to the Berkshire Playhouse at Stockbridge, and even Serge Koussevitzky's festival at ~~Tanglewood offended~~ some, who thought Koussevitzky's music not worth the words and the fuss. These were partly placated by shrewd management—box-holders entered the grounds by a separate gate, and entered the music shed from a different side.

Quiet Now

Now things are quiet. There is no Festival, and the Playhouse has been closed two summers. The roadside stands, most of them, bear signs reading "Closed for Duration," and even the antique shoppes outside the charmed villages of Lenox, Stockbridge, Great Barrington and so on have mostly faded away.

Only one artistic venture of national reputation still runs—Ted Shawn's dance school and modest festival at Jacob's Pillow, near Lee. Dr. Koussevitzky's contribution this summer is only a short series of chamber concerts at the Lenox library, and the big parties that once brought together the people-who-matter simply do not exist.

Only about two-thirds of the really big places are open, and the life there is so reduced as to be like a scene viewed backward through a telescope.

Tea consumption has dropped, too. The "important" villages seem peculiarly empty through the day, as indeed they are. The youth is in service, some a few miles north in Williams College, now altogether in the hands of the Navy. Their fathers are reservists called up, or are tied to their war plant desks, or are in Washington or abroad for civilian war jobs. Their mothers and sisters are doing a great job in nurses' aid, Red Cross, the Motor Corps, or on the line in the Pittsfield General Electric plant. Some of them are taking over gardens—vegetable, not flower. Nobody has much time for chit-chat.

Old Inns

One of the sights of the Berkshires has been the clientele of the great old inns in the district—the Red Lion and Heaton Hall at Stockbridge, the Curtis at Lenox, the Berkshire Inn at Great Barrington, and such places. Most of the patrons are on the dark side of 50, and many have been returning each summer to their favorite porch chair for three or four decades.

They were not happy when thousands of tourists invaded their domain. Luggage being dragged in and out, and espacially the hordes that besieged the dining room on week ends—during Dr. Koussevitsky's festival, proved pretty distracting.

Now the hundreds of sugar bowls and tea pots that line the walls of the Red Lion no longer jiggle to hurrying boots. The patrons who used to have two or three rooms and lately were forced into one, again have their extra space. Heaton Treadway estimates that the loss of the Tanglewood festival has cost his Red Lion $20,000, and the other inns proportionately. But the space is taken, the inns are full, and the managers need not worry about how to feed the extras.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

"Go-as-you-please symphonies" as the Esplanade concerts in Boston have been termed could happen only in America. Gov. Leverett Saltonstall sat down on the grass along with thousands of others to hear the first of these informal concerts on the bank of the historic Charles river. The concerts began at 7 o'clock and closed at 9 o'clock before the dim-out rules should go into effect. They are on what is known as the Embankment with the Cambridge shore and the Memorial drive seen across the waters—once a twinkling array of lights reflected in the waters—now dimmed in black-out laws. The concerts began this season at 7 o'clock and clos at 9.

The most successful season in the history of the series inaugurated by Boston's pop conductor, Arthur Fiedler in 1929, the concerts have included composers varying from Bach to Sousa—and Alec Templeton. Playing every night but one Wednesday mornings featured children's concerts. The concerts are not subsidized, but are supported by voluntary contributions, many generous donors adding to the daily chance to drop coins in a spot at the entrance.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Jewish advocate - Sept 2, 1943

By JULES WOLFFERS

Summer Series Closed

With Richard Burgin conducting a group of about 25 string players, the summer series of chamber concerts by principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a close last Monday evening at New England Mutual Hall. The same program had been heard the previous afternoon at Harvard's Sanders Theatre in Cambridge.

Three varied and absorbing numbers were performed: Schoenberg's string sextet, "Verklarte Nacht," played by the massed strings; Largo Mesto, from the Concerto No. 3 for cello and strings, by C. P. E. Bach, with Jean Bedetti the soloist; and Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 132, arranged for string orchestra. Two pieces for string octet by Shostakovich were to have opened the program but a mix-up in the music parts intervened.

It is evident that the musicians respect Mr. Burgin's musicianship and authority. Next to Dr. Koussevitzky, they play best for their concertmaster. As a result, the concert went off very well indeed, with Mr. Bedetti producing some beautiful tone in the Bach and with the Beethoven quartet sounding remarkably effective with the full body of strings.

As a whole, the entire series of seven concerts was most enjoyable. Each program was distinctly worthwhile and if some were better than others, that's only to be expected. If, however, the question were put, did the concerts as a whole come up to the standards set by the sponsoring group in its regular concerts, the answer would have to be a decided negative.

After all, here we have the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the greatest orchestras (at very least) in the world, initiating and sponsoring a group of chamber concerts utilizing its leading players. We therefore have the right to expect a level of performance at least equal to that of the regular season; conducting of a sort to leave no question in mind; and ensemble of a distinctly superior kind. Unfortunately, these were not always present to the degree we had the right to expect.

Now, one can not altogether blame the musicians. Surely the policy of multiple conductorship wreaked enough havoc with the New York Philharmonic for sponsors of the chamber series to have realized its dangers. In its own way these concerts should have had all the distinction and eclat of the regular series. Only a conductor thought worthy to conduct a regular Boston Symphony concert should have been chosen. To do otherwise immediately meant the relegation of the chamber series to second rank. Of course, one or, at most, two conductors should have been used. This would have given an opportunity to the players, some of whom were in every program, to become a cohesive unit. This is not to decry the talent of any of the conductors; Mr. Burgin and Mr. Zighera are first-class, while others showed rare promise. But one wonders how many, in addition to Mr. Burgin, would have been chosen to guest-conduct the Symphony in the winter season.

As for ensemble and performance, shortcomings noted were probably due at times to conductor trouble and perhaps also to insufficient rehearsal. It is axiomatic that the smaller the group, the more rehearsals are needed. While a symphony orchestra can put on a modern work with perhaps three or four rehearsals, a string quartet, say, will lavish hour upon hour of rehearsal and study before daring to perform publicly a new quartet, or even an old one, for that matter. True, there are practical difficulties involved, but two rehearsals or so are not enough to put on a really fine program of chamber music, the musicians' opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. Something will have to be done about this matter of rehearsal time for serious music. Such concerts must not be restricted by commercial standards and by red tape. But whatever the difficulties, more rehearsal time would have been to great advantage.

One must not get the impression from the foregoing that the concerts were not a success. This they were, decidedly, and, as said previously, every concert was interesting and most worthwhile. If we expect a great deal from any musical venture under so direct a sponsorship of our Boston Symphony, it is only because the Symphony itself has set these high standards.

[4]

Concert

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 5 - 1943

Boston Symphony Season

Organization Presented 242 Concerts During Last Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which completed its sixty second season last week, reports record number of concerts given during the last year. Taking summer performances and those given for the armed forces into account 242 concerts were given throughout the season. The total attendance is estimated at more than 850,000 persons.

The orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, gave sixty concerts in its regular Boston season, and forty-five concerts in other cities, plus seven concerts in connection with other activities Members of the orchestra have played in seventy "Pop" concerts, twenty-eight Esplanade concerts, fourteen chamber concerts, twelve service or benefit concerts in camps and other places, and six youth concerts.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 5 - 1943

Boston Symphony Gave 242 Concerts

Springfield and Northampton Among 45 Cities to Hear Orchestra During Tour — Total Attendance for 1942-1943 Season Estimated at 850,000 — New Season Opens October 8

THE 62D season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, just completed, was the busiest in its history with 242 concerts performed within the 304 days alloted to activities. Total attendance is estimated at more than 850,000 for the past year.

With its new season opening on October 8, the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave 60 regular concerts in Boston during 1942-43 and 45 in other cities. Seventy "Pop" concerts were presented by members of the orchestra; 28 at the Esplanade; 14, chamber music in Cambridge; six youth concerts and 12 for the service at camps and elsewhere.

The Winter Concerts

The regular season (October 9 to May 1) of 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts and six pairs of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall included on the season's programs 85 musical works, of which 16 were heard for the first time at these concerts; 13 of the 47 composers represented were born in this country or are living here. Outside of Boston eight concerts were given in Cambridge, five in Providence, 10 in New York city, five in Brooklyn, two in Hartford, two in New Haven, two in Pittsburg. There were single concerts in Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, New London, Springfield, Philadelphia, Northampton, Worcester and New Brunswick.

The Summer Concerts

The 58th season of "Pop" concerts under Arthur Fiedler was extended to 70 nights (May 4 to July 17). More than 100 special groups were "among those present," including 32 schools and alumni associations, 64 clubs, relief groups, industrial and commercial organizations. On 13 nights, branches of the military service had special reservations. The 15th season of Esplanade concerts, Arthur Fiedler conducting, was performed in the Hatch memorial on the Charles River embankment from July 22 to August 18, with performances each night (Mondays excepted). Certain nights were dedicated to the WAVES, the coast guard and SPARS, the marine corps, and the Spanish War Veterans.

A new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given on Sunday afternoons in Cambridge and Monday evenings in Boston from July 11 to August 30.

A summer without a Berkshire festival became a summer of music in Boston, with the "Pops" season extended two weeks, the esplanade season one week longer than usual. The chamber series further extended the season to a total length of 48 weeks and was performed by the principals of the Boston Symphony orchestra and others who have been prominent in the Berkshire Music center in Tanglewood at this time of the year. Meanwhile, four concerts were given in the library at Lenox, under the auspices of tthe Koussevitzky Music Foundation, inc., for the benefit of the Red Cross.

Concerts for the Service

The orchestra voluntarily, as a whole or in part, gave a number of special performances for men and women in war service during the season past. Two concerts were given in Symphony hall by the full orchestra under Dr Koussevitzky on Sunday afternoons, December 20 and March 28, at which men and women in uniform were admitted free of charge. At a united nations concert in Symphony hall on October 11 an orchestra of symphony players participated, and on January 4, in Symphony hall, the full orchestra appeared under Dr Koussevitzky for the benefit of the United War fund. The orchestra and its regular conductor also visited Camp Myles Standish in Taunton to give two performances on April 20. Members of the orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler or Richard Burgin, gave concerts at Fort Devens, December 2, and Camp Edwards, January 31, and at the naval training station at Newport, R. I., April 18. Three victory concerts were given at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts November 1, December 27, and March 7, Arthur Fiedler conducting. A Russian war relief concert was given by members of the orchestra under Mr Fiedler at the Memorial auditorium in Lowell on August 16. Mr Fiedler and Mr Burgin conducted a series of weekly "jam sessions" for which St Paul's cathedral provided a room. All men in the service who could play an instrument were invited to participate in these extemporary performances.

Broadcasting

Since December 26, 1942, the Saturday concerts in Boston have been broadcast over the Blue network; 15 symphony concerts, 11 "pop" concerts, and four Esplanade concerts. (These broadcasts will continue on Saturday nights through the coming season).

Personnel

The orchestra's membership has undergone little change during the past season. Carl Stockbridge, a member of the 'cello section, died last December after 24 years of service. Two members of the orchestra have entered the armed forces—Lawrence White, who received a commission as first lieutenant in musical work, and Willis Page. Two regular and 15 part-time employes of Symphony hall are now in the service.

Symphony Hall

In the year just closing, Symphony hall was used 319 times. The major use was by the orchestra—251 times, of which 116 were rehearsals, 65 were symphony concerts, and 70 were "pop" concerts. In addition, the orchestra took part at a public meeting to open the Greater Boston United War fund campaign.

OGDENSBURG, N. Y.
JOURNAL

SEP 7 - 1943

Just in Passing

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has set a production record of its own for the past season. Some 50,000 concertgoers attended performances of the orchestra, and 242 concerts were performed within 304 days, an average of one concert every 30 hours, not including rehearsals. An extended "pop" season this summer, a new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts, and special volunteer programs for men and women in the armed services topped off the schedule.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 6 - 1943

MUSIC

Bostonians Active During Summer

By Carl E. Lindstrom

A summer without a Berkshire Festival should, it seems, result in fewer concerts played by the Boston Symphony orchestra, but the reverse is true. During the past year, the orchestra has played more concerts than in any season in all its history, a total of 242. This includes the Symphony Hall schedule, the "Pops" and Esplanade concerts. The season lasted 304 days and thus, with a little simple arithmetic, we find that the orchestra played a concert every 30 hours.

Counting all seats occupied at all events, the total audience has been more than 850,000. How many of these were repeaters does not appear. That brings us into a field which has never been combed statistically, whether you take Boston, New York, Hartford or elsewhere. Just how many different persons attend concerts?

Adding up the "gate" at Bushnell for one season wouldn't give us the results at all, because, as everyone knows, the familiar faces are there night after night. Symphony audiences and the Sunday afternoon devotees are not entirely the same.

There is, no doubt, some overlapping in the Carnegie Hall crowd and the Metropolitan crowd, but it has probably been less than one might guess.

Can we say that there are 4,000 concert goers in Hartford? How many in New York? The Boston Orchestra's 850,000 listeners were not all Bostonians. Besides two dates here, concerts were given in Providence, New York, Brooklyn, New Haven, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

* * *

QUITE a number of concerts were devoted to the interests of servicemen or related benefits. At two concerts men and women in uniform were admitted free. There was a United Nations concert in Symphony Hall last October and a benefit for the United War Fund. "Pops" Conductor Arthur Fiedler and Concert Master Richard Burgin conducted a series of "jam sessions" at which all men in the service who could play any instrument whatever were invited to take part in impromptu performances. Members of the orchestra have played at Fort Devens, Camp Edwards and the Naval Training Station at Newport.

The personnel has been little changed during the past season. Two men, Lawrence White and Willis Page, entered the service. Carl Stockbridge of the cello section died last December after 24 years of service.

The programs for the past season show interesting statistical data. Of 85 musical works heard, 16 were played for the first time at Symphony Hall concerts. Of the 47 composers represented, 13 either were born in this country or are living here.

* * *

THE 58th season of "Pop" concerts under Arthur Fiedler was extended to 70 nights. More than 100 special groups attended, including 32 schools and alumni associations, 64 clubs, relief groups, industrial and commercial organizations. On 13 nights, branches of the military service had special reservations.

The 15th season of Esplanade Concerts was performed in the Hatch Memorial on the Charles River Embankment from July 22 to Aug. 18, with performances each night (Mondays excepted). Certain nights were dedicated to the WAVES, the Coast Guard, the SPARS, the Marine Corps and the Spanish War Veterans.

The orchestra did get within hailing distance of its summer home. Four concerts were given in the library at Lenox under the auspices of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation Inc., for the benefit of the Red Cross.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 9 - 1943

Themes and Variations

By HENRY SIMON

Rodzinski's Assistant

The announcement, just released by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, that Leonard Bernstein, 25, of Boston, is to be its new assistant conductor is particularly gratifying to those of us who want to see more young American conductors given a chance in responsible positions.

It must have taken considerable courage on the part of Artur Rodzinski to make this choice, for there are doubtless a dozen more experienced men available and anxious for the appointment. They may be expected to feel hurt and some of them to raise their voices in sharp criticism.

Yet it would be hard to imagine a more brilliant or more promising choice. Mr. Bernstein, whom I have met on several occasions during the past few months, is one of the most competent, sensitive and catholic-minded musicians I have ever known or known about. He plays the piano compositions of composers so varied as Mozart, Brahms, Liszt, Stravinsky and Aaron Copland with what can only be called indiscriminate understanding. He is the most exciting white boogie-woogie player I have heard, and Warner Bros. are using two of his popular songs in currently scheduled movies. His Sonata for Clarinet and Piano, a severely modern work, received excellent reviews at its Boston premiere and will be published shortly.

He is scheduled to conduct his own First Symphony with both the Pittsburgh and the Boston Symphony Orchestras this season, and with the latter he will also appear as piano soloist in a Beethoven Concerto.

I have had only two opportunities to report on him as a conductor—once when he presided at a modern concert in the Museum of Modern Art and once when he led the Goldman Band in contemporary American works. Both performances showed unmistakable gifts of a very high order.

Even his comparative lack of experience may be an asset to Mr. Rodzinski. The Philharmonic-Symphony's new musical director has the task of making a fresh, well knit musical personality out of an old and honored organization that has played under more than a score of different men during the past two years. He stands a better chance of success with a young, malleable man as an assistant than he would with an older and more experienced personality whose ideas and temperament might conflict with his own.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

SEP 9 - 1943

U. S. CONDUCTOR GETS PHILHARMONIC POST

Leonard Bernstein, 25, Named Assistant to Artur Rodzinski

Leonard Bernstein, 25-year-old composer, pianist and conductor, has been engaged by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society as assistant conducter. This action was taken on the advice of Artur Rodzinski, conductor and musical director of the society.

Mr. Bernstein was born in Lawrence, Mass., on Aug. 25, 1918. After attending Boston Latin School, he was graduated in 1939 from Harvard College, where he majored in music, studying composition under Walter Piston and Edward Burlingame Hill and piano with Heinrich Gebhard. The next two years were spent at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where Mr. Bernstein worked with Fritz Reiner in conducting and Randall Thompson in orchestration, continuing his piano study with Isabella Vengerova.

During the summers Mr. Bernstein studied conducting under Serge Koussevitzky and last year he returned to Tanglewood in the Berkshires to be Dr. Koussevitzky's assistant, after spending the winter in Boston teaching, composing and producing several operas for the Institute of Modern Art there. In that season Mr. Bernstein's clarinet sonata had its first hearing. The sonata is to be published in the coming winter.

Mr. Bernstein has continued composing for the last year in this city and also is about to publish his first symphony and several songs.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y.
SARATOGIAN

SEP 1 4 1943

JUST IN PASSING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has set a production record of its own for the past season. Some 850,000 concertgoers attended performances of the orchestra, and 242 concerts were performed within 304 days, an average of one concert every 30 hours, not including rehearsals. An extended "pop" season this summer, a new series of seven pairs of chamber concerts, and special volunteer programs for men and women in the armed services topped off the schedule.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE

SEP 8 - 1943

Symphony Opens 63d Year Oct. 8

The 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 8 at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will then begin his 20th year as conductor, the longest tenure in the history of the orchestra.

At Symphony Hall, 24 pairs of concerts will be given Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, together with six pairs Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

Soloists will include violinists Mischa Elman—who will play a new concerto by Martinu, and Joseph Szigeti; pianists Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist. Soprano Lily Pons will appear with her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, who will be one of the guest conductors.

Other guest conductors will be Vladimir Golschmann of the St. Louis Symphony and Igor Stravinsky, whose program will include an "ode" which he has recently completed. Richard Burgin, now designated associate conductor of the orchestra, will direct two pairs of concerts.

This Clipping From
BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP 1 2 1943

63d Boston Symphony Season Begins Oct. 8

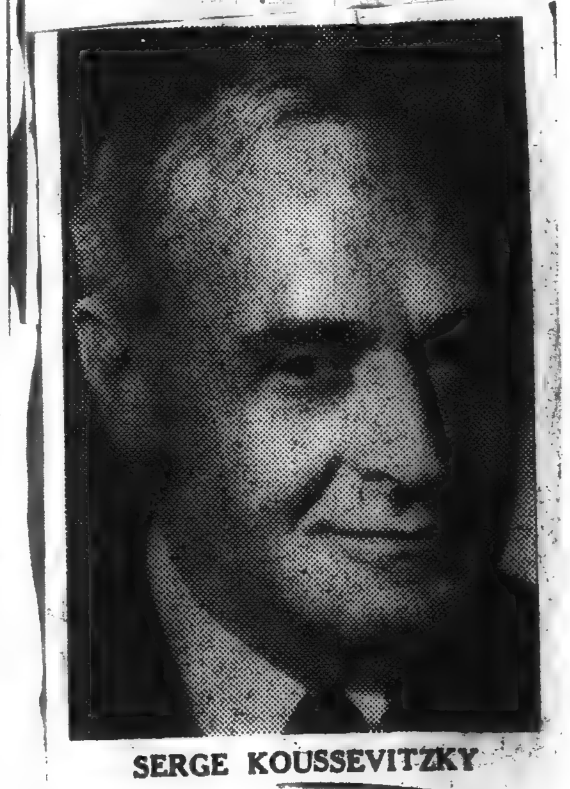
The 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 8; Serge Koussevitzky will then enter his 20th year as conductor. Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall, together with six pairs Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. Season tickets for these series are available at the Symphony Hall box office.

Among the new music will be three new symphonies by American composers: the Second by Samuel Barber; William Schumann's Fifth, for strings; and Roy Harris' Fifth.

The Third Symphony by Rachmaninoff, Schubert's Sixth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony are also scheduled, together with Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," the "Mathis der Maler" Suite by Hindemith, Roussel's Suite in F, "The Rite of Spring" by Stravinsky, "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, and the First and Seventh Symphonies by Shostakovich.

BOSTON, MASS.
MORNING GLOBE

SEP 8 - 1943



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Symphony Opens 63d Year Oct. 8

The 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 8 at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will then begin his 20th year as conductor, the longest tenure in the history of the orchestra.

At Symphony Hall, 24 pairs of concerts will be given Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, together with six pairs Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

Soloists will include violinists Mischa Elman—who will play a new concerto by Martinu, and Joseph Szigeti; pianists Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist. Soprano Lily Pons will appear with her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, who will be one of the guest conductors.

Other guest conductors will be Vladimir Golschmann of the St. Louis Symphony and Igor Stravinsky, whose program will include an "ode" which he has recently completed. Richard Burgin, now designated associate conductor of the orchestra, will direct two pairs of concerts.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

SFP 9 - 1943

CITY NEWS

Boston Symphony Will Open Oct. 8

Frank Sinatra Is Not Among Soloists to Sing

By Willard M. Clark

The 63rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the 20th year of Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky as its conductor, will open in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon, Oct. 8. During a press conference held Tuesday in the Harvard Club it was revealed that Mr. Koussevitsky will also reach his 70th year, as eager and powerful a conductor as when he first mounted the podium.

Newsmen at the conference wondered if Frank Sinatra, after his triumphs with the New York Philharmonic and Los Angeles symphony orchestra, would be invited to sing with the orchestra. He definitely has not been invited to appear with that august body this season. There will, however, be a galaxy of soloists including pianists, Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladmir Horowitz; Joseph Szigeti, violinist and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist.

Lily Pons will appear with her husband Andre Kostelanetz, who will share conducting honors with Igor Stravinsky, Vladmir Goleham, conductor of the St. Louis symphony orchestra, making his first appearance in Boston, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster, during the few weeks Dr. Koussevitsky vacations.

The basis of the season's repertory will of course consist of the great music of the symphonic past. A new Violin Concerto by Martinu will be presented by Mischa Elman, who returns as soloist at these concerts.

Three new symphonies have been completed by three American composers whose outstanding talents, Dr. Koussevitsky has made known in the past. They are to be the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by William Schuman, and the Fifth Symphony of Roy Harris.

Music to be repeated from past seasons will include Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Hindmith's "Mathis der Maler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Sibelius' "Pahjola's Daughter" and the first and seventh symphonies of Shostakovitch.

Music not yet heard or long unheard at these concerts will include the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the Sixth of Schubert and the Third of Tschaikowsky.

Igor Stravinsky, conducting a pair of concerts as guest, will give the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed.

The season to come will include the usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening cncerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

The Orchestra will undertake its usual schedule of concerts in other cities, including five visits to New York and a western tour in December.

George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, said that advance sales were coming in well and that another brilliant season under the devoted direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, who for 19 years has devoted himself to the American musical scene, might be expected.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 12 1943

Stage News

Koussevitzky's 20th Season Announced By Symphony

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when the orchestra gives the first pair of concerts of its 63d season. The season to come will include the usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons.

Koussevitzky plans to introduce new works of special interest in his 20th season, and meanwhile to revive outstanding compositions which he has introduced through his succession of years in America. The basis of the season's repertory will, of course, consist of the great music of the symphonic past. A new Violin Concerto by Martinu will be presented by Mischa Elman, who will return to be soloist at these concerts. Other soloists will include Lily Pons, soprano; the pianists, Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz; Joseph Szigeti, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, violoncellist.

Three new symphonies have been completed by three American composers whose outstanding talents Koussevitzky has made known in years past. They are the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by William Schuman, and the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris. Music to be repeated from past seasons will include Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Siebelius'" Pohjola's Daughter," the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shotakovitch and other works.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a pair of concerts as guest, giving the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors, Andre Kostelanetz and Vladimir Golschmann. Mr. Kostelentz will appear in the same pair of concerts with Lily Pons. Vladimir Golschmann, the conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, is to make his first appearance in Boston. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two pairs of programs.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

SEP 12 1943

THE Boston Symphony orchestra set a record in the season which it just ended, averaging one concert every thirty hours or a total of 242 concerts performed within the season's length of 304 days. The total attendance at these concerts was more than 850,000. A number of special programs were given for men and women in the armed forces, including performances by the entire orchestra under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitsky and "jam" sessions for service personnel who could play instruments. In place of the Berkshire music festival concerts which have been cancelled for the past two years because of the war, the Pops season was extended for two weeks and there was a new series of seven chamber music concerts. The regular fall season of the orchestra will open on Saturday Oct. 9 and as usual the Saturday night concerts will be broadcast over the Blue network.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 12 1943

SYMPHONY SEASON WILL OPEN HERE FRIDAY, OCT. 8

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE 63rd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins on Friday, Oct. 8, next, will be the 20th of its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. One can hardly take exception to this summary of the conductor's achievements as set forth in the announcement from Symphony Hall:

"The 19 years through which Serge Koussevitzky has devoted his life to the American musical scene have been notable in more ways than could be enumerated in a short space: in the quality of the orchestra's performances, in the enlargement of its scope of concerts, and, not least, in the expanse and enrichment of its repertory. The American citizenship of Serge Koussevitsky symbolizes his devotion to this country and the growth of its music."

Of late years Dr. Koussevitzky has been loath to announce too much of the season's repertory in advance for fear some slip-up in the plans, and these are often unavoidable, will cause disappointment. Nevertheless, this 20th season he has committed himself quite extensively.

In the matter of new pieces he will offer three American symphonies, recently completed, the Second of Samuel Barber, the Fifth, for strings alone, of William Schuman, and the Fifth, according to the Symphony Hall communique, of Roy Harris. Since we heard Mr. Harris' Fifth Symphony last season, the one dedicated to Soviet Russia, is it possible that the work under consideration is No. 6? A recently completed violin concerto by Bohuslav Martinu, to receive its world premiere from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, with Ruth Posselt as the soloist, will be heard in Boston from Mischa Elman, who had not appeared at the Symphony concerts in many a year. New to Boston, at least, will be the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff. And, oh yes, Igor Stravinsky, conducting a pair of concerts, as guest, will introduce a new "Ode" of his own.

The dwindling supply of new works of major importance has caused many a commentator, this one included, to cry loudly and insistently for revivals from the past. Specifically, this department has pointed out on more than one occasion that it is a mistake to let the public think of Schubert as the composer of two symphonies and Tchaikovsky as the author of three. Now comes the welcome news that Dr. Koussevitzky purposes to enrich the active repertory with Schubert's Sixth Symphony in C major and Tchaikovsky's Third in D, sometimes called the "Polish." A few years ago Arthur Fiedler conducted the former, rarely heard anywhere these days, at a concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, and the Tchaikovsky Third was done about the same time by Alexander Thiede and a WPA orchestra at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. If Dr. Koussevitzky make good his intentions regarding them, they will be new to most of his listeners.

Among the pieces unheard during the past few seasons will be Mahler's masterpiece, "The Song of the Earth" (with the assisting tenor and contralto as yet unspecified); Hindemith's outstanding symphonic work to date, "Mathis der Maler"; the charming Suite in F of Roussel; Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," still dreaded by many concert-goers; Sibelius' tone poem of Finnish legend, "Pohjola's Daughter," and the First Symphony of Shostakovitch. That composer's Seventh Symphony, about which so much fuss was made just a year ago, will be repeated.

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

SEP 18 1943

Koussevitzsky Friends' Adviser

Noted Leader Praises Toledo Music Group

Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, a leader of world music and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has accepted a place on the advisory committee of the newly organized Friends of Toledo Music.

Dr. Koussevitzsky's decision to be an adviser was announced today by Emma Endres Kountz, president of the Friends.

Dr. Koussevitzsky's note of acceptance follows:

"This is just a line of appreciation for asking me to become a member of your advisory committee. Although as a rule I am reluctant to give my name, in this instance I am willing to accept to do it for you and your organization.

Offers Warm Wishes

"May I take this opportunity to send you again my warm wishes for the opening of your concerts and my congratulations on your splendid endeavor?"

Also announced was the personnel of the sinfonietta which will play in the Friends' inaugural concert Tuesday evening, Sept. 28, in Macomber High School auditorium or the auditorium of the Ursuline convent. If the Toledo public school strike is settled before the concert, Macomber auditorium will be used.

Players Named

The players are as follows:

Violins — Frederick Bardsley, Stanley Church, Harry Johnson, Eric Liljequist, Gerald McLaughlin, Florence Miller, Florence Parre, Ivan Petroff, Rudolph Schroeder, Meyer Shapiro, Cecile Vashaw and Ray Welch.

Violas — Mathilde Burns, Earl Hess, Kenneth Holland and Wesley Otis. Cellos—Ruth Beeson, Emily Derrer, Mary Emily Harder and Elizabeth Walker. Double bass—Loyal Huffman and Hermond Lacey.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 12 1943

ORCHESTRA SHIFTS

Changes in Conductors May Enliven Season—New Works on Lists

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

JUDGING by the glimpse at the plans of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for the coming season, published in these columns a fortnight ago, the ensemble should be giving livelier and more integrated programs than in recent years. The appointment of one man, Artur Rodzinski, as permanent guide and planner, brings not only unified control but should assure spice and initiative.

If this is true of the New York orchestra, how fare the symphonies in other parts of the land? There should be commensurate liveliness of program-making and leadership in other major orchestral centers, for there are new conductors in a number of cities. Desiré Defauw is taking over in Chicago; Erich Leinsdorf assumes control in Cleveland; Alfred Wallenstein becomes conductor in Los Angeles; Karl Kreuger heads the reorganized orchestra in Detroit.

New leadership is in itself no guarantee of better programs and performances than those that have gone before. Persons with good memories can recall that in New York and in other communities the new conductors were occasionally a comedown after the old. An old hand is not necessarily stale or deadening. Witness the vitality and freshness of outlook that characterize Serge Koussevitzky's leadership in Boston.

New Works for Boston

Mr. Koussevitzky's sure hand for creative program-making is again in evidence as the first news of his plans for the new season are disclosed. At least three large American works are on the agenda for first performance—the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, now a private in the United States Army; the Fifth Symphony for strings by William Schuman, and a new symphony by Roy Harris. There will also be a new violin concerto by the prolific — and gifted—Bohusltv Martinu, with Mischa Elman, who commissioned the work, as soloist. Igor Stravinsky's recently completed "Ode" will be introduced by the Boston Symphony, with the composer conducting.

These premières are probably not the sum of Mr. Koussevitzky's offering of contemporary music. Those who know the conductor's record would cheerfully risk the guess that he will find other worthwhile compositions to introduce. And more important, he will not be content to rest on the laurels of premières. Mr. Koussevitzky believes in giving second, third and fourth performances of fairly new works, and these repeats are more important to the public than the practice of doing a first time and forgetting about a work.

Nor is Mr. Koussevitzky the only hold-over conductor who will grace his programs with new music. Fritz Reiner in Pittsburgh plans to produce a new symphony by the talented 25-year-old American, Leonard Bernstein, who has, incidentally, been named assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. A suite drawn from Béla Bartók's "Mikrokosmos," with eight movements arranged for orchestra by Tibor Serly, and a new score by Paul Bowles, "Pastorela," will be performed for the first time by Mr. Reiner.

Basing a prediction on their record of past performances, one may guess that men like Eugene Ormandy, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Hans Kindler, Eugene Goossens, Pierre Monteux, Vladimir Golschmann, Reginald Stewart and other leaders of American orchestras will continue to show, at least in varying degree, hospitality to contemporary music.

But the places that will be watched with particular interest will be Cleveland, Los Angeles and Chicago, especially the first two. Mr. Leinsdorf in Cleveland and Mr. Wallenstein in Los Angeles are young men, as conductors go, who are receiving their first cachets as permanent heads of major symphonic orchestras.

Both men, of course, have come up through hard schools. Mr. Leinsdorf, who inherited the Wagnerian repertory at the Metropolitan Opera House, as well as other German works, at short notice when Artur Bodanzky died, tackled one of the most onerous tasks in music with courage and no little talent. Even if one grants that there were shortcomings in his work, the wonder of it was that he could last as long as he did with no disasters.

Mr. Wallenstein, who has had the healthy experience of viewing the conductor's tasks from the instrumentalist's side of a music stand, has built up his reputation and a formidable repertory as conductor of radio concerts. He has also led several major orchestras as guest conductor, but the bulk of his experience came in the exacting, split-second school of the radio, where a conductor must be not only efficient and alert but even entertaining on occasion.

We may be sure that the leadership in Cleveland and Los Angeles will be vigorous. Mr. Leinsdorf has instituted an idea new to Cleveland but familiar in many European cities. He has made up all his programs for the season and has announced them to the public. The custom has much to recommend it. There is no reason why the public should not know, well in advance, what it is buying. Thus the patrons who can afford to go to only a few concerts a season can make their selection on the basis of the music they want to hear, without waiting for announcements from week to week.

Cleveland Premieres

Mr. Leinsdorf promises at least two premières. Mr. Martinu's Second symphony, which the composer dedicated to the descendants of his native Czechoslovakia who live in Cleveland, will be played for the first time on Oct. 28. Nikolai Lopatnikoff's "Opus Sinfonicum," which won the $1,000 composition contest of the Music Arts Association of Cleveland in honor of the orchestra's silver jubilee, will be played on the program celebrating the orchestra's anniversary on Dec. 9. Mr. Leinsdorf also plans first Cleveland performances of scores by Barber, Morton Gould, Randall Thompson and Francesco Mignone, the Brazilian.

Mr. Wallenstein's ideas for the Los Angeles Philharmonic have not been disclosed, but his work will bear watching. He is the only American-born conductor to head a major American symphonic orchestra. His success might lead to greater receptivity toward Americans elsewhere; in any event, Los Angeles deserves a salute for welcoming a man whose training and experience are home-grown.

The new orchestral season in America shapes up attractively. There should be some good music and perhaps larger audiences than in the past. With victory in the making on our battlefronts, America and its music should have something to sing about.

Symphony Marks Koussevitzky's 20th Year With October Concerts

Lowell Telegram Sept 12

Famed Conductor Rounds Out Two Decades — New Works To Be Introduced This Season

On Friday afternoon, October 8 next, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will begin his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the Orchestra gives the first pair of concerts of its Sixty-Third Season. The season to come will include the usual twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. Season tickets for each of these series are now being subscribed at Symphony Hall. The Orchestra will undertake its usual schedule of concerts in other cities, with five visits to New York in the course of the season, and a tour of Western cities in December. The Orchestra will continue to meet wartime conditions by bringing its performances to the men in war service.

The nineteen years through which Serge Koussevitzky has devoted his life to the American musical scene have been notable in more ways than could be enumerated in a short space: in the quality of the Orchestra's performances, in the enlargement of its scope of concerts, and, not least, in the expanse and enrichment of its repertory. The American citizenship of Serge Koussevitzky symbolises his devotion to this country and the growth of its music.

Koussevitzky plans to introduce new works of special interest in his twentieth season, and meanwhile to revive outstanding compositions which he has introduced through his succession of years in America. The basis of the season's repertory will, of course, consist of the great music of the symphonic past. A new Violin Concerto by Martinu will be presented by Mischa Elman, who will return to be soloist at these concerts. Other soloists will include Lily Pons, soprano, the pianists Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz, Joseph Szigeti, the violinist, and the violoncellist Gregor Piatigorsky.

Three new symphonies have been completed by three American composers whose outstanding talents Koussevitzky has made known in years past. They are to be the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by William Schuman, and the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris. Music to be repeated from past seasons will include Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Hindimith's "Mathis der Maler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter," the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shostakovitch, and other works. Music not yet heard or long unheard at these concerts will include the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the Sixth of Schubert, and the Third of Tchaikovsky.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a pair of concerts as guest, giving the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors: Andre Kostelanetz and Vladimir Golschmann. Mr. Kostelanetz will appear in the same pair of concerts with Lily Pons. Vladimir Golschmann, the conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, is to make his first appearance in Boston. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two pairs of programs.

There are already many applications daily for season tickets at the subscription office, an interest which gives every indication of a successful season to come.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION

SEP 26 1943

Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor, in one of the many gestures by photographs of which he can recognize what piece is being played.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 12 1943

KOUSSEVITZKY BEGINS 20TH YEAR IN BOSTON

He Will Introduce a New Violin Concerto and Three New Symphonies

On Friday afternoon, October 8, in Symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, when the orchestra gives the first pair of concerts of its 63d season. The season to come will include the usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. Season tickets for each of these series are now being subscribed at Symphony hall. The orchestra will undertake its usual schedule of concerts in other cities, with five visits to New York in the course of the season, and a tour of western cities in December. The orchestra will continue to meet wartime conditions by bringing its performances to the men in war service.

The [illegible] years through which Serge Koussevitzky has devoted his life to the American musical scene have been notable in more ways than could be enumerated in a short space: in the quality of the orchestra's performances, in the enlargement of its scope of concerts, and, not least, in the expanse and enrichment of its repertory. The American citizenship of Serge Koussevitzky symbolizes his devotion to this country and the growth of its music.

Koussevitzky plans to introduce new works of special interest in his 20th season, and meanwhile to revive outstanding compositions which he has introduced through his succession of years in America. The basis of the season's repertory will, of course, consist of the great music of the symphonic past. A new violin concerto by Martinu will be presented by Mischa Elman, who will return to be soloist at these concerts. Other soloists will include Lily Pons, soprano; the pianists, Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz; Joseph Szigeti, violinist, and the violoncellist, Gregor Piatigorsky.

Three new symphonies have been completed by three American composers whose outstanding talents Koussevitzky has made known in years past. They are to be the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by William Schuman, and the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris. Music to be repeated from past seasons will include Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Sibelius's "Pohjola's Daughter," the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shostakovitch, and other works. Music not yet heard or long unheard at these concerts will include the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the Sixth of Schubert and the Third of Tschaikovsky.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a pair of concerts as guest, giving the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors: Andre Kostelanetz and Vladimir Golschmann. Mr Kostelanetz will appear in the same pair of concerts with Lily Pons. Vladimir Golschmann, the conductor of the St Louis orchestra, is to make his first appearance in Boston. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct two pairs of programs.

There are already many applications daily for season tickets at the subscription office, an interest which gives every indication of a successful season to come.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 26 1943

Koussevitzky's Boston Season Starting Oct. 8

Three New Symphonies by American Composers To Be Performed

Serge Koussevitzky will begin his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, the organization's first concert of its sixty-third season. The usual twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be given and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. The customary ten concerts will be given in New York, and the schedule of other cities will include a tour of the West in December. Performances will again be given for men in the war services.

Among the novelties to be performed are three newly completed symphonies by American composers — Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, Roy Harris's Fifth Symphony and William Schuman's Fifth Symphony for strings. A new violin concerto by the Czech composer Martinu will be performed with Mischa Elman as soloist. Modern works listed for repetition include Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," "Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," Sibelius's "Pohjola's Daughter" and the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shostakovitch.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct one pair of concerts as guest. His program will include a new "Ode" recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors, Vladimir Golschmann and Andre Kostelanetz. Lily Pons will appear as soloist with Mr. Kostelanetz. Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra will direct two pairs of concerts. Other soloists will include Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz, pianists; Joseph Szigeti, violinist, and Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS

SEP 18 1943

Picture Tells Koussevitzky What Piece Is Being Played

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Sept. 18 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky can look at a picture of himself conducting and tell what composition is being played.

More than 50 years of discipline and training produced this exquisitely exact conducting technique. During the last 19 of those years, the 68-year-old Russian-born "Dictator of the Baton" has moulded the Boston Symphony.

A volcanic temperament, rigidly controlled, made possible his multiple accomplishments. A boy conductor at 12, acknowledged the world's finest double bass virtuoso before he was 30, he formed his own orchestra in Russia, and conducted in many European capitals before coming to Boston in 1924.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Noted for interpretations of contemporary works, especially Russian, and for his interest in modern American composers, Koussevitzky today is being heard throughout the country.

Few realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Symphony hall audiences see an impeccably-dressed conductor laboring over his musicians, pulling the music from their hearts, almost as though he himself were playing all the parts.

He Works Hard

On occasion, however, during an arduous rehearsal, the mild-mannered man becomes a shouting, gesticulating demon, demanding the impossible from the 105 men under him—and often getting it.

As everything goes well, he murmurs "Fine, fine," and half-sits, half-leans against the chair placed on the podium, his right foot keeping time, his arms and face mirroring the music.

Suddenly something is wrong. The little man—actually he's not much over 5 feet 6—in the well-worn dark blue jacket and gray trousers, impeccably creased even for rehearsal, stops the performance. "No, no," he shouts. "That is just noise. I must have the music." And he hums the measures, glaring at the men.

"So you want me to teach it to you," he asks them. "So, if you want, we do it 1000 times."

Or again, while rehearsing a chorus with the orchestra, he explains: "Ladies and gentlemen, you have very beautiful voices. I not. But we must work together for best results. So, if you sing good I will love you all." And then adds, in a very matter-of-fact tone: "If you sing bad I will drown you with the orchestra."

Started at Age of Ten

Koussevitzky works as hard as the men. Invariably he leaves the hall bathed in perspiration, with a great black cape. (No red lining for him) flung over his shoulders.

But even before the rehearsals there is much preparation. The preliminaries occur in the study of Koussevitzky's Brookline home — a study littered with scores, piled on the piano, on tables and chairs.

"No matter how many times I play a standard classic," he explains, "I sit down and bury myself in it with the feeling: Ah, here is an astonishing work by a remarkable new composer."

While working on the score, Koussevitszky develops the necessary accompanying gestures, singing, humming or shouting the orchestral parts to himself. "Sometimes I imagine the men are in front of me, and that helps to get it (the music) just so," he says.

There is nothing unusual about this. As a 10-year-old in the little North Russian town of Vyshny Volochek, where he was born, Koussevitzky remembers practicing conducting before a mute group of chairs and packing boxes, and yelling the music at the top of his lungs.

"The greatest music of our day," he said, "is now being written in war-torn Russia. It carries a message of courage, comfort and faith amidst untold suffering and destruction."

A voluntary exile from Russia in 1920, Koussevitzky became an American citizen in 1941.

In his spare time Koussevitzky walks, reads philosophy and surprisingly enough, writes, because: "I like to spoil papers. That is my relaxation between concerts."

63d Boston Symphony Season Begins Oct. 8

The 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 8; Serge Koussevitzky will then enter his 20th year as conductor. Twenty-four pairs of concerts will be given on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at Symphony Hall, together with six pairs Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. Season tickets for these series are available at the Symphony Hall box office.

Among the new music will be three new symphonies by American composers: the Second by Samuel Barber; William Schumann's Fifth, for strings; and Roy Harris' Fifth.

The Third Symphony by Rachmaninoff, Schubert's Sixth Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony are also scheduled, together with Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," the "Mathis der Maler" Suite by Hindemith, Roussel's Suite in F, "The Rite of Spring" by Stravinsky, "Pohjola's Daughter" by Sibelius, and the First and Seventh Symphonies by Shostakovich.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

SEP 21 1943

. . . Gene Hamilton, veteran local mikeman who turned producer of Blue Network shows a few years ago, has gone back to announcing. He's now handling the Boston Symphony programs. . . . Starting Oct. 9, the Groucho Marx show will have an 8 p. m. Saturday night spot on Columbia. It's now aired at 10:15 p. m.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 26 1943

Conductor Discusses Mission of the Artist

Sergei Koussevitzky Points Out That in Russia Art Is a Mighty Weapon of the War — The Artist Must Arouse Patriotic Ardor and Sacred Wrath, He Declares

WITH the local music season just opening, the following reprint of an address by Sergei Koussevitzky on "Music in our civilization" should give concertgoers a deeper insight into the music they will hear during the course of the next six or seven months:—

"Music is a dominant need of our time. It is a great stimulus for our fighting forces and a great hope for our future.

"To realize the full significance of music amid the profound calamity of the present war we must glance back into the history of the past.

"The effects of wars and revolutions upon the fine arts, and culture in general, have been twofold. Either the arts succumb to extreme materialism, demoralization and decay, or, to the contrary, they herald an epoch of cultural and spiritual rebirth, a release of new thought, new creative forces and a new age in history.

"Within our generation and memory we have witnessed a period of excessive materialism and of a marked decadence in art as an after-effect of the first World war. Today, with the advent of the second World war, we are living through a vigorous upswing of cultural forces and consciousness.

"Such periods in history are periods of transition and of regeneration through human suffering and sacrifice; of reconstruction through a moral and spiritual rebirth and through the collapse of a decaying order of life.

"Hoards of unholy forces have attacked, invaded and imperiled our life. As never before do we realize that art and culture are a stronghold against the aggressor and his devastating, demoralizing forces.

"As we know, this is a war of the people as much as of the armies, of the artists as much as of the soldiers.

"Every atom of artistic effort must be mobilized and thrown into action.

Medium Against Evil

"Of all the arts, music is a powerful medium against evil and destruction. It has the power to heal, to comfort and to inspire. In these stormy, perilous days it is the mission of art to protect the fundamental values for which our armies are fighting, to shelter the ennobling, everlasting treasures of art, to maintain the high standard of morale, of culture and thought.

"Music is a living and active force which is essential for preserving the burning spirit and the lasting aspirations and ideals.

"We have to fulfill the great and pressing task of carrying the torch of art and inspiration to the battlefront.

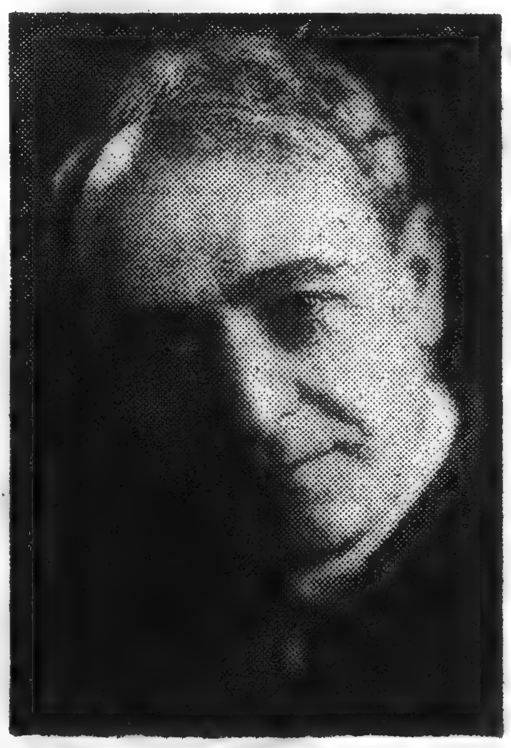
"Millions of men-at-arms need our music. We cannot afford to waste time. The war goes on at a terrifying pace. Not for a day, not for an hour does bloodshed stop.

Art Is a Weapon

"We have before us the matchless example of Russia, where art is a mighty weapon in the war.

"Artists go to the front, into the heat of the battle, where they witness true heroism, and learn to know what is life and death, love and hatred. For those who know supreme love learn also to know profound hatred.

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY



"Music is a living and active force."

"The fighting men despise and hate the merciless, inhuman enemy; they despise him for degenerating from a once cultured people into a slave and follower of a diseased mind and order, for sinking to the low stage of barbarism. They hate him for the cruelty to old and young, to woman and child, to innocent and weak; for the scorched earth, for the suffering of the mounting toll of victims.

"The artist must experience the very depth of human emotion to give an illuminating account of it. In his work he must portray the intensity of human misery and endurance; the untold tale of tears and blood. He must arouse patriotic ardor and sacred wrath in the hearts of fighting men. He must inspire deeds of great heroism and valor. This is the mission of the artist today.

"Let us write hymns of freedom and victory; compose marches to vanquish the foe; let us proclaim hatred for despotism and destruction; let us sing the song of love for mankind and faith in the ageless ideals of independence and democracy.

"Let music become the symbol of the undying beauty of the spirit of man.

"Let us conquer darkness with the burning light of art."

This Clipping From
New Bedford Mass
[illegible]
SEP 19 1943

Concert Season Opens Oct. 8

Koussevitzky 20 Years With Boston Symphony

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 8 in Symphony Hall, Boston, Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the orchestra gives the first pair of concerts of its 63d season. The season will include the usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday nights and Tuesday afternoons. Season tickets for each of these series are now being subscribed at Symphony Hall. The orchestra will undertake its schedule of concerts in other cities, with five visits to New York in the course of the season, and a tour of western cities in December. The orchestra will continue to meet war-time conditions by bringing its performances to the men in war service.

Koussevitzky plans to introduce new works of special interest in his 20th season, and meanwhile to revive outstanding compositions which he has introduced through his succession of years in America. The basis of the season's repertory will, of course, consist of the great music of the symphonic post. A new violin concerto by Martinu will be presented by Mischa Elman, who will return to be soloist at these concerts. Other soloists will include Lily Pons, soprano, the pianists Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz, Joseph Szigeti, the violinist, and the violoncellist Gregor Piatigorsky.

Three new symphonies have been completed by three American composers whose outstanding talents Koussevitzky has made known in years past. They are to be the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber, the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by Willam Schuman, and the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris. Music to be repeated from past seasons will include Mahler's "The Song of the Earth," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter," the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shostakovitch, and other works. Music not yet heard or long unheard at these concerts will include the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the Sixth of Schubert, and the Third of Tchaikovsky.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a pair of concerts as guest, giving the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors: Andre Kostelanetz and Vladimir Golschmann. Mr. Kostelanetz will appear in the same pair of concerts with Lily Pons. Vladimir Golschmann, the conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, is to make his first appearance in Boston. Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two pairs of programs.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 26 1943

Koussevitzky Begins His 20th Year As Conductor October 8 In Boston

Serge Koussevitzky will begin his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday afternoon, October 8, at Symphony Hall. At that time the orchestra will give the first pair of concerts of its sixthy-third season.

The season will include the usual 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and six pairs of concerts on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. The orchestra will undertake its customary schedule of concerts in other cities, with five visits to New York and a tour of western cities in December. The orchestra will also continue to meet war-time conditions by bringing its performances to men in war service.

Dr. Koussevitzky plans to introduce new works and to revive outstanding compositions offered in the past. A new Violin Concerto by Martinu will be performed by Mischa Elman. Other soloists will be Lily Pons, soprano; the pianists Rudolf Serkin, Alexander Brailowsky and Vladimir Horowitz; Joseph Szigeti, violinist, and Alexander Piatigorsky, 'cellist.

Three new symphonies by three American composers will be premiered. These are the Second Symphony of Samuel Barber; the Fifth Symphony, for Strings, by William Schuman; and the Fifth Symphony by Roy Harris.

Music to be repeated will include Mahler's "Song Of The Earth," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," Roussel's Suite in F, Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," Sibelius's "Pohjola's Daughter," the First and Seventh Symphonies of Shostakovitch. Music not heard or long unheard at these concerts will include the Third Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the Sixth of Schubert and the Third of Tschaikowsky.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a pair of concerts, giving the first performance of a new "Ode" which he has recently completed. There will be two other guest conductors, Andre Kostelanetz and Vladimir Golschmann. Mr. Kostelanetz will appear in the same pair of concerts as Lily Pons. Mr. Golschmann, conductor of the St. Louis Orchestra, will make his first appearance in Boston. Richard Burgin, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct two pairs of programs.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Opens Its 63rd Season Friday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 63d season on Friday and Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 20th year as conductor of the organization. The Boston season will be supplemented by 10 concerts in New York and a western tour in December. Among the novelties will be three newly completed symphonies by American composers: Samuel Barber's Second, Roy Harris' Fifth and William Schuman's Fifth symphony for strings. Igor Stravinsky will conduct one pair of concerts, including his new "Ode" on the program. Other guest conductors will be Vladimir Golschmann and Andre Kostelanetz.

---

sing those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

Urged Americans to Compose.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans, too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that homegrown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

"The Roy Harris Third Symphony was played 10 times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"We have the necessary technical skill now," the greying, magnetic conductor explained, "a skill equal to anything developed in Europe. And it has been produced in three generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous energy, gaiety and abundance is finding vital musical expression at last."

Audiences Improve.

"Already Samuel Barber has composed a Commando march which I will play this season. Then there is William Schuman's new symphony for strings, written just before he entered the Army. That also I will give."

"But it is not the composers who cause the trouble." He shook his head and the lines seemed to deepen in the mobile face. "Always there is the audience—

"At first I had to fight for American music. Hundreds of letters came in, demanding I stop playing these new works. But I didn't." His face brightened, his voice grew more enthusiastic.

"Today the audiences have made great progress in recognizing and appreciating American music, especially in Boston. Already I have played two concerts of American works alone.

"And I am planning to devote the third and fourth symphony programs this season entirely to compositions of living American and Soviet composers."

Koussevitzky smiled and stood up and brought the interview to an end with another of those infinitely expressive gestures of his—the hands meeting gracefully as though he had just concluded a symphony.

In a sense he had—a symphony of labor and love, dedicated to American composers and written during 19 years of devoted struggle, was nearing successful completion.

New Stravinsky Work Is Played By Boston Symphony Orchestra

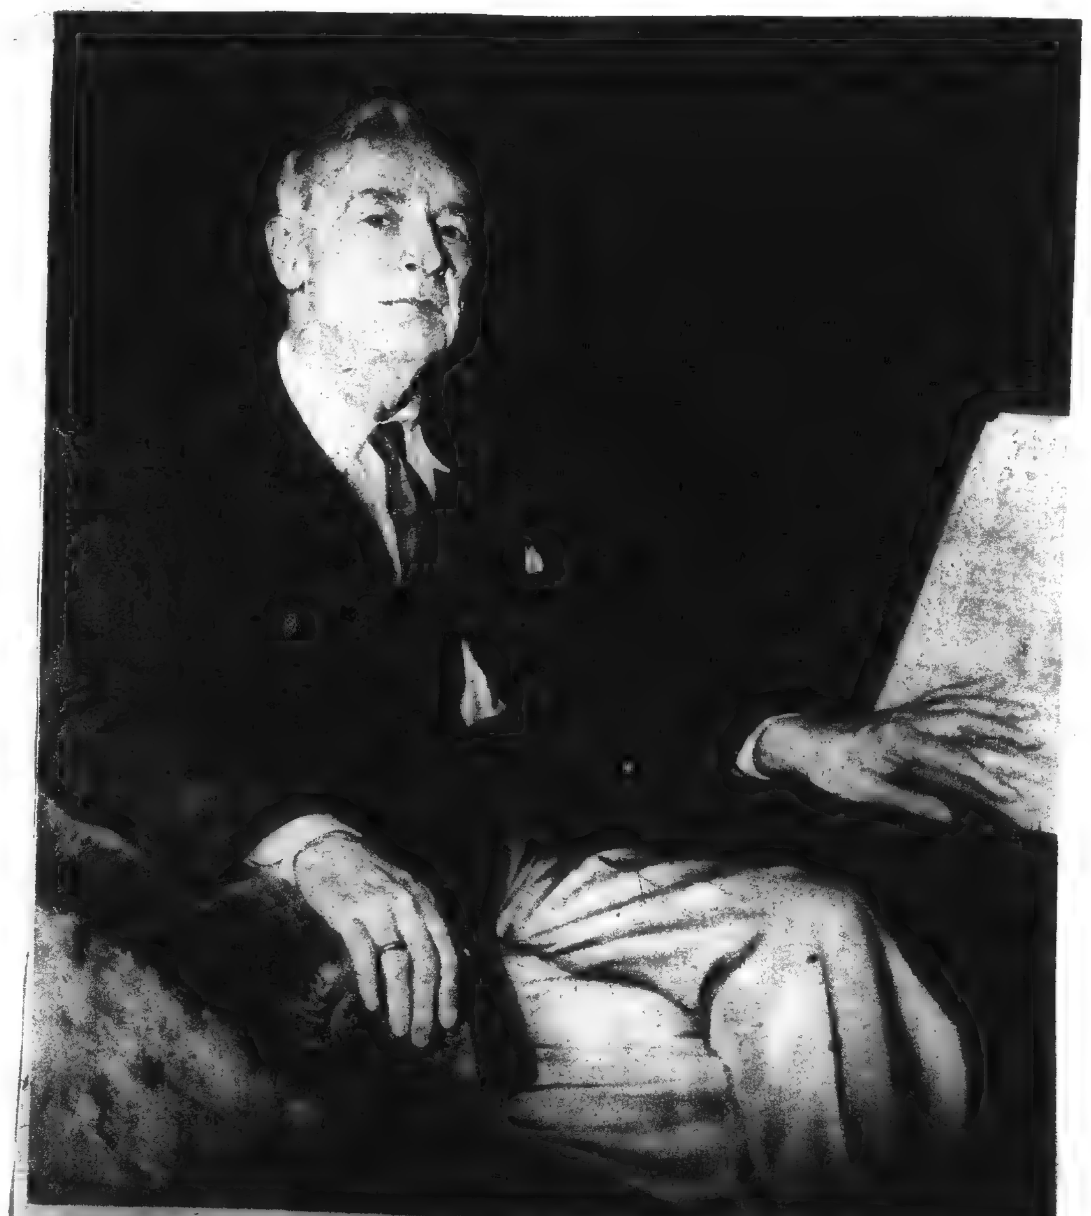
By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Symphony No. 5, E minor.....Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts.............Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Interest in Mr. Koussevitzky's all-Russian program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday night centered in Stravinsky's "Ode," which was given its first New York performance. The composition is in three short movements, entitled respectively, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph." For this writer it is the Russian composer's most felicitous recent product. The fear that Stravinsky no longer could turn out a piece of music not permeated solely by the processes of the intellect alone is dispelled here.

This "Ode" is an intimately poetic creation. The "Eulogy" is no rhetorical panegyric but a wistfully regretful memory of one who has been tenderly regarded but whose passing does not cause the tear ducts to overflow. The "Eclogue," as its title implies, is bucolic in mood. The "Epitaph," with its transparent, remote harmonies is touched by an other-world spirit. That this delicately conceived work should still linger in the listener's mind so unforgettably speaks well for its intrinsic value. For it was sandwiched in between the lavishly scored and teemingly romantic Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky and Ravel's cannily brilliant version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with its grandiose closing pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the new Stravinsky score, with its unpretentious apposite orchestration, was a flawless realization thereof from every aspect. Aside from exaggerated rubati in the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Symphony, which occasionally terminated in something not far from sentimentality, the conductor's conception of this thrice-familiar work was unusually eloquent, even the slow movement being paced flowingly, so that its melancholy melodies did not sob too abjectly. Both here and in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in their multicolored instrumental garb, the orchestra played with its customary tonal allure.

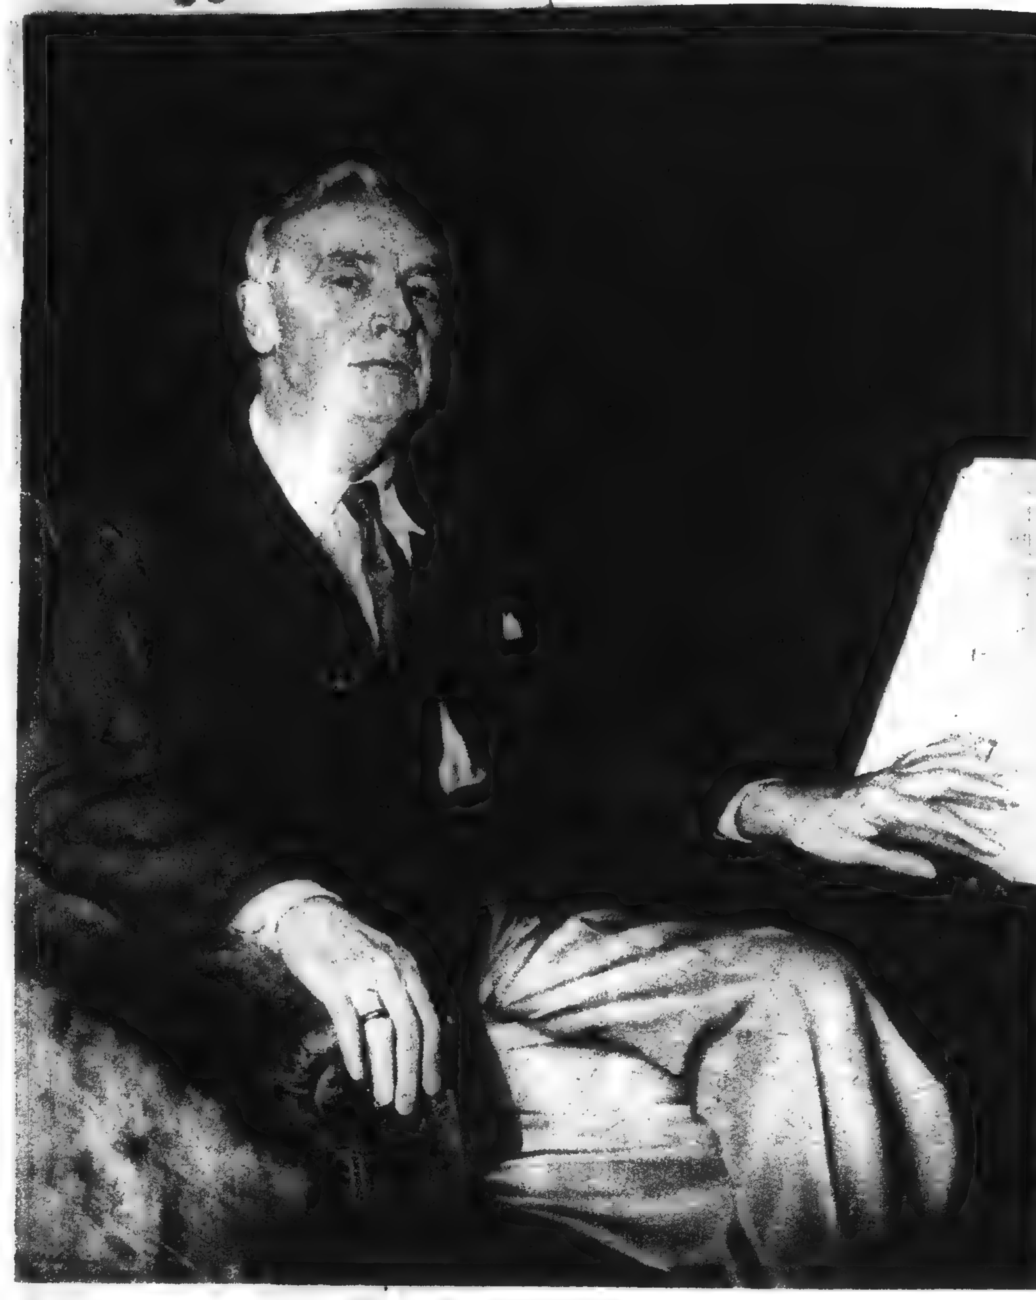


SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, from the portrait by Boris Chaliapin, son of the late basso, Feodor Chaliapin. Dr. Koussevitzky begins his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which enters on its 63rd season Friday evening.

PASTE OVER

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 3 1943



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, from the portrait by Boris Chaliapin, son of the late basso, Feodor Chaliapin. Dr. Koussevitzky begins his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which enters on its 63rd season Friday evening.

BORIS GOLDOVSKY will resume his piano-talks on current Boston Symphony concerts at the Symphony Luncheons in the Oval Room of the Copley Plaza beginning Friday noon.

(Photo by James Coyne)

This Clipping From

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 8 - 1943

Koussevitzky States U. S. Composers Match Masters

BY TOM CHASE

Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said. "It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers."

Koussevitzky assured them and other Americans, too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said.

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus," the conductor explained. "Our tremendous energy, gayety and abundance are finding vital musical expression at last."

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 3 - 1943

Pretty Please, or, An Earnest Plea To the B. S. O.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Now that Serge Koussevitzky is poised to leap into his 20th season as the conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (to its everlasting glory, by the way), I wonder if it would be too saucy to ask him to celebrate his anniversary be recalling some of his earlier zest in performing programs which will make our hair stand more or less on end?

It really is a little of a paradox that every year he has increased in interpretative scope, in intensity of expression and even in physical vitality (itself something of a wonderful paradox!) while his programs have become increasingly—well, I hate to say stuffy, but that about touches the nub of the matter. In all fairness, he does do a number of new compositions and revivals of merit, but generally it must be admitted that the programs reflect a certain over-cautiousness which hardly becomes his unchallenged dominance in the musical world today.

If statistics are required to lend weight to this assertion, consider the report of the National Music Council, Inc. In its annual report dated July, 1943, the council places the Boston orchestra as 12th on a list of 15 first-line American symphony orchestras in its performance percentage of work by native born American composers. Well, American music could be a lot better, assuredly, and most of us listen to it as a duty, but surely Dr. Koussevitzky could omit the yearly repetition of, say, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, to give American music a little better representation?

The Boston orchestra's performance percentage of works by both American-born and naturalized composers, plus foreign-born composers now living in the United States, a triple category which certainly includes 75 per cent. of the best contemporary composers, places the orchestra 10th on the list of 15. This is even more disturbing, for it means that contemporary music is being slighted in favor of old estabilsihed repertoire, most of which, by means of phonograph records and continual radiod performances, is already perilously over-played.

And so it seems to me that this is the year to re-examine the modern repertoire. Countless numbers of good and even significant modern works have had their first hearing and have been forgotten. Moreover, hundreds of older works have been dropped from the repertoire for reasons which are now obscure or, because of the ever shifting outlook, reasons on longer valid.

Well aware of the factors involved in the planning and execution of a symphonic program, such as awkward personnel requirements, rehearsal considerations, radio time limitations, intermissions, etc., I offer the following possibilities in all humility. They're just things I for one, would like to hear, and, judging by the various letters that come in on the subject during the season, things others would like to hear. Moreover, I am well aware I migh not find some of them especially at tractive; all right, be it on my ow head. I still want to hear them, ju as I want to hear all the Mahler and the Bruckner any one will play.

Some of the lesser known thin of Villa-Lobos should prove inte esting. Instead of the frequently heard Choros No. 10, how about No 8, 11 or 12? Or, for that matter, ho about "Bachianas Brazilerias?" Per haps Carloes Chavez' Sinfonia D Antigona would sound better on second hearing, a doubtful poss bility, but still a possibility. As mu Martinu as possible, it seems to m True, Dr. Koussevitzky has alwa favored this composer, and has been especially good about bringing out his new works. Many of them deserve a second or third hearing.

Among the lesser known works of Sibelius, "In Memoriam" may certainly be recommended, and the Seventh Symphony definitely needs rehearing. Some of Delius' more unfamiliar orchestral compositions should be heard and so should Elgar's "Falstaff," among other of his works. Schoenberg's "Pelleas aand Melisande" was mentioned as a possibility last season; let us hope it is programmed this year. And then there is Falla's Harpsichord Concerto, not wholly successful but exceedingly interesting; Pizzetti's fine "La Pisanella" suite; Szymanowski's B-flat Symphony; Bloch's "America" Symphony by all means; Vaughan Williams' Pastoral Symphony; something of Malipiero, say the Sinfonia Elegiaca (about which I know absolutely nothing); and something of Castelnuova-Tedesco (about whom I know next to nothing).

As a final request (for the moment), I think I should like most to hear Honegger's "King David" again. Its difficulties are considerable, of course, but are they more so than the preparation of Beethoven's ninth?

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN CONCERT

Igor Stravinsky's 'Ode' in 3 Parts Led by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

For the first New York concert of his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program exclusively of Russian music. There was a personal element in this arrangement, as also, without doubt, thought of the relations of America and Russia today, and the heroic contribution of the Russian people to the life and the future of the world.

The personal equation was als present in the first New York per formance of Igor Stravinsky' "Ode" in three parts for orchestr commissioned for him by the Ko sevitzky Musical Foundation dedicated to the late Natalie Ko sevitsky. This work had been giv its première by Dr. Koussevitz in Boston the 8th of last Octob

The program included Tc kovsky's Fifth Symphony — Beethoven's of the same num symphony, with TALLAHASSEE, FLA.

DEMOCRAT

OCT 8 - 1943

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 9 - 1943

AMERICAN COMPOSERS MATCH EUROPEANS, SAYS KOUSSEVITSKY

By TOM CHASE.

Boston, Oct. 9. (AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by thes urging war effort and the encouragement now now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accom plishments of the European mas ters, world famous Conductor Ser Koussevitzky said today as he be gan his 20th season as leader o the Boston symphony orchestra.

"We can not say we have Beethoven as yet, but there ha been great technical developmen with tremendous progress in th past year," he said during an in terview at his quietly modernisti home in nearby Brookline.

Young U S Composers Matching Accomplishments of Europeans

BOSAON, (AP)—Young American composers — stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston symphony orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

"The Roy Harris Third symphony was played 10 times by the Boston symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire program of American works and no one walks out.

generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous energy, gayety and abundance is finding vital musical expression at last."

[9]

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

OCT 8 - 1943

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.
TRIBUNE

OCT 8 - 1943

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 8 - 1943

TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

5

OCT 8 - 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 8 - 1943

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

OCT [illegible]

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

OCT 8 - 1943

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

OCT 8 - 1943

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

OCT 8 - 1943

LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION SUN JOURNAL

OCT 8 - 1943

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 8

WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH TIMES

OCT 8 - [illegible]

Becoming Masters

BOSTON, (AP)—Young American composers — stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters,

PASTE OVER

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 3 - 1943

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, from the portrait by Boris Chaliapin, son of the late basso, Feodor Chaliapin. Dr. Koussevitzky begins his twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which enters on its 63rd season Friday evening.

BORIS GOLDOVSKY will resume his piano-talks on current Boston Symphony concerts at the Symphony Luncheons in the Oval Room of the Copley Plaza beginning Friday noon.

(Photo by James Coyne)

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 8 - 1943

Koussevitzky States U. S. Composers Match Masters

BY TOM CHASE

Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said. "It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers."

Koussevitzky assured them and other Americans, too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said.

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus," the conductor explained. "Our tremendous energy, gayety and abundance are finding vital musical expression at last."

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 3 - 1943

Pretty Please, or, An Earnest Plea To the B. S. O.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Now that Serge Koussevitzky is poised to leap into his 20th season as the conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (to its everlasting glory, by the way), I wonder if it would be too saucy to ask him to celebrate his anniversary be recalling some of his earlier zest in performing programs which will make our hair stand more or less on end?

It really is a little of a paradox that every year he has increased in interpretative scope, in intensity of expression and even in physical vitality (itself something of a wonderful paradox!) while his programs have become increasingly—well, I hate to say stuffy, but that about touches the nub of the matter. In all fairness, he does do a number of new compositions and revivals of merit, but generally it must be admitted that the programs reflect a certain over-cautiousness which hardly becomes his unchallenged dominance in the musical world today.

If statistics are required to lend weight to this assertion, consider the report of the National Music Council, Inc. In its annual report dated July, 1943, the council places the Boston orchestra as 12th on a list of 15 first-line American symphony orchestras in its performance percentage of work by native born American composers. Well, American music could be a lot better, assuredly, and most of us listen to it as a duty, but surely Dr. Koussevitzky could omit the yearly repetition of, say, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, to give American music a little better representation?

The Boston orchestra's performance percentage of works by both American-born and naturalized composers, plus foreign-born composers now living in the United States, a triple category which certainly includes 75 per cent. of the best contemporary composers, places the orchestra 10th on the list of 15. This is even more disturbing, for it means that contemporary music is being slighted in favor of old estabIsihed repertoire, most of which, by means of phonograph records and continual radiod performances, is already perilously over-played.

And so it seems to me that this is the year to re-examine the modern repertoire. Countless numbers of good and even significant modern works have had their first hearing and have been forgotten. Moreover, hundreds of older works have been dropped from the repertoire for reasons which are now obscure or, because of the ever shifting outlook, reasons on longer valid.

Well aware of the factors involved in the planning and execution of a symphonic program, such as awkward personnel requirements, rehearsal considerations, radio time limitations, intermissions, etc., I offer the following possibilities in all humility. They're just things I for one, would like to hear, and, judging by the various letters that come in on the subject during the season, things others would like to hear. Moreover, I am well aware I might not find some of them especially attractive; all right, be it on my own head. I still want to hear them, just as I want to hear all the Mahler and the Bruckner any one will play.

Some of the lesser known things of Villa-Lobos should prove interesting. Instead of the frequently-heard Choros No. 10, how about Nos. 8, 11 or 12? Or, for that matter, how about "Bachianas Brazilezias?" Perhaps Carloes Chavez' Sinfonia De Antigona would sound better on a second hearing, a doubtful possibility, but still a possibility. As much Martinu as possible, it seems to me. True, Dr. Koussevitzky has always favored this composer, and has been especially good about bringing out his new works. Many of them deserve a second or third hearing.

Among the lesser known works of Sibelius, "In Memoriam" may certainly be recommended, and the Seventh Symphony definitely needs rehearing. Some of Delius' more unfamiliar orchestral compositions should be heard and so should Elgar's "Falstaff," among other of his works. Schoenberg's "Pelleas aand Melisande" was mentioned as a possibility last season; let us hope it is programmed this year. And then there is Falla's Harpsichord Concerto, not wholly successful but exceedingly interesting; Pizzetti's fine "La Pisanella" suite; Szymanowski's B-flat Symphony; Bloch's "America" Symphony by all means; Vaughan Williams' Pastoral Symphony; something of Malipiero, say the Sinfonia Elegiaca (about which I know absolutely nothing); and something of Castelnuova-Tedesco (about whom I know next to nothing).

As a final request (for the moment), I think I should like most to hear Honegger's "King David" again. Its difficulties are considerable, of course, but are they more so than the preparation of Beethoven's ninth?

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN CONCERT

Igor Stravinsky's 'Ode' in 3 Parts Led by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

For the first New York concert of his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program exclusively of Russian music. There was a personal element in this arrangement, as also, without doubt, thought of the relations of America and Russia today, and the heroic contribution of the Russian people to the life and the future of the world.

The personal equation was also present in the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Ode" in three parts for orchestra commissioned for him by the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitsky. This work had been given its première by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston the 8th of last October.

The program included Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony — like Beethoven's of the same number

---

TALLAHASSEE, FLA.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 8 - 1943

…S Composers Matching …shments of Europeans

…oung American
…nulated by the
…rt and the en-
…w given them by
…as—are matching
…accomplishments of
… masters, world fa…ctor Serge Kousse-
…today as he began his
…n as leader of the Bos-
…phony orchestra.

…an not say we have a
…en as yet, but there has
…reat technical development
…tremendous progress in the
…year," he said during an in-
…iew at his quietly modernis-
… home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

"The Roy Harris Third symphony was played 10 times by the Boston symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire program of American works and no one walks out.

ood
UN ON Norman titled mount big pref-duce hat he ed

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

OCT 8 - 1943

GRAND HAVEN, MICH.
TRIBUNE

OCT 8 - 1943

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

OCT 8 - 1943

TACOMA, WASH.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

5

OCT 8 - 1943

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
INDEPENDENT

OCT 8 - 1943

KINGSTON, N. Y.
FREEMAN

OCT 8 - 1943

DALLAS, TEXAS
TIMES HERALD

OCT 8 - 1943

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

OCT 8 - 1943

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

OCT 8 - 1943

LOCKPORT, N. Y.
UNION SUN JOURNAL

OCT 8 - 1943

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

OCT 8

ST PALM BEACH, FLA.
PALM BEACH TIMES

OCT 8 - 1

Becoming Masters

BOSTON, (AP)—Young American composers — stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous energy, gayety and abundance is finding vital musical expression at last."

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 9 - 1943

AMERICAN COMPOSERS MATCH EUROPEANS, SAYS KOUSSEVITSKY

By TOM CHASE.

Boston, Oct. 9. (AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by thes urging war effort and the encouragement now now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston symphony orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

PASTE OVER

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
OCT 8 - 1943

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
NEWS
- 1943

ST. JOHNSBURY, VT.
CALEDONIAN RECORD
OCT 9 - 1943

This Clipping From
[illegible]
OCT 11 1943

ROANOKE, VA.
WORLD-NEWS
OCT 9 - 1943

VICKSBURG, MISS.
HERALD

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
OCT 10 1943

DAYTONA BEACH, FLA.
JOURNAL
43

BUTTE, MONT.
MONTANA STANDARD

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL
1943

GREENVILLE, S. C.
PIEDMONT
OCT 9 - 1943

LIVINGSTON, MONT.
ENTERPRISE
OCT 9 - 1943

merican Composers re Doing Better Work

BOSTON, Oct. 9.—(AP)—Young merican composers—stimulated the surging war effort and the couragement now given them by ajor orchestras—are matching e technical accomplishments of ous conductor them that mitaoo e European masters, World-Famous Conductor Serge Koussevitsky aid today as he began his twentieth season as leader of the Boston ymphonic orchestra.

"We cannot say we have a Beethoven as yet(, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said.

Protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said. "The Roy Harris Third Symphony was played 10 times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"We have the necessary technical skill now," the greying magnetic conductor explained, "a skill equal to anything developed in Europe. And it has been produced in three generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous energy, gayety and abundance is finding vital musical expression at last."

musical expression at last."

hands meeting gra though he had just concluded a symphony.

American composers and written during 19 years of devoted strug

---

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 8 - 1943

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
OCT - 1943

DANVILLE, VA.
BEE 1943

PONTIAC, MICH.
PRESS
OCT 8 - 1943

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES
OCT 8 - 1943

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
OCT 8 - 1943

This Clipping From
Bangor Me
Commercial
OCT 8 - 1943

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
OCT 8 - 1943

MAESTRO LAUDS YOUNG AMERICA

Koussevitzky Says U. S. Has Good Composers.

BY TOM CHASE.
Associated Press Writer.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 8.—Young American composers, stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras, are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the last year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle" noted

READING, PA.
EAGLE
OCT 8 - 1943

---

twentieth season as leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewing enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent

oices Faith can Composers

ressive hands of his to illustrate n emotion words could not con-other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the rethusiastic . S. Composers

ens, But One Koussevitzky and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

"I asked Wal/er Piston and Aaron Copland why they wrote quartets

e Developing estra Leader

uartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would lay it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and ther Americans too, that their ymphonic works would be given hearing. But that was only a tart. Then came the task of peruading the public and the critics hat home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky aid, adding that "the only way to make propoganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

"The Roy Harris Third Symphony was played ten times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all maor orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire rograms of American works and o one walks out.

"We have the necessary technial skill now," the greying, magetic conductor explained, "a skill qual to anything develope in urope. And it has been produced in three generations of comosers.

"I think the war is acting as a reat stimulus. Our tremendous nergy, gayety and abundance is nding vital musical expression at st."

ductor explained, "a skill equal to ything developed in Europe. And has been produced in three gene-her Americans too, that their mphonic works would be given hearing. But that was only a art. Then came the task of perading the public and the critics t home-grown talent had someng to say musically and the uisite skill to say it well

---

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS
OCT 9 - 1943

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 9 - 1943

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
OCT 12 1943

This Clipping From HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
OCT 10 1943

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
OCT 12 1943

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
OCT 13 1943

osers Match vitzky Says

rown talent has something to h Season Opens d Short Address

as Boston Symphony onductor and He gratulations er thing virtually never done in nphony Hall—and congratulated r great conductor" on beginning 20th year in Boston, the longest conductor has ever led the orstra.

an Composers

ES MANY EXCELLENT FAMOUS KOUSSEVILSKY

erican composers enthusiastically music since ry in 1924. ood dozen ," he said, nt and usexpressive n emotion rrived. I k, Foote. mposers. nd Aaron quartets They said y did."

hem, and

Koussevitzky Has High Praise For Young U. S. Composers

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON (AP). — Young American composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his twentieth season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We cannot say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quiety modernistic home in near-by Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

A Dozen Good Ones

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requitite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

"The Roy Harris Third Symphony was played ten times by the Boston Symphony and now is in standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"We have the necessary technical skill now," the greying, magnetic conductor explained, "a skill equal to anything developed in Europe. And it has been produced in three generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous energy, gaety and abundance is finding vital musical expression at last.

To Play Barber Work

"Already Samuel Barber has composed a commando march which I will play this season. Then there is William Schuman's new symphony for strings, written just before he entered the Army. That also I will give."

"But it is not the composers that cause the trouble." He shook his head and the lines seemed to deepen in the mobile face. "Always there is the audience—

"At first I had to fight for American music. Hundreds of letters came in, demanding I stop playing these new works. But I didn't." His face brightened, his voice grew more enthusiastic.

"Today the audiences have made great progress in recognizing and appreciating American music, especially in Boston. Already I have played two concerts of American works alone.

"And I am planning to devote the third and fourth symphony programs this season entirely to compositions of living American and Soviet composers."

Koussevitzky smiled and stood up and brought the interview to an end with another of those infinitely expressive gestures of his—the hands meeting gracefully as though he had just concluded a symphony.

In a sense he had—a symphony of labor and love, dedicated to American composers and written during 19 years of devoted struggle, was nearing successful completion.

Conductor Lauds Technical Skill of American Composers

Boston, Oct. 8 (AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his twentieth season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"We can not say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development, with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

Encouraged Musicians

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"It was different when I arrived. I knew MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote. But nothing about young composers.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing.

Audiences Like American Works

"The Roy Harris Third Symphony was played ten times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras."

Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no one walks out.

"We have the necessary technical skill now," the greying magnetic conductor explained, "a sikll equal to anything developed in Europe. And it has been produced in three generations of composers.

"I think the war is acting as a great stimulus. Our tremendous

---

INDIANA, PA.
GAZETTE
OCT 9 - 1943

COMPOSERS GET NEW HONORS

—V—

U. S. Musicians Match Technique of European Masters

BOSTON, Oct. 9.—(AP)—Young American composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, world famous Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today as he began his twentieth season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Salute to a Symphony Leader

By John N. Burk

Photos Arthur Griffin, Scherver Studios, Alfredo Valente

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: A Quiet Modesty Pervades His Musical Energy

A RECORD OF A SORT has been set at Symphony Hall—the Boston Symphony Orchestra has opened a season for the 20th successive October under the same conductor. The event breaks a tradition as well as a record, for the orchestra, now in its 63rd season, has never stayed wed to one leader for more than eight years at a stretch. A tradition often has a reason behind it, and the reason here was the wise avoidance of that pitfall observable in Europe's best—the long-continuing state of affairs where orchestra and conductor together sink ever more deeply into the complacent and sleepy routine of the "fonctionnaire."

The singular position of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that it has had for so many years a conductor so far from complacent. Geniuses of the first order happen now and then among conductors, but a quality of restlessness is apt to be found with this kind of greatness. After raising an orchestra to the heights, they have a way of departing, leaving a sad gap behind them. Perhaps the Boston audiences have tended to take their blessing as much for granted as people always do when they have the same high quality week after week and year after year. Although their loyalty and enthusiasm is unquestionable, one only has to watch the audiences in other cities which hear the orchestra once or twice or even five times a year to sense the difference in tension.

It is Koussevitzky's most remarkable trait that this very recurrence of concerts week after week and year after year leaves him with an undiminished store of freshness of outlook, abounding energy, and artistic ambition. He can turn to a standard composition for the 77th time, study it and present it as freshly as if it had just been composed. When the leader has this quality of enterprise and this spirit of quest, and when he exacts resilience and adaptability in the ranks of his players—then even the suspicion of routine performance becomes impossible.

Twenty years treats different men in different ways. They have added to the personality of Serge Koussevitzky, given him greater depth and character, and otherwise laid no more than a light hand upon him. He first landed in America, in September, 1924. This writer remembers clearly his appearance as he stepped down the gangplank of the Ile de France and made his way to that spot on the odorous Hudson River dock where the letter "K" was almost obscured by a mountain of luggage almost entirely his own. He looked younger than his years, with his dapper tweeds and his almost excessively polite manner of speech, warming quickly to ardor on any musical subject.

The Koussevitzky of 1943 is not essentially different, nor has he perceptibly changed except in superficial ways. Watch him upon the stand, or engage him for a moment in conversation. The physical alertness bespeaks the man who is moderate and always careful in his habits. He possesses, as then, the faculty for complete relaxation and rest after the tension of a performance. The mental alertness, the range of his interests has increased. He is fond of philosophizing. But the absorbing subject, never long absent, is music. His art remains his absorbing passion, nor has his eagerness lost any of its edge.

But in another sense he has changed—changed as a European will when through two decades in the New World old ties have fallen into disuse, and new ones taken their place by imperceptible degrees. With long association the point of view is accepted, the habits of thought in little things, the touches of humor in the give and take of everyday matters. They wear down, bit by bit, what is alien; they lead to inter-understanding, and finally to self-identification with another people. This process of self-identification still continues. It will fortunately never erase Koussevitzky's basic Russian character, his European graciousness and cosmopolitanism.

Nineteen years ago, when Koussevitzky stood awaiting customs inspection on the French Line Pier, he was a stranger, surrounded by incomprehensible people speaking an incomprehensible language. Perhaps at that moment he was unbearably homesick—as homesick as his countryman Tchaikovsky had been years before when he found himself in New York, a stranger in an outpost of civilization, a wide ocean removed from all that he knew or cared for. If these were Serge Koussevitzky's sensations, he concealed them perfectly, as he responded with a courteous "enchanté" to those who were there to welcome him. He once admitted, long afterwards, that he had then had no remote idea of remaining in America for more than a season, or two at the outside. The opportunity to have a world-famous orchestra and a free hand with it tempted him. But, having had his fling, he would presently return to his home and his friends, and his orchestra in Paris.

To the musical public of America he was at least as strange as they were to him. The very name was exotic, and the tales about him were fabulous. There were the accounts of his early exploits as double bass virtuoso, of his voyages along the Volga with his orchestra, his disagreements with the Soviet authorities, his later "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and his electrifying guest appearances in London.

Koussevitzky was liked and accepted at once in America. He was found to be less unorthodox in his tempi than had been reported. The worst that could be said of him was that he conducted Beethoven or Wagner as he felt their music, quite honestly, and could not alter his musical instincts to what someone else considered to be the correct tempi. There are some tempi over which there will never be unanimous agreement. There are some pages of music in which Koussevitzky has gradually grown toward orthodoxy. Generally speaking, the acceptance of Koussevitzky's tempi nowadays is as close to unanimous as could be expected with any conductor.

While the American public was getting used to Serge Koussevitzky, Koussevitzky gradually found himself more and more at home with the American public. The process of acclimatization creeps upon one unawares. Customs cease to be outlandish, friends of circumstance are found to be friends indeed. An orchestra whom its new leader cannot even address in a single language they can all understand finds close rapport with him, responds to the slightest shade of his expressive intent, becomes the most vital concern of his life. The Boston Symphony audiences, the Amercian public, the American musical scene, of which the newcomer from Europe has known nothing, become the fiber, the virtual extent of his career. No reluctance was involved—no sense of limitation. The expatriate who had no place in Russia, a visitor's place in France, found at last his soil and his roots. He brought with him from the Old World a rich culture which still graces Koussevitzky, the American citizen, and remains the basic substance of Koussevitzky, the performing artist.

To admit this is not to belittle the Americanism of Koussevitzky. In bringing Tchaikovsky or Shostakovitch to American audiences, in achieving superb choral performances with American forces, in realizing his fondest dreams of a school in direct relation with young American talents, he has, while working with them, taken their still groping but immensely promising talents to heart. The musical Koussevitzky remains as young as they—he shares their elasticity and freedom from prejudice. Youth will always be about him. He will always be more congenial with them, will always have more to impart to them than to others. On the creative side, he has much to draw from them too. He has befriended the most talented and forward-looking composers in this country, made himself intimately familiar with their personal traits, and so reached an understanding of their music which is as native as a native-born conductor's could be.

Koussevitzky's orchestra, which he has made a part of himself, the composers whose every step he has developed by performance, the school which he realized after a life of planning and which he will resume when conditions permit, the festival at Tanglewood—these are the seat of his deepest affections. It has taken a score of years to bring them to fruition—and he has further, more far-reaching plans for them all.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY LEADER AT THE PIANO

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S ABSORBING INTEREST IS MUSIC

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, OCTOBER 9, 1943

Koussevitzky Honored At Opening of Season

Monitor By L. A. Sloper Oct. 9, 43

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received unprecedented honors when he stepped upon the platform in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to begin his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he neared the center of the stage, Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, leaped to the dais and led the orchestra in Walter Piston's Fanfare, recently played in Sanders Theater when Harvard conferred a degree on Winston Churchill.

Then Jerome D. Greene, president of the Board of Trustees, climbed to the platform and welcomed the conductor with a brief address which conveyed "warmest congratulations" from his audiences. Dr. Koussevitzky replied with a graceful tribute to the orchestra, its founder, and those who have helped it "to fulfill its cultural and artistic mission." He concluded:

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression: because music is a leading and a living force toward the supreme goal—life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the musical program with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, edited by A. Siloti, the composition with which he began his first concert in Boston 19 years ago. He continued with Stravinsky's new "Ode" for Orchestra (first performance) and the "Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," and closed with the First Symphony of Brahms. Now he has only the Shostakovitch Fifth left for period to his twentieth season.

Stravinsky's "Ode," composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It is a chant in three parts for orchestra, and is described by the composer as "an appreciation of Natalie Koussevitzky's spiritual contribution to the art of the eminent conductor, her husband."

The three parts are a Eulogy, an Eclogue, and an Epitaph. The piece is lightly scored, and is written in its composer's neo-classic vein of dissonant counterpoint. The first and third parts are solemn in mood but the second is lively, and is intended, according to the composer to suggest out-of-doors music, "an idea cherished by Natalie Koussevitzky and brilliantly materialized at Tanglewood by her husband." The work as a whole, undoubtedly born of real emotion, left in performance the impression of sterility that is made by so much of the composer's later output.

The orchestra opens its sixty-third season with only minor changes in personnel and with its virtuosity kept to concert pitch by almost continuous playing for the last two years. Indeed, it is possible to feel that it has played a little too uninterruptedly. There were raggednesses yesterday in the strings and in the brass, and tone was often harsh. These flaws, especially apparent in the Vivaldi and the Brahms, are due in part probably to a lack of clarity in the conductor's indication of entrances and to his insistence on more and more volume in climaxes. When leader and men have settled down together for the season, we shall no doubt have greater precision and better tone.

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Ravel item, which seems to have won a settled place in the repertory, reminded us again that the more music leans on a program, the sooner we tire of it. But the finale may always be depended upon to make its effect.

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA

First Symphony Luncheon

The first of the new season's Symphony Luncheons drew a capacity gathering to the Oval Room of Hotel Copley Plaza yesterday noon.

Boris Goldovsky spoke about Modeste Moussorgsky as the greatest of Russian composers, following the luncheon. Mr. Goldovsky's piano illustrations devolved mainly upon the composer's traits as shown in the opera "Boris Godunoff" and in "Pictures at an Exhibition," the latter of which is upon this week's Boston Symphony program.

The town knows full well, by now, that the Symphony Luncheons are quite out of the ordinary, but the fact can profitably be emphasized anew. Both for the information Mr. Goldovsky conveys and for his very pleasant informal manner, these Symphony Luncheons are not to be missed by those who want to hear human but sound comment upon music and its creators.

C. W. D.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

OCT 10 1943

Stravinsky Ode Is Highlight of Symphony Concert

A new work by Stravinsky highlighted the Boston Symphony orchestra's opening broadcast, heard over KSCJ Saturday at 7:15 p. m.

Entitled Ode, it was dedicated to the late Mme. Serge Koussevitsky. Stravinsky composed his Ode in memory of Mme. Koussevitsky, who died in 1942. He will be a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony later in the season.

Koussevitsky, who conducted the Saturday night concert leads the orchestra for his 20th season. The program will be heard every Saturday night during the coming months at the above time.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 1943

Roy Harris Praised By Conductor

Among the young American composers praised by the world famous conductor Serge Koussevitzky today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Roy Harris, formerly composer-in-residence at Cornell, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Boston, Mass.

Native composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, declared Koussevitzky in an interview. He noted that the Roy Harris Third Symphony was played 10 times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras.

No Beethoven Yet

"We cannot say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing."

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

OCT 8 - 1943

STRAVINSKY PREMIERE

BOSTON, Oct. 8, (INS)—The premiere performance of a work by Igor Stravinsky will be one of the features when Serge Koussevitsky opens his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The work, entitled simply "Ode," is dedicated to the memory of Koussevitsky's late wife, Natalie. Its first or pastoral movement is intended to convey the composer's impression of "the scenic surroundings of the Berkshire symphonic festival."

Rounding out the program is the Concerto in D Minor for orchestra with organ, by Vivaldi, and the first symphony of Johannes Brahms

---

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed

Herald - Oct 9

(Continued from First Page)

inspirational message. At the conclusion of the ceremony both audience and orchestra broke into prolonged applause which the conductor, his face scarlet with emotion and his head held high in pride, acknowledged with simple dignity. And so the music began.

Appropriately enough, it began with the exquisite Vivaldi Concerto in D minor which served to introduce the conductor to America just 20 years ago, almost to the hour. In this, as well as in Brahms' C minor Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (which the conductor had most certainly elected to play in the hope that the performance of the final "Gates of Kiev" section would coincide with the taking of that well-spring of Russian culture by the Red Army), the orchestra achieved wonders of sonority and the conductor wonders of interpretative vitality. But musical discussion must be limited these days to first things, and Stravinsky's "Ode" comes under that classification.

On first hearing, despite its many charming and even beautiful passages, the "Ode" appears clearly to be a case of sending a man on a boy's errand. Scored for 110 men, the work is nonetheless a miniature, and would unquestionably prove more effective scored for chamber orchestra. As it is, three quarters of the time three quarters of the orchestra is engaged only in counting measures of rest. Yet it cannot be denied that the other quarter is engaged in making exceedingly good music. The first movement, of long, flowing melodic contours, is patently reminiscent of sections of "Baiser de la Fee" both in content and in scoring. The two subsequent movements, rarefied neo-classic texture, are even more intimate than the first, but both are filled with moments of exceeding delicacy of expression. In short, reduced to proper dimensions, the "Ode" (dedicated by the way to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky) would prove of extraordinary beauty. As it is, the picture is made ridiculous by the size of the frame.

AY, OCTOBER 9, 1

SYMPHONY HAS 20TH OPENING

Koussevitzky Arranges Notable Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 20th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon with ceremony. While orchestra and audience stood at attention, Concert Master Richard Burgin presided over the performance of that form of fanfare for wind instruments known as "tusch."

Thereupon, Jerome D. Greene, president of the board of trustees, delivered a few words of welcome to orchestra and leader, mentioning also the radio audience that will hear the first half of the concert tonight. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky read from a prepared script his sentiments on this notable anniversary and then led band and listeners in a performance of the national anthem.

As for the programme proper, the initial number, Vivaldi's sturdy Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, as arranged by Siloti, had a more than purely musical interest and significance since it headed the conductor's first Boston programme.

Throughout the afternoon the standard of performance was exceptionally high. The final number, Brahms' First Symphony, which for some reason was overlooked last season, received a glamorous presentation.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 14 1943

FIRST PERFORMANCE

Boston, Oct. 14.—(UP)—Twenty-one-year-old Lucas Foss of New York City will be honored tomorrow when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first performance of his symphonic poem, "The Prairie."

Society

Herald Oct 9, 43

Winter Season Ushered in By Symphony Concert

'Homecoming' Gathering at Inaugural; Subway Popular Mode of Transportation

By ALISON ARNOLD

Although we have been enjoying Indian summer weather lately, the winter season definitely began yesterday with the opening of the sixty-third season of the Symphony concerts. The occasion is always important, but this year it also marked the beginning of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth year as conductor, and after the vast audience rose to honor him as he stepped out on the stage, he made a gracious speech in acknowledgment. "The Star Spangled Banner" opened the program, which included Stravinsky's Ode dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitsky, who was for years a familiar figure in the first balcony at each concert.

This first Friday afternoon concert of the season is like a great homecoming since it brings together friends who have been separated for the long summer months. This year most of the subscribers arrived by subway, although some are carefully saving their gas coupons for Friday afternoons. In the audience were distinguished dowagers, smart young matrons, servicemen and debutantes, as well as youngsters who were attending their first Symphony.

Many mothers and daughters attended together. With Mrs. Neal Rantoul was her daughter, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Jr., and with Mrs. Francis P. Sears was her daughter, Miss Sally Sears, a tiny black hat adorned with a red rose atop her blonde pompadour. With Mrs. Paul F. Clark was Miss Jean Clark, in a becoming Red Cross uniform.

Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and her debutante daughter, Miss Marjorie Soule, were escorted by Mr. Augustus W. Soule, Jr., and Mr. Winsor Soule, both in Army uniforms. With Mr. nd Mrs. John W. Bartol was their ughter, Mrs. Constantine Belash, d Mrs. Ward Thoron was accomnied by her daughter, Mrs. Robert Knapp, whose bright red shoulder g matched the trimming on her t.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fiedler were companied by Mrs. Fiedler's moth- Mrs. John T. Bottomley, and h Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller were her ughter, Miss Lydia Fuller, and daughter-in-law, Mrs. Alvan T. ller, Jr. Mrs. George Dutton and daughter, Miss Newell Dutton, ved together, and with Mrs. derick Ayer was her daughter, a.

an McCagg arrived from school n with books, and in a group n the Winsor School were Pa a Perrin and Constance Macld. Among the debutantes were Mary Edmands and Miss Car Bayne, and among the sub- was Cornelia Perkins, young hter of the Rev. and Mrs. Pal Perkins.

tting in her usual first balcony and looking as chic as ever was Robert Treat Paine, who wore ver fox scarf with her slim black mble. Among the many others psed were Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Francis Crowninshield, Mrs. J. Gardner dley, Mrs. George Saltonstall , Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Frank Sawtell, Mrs. Robert H. enson, Mrs. William Dexter, Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., Mrs. er Converse, Mrs. Raymond ham, Mrs. Charles Higginson, Roland Baker, Mrs. William a Orcutt, Mrs. E. Sturgis Hinds, . Charles Gaston Smith, Miss harine Lane, Mrs. Lorenz Mu- , Mrs. Basil Gavin and Mrs. Lawe L. Reeve.

This Clipping From PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 14 1943

* * *

Milton Cross and Gene Hamilton must reform. Gene first burlesqued the starched tones of symphony announcers on Basin Street broadcasts. Now he goes back to handling the Boston Symphony. Cross, current heckler of the long-hair boys who play in the Basin Street gang, will again broadcast the Metropolitan Opera. They'd better watch the script.

* * *

Opening Program Of Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, gave the first program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti) .... Vivald
Ode in Three Parts .... Stravins
"Pictures at an Exhibition" (Ravel orchestration) .... Moussor
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. .... Br

Globe MUSIC Oct. 9, 43

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fanfare that Walter Piston composed for the Harvard ceremonies honoring Winston Churchill was played in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as greeting to Serge Koussevitzky. When the conductor rounded the corner of the stage to enter his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Concertmaster Richard Burgin, fiddle tucked under left arm, leaped to the stand and signaled the men to begin.

A moment or two before, orchestra and audience had risen in tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky, usual at the start and finish of each season. But this was not all. Jerome D. Greene, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, mounted steps from the audience and made a short, formal speech of welcome.

In the reply Mr. Koussevitzky read, he said in part: "On my 20th year in America, I am happy to be able to serve the musical art of this country and to carry on the traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . It is during the two decades of my association with the Boston Symphony that I have learned to love the spirit of America.

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression: because music is a leading and a living force toward the supreme goal — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

These ceremonies and the customary performance of "The Star Spangled Banner" concluded, conductor and players addressed themselves to the opening program of the orchestra's 63d season. Vivaldi's D minor Orchestral Concerto (in the edition of Siloti) fittingly came first because it was the first music that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted in Boston. Subsequently we heard the initial performance of Igor Stravinsky's new Ode; the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Brahms' First Symphony.

In the classic order of Vivaldi, the color of Moussorgsky's tone-pictures and the energizing sweep of the C minor Symphony, we all had again the vast pleasure of hearing instrumental virtuosity and interpretive distinction applied to masterpieces. From page to page, one could detect a chord not sounded with absolute precision, hurried episodes in the Brahms. Even so, one thought constantly of the valid assertion that this orchestra is without equal.

It was too bad that "The Old Castle" and "Bydlo" were omitted from the "Pictures at an Exhibition," presumably to comply with the exactitudes of radio timing. These two sections not only have intrinsic value, but they provide essential contrast with the sections adjacent to them.

Stravinsky's Ode is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky and falls in three movements: Eulogy, Eclogue and Epitaph. In view of Stravinsky's purpose, it is regrettable that enthusiastic words cannot be written of the Ode. But Stravinsky seems to have landed in a creative dead-end characterized by superficiality, little energy, thinness and aridity. The once-prodigious master of dissonance and rhythm has here penned music of occasional chamber proportions whose main traits are ineffectuality and dullness.—C. W. D.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Koussevitzky Honored At Opening of Season

Monitor Oct. 9. 43

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky received unprecedented honors when he stepped upon the platform in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to begin his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he neared the center of the stage, Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, leaped to the dais and led the orchestra in Walter Piston's Fanfare, recently played in Sanders Theater when Harvard conferred a degree on Winston Churchill.

Then Jerome D. Greene, president of the Board of Trustees, climbed to the platform and welcomed the conductor with a brief address which conveyed "warmest congratulations" from his audiences. Dr. Koussevitzky replied with a graceful tribute to the orchestra, its founder, and those who have helped it "to fulfill its cultural and artistic mission." He concluded:

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression: because music is a leading and a living force toward the supreme goal—life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the musical program with Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ, edited by A. Siloti, the composition with which he began his first concert in Boston 19 years ago. He continued with Stravinsky's new "Ode" for Orchestra (first performance) and the "Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," and closed with the First Symphony of Brahms. Now he has only the Shostakovitch Fifth left for period to his twentieth season.

Stravinsky's "Ode," composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It is a chant in three parts for orchestra, and is described by the composer as "an appreciation of Natalie Koussevitzky's spiritual contribution to the art of the eminent conductor, her husband."

The three parts are a Eulogy, an Eclogue, and an Epitaph. The piece is lightly scored, and is written in its composer's neo-classic vein of dissonant counterpoint. The first and third parts are solemn in mood but the second is lively, and is intended, according to the composer to suggest out-of-doors music, "an idea cherished by Natalie Koussevitzky and brilliantly materialized at Tanglewood by her husband." The work as a whole, undoubtedly born of real emotion, left in performance the impression of sterility that is made by so much of the composer's later output.

The orchestra opens its sixty-third season with only minor changes in personnel and with its virtuosity kept to concert pitch by almost continuous playing for the last two years. Indeed, it is possible to feel that it has played a little too uninterruptedly. There were raggednesses yesterday in the strings and in the brass, and tone was often harsh. These flaws, especially apparent in the Vivaldi and the Brahms, are due in part probably to a lack of clarity in the conductor's indication of entrances and to his insistence on more and more volume in climaxes. When leader and men have settled down together for the season, we shall no doubt have greater precision and better tone.

The performance of the Moussorgsky-Ravel item, which seems to have won a settled place in the repertory, reminded us again that the more music leans on a program, the sooner we tire of it. But the finale may always be depended upon to make its effect.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 9 1943

Roy Harris Praised By Conductor

Among the young American composers praised by the world famous conductor Serge Koussevitzky today as he began his 20th season as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Roy Harris, formerly composer-in-residence at Cornell, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Boston, Mass.

Native composers—stimulated by the surging war effort and the encouragement now given them by major orchestras—are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters, declared Koussevitzky in an interview. He noted that the Roy Harris Third Symphony was played 10 times by the Boston Symphony and now is in the standard repertoire of all major orchestras.

No Beethoven Yet

"We cannot say we have a Beethoven as yet, but there has been great technical development with tremendous progress in the past year," he said during an interview at his quietly modernistic home in nearby Brookline.

The Russian-born conductor and master of the "bull fiddle"—noted for his championing of American composers — reviewed enthusiastically the progress of native music since first he came to this country in 1924.

"Today we have a good dozen wonderful young composers," he said, speaking with a slight accent and using those marvelously expressive hands of his to illustrate an emotion words could not convey.

"I asked Walter Piston and Aaron Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony. They said no one would play it if they did."

Koussevitzky assured them, and other Americans too, that their symphonic works would be given a hearing. But that was only a start. Then came the task of persuading the public and the critics that home-grown talent had something to say musically and the requisite skill to say it well.

The protests were many and loud-voiced, "but I told these people I would continue even if audiences walked out," Koussevitzky said, adding that "the only way to make propaganda for new things is to give them a hearing."

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA

First Symphony Luncheon

The first of the new season's Symphony Luncheons drew a capacity gathering to the Oval Room of Hotel Copley Plaza yesterday noon.

Boris Goldovsky spoke about Modeste Moussorgsky as the greatest of Russian composers, following the luncheon. Mr. Goldovsky's piano illustrations devolved mainly upon the composer's traits as shown in the opera "Boris Godunoff" and in "Pictures at an Exhibition," the latter of which is upon this week's Boston Symphony program.

The town knows full well, by now, that the Symphony Luncheons are quite out of the ordinary, but the fact can profitably be emphasized anew. Both for the information Mr. Goldovsky conveys and for his very pleasant informal manner, these Symphony Luncheons are not to be missed by those who want to hear human but sound comment upon music and its creators.

C. W. D.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

OCT 10 1943

Stravinsky Ode Is Highlight of Symphony Concert

A new work by Stravinsky highlighted the Boston Symphony orchestra's opening broadcast, heard over KSCJ Saturday at 7:15 p. m.

Entitled Ode, it was dedicated to the late Mme. Serge Koussevitsky. Stravinsky composed his Ode in memory of Mme. Koussevitsky, who died in 1942. He will be a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony later in the season.

Koussevitsky, who conducted the Saturday night concert leads the orchestra for his 20th season. The program will be heard every Saturday night during the coming months at the above time.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

OCT 8 - 1943

STRAVINSKY PREMIERE

BOSTON, Oct. 8, (INS)—The premiere performance of a work by Igor Stravinsky will be one of the features when Serge Koussevitsky opens his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today.

The work, entitled simply "Ode," is dedicated to the memory of Koussevitsky's late wife, Natalie. Its first or pastoral movement is intended to convey the composer's impression of "the scenic surroundings of the Berkshire symphonic festival."

Rounding out the program is the Concerto in D Minor for orchestra with organ, by Vivaldi, and the first symphony of Johannes Brahms

---

Koussevitzky Is Acclaimed

Herald - Oct 9

(Continued from First Page)

inspirational message. At the conclusion of the ceremony both audience and orchestra broke into prolonged applause which the conductor, his face scarlet with emotion and his head held high in pride, acknowledged with simple dignity. And so the music began.

Appropriately enough, it began with the exquisite Vivaldi Concerto in D minor which served to introduce the conductor to America just 20 years ago, almost to the hour. In this, as well as in Brahms' C minor Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" (which the conductor had most certainly elected to play in the hope that the performance of the final "Gates of Kiev" section would coincide with the taking of that well-spring of Russian culture by the Red Army), the orchestra achieved wonders of sonority and the conductor wonders of interpretative vitality. But musical discussion must be limited these days to first things, and Stravinsky's "Ode" comes under that classification.

On first hearing, despite its many charming and even beautiful passages, the "Ode" appears clearly to be a case of sending a man on a boy's errand. Scored for 110 men, the work is nonetheless a miniature, and would unquestionably prove more effective scored for chamber orchestra. As it is, three quarters of the time three quarters of the orchestra is engaged only in counting measures of rest. Yet it cannot be denied that the other quarter is engaged in making exceedingly good music. The first movement, of long, flowing melodic contours, is patently reminiscent of sections of "Baiser de la Fee" both in content and in scoring. The two subsequent movements, rarefied neo-classic texture, are even more intimate than the first, but both are filled with moments of exceeding delicacy of expression. In short, reduced to proper dimensions, the "Ode" (dedicated by the way to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky) would prove of extraordinary beauty. As it is, the picture is made ridiculous by the size of the frame.

AY, OCTOBER 9, 1

SYMPHONY HAS 20TH OPENING

Koussevitzky Arranges Notable Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's 20th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon with ceremony. While orchestra and audience stood at attention, Concert Master Richard Burgin presided over the performance of that form of fanfare for wind instruments known as "tusch."

Thereupon, Jerome D. Greene, president of the board of trustees, delivered a few words of welcome to orchestra and leader, mentioning also the radio audience that will hear the first half of the concert tonight. Finally Dr. Koussevitzky read from a prepared script his sentiments on this notable anniversary and then led band and listeners in a performance of the national anthem.

As for the programme proper, the initial number, Vivaldi's sturdy Concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ, as arranged by Siloti, had a more than purely musical interest and significance since it headed the conductor's first Boston programme.

Throughout the afternoon the standard of performance was exceptionally high. The final number, Brahms' First Symphony, which for some reason was overlooked last season, received a glamorous presentation.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 14 194

FIRST PERFORMANCE

Boston, Oct. 14.—(UP)—Twenty-one-year-old Lucas Foss of New York City will be honored tomorrow when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give the first performance of his symphonic poem, "The Prairie."

Society

Herald Oct 9, 43

Winter Season Ushered in By Symphony Concert

'Homecoming' Gathering at Inaugural; Subway Popular Mode of Transportation

By ALISON ARNOLD

Although we have been enjoying Indian summer weather lately, the winter season definitely began yesterday with the opening of the sixty-third season of the Symphony concerts. The occasion is always important, but this year it also marked the beginning of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth year as conductor, and after the vast audience rose to honor him as he stepped out on the stage, he made a gracious speech in acknowledgment. "The Star Spangled Banner" opened the program, which included Stravinsky's Ode dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitsky, who was for years a familiar figure in the first balcony at each concert.

This first Friday afternoon concert of the season is like a great homecoming since it brings together friends who have been separated for the long summer months. This year most of the subscribers arrived by subway, although some are carefully saving their gas coupons for Friday afternoons. In the audience were distinguished dowagers, smart young matrons, servicemen and debutantes, as well as youngsters who were attending their first Symphony.

Many mothers and daughters attended together. With Mrs. Neal Rantoul was her daughter, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Jr., and with Mrs. Francis P. Sears was her daughter, Miss Sally Sears, a tiny black hat adorned with a red rose atop her blonde pompadour. With Mrs. Paul F. Clark was Miss Jean Clark, in a becoming Red Cross uniform.

Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and her debutante daughter, Miss Marjorie Soule, were escorted by Mr. Augustus W. Soule, Jr., and Mr. Winsor Soule, both in Army uniforms. With Mr. nd Mrs. John W. Bartol was their ughter, Mrs. Constantine Belash, d Mrs. Ward Thoron was accomnied by her daughter, Mrs. Robert Knapp, whose bright red shoulder g matched the trimming on her t.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Fiedler were companied by Mrs. Fiedler's moth- Mrs. John T. Bottomley, and h Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller were her ughter, Miss Lydia Fuller, and daughter-in-law, Mrs. Alvan T. ller, Jr. Mrs. George Dutton and daughter, Miss Newell Dutton, ved together, and with Mrs. derick Ayer was her daughter, a.

an McCagg arrived from school n with books, and in a group n the Winsor School were Pa- a Perrin and Constance Macld. Among the debutantes were Mary Edmands and Miss Car- Bayne, and among the sub- was Cornelia Perkins, young hter of the Rev. and Mrs. Pal- Perkins.

ting in her usual first balcony and looking as chic as ever was Robert Treat Paine, who wore er fox scarf with her slim black mble. Among the many others psed were Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Ralph Bradley, Mrs. Francis rowninshield, Mrs. J. Gardner ley, Mrs. George Saltonstall , Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Frank Sawtell, Mrs. Robert H. nson, Mrs. William Dexter, Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., Mrs. er Converse, Mrs. Raymond am, Mrs. Charles Higginson, Roland Baker, Mrs. William a Orcutt, Mrs. E. Sturgis Hinds, . Charles Gaston Smith, Miss harine Lane, Mrs. Lorenz Mu- , Mrs. Basil Gavin and Mrs. Law- e L. Reeve.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 14 1943

* * *

Milton Cross and Gene Hamilton must reform. Gene first burlesqued the starched tones of symphony announcers on Basin Street broadcasts. Now he goes back to handling the Boston Symphony. Cross, current heckler of the long-hair boys who play in the Basin Street gang, will again broadcast the Metropolitan Opera. They'd better watch the script.

* * *

Opening Program Of Symphony Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, gave the first program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Concerto in D minor (edited by Siloti) ... Vivald
Ode in Three Parts........Stravins
"Pictures at an Exhibition" (Ravel orchestration) .... Moussor
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. ... Bra

MUSIC

Globe Oct. 9, 43

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fanfare that Walter Piston composed for the Harvard ceremonies honoring Winston Churchill was played in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as greeting to Serge Koussevitzky. When the conductor rounded the corner of the stage to enter his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Concertmaster Richard Burgin, fiddle tucked under left arm, leaped to the stand and signaled the men to begin.

A moment or two before, orchestra and audience had risen in tribute to Mr. Koussevitzky, usual at the start and finish of each season. But this was not all. Jerome D. Greene, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, mounted steps from the audience and made a short, formal speech of welcome.

In the reply Mr. Koussevitzky read, he said in part: "On my 20th year in America, I am happy to be able to serve the musical art of this country and to carry on the traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. . . . It is during the two decades of my association with the Boston Symphony that I have learned to love the spirit of America.

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression: because music is a leading and a living force toward the supreme goal — life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

These ceremonies and the customary performance of "The Star Spangled Banner" concluded, conductor and players addressed themselves to the opening program of the orchestra's 63d season. Vivaldi's D minor Orchestral Concerto (in the edition of Siloti) fittingly came first because it was the first music that Mr. Koussevitzky conducted in Boston. Subsequently we heard the initial performance of Igor Stravinsky's new Ode; the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Brahms' First Symphony.

In the classic order of Vivaldi, the color of Moussorgsky's tone-pictures and the energizing sweep of the C minor Symphony, we all had again the vast pleasure of hearing instrumental virtuosity and interpretive distinction applied to masterpieces. From page to page, one could detect a chord not sounded with absolute precision, hurried episodes in the Brahms. Even so, one thought constantly of the valid assertion that this orchestra is without equal.

It was too bad that "The Old Castle" and "Bydlo" were omitted from the "Pictures at an Exhibition," presumably to comply with the exactitudes of radio timing. These two sections not only have intrinsic value, but they provide essential contrast with the sections adjacent to them.

Stravinsky's Ode is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky and falls in three movements: Eulogy, Eclogue and Epitaph. In view of Stravinsky's purpose, it is regrettable that enthusiastic words cannot be written of the Ode. But Stravinsky seems to have landed in a creative dead-end characterized by superficiality, little energy, thinness and aridity. The once-prodigious master of dissonance and rhythm has here penned music of occasional chamber proportions whose main traits are ineffectuality and dullness.—C. W. D.

PASTE OVER

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL
OCT 9 - 1943

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
OCT 9 - 1943

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
OCT 9 - 1943

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
OCT 9 - 1943

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
OCT 9 - 1943

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
OCT 9 - 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~ENQUIRER~~
Times
OCT 9 1943

Boston Symphony Begins Brilliant New Season

Oct. 10, 43
Lowell Telegram

The sixty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra twentieth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky opened with rapturous applause and an orchestral ovation led by the concert master, Richard Burgin, as Dr. Koussevitsky walked on the stage. After a preliminary word of thanks on behalf of the trustees of the orchestra and the audience for the great conductor's years of service, Dr. Koussevitsky read a brief speech in which he stated his conviction in music's present and future usefulness in building a better world.

The programme commenced with the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor for Orchestra with Organ, edited by A. Siloti. Starting with an austere and strict canon between first and second violins, the first movement swells to the formidable volume which only simple chords are capable of giving. The whole is full of the brilliant Italian string writing of the period.

The first performance of an Ode in Three Parts, for Orchestra by Stravinsky, dedicated to Madame Koussevitsky, reveals a piece of such refinement and reticense, that further hearings for even first judgment are necessary. The plaintive melody in Part 1 with its sputtering accompaniment recall the opening of the now popular "Sacre du Printemps."

Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition", whose original piano pieces are childlike in both idea and manifestation, have been raised to orchestral sophistication by Ravel.

In both this and Brahm's first symphony, which concluded the programme, the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitsky's inspired baton performed with that rare combination of neatness and grandeur to which Boston is luxuriously accustomed.

The programme for next week will be: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony", "The Prairie" by Lukas Foss, (first performance) and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss.

B. W.

Pretty Please, or, An Earnest Plea To the B. S. O.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Now that Serge Koussevitzky is poised to leap into his 20th season as the conductor and musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (to its everlasting glory, by the way), I wonder if it would be too saucy to ask him to celebrate his anniversary be recalling some of his earlier zest in performing programs which will make our hair stand more or less on end?

It really is a little of a paradox that every year he has increased in interpretative scope, in intensity of expression and even in physical vitality (itself something of a wonderful paradox!) while his programs have become increasingly—well, I hate to say stuffy, but that about touches the nub of the matter. In all fairness, he does do a number of new compositions and revivals of merit, but generally it must be admitted that the programs reflect a certain over-cautiousness which hardly becomes his unchallenged dominance in the musical world today.

If statistics are required to lend weight to this assertion, consider the report of the National Music Council, Inc. In its annual report dated July, 1943, the council places the Boston orchestra as 12th on a list of 15 first-line American symphony orchestras in its performance percentage of work by native born American composers. Well, American music could be a lot better, assuredly, and most of us listen to it as a duty, but surely Dr. Koussevitzky could omit the yearly repetition of, say, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, to give American music a little better representation?

The Boston orchestra's performance percentage of works by both American-born and naturalized composers, plus foreign-born composers now living in the United States, a triple category which certainly includes 75 per cent. of the best contemporary composers, places the orchestra 10th on the list of 15. This is even more disturbing, for it means that contemporary music is being slighted in favor of old estabsihed repertoire, most of which, by means of phonograph records and continual radiod performances, is already perilously over-played.

And so it seems to me that this is the year to re-examine the modern repertoire. Countless numbers of good and even significant modern works have had their first hearing and have been forgotten. Moreover, hundreds of older works have been dropped from the repertoire for reasons which are now obscure or, because of the ever shifting outlook, reasons on longer valid.

Well aware of the factors involved in the planning and execution of a symphonic program, such as awkward personnel requirements, rehearsal considerations, radio time limitations, intermissions, etc., I offer the following possibilities in all humility. They're just things I for one, would like to hear, and, judging by the various letters that come in on the subject during the season, things others would like to hear. Moreover, I am well aware I might not find some of them especially attractive; all right, be it on my own head. I still want to hear them, just as I want to hear all the Mahler and the Bruckner any one will play.

Some of the lesser known things of Villa-Lobos should prove interesting. Instead of the frequently-heard Choros No. 10, how about Nos. 8, 11, or 12? Or, for that matter, how about "Bachianas Brazilerias?" Perhaps Carloes Chavez' Sinfonia D Antigona would sound better on second hearing, a doubtful possi bility, but still a possibility. As muc Martinu as possible, it seems to m True, Dr. Koussevitzky has alwa

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The current Symphony list provides a quick glance at the genus programme music: First, a relatively early, often tentative specimen, the present interest in which is very largely historical, Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony; second, what some have called the finest flowering of the species, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and, between these extremes, one of the rare contemporary examples, Lucas Foss' "The Prairie," in its initial performance.

Of course, 21-year-old, German-born Mr. Foss, who was on hand yesterday to receive the audience's cordial applause, insists that his piece is not programme music, though "the opening fanfare-like sonorities clearly suggest vast open landscapes and lots of fresh air." Now, if Mr. Foss does not want his listeners to start thinking of everything prairie-like, from grasses to gophers, from bison to Buffalo Bill, he should not make use of so provocative a title. Actually, the piece is built on themes from a cantata based on Sandburg's poem, "Prairie," which also provided Leo Sowerby with material for a tone poem of that name, heard at Symphony Hall in 1932.

In Mr. Foss' case, the admirably suggestive beginning and end might well provide a tonal background for one of those documentary films. Between times come some irrelevant bits. Taken as a whole, the piece is decidedly amorphous, though its general flavor is recognizably American and it discloses the young composer as one well on the way to orchestral mastery.

Dr. Koussevitzky always conducts his novelties, whatever their source, painstakingly and with infectious enthusiasm. To the music of Berlioz and Strauss he and the orchestra again gave

---

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
OCT 13 1943

No Beethoven Yet

IT IS NOT the composers who cause the trouble. There is always the audience. Thus speaks Serge Koussevitzky, world famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in an interview on the eve of entering upon his 20th season. It is a remarkable picture which he gives, and one not lacking in implication and painting a moral. While he sees no Beethoven among them as yet, he said there are a good dozen of young American music composers who are matching the technical accomplishments of the European masters. Beyond the stimulus of the war effort these American artists have the encouragement given them by major orchestras.

Russain-born Koussevitzky, bull fiddler of world fame, caustically reviewing the days of MacDowell, Chadwick and Foote, at the time of his arrival here 20 years ago, said that he knew nothing then of any young American composers. Asking Piston and Copeland why they wrote quartets and nothing for symphony, their reply was, that no one would play it if they did. Thus he took up the task of giving American composers—and American audiences and critics assurance that home grown talent had something to say musically, with the requisite skill to say it. He heard protests in number and volume, but has stuck to his guns. Today audiences listen to entire programs of American works and no body walks out.

Thus this great musical leader, coming here from Russia, speaks of a growing appreciation of what American musical artists are receiving from their own people. It is a lesson which can be extended into other fields, for Americans, from Colonial days—when perhaps it was necessary, have ever had a penchant for the imported. The pecularity of it is that on the other hand we've bragged about and extolled our resources, inventive genius, originality, and astounding ability in production.

Just as a home town boy is handicapped so long as he stays in his home town—never grows up to the generation ahead of him—so in the larger fields of art, literature, making a horseshoe or spinning a yard of cotton cloth, home talent has never had the backing which rightly it deserved. Only at the football games do we cheer for the home team, and then not as loudly as we should.

No musician denies the mastership of the masters. No one would seek to bar either talent or genius wherever it may appear.

Really what Koussetvizky does so incisively is to point out to us riches which we possess and do not recognize, and that they are not "imported."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 9 - 1943

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 9 - 1943

NEW YORK, N. Y.
~~ENQUIRER~~
Times
OCT 10 1943

0 Years on Symphony

OVATION
EAR HERE

ns

LIE, JR. Herald

ON VARIOUS FRONTS

THE Boston Symphony enters the new season with a clean financial slate, according to a report by Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees, to the more than 3,200 enrolled "Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Mr. Greene told the friends their gifts did more than relieve the emergency of last season.

"They proved," he declared, "that in a situation threatening the stability of Orchestra, its Friends could be counted on to rise to the occasion."

Mr. Greene sent the Friends a report on the various services of the Orchestra in the last season. He said it could "hardly do justice to the loyal and strenuous labors of the members of the Orchestra, who under the leadership of their great conductor maintained the standards of their art under unusually exacting conditions."

A preliminary estimate indicates that this season the Orchestra's operating expenses, including some salary increases, will exceed operating revenues and endowment income by $121,500.

At the concert of the National Orchestral Association on Jan. 10 in Carnegie Hall the soloists will be Carroll Glenn, violin, and her husband, Sgt. Eugene List piano.

Greensboro, N. C., thanks to Basic Training Center No. 10 of the Army Air Forces Eastern Technical Training Command, is hearing some good music. It happens that the center has more than 100 first-class musicians based in it. As one result, Greensboro recently heard the Brahms Horn Trio, given in one of the four War Department theatres on the post before a Sunday afternoon audience of 500 listeners, including many civilian guests. On the program were Private Felix Galimir, former leader of the Galimir Quartet, with a trio consisting of himself and Private Elliot Magaziner of the Cleveland Orchestra, and Private Joseph Kenich of the New York Philharmonic, with Private Arthur Holmes, product of the Juilliard School of Music, as the horn player.

The report came to this office in an article by Private Irving Kolodin, formerly of The New York Sun's music staff.

Globe Oct 1

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Going by titles, you might think the Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing only story-and-color music this week. Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony is precisely that, and so is "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss. But in spite of its title, "The Prairie," by Lukas Foss is not supposed to be program music.

"The Prairie" is, in fact, an instrumental work based on themes from an unperformed cantata which, in turn, was inspired by Carl Sandburg's poem. It is also very good music for a composer just over 21. Yesterday's performance of "The Prairie" was the first.

Although Foss was born a European, there is nothing European about his work, which pays its respects to Aaron Copland in certain technical ways. The handling of some of the instruments, noticeably the trumpet fanfare at the outset, also brings Copland to mind.

Foss must be very talented. Already he has lerned to handle orchestration, counterpoint and rhythmic movement with a notable amount of skill. He seems to have a knack for dissonance that is effective and has bite without being crude. In spite of almost sequential repetition and mood reminiscences of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, "The Prairie" has about it a definite air of budding professionalism.

In years to come Foss will doubtless write music more original and more important. Just now he may be satisfied with the realization that he is on his way. Appearing on the Symphony Hall stage after the performance, Foss was cordially greeted.

Each time Serge Koussevitzky conducts delienative music like the "Fantastic" Symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel," it seems that one has never really heard them before in true perspective. The same thing happened again yesterday, as the Boston Symphony traversed Berlioz' flaming romanticism and Strauss' genial cynicism with astounding brilliance.

Astounding is the right word. Yesterday's audience heard playing so precise, colorful, warm, graceful in phrasing and often times incredible of speed that they would be quite entitled to think that they had experienced the ultimate in orchestral virtuosity. A tuba might burble and the chimes might sound tinny in a shower of clashing harmonics, but the total effect was dazzling.

—C. W. D.

"The Prairie" By Boston Symphony

Lowell Telegram

A first performance of "The Prairie" by the 20-year-old American composer, Lukas Foss, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of its Friday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall this season.

Placed between Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel", "The Prairie" appeared youthful, but melodies as well as large and small continuities of form testified much for the composer's natural musicianship. If the music contained contrapuntal complexities, they were not in evidence; in their place, the whole had a flowing emotional sequence. There was a strong resemblance between the music style of "The Prairie" and that of Aaron Copland.

The "Fantastic Symphony" by Hector Berlioz which opened the program, has now become a symphonic favorite. It has, oh joy, a story—or so the chuckles of delight in Friday's audience would signify. But even conceding that its descriptive plan and, above all, its orchestration have appealing originality, yet the musical ideas themselves (melodies, harmonies, and infrequent counterpoint) are often of such commonplace quality that long acquaintance does not make the music grow in stature.

The well-known example of musical humor, "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss, served, as did the "Fantastic Symphony" to give the orchestra and conductor ample instrumental leeway. All was in excellent taste.

The programme for next week's symphony concert will be: Mozart, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik", Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral", Berezowsky, symphony No. 4, (first performance), and Rimsky - Korsakov "Capriccio Espagnol".

BETSY WARREN

[13]

HERALD TRIBUNE N.Y.

OCT 9 - 1943

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON, Oct. 8.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, first concert of the season this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Concerto in D minor........Vivaldi-Siloti
Ode ....Stravinsky
(First performance)
"Pictures at an Exposition"...Moussorgsky Ravel Symphony No. 1 in C minor..Brahms

An Anniversary and a Memorial

UP BOSTON way the autumn leaves are still a little green; they will flame brighter in another ten days. It is doubtful whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, will ever be, ever has been, a riper, more polished ensemble than it is right now. The beginning of Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth season as its conductor finds it suave, skillful, unified, comparable in technical and tonal excellence to only one other in the United States, that of Philadelphia.

Both are sensitive and powerful instruments. But Boston is unique among American cities today in having, along with such an instrument, a man conducting it who has worked with it for twenty years.

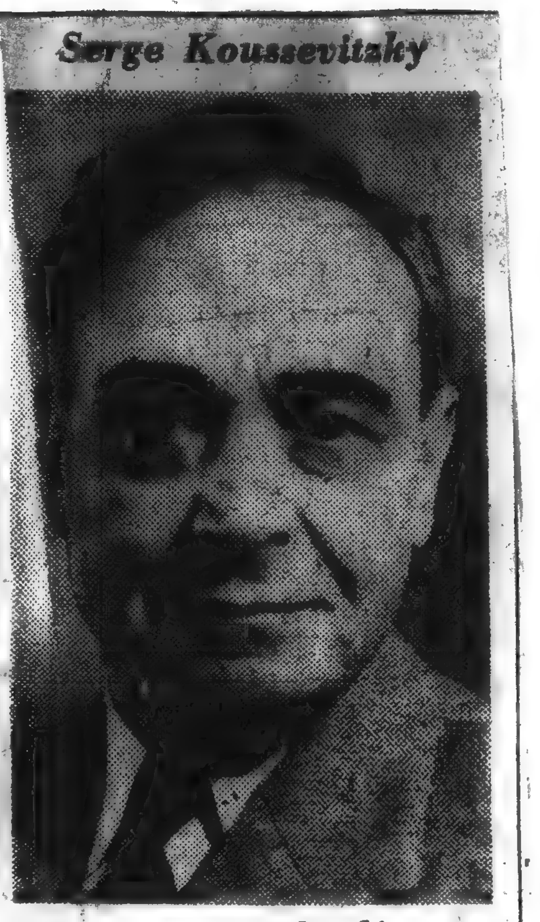
* * *

Today's anniversary was celebrated by the performance of the same Vivaldi work that opened Mr. Koussevitzky's first concert in Boston on Oct. 10, 1923. The piece also served to show off the string choir. This reviewer, who was present on both occasions, opines that although the orchestra is very little better (if any) now than it was then (for Pierre Monteux had formed a superb ensemble), Koussevitzky is a far better conductor than he was at that time. Bostonian intellectual standards and the orchestra's own musical ones have toned down the Russian fire-eater, have toned him up, too, and made of him an ideal spokesman for a community that cherishes the intellectual amenities as if they were the basic civilities of life.

* * *

As a memorial to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife and helpmate for many years, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc. (in other words, Mr. Koussevitzky himself), had commissioned for this anniversary occasion an elegiac piece from the great Igor Stravinsky, who knew her well. The work is in three sections, the middle one an evocation of eighteenth century garden music. The others are sober and funere though at no point tearful. T work as a whole is restrain comely without ostentation daintily noble, as befits the neral monument of a lady w was not in her own right a pub character. It is to be hoped t good Doctor will bring it along New York when the orchest comes down next month. V hear far too little music that technically masterful and em tionally reserved.

Serge Koussevitzky



Who began yesterday his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

OMAHA, NEB.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD

OCT 9 - 1943

Koussevitzky Opens 20th Season, Traditions Broken

Boston, Mass. (AP)—Traditions were tossed around like arpeggios at Symphony hall Friday as Serge Koussevitzky began his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The tradition-breakers included a short address by Koussevitzky, and the playing of a anfare composed for Winston hurchill.

The regular Friday afternoon udience rose to its feet on Koussevitzky's entrance, as is he custom at the opening and losing concerts, and then sud- lenly Richard Burgin, the asso- iate conductor, sprang upon the odium, raised his hands and he orchestra came to life.

Next Jerome D. Greene, presi- lent of the orchestra's board of rustees, stepped up from the udience—another thing virtual- y never done in Symphony hall —and congratulated "our great onductor" on beginning his wentieth year in Boston, the ongest any conductor has ever ed the orchestra.

Koussevitzky responded, pay- ng tribute to Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Bos- on Symphony and "to this great organization."

Serge Koussevitzky . . . traditions tossed aside.

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression," he said.

The program included the first performance anywhere of a three-part "ode" by Igor Stravinsky, composed as a memorial to the late Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky; a Vivaldi concerto, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Brahms First Symphony.

PROGRAM NOTES

Oct 8

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PROGRAM notes used to be a form of belles-lettres. As composed by Donald Tovey in Edinburgh, Philip Hale in Boston, Lawrence Gilman in New York and Felix Borowski in Chicago, they were harming to read, informative and often intellectually penetrating, t their least so, they were accurate and their language was genteel. Their purpose was to supplement the listener's spontaneous musical nderstanding with detailed analyses of the works played and with uch appropriate selection of historical data and classic comment as vould tend to clarify the music for him, both its style and its content. N recent years a tendency has been noticeable in program notes oward hastily gathered and often incorrect information, toward the mission of analysis of form and the quotation of themes and toward substitution for the quoting of diversified critical opinion about vorks of the past, of sales talk about how beautiful they are. Even vhen notes are couched in good English (which is far from always), hey are likely to resemble less a scholarly discourse than a pub- isher's blurb.

The sort of introductions that precede radio broadcasts of high- lass music are even more offensive, on the whole, than what the symphony orchestras print in their house programs. The sales- manship note is nearly always dominant. The selection about to be played is praised as something especially picked out for the listener's private delight and brought to him through the benevolence of a loving radio company or of some equally affectionate lessee of that company's time. Since the purpose of all broadcasts is to create good will toward somebody's business, it is almost impossible for the executives of that business to think up a disinterested presentation. Radio disseminates huge quantities of cultural music of the highest quality, but it also disseminates simple entertainment. And, so far the kind of honorific introduction it has been putting out with its cultural offerings is uncomfortably dangerously close to ballyhoo, or the advertising style of the entertainment industries.

* * *

Radio's Influence

IT IS quite probable that the decline of the concert program note in both scholarship and charm is due to the increased influence of radio's financial prestige on our symphonic organizations. It has not een my observation, however, that this influence is a direct one. adio companies and the sponsors of cultural broadcasts are likely show more respect for the radio public's intelligence than mana- rs and conductors do. The conservatism of the Philharmonic's unday afternoon programs is due to no pressure from either the olumbia Broadcasting Service or the United States Rubber Com- any, so far as I can find out. There is every reason to believe, on he other hand, that the Philharmonic management is the timid one. onvinced by long experience in concert organization that the larger ny audience is the safer the program must be, that management and practically all conductors) is equally convinced that a nation- ide broadcast is no place to do experimental or unfamiliar music.

The error in this calculation is to suppose that private listeners spond to music in the same way they would if they were gathered gether in a hall. Group responses to anything tend to approximate ose of the least intelligent persons present. The bed-or-fireside tener, like the reader of books, responds to art with his full intel- tual equipment, no matter how elaborate this may be. He may get red and turn the stuff off, or he may wander into another room. t if he listens at all he is not influenced by any crowd psychology. e music itself must interest him. The radio people know that a nsiderable variety in programs is necessary in order to keep up s interest. Their advertisers know, too, that cultural broadcasts d mass entertainment are not the same. When they buy culture y want the real thing. It is only from that they can get the dis- erested press mentions they are looking for.

It is my suspicion that the writers of concert program notes are cting, as intellectuals so often do, to the presence of radio in rybody's musical life in an excessive and contradictory fashion. ey imagine that because the radio announcing of high-class music mostly a pretty low-class literary performance the radio public for t music must be ignorant and indiscriminating. This reasoning, ich is, no doubt, largely unconscious, carries them to conclude ther that the whole music public, since it certainly takes that of presentation, probably likes it. In any case, their notes tend imitate the worst features of radio introductions—inaccurac egance and blurb. They are not only debasing in this way e respectable brand of belles-lettres, they are removing from the phony concert itself that aspect of serious instruction that is no responsible than their fine musical executions are for the esteem hich our orchestras are held.

* * *

e Necessity of Public Instruction

O PRINT no program notes at all would be better, if that were practical. Such is the continental habit. But it is not ours. have always had them; we like them; we are entitled to proper s. (We are also entitled to enough light in concert halls to read m by.) Proper ones consist of:

a. Historical information about composers and their intentions t is up to date and verifiable.

b. Analysis, with musical quotations, of the works being played.

c. Fair statement, with quotations from other commentators critics, of esthetic and other controversies previously raised by works.

. If a work is being performed for the first time, whatever ce the composer wishes to add.

There still are program annotators in the United States who pt to furnish this information and who do so in graceful lan- . They are rare, though. What we mostly get is both incorrect and unreadable. This protest is not made out of any wish to delay the ultimate commercialization of our major orchestras. I am inclined, rather, to hasten that consummation if I can because I believe that radio executives will take care eventually of our conductors' present conservatism about programs. They may even come to the rescue, too, of the program note, though that will be more difficult. I think it would be a good idea for the orchestras to improve their program notes right now, if only for business reasons. Because those notes are a cardinal element in the creation and the maintenance of any American orchestra's intellectual prestige. And its whole intellectual prestige (of which the orchestra's playing ability is only a part) is exactly what any orchestra has to sell to the broadcasters. The chief budget buckler, moreover, of our orchestras in the next ten years is going to be the money that is paid in by broadcasting companies, by lessees of broadcasting time and by the corporations, mostly subsidiaries of broadcasting, that manufacture gramophone records. This support will be forthcoming exactly as long as the orchestras maintain their nation-wide intellectual prestige. And they will maintain that only as long as they are clearly instruments of public instruction.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
~~POST~~
Times
OCT 16 1943

Foss Work Played in Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 15 (AP)—Lukas Foss, 21 years old, of New York today became the youngest American composer ever to have a composition performed by the Bosto Symphony Orchestra. The composer appeared on the stage afte the world première of his orchestral piece, "The Prairie," to receiv a friendly hug and a fatherly pa on the head from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

The new work is based on an original cantata set to Carl Sandburg's poem "Prairie." Born in Berlin, Mr. Foss studied in the Paris Conservatory and then came to America. Since he has written several works and received a Pulitzer Prize.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 23 1943

NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

Berezowsky Leads Boston Orchestra in Premiere of Own Work.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the world premiere of Nicolai Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony today—with the composer conducting—and only a modicum of the capacity audience walked out of Symphony Hall during the performance.

This was something of a victory for American composers—Berezowsky was born in Russia but has lived in America since 1922—and for the usually lethargic Friday afternoon gathering of reserved Bostonians.

Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony was brilliantly and cleverly orchestrated in the modern manner, vaguely reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Scriabin and Shostakovitch. It sounded extremely well on first hearing—nevertheless the impression remained that there was more shadow than substance.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 16 1943

Youth's Music Is Played By Hub Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 15—(AP)—A youthful New Yorker—21-year-old Lukas Foss—today became the youngest American composer ever to have a composition performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Appearing more the high school student seeking an usher's job than the composer, Foss came out on the stage after the world premiere of his orchestral piece "The Prairie" to receive a friendly hug and fatherly pat on the head from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

Based on an original cantata set to Carl Sandburg's poem "Prairie," the new work proved pleasantly agreeable and definitely uninspired.

Lukas Foss was a conductor-pupil for three years at Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music center.

Born in Berlin, August 15, 1922, he studied at the Paris conservatoire from 11 to 15 and then came to America. Since that time he has written a number of works and received a Pulitzer prize. Several compositions have had radio performances and an allegro concertante was performed last year by both the New York NBC Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestra.

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

OCT 9 - 1943

Koussevitzky Opens 20th Season, Traditions Broken

Boston, Mass. (AP)—Traditions were tossed around like arpeggios at Symphony hall Friday as Serge Koussevitzky began his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The tradition-breakers included a short address by Koussevitzky, and the playing of a fanfare composed for Winston Churchill.

The regular Friday afternoon audience rose to its feet on Koussevitzky's entrance, as is the custom at the opening and closing concerts, and then suddenly Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, sprang upon the podium, raised his hands and the orchestra came to life.

Next Jerome D. Greene, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, stepped up from the audience—another thing virtually never done in Symphony hall—and congratulated "our great conductor" on beginning his twentieth year in Boston, the longest any conductor has ever led the orchestra.

Koussevitzky responded, paying tribute to Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony and "to this great organization."

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression," he said.

The program included the first performance anywhere of a three-part "ode" by Igor Stravinsky, composed as a memorial to the late Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky; a Vivaldi concerto, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Brahms

---

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

New Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—A new orchestra, to be known as the Boston Community Orchestra is now being organized by Harry Ellis Dickson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be sponsored by the Community Recreation Service of Boston.

LD TRIBUNE N.Y.

CT 9 - 1943

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON, Oct. 8.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, first concert of the season this afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Concerto in D minor........Vivaldi-Siloti
Ode ....Stravinsky
(First performance)
"Pictures at an Exposition"...Moussorgsky
Ravel Symphony No. 1 in C minor..Brahms

An Anniversary and a Memorial

UP BOSTON way the autumn leaves are still a little green; they will flame brighter in another ten days. It is doubtful whether the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, will ever be, ever has been, a riper, more polished ensemble than it is right now. The beginning of Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth season as its conductor finds it suave, skillful, unified, comparable in technical and tonal excellence to only one other in the United States, that of Philadelphia.

Both are sensitive and powerful instruments. But Boston is unique among American cities today in having, along with such an instrument, a man conducting it who has worked with it for twenty years.

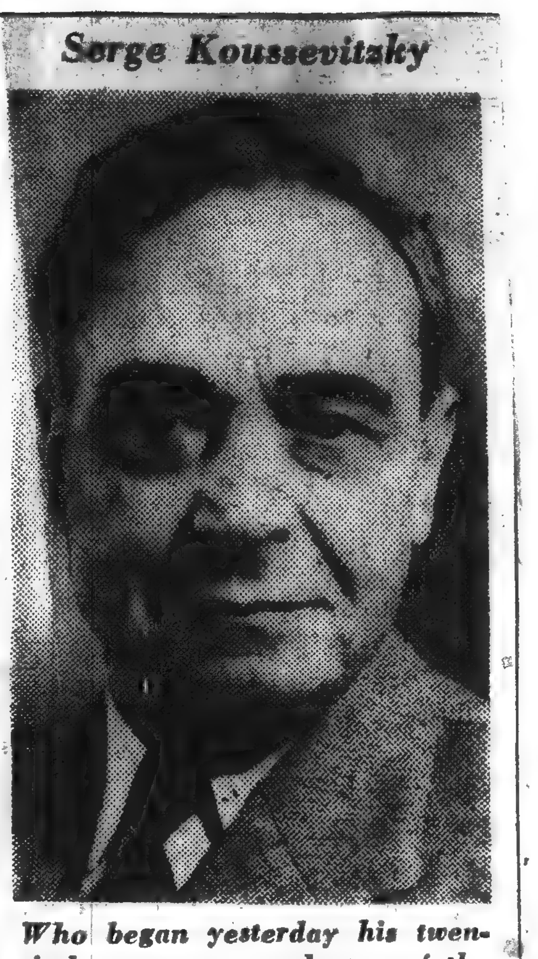
* * *

Today's anniversary was celebrated by the performance of the same Vivaldi work that opened Mr. Koussevitzky's first concert in Boston on Oct. 10, 1923. The piece also served to show off the string choir. This reviewer, who was present on both occasions, opines that although the orchestra is very little better (if any) now than it was then (for Pierre Monteux had formed a superb ensemble), Koussevitzky is a far better conductor than he was at that time. Bostonian intellectual standards and the orchestra's own musical ones have toned down the Russian fire-eater, have toned him up, too, and made of him an ideal spokesman for a community that cherishes the intellectual amenities as if they were the basic civilities of life.

* * *

As a memorial to the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife and helpmate for many years, the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc. (in other words, Mr. Koussevitzky himself), had commissioned for this anniversary occasion an elegiac piece from the great Igor Stravinsky, who knew her well. The work is in three sections, the middle one an evocation of eighteenth century garden music. The others are sober and funereal, though at no point tearful. The work as a whole is restrained, comely without ostentation and daintily noble, as befits the funeral monument of a lady who was not in her own right a public character. It is to be hoped the good Doctor will bring it along to New York when the orchestra comes down next month. We hear far too little music that is technically masterful and emotionally reserved.

Serge Koussevitzky



Who began yesterday his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

MAHA, NEB.
ORLD-HERALD

1943 ssevitzky Opens 20th Season, Traditions Brok

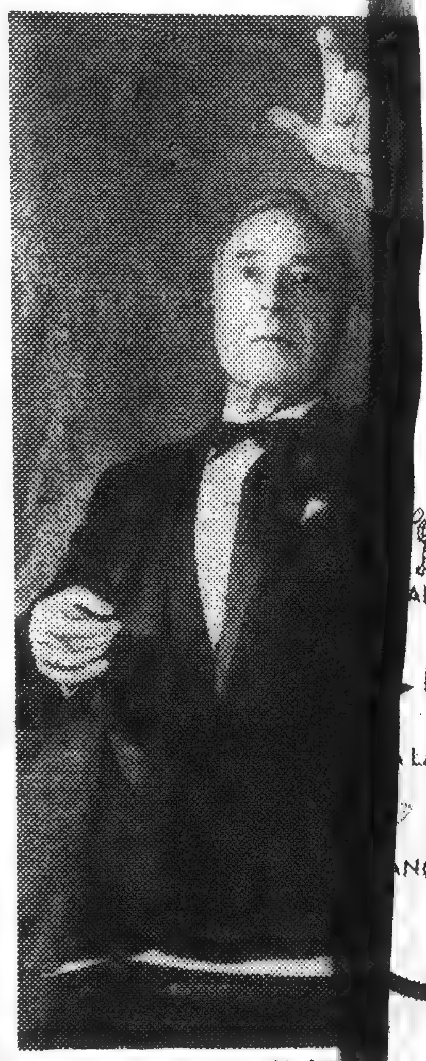
oston, Mass. (AP)—Traditions e tossed around like arpeggos at Symphony hall Friday as Serge Koussevitzky began his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The tradition-breakers included a short address by Koussevitzky, and the playing of a fanfare composed for Winston Churchill.

The regular Friday afternoon udience rose to its feet on Koussevitzky's entrance, as is he custom at the opening and losing concerts, and then sudlenly Richard Burgin, the assoiate conductor, sprang upon the odium, raised his hands and he orchestra came to life.

Next Jerome D. Greene, presilent of the orchestra's board of rustees, stepped up from the udience—another thing virtualy never done in Symphony hall —and congratulated "our great onductor" on beginning his wentieth year in Boston, the ongest any conductor has ever ed the orchestra.

Koussevitzky responded, payng tribute to Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony and "to this great organization."



Serge Koussevitzky ditions tossed aside.

"Today, when the flaming battlefield fo and ideals of democ my deep and firm be music will help to bu world free from dest oppression," he said.

The program inclu performance anyw three-part "ode" by vinsky, composed as to the late Mrs. Na sevitzky; a Vival Moussorgsky's "Pictur Exhibition" and the First Symphony.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
~~POST~~
Times

OCT 16 1943

Foss Work Played in Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 15 (AP)—Lukas Foss, 21 years old, of New York today became the youngest American composer ever to have a composition performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The composer appeared on the stage after the world première of his orchestral piece, "The Prairie," to receive a friendly hug and a fatherly pa on the head from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

The new work is based on an original cantata set to Carl Sandburg's poem "Prairie." Born in Berlin, Mr. Foss studied in the Paris Conservatory and then came to America. Since he has written several works and received a Pulitzer Prize.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 23 1943

NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

Berezowsky Leads Boston Orchestra in Premiere of Own Work.

Boston, Oct. 22.—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the world premiere of Nicolai Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony today—with the composer conducting—and only a modicum of the capacity audience walked out of Symphony Hall during the performance.

This was something of a victory for American composers—Berezowsky was born in Russia but has lived in America since 1922—and for the usually lethargic Friday afternoon gathering of reserved Bostonians.

Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony was brilliantly and cleverly orchestrated in the modern manner, vaguely reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Scriabin and Shostakovitch. It sounded extremely well on first hearing—nevertheless the impression remained that there was more shadow than substance.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 16 1943

Youth's Music Is Played By Hub Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 15—(AP)—A youthful New Yorker—21-year-old Lukas Foss—today became the youngest American composer ever to have a composition performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Appearing more the high school student seeking an usher's job than the composer, Foss came out on the stage after the world premiere of his orchestral piece "The Prairie" to receive a friendly hug and fatherly pat on the head from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

Based on an original cantata set to Carl Sandburg's poem "Prairie," the new work proved pleasantly agreeable and definitely uninspired.

Lukas Foss was a conductor-pupil for three years at Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music center.

Born in Berlin, August 15, 1922, he studied at the Paris conservatoire from 11 to 15 and then came to America. Since that time he has written a number of works and received a Pulitzer prize. Several compositions have had radio performances and an allegro concertante was performed last year by both the New York NBC Symphony and the Philadelphia orchestra.

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

OCT 9 - 1943

Koussevitzky Opens 20th Season, Traditions Broken

Boston, Mass. (AP)—Traditions were tossed around like arpeggios at Symphony hall Friday as Serge Koussevitzky began his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The tradition-breakers included a short address by Koussevitzky, and the playing of a fanfare composed for Winston Churchill.

The regular Friday afternoon audience rose to its feet on Koussevitzky's entrance, as is the custom at the opening and closing concerts, and then suddenly Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, sprang upon the podium, raised his hands and the orchestra came to life.

Next Jerome D. Greene, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, stepped up from the audience—another thing virtually never done in Symphony hall—and congratulated "our great conductor" on beginning his twentieth year in Boston, the longest any conductor has ever led the orchestra.

Koussevitzky responded, paying tribute to Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony and "to this great organization."

"Today, when the world is a flaming battlefield for the cause and ideals of democracy, it is my deep and firm belief that music will help to build a new world free from destruction and oppression," he said.

The program included the first performance anywhere of a three-part "ode" by Igor Stravinsky, composed as a memorial to the late Mrs. Natalie Koussevitzky; a Vivaldi concerto, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and the Brahms First Symphony.

[14]

PROGRAM NOTES

Oct 8

By VIRGIL THOMSON

PROGRAM notes used to be a form of belles-lettres. As composed by Donald Tovey in Edinburgh, Philip Hale in Boston, Lawrence Gilman in New York and Felix Borowski in Chicago, they were charming to read, informative and often intellectually penetrating. At their least so, they were accurate and their language was genteel. Their purpose was to supplement the listener's spontaneous musical understanding with detailed analyses of the works played and with such appropriate selection of historical data and classic comment as would tend to clarify the music for him, both its style and its content. In recent years a tendency has been noticeable in program notes toward hastily gathered and often incorrect information, toward the omission of analysis of form and the quotation of themes and toward a substitution for the quoting of diversified critical opinion about works of the past, of sales talk about how beautiful they are. Even when notes are couched in good English (which is far from always), they are likely to resemble less a scholarly discourse than a publisher's blurb.

The sort of introductions that precede radio broadcasts of high-class music are even more offensive, on the whole, than what the symphony orchestras print in their house programs. The salesmanship note is nearly always dominant. The selection about to be played is praised as something especially picked out for the listener's private delight and brought to him through the benevolence of a loving radio company or of some equally affectionate lessee of that company's time. Since the purpose of all broadcasts is to create good will toward somebody's business, it is almost impossible for the executives of that business to think up a disinterested presentation. Radio disseminates huge quantities of cultural music of the highest quality, but it also disseminates simple entertainment. And, so far, the kind of honorific introduction it has been putting out with its cultural offerings is uncomfortably dangerously close to ballyhoo, or the advertising style of the entertainment industries.

* * *

Radio's Influence

IT IS quite probable that the decline of the concert program note in both scholarship and charm is due to the increased influence of radio's financial prestige on our symphonic organizations. It has not been my observation, however, that this influence is a direct one. Radio companies and the sponsors of cultural broadcasts are likely to show more respect for the radio public's intelligence than managers and conductors do. The conservatism of the Philharmonic's Sunday afternoon programs is due to no pressure from either the Columbia Broadcasting Service or the United States Rubber Company, so far as I can find out. There is every reason to believe, on the other hand, that the Philharmonic management is the timid one. Convinced by long experience in concert organization that the larger any audience is the safer the program must be, that management (and practically all conductors) is equally convinced that a nation-wide broadcast is no place to do experimental or unfamiliar music.

The error in this calculation is to suppose that private listeners respond to music in the same way they would if they were gathered together in a hall. Group responses to anything tend to approximate those of the least intelligent persons present. The bed-or-fireside listener, like the reader of books, responds to art with his full intellectual equipment, no matter how elaborate this may be. He may get bored and turn the stuff off, or he may wander into another room. But if he listens at all he is not influenced by any crowd psychology. The music itself must interest him. The radio people know that a considerable variety in programs is necessary in order to keep up this interest. Their advertisers know, too, that cultural broadcasts and mass entertainment are not the same. When they buy culture they want the real thing. It is only from that they can get the disinterested press mentions they are looking for.

It is my suspicion that the writers of concert program notes are reacting, as intellectuals so often do, to the presence of radio in everybody's musical life in an excessive and contradictory fashion. They imagine that because the radio announcing of high-class music is mostly a pretty low-class literary performance the radio public for that music must be ignorant and indiscriminating. This reasoning, which is, no doubt, largely unconscious, carries them to conclude further that the whole music public, since it certainly takes that sort of presentation, probably likes it. In any case, their notes tend to imitate the worst features of radio introductions—inaccuracy, inelegance and blurb. They are not only debasing in this way a once respectable brand of belles-lettres, they are removing from the symphony concert itself that aspect of serious instruction that is no less responsible than their fine musical executions are for the esteem in which our orchestras are held.

* * *

The Necessity of Public Instruction

TO PRINT no program notes at all would be better, if that were practical. Such is the continental habit. But it is not ours. We have always had them; we like them; we are entitled to proper ones. (We are also entitled to enough light in concert halls to read them by.) Proper ones consist of:

a. Historical information about composers and their intentions that is up to date and verifiable.

b. Analysis, with musical quotations, of the works being played.

c. Fair statement, with quotations from other commentators and critics, of esthetic and other controversies previously raised by these works.

d. If a work is being performed for the first time, whatever preface the composer wishes to add.

There still are program annotators in the United States who attempt to furnish this information and who do so in graceful language. They are rare, though. What we mostly get is both incorrect and unreadable. This protest is not made out of any wish to delay the ultimate commercialization of our major orchestras. I am inclined, rather, to hasten that consummation if I can because I believe that radio executives will take care eventually of our conductors' present conservatism about programs. They may even come to the rescue, too, of the program note, though that will be more difficult. I think it would be a good idea for the orchestras to improve their program notes right now, if only for business reasons. Because those notes are a cardinal element in the creation and the maintenance of any American orchestra's intellectual prestige. And its whole intellectual prestige (of which the orchestra's playing ability is only a part) is exactly what any orchestra has to sell to the broadcasters. The chief budget buckler, moreover, of our orchestras in the next ten years is going to be the money that is paid in by broadcasting companies, by lessees of broadcasting time and by the corporations, mostly subsidiaries of broadcasting, that manufacture gramophone records. This support will be forthcoming exactly as long as the orchestras maintain their nation-wide intellectual prestige. And they will maintain that only as long as they are clearly instruments of public instruction.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

New Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 20.—A new orchestra, to be known as the Boston Community Orchestra is now being organized by Harry Ellis Dickson of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be sponsored by the Community Recreation Service of Boston.

By MARJORIE WATTS Globe Oct 3

One of the most privileged audiences in this wartime world will make its traditional Friday afternoon pilgrimage to Symphony Hall this week to open the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Friday's concert will also mark the 20th season that marvelous, musicianly Serge Koussevitzky has opened. Best beloved of all Boston's Symphony conductors in the history of the orchestra, the slender Spartan-backed figure is familiar to two whole generations of Bostonians and both generations will be standing in Symphony Hall Friday, their affectionate applause accompanying him across the stage as he enters.

Cabots and Coolidges and Saltonstalls whose Symphony seats are handed down from mother to daughter along with the family silver, will be sharing those seats with uniformed guests of all ages and many countries this year.

Many seat-holders are hoping that fortunate furloughs will bring a young son or daughter in uniform home to share this traditional Friday afternoon pleasure, and others plan to take Boston's Service visitors to the concerts.

Seat locations, prized possessions since the days when they were auctioned to the highest bidders at spirited feud-provoking meetings in the old Boston Music Hall, have been kept in the family this season in spite of the fact that war jobs have taken many a Bostonian half way across the country "for the duration." The Bradley Deweys have kept theirs, and members of the family will use the seats even though the Deweys are war-working in Washington this Winter.

In the familiar phalanx of faces on Friday will be Row A Symphony Hall neighbors, Mrs. George P. Champlin, Mrs. Franklin T. Pfaelzer, Mrs. Homer Gage, Mrs. George T. Keyes, and sisters Edith and Harriet Rantoul. Just in back of them in their usual seats will be Mrs. Guy W. Currier, Mrs. Christian Born, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Miss Ellen Coolidge, Mrs. James H. Ropes, Mrs. Malcolm B. French, and Mrs. William D. Elwell.

Side by side in Row D as usual will be Mrs. Walter G. Phippen, Mrs. William A. Kinsman and Mrs. Lewis Dexter, and still others in the first rows will be Mrs. Benjamin D. Shreve, Mrs. Philip R. Allen, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. George Lewis, Mrs. Hobart Ames, Mrs. Edwin Ginn, Mrs. Morgan Butler, Mrs. Charles Almy, Maxim Karolik, Mrs. Hugh Bancroft and Mrs. Augustus N. Rantoul, whose guest on Friday will be her daughter Charlotte, just back from a Red Cross job overseas, to which she returns shortly.

Mrs. Neal Rantoul will also share in the family reunion for her seats are just back of those attractive dark-haired Charlotte and her mother have. Mrs. Charles S. Bird, Lady Herbert Ames and Mrs. Arthur I. Cabot also have their usual seats this season, and Row J will find Mrs. Richard D. Fay, Mrs. Stephen W. Sabine, Mrs. Edward Harding, Mrs. Endicott Peabody and Mrs. George U. Crocker, as well as Mrs. Henry S. Burnham and Miss Nina Burnham, Mrs. Gardner M. Lane and Mrs. Paul F. Clark in their customary places.

Among those sharing Row K will be Mrs. Warren MacPherson, Mrs. Charles F. Ayer and Miss Elizabeth Leland, and in M will be Mrs. Moses Williams, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. F. Wayland Ayer, Mrs. Harold Murdock and Mrs. Frederick Ayer and her North Shore neighbor, Mrs. Francis P. Sears.

Mrs. Stephen Van R. Crosby, Mrs. Louis A. Frothingham and Mrs. John S. Ames have long been Symphony neighbors in S, and Mr. and Mrs. John Nicholas Brown will come from Newport to their usual seats in T. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman Jr., Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson and Mrs. Arthur W. Bell are Row W neighbors as usual, and still others who will be together for the year's first program are Mrs. Richard W. Foster and Miss Betty Foster, Mrs. George Clapp and Miss Mary Clapp, Mrs. John G. Coolidge, Mrs. William Phillips, Mrs. Bayard Warren, Mrs. Alvin F. Sortwell, Mrs. Henry P. King, Mrs. Richard Ely Danielson, Mrs. Alexander Ladd, Mrs. George S. West, Mrs. Thomas S. Blumer, Mrs. Charles S. Jenney and Mrs. Russell Coolidge.

The first balcony has always been a prized location for Symphony goers and keeping traditional places there are Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman, Mrs. George Hawley, Mrs. Frederick S. Moseley, Mrs. Edward D. Brandegee, Mrs. Alexander Forbes, Mrs. John W. Hallowell, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Mrs. John S. Lawrence, Mrs. Frederick Winthrop, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott and her sister, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird Jr.

Mrs. Francis Bird and Miss Anna Bird, Mrs. Samuel Hoar, Mrs. Gamaliel Bradford, Mrs. Andrew N. Hepburn, Mrs. Henry S. Grew, Mrs. Thaddeus DeFriez and her daughter, Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray. And still others are Mrs. John H. Cunningham, Mrs. George R. Agassiz, Mrs. George H. Monks, Mrs. Dudley Howe and Mrs. James C. Howe, Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Charles Collebs, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler and her sister Miss May Bottomley and Mrs. Robert Saltonstall Jr.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1943

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14-A .... Berlioz
"The Prairie" .... Lukas Foss
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28 .... Strauss

A very satisfying concert, this, no question about it. The Berlioz Symphony remains, in Dr. Koussevitzky's electrifying conception of it, one of the most vivid war horses in the repertoire. As the same holds true for the Strauss favorite, it is possible to come at once to grips with Lukas Foss' "The Prairie," a piece which yesterday received its first performance in the not too enviable position of holding the fort for the contemporaries.

It is all too easy, in Mr. Foss' case, to give him an "A" for effort and remark, as a sententious aside, that he has the stuff and will doubtless do fine things when he is a little older. Yet a man with his formidable orchestral technic, his obvious sincerity and his undeniable musical gifts cannot so snidely be left hanging for later reckoning. He is, after all, 21, and there are too many examples of highly gifted youths in music to let him down for his tender years.

He is, I think, on the wrong path. His music, which is by no means unattractive, nonetheless from the outset shrieks "This is American music!" And then it sets out, by every means ever employed by the League of American Composers, to cram that fact down our ears. Thus there are all the Harrisian, Coplandian and Shumanian intervals which are, they tell us, ineradicably associated with the wide open spaces. Then there are all the folksy tunes, the jagged rhythms, the "corney" jazz figures and the grotesque instrumental combinations (trumpet and xylophone in unison, for instance) which members of the league can recognize with one ear as wholly and uniquely indigenous. It's American music, by gad (it is supposed to say) and you'd better learn to like it, or else.

This sort of thing is plaguing and confusing Mr. Foss at the moment. It seems to me that if he threw the complete works of Carl Sandburg, Walt Whitman and the other wide-open-spaces poets into the dust bin and looked within himself for inspiration; if he'd cease cronying around with other violently American composers (who can do him no good but a lot of harm), and if he'd abandon the attempt to write American music and write just music, why then, Lukas Foss will one day write better music than any of his current heroes. As it is "The Prairie" is just another American piece with good spots, good workmanship and no point whatever.

All this, however, doesn't negate the quality and the beauty of the concert. On the contrary, one has only to recall the exquisite phrasing of the opening measures of the Ball Scene of the Berlioz, or the color and vividness of the performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" to realize how fine the concert was. And if "The Prairie" proved to be the weakest link, who could have expected otherwise?

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

OCT 18 1943

Symphony Plays Young Man's Piece

Boston, Oct. 18 (AP)—Twenty-one-year-old Lukas Foss is the youngest American composer ever to have a composition performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Appearing more like a high-school student seeking an usher's job than a composer, Foss came out on the stage after the world premiere of his orchestral piece "The Prairie" recently to receive a friendly hug and a fatherly pat on the head from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

Lukas Foss was a conductor-pupil for three years at Koussevitzky's Berkshire Music Center. Born in Berlin, August 15, 1922, he studied at the Paris Conservatoire from 11 to 15 and then came to America. Since that time he has written a number of works and received a Pulitzer Prize. An Allegro Concertante was performed last year by both the NBC Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct 23

Nicolai Berezowsky, who conducted his Fourth Symphony in its premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, cannot complain that he is ill-used in Boston. This Russian-born composer, who by 1944 will have spent half of his 44 years in America, has now been represented at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by four symphonies and as many concerted pieces. As a violinist he has played his own Violin Concerto here. Nor is this present occasion the first time he has appeared as conductor.

It was in 1931 that we first made Mr. Berezowsky's acquaintance. In the intervening years his skill and adroitness in composition and in orchestration have increased. This Fourth Symphony is well put together, it falls most pleasantly on the ear.

But no more than any of its predecessors does it mark its composer as a man of individual utterance. Mr. Berezowsky gives the theme-spotter plenty to think about. In particular does this Fourth Symphony bear witness to the place of its author's birth. Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, it is dedicated to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky. Mr. Berezowsky and his music were cordially applauded yesterday.

The rest of the afternoon fell to Dr. Koussevitzky and to familiar music. Next week the balance will be reversed and there will be three novelties, making a total of six in four pairs of concerts, something of a record for these days. In their several ways, yesterday's standard numbers were calculated to emphasize most of the special virtues of orchestra and conductor. They were Mozart's string serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's glittering "Spanish Caprice."

Globe

MUSIC

Oct 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Nicholai Berezowsky conducted the first performance of his own Fourth Symphony yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the first of this week's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The remainder of a very long program, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, began gracefully with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," progressed through the bucolic joys of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and ended with the lushly colored Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Since he has lived more than 20 years in the United States, Mr. Berezowsky may by courtesy be considered an American composer. But his musical roots are in Russia and his inclinations are toward European ways. As a matter of placement, the Fourth Symphony may be catalogued American, but it is far from the Piston-Harris-Copland school.

The best things about the good-sized Fourth are its fluent, sophisticated air and its able orchestration, that shows Mr. Berezowsky to have absorbed from Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Ravel and Shostakovich. In idiom the Fourth is one step ahead of electicism. The scherzo is the best-integrated movement of the four, the most dissonant and the most effective rhythmically.

Through the slow movement, which begins and finishes with lovely English horn solos, I thought almost continuously of Rachmaninoff. Thematically, the allegros of the first movement and finale seem weakest. They also are definitely labored. The finale, by the way, seems based upon a theme uncomfortably suggestive of a phrase from the Westminster Chimes.

One's total impression is of complex orchestral counterpoint well handled, a lot of agreeable sounds but very few ideas. It is always interesting to hear a composer's interpretation of his own music, and the orchestra seemed to respond to Mr. Berezowsky. But I would like to hear the Fourth again with Mr. Koussevitzky at the helm.

Mozart was beautifully done, though Mr. Koussevitzky took an overly fast pace in the andante and galloped through the rondo. Beethoven's "Pastoral" has come to be one of the loveliest Koussevitzky performances. He and the Boston Symphony have done it with more finesse, however, than was true yesterday. But even those little roughnesses did not violate the mood of the "Pastoral" nor dim the lustre of Koussevitzky's conception.

Broadly speaking, the Spanish Caprice is tune-and-effect-music, not to be heard too often because it is orchestrally pretty rich. When it is given it should have all the color intensity and dazzling brilliance such as we heard yesterday.

C. W. D.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

[illegible]

Victory for Amer
As Few Walk Ou

Boston, Oct. 22—(AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the world premiere of Nicolai Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony today—with the composer conducting—and only a modicum of the capacity audience walked out of Symphony Hall during the performance.

This was something of a victory for American composers—Berezowsky was born in Russia but has lived in America since 1922—and for the usually lethargic Friday afternoon gathering of reserved Bostonians.

People have been walking out on new works ever since the late noted music critic Philip Hale remarked that the exit signs were on the doors "in case of Brahms." That was in the early nineteen hundreds. The exodus business reached a climax with the first performance here of Igor Stravinsky's "Rites of Spring."

But today's work lacked both the harshness and the material of Stravinsky. Beresowsky's Fourth Symphony was brilliantly and cleverly orchestrated in the modern manner, vaguely reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Scriabin and Shostakovitch. It sounded extremely well on first hearing—nevertheless the impression remained that there was more shadow than substance.

Most delightful of the four movements was the lyris Scherzo, with a simple main theme and a charming three-bar motto on a descending octave. The last movement worked up to a tremendous maestoso ending, with the main theme played simultaneously by the entire orchestra in four different rhythms.

Berezowsky conducted his difficult symphony competently, but without ever attaining complete command of the orchestra. As a result, one kept thinking how much better the work might have sounded if Serge Koussevitzky had been on the podium instead.

The remainder of the program was devoted to works in the standard repertoire and included Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachmusik," Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol" — all brilliantly performed by the orchestra under Koussevitzky's superb leadership.

Post Oct 17

THE NEW STRAVINSKY MUSIC IS EXCELLENT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IT IS hard to get a line on one's contemporaries. The cronies of Franz Schubert would have been surprised indeed to learn that the tallow-faced, bespectacled, dumpy little man, whose music few people took seriously, was destined to become one of the immortals. Conversely, the fellow-townsmen of George Philipp Telemann or of Adalbert Gyrowetz would have been disturbed to find out that these worthies would mean infinitely less to posterity than a certain J. S. Bach and one Ludwig van Beethoven. And so it is and always will be. To those who walk this planet at the same time with them, the geese and the swans may look very much alike.

A problem for today's music critics is the placing of certain composers whose names begin with S: Strauss, Sibelius, Schoenberg, Stravinsky and now Shostakovitch. It is possible to read all sorts of verdicts on each of these men, and it may be a long time before we find them fixed in their proper niches. Some of them, like the aforementioned Gyrowetz, may gracefully disappear and save us the trouble.

The one to be considered he e just now is Stravinsky, whose three-part Ode, on the opening Boston Symphony programme, precipitated the usual clash of opinions. This reviewer liked it very much but the paper shortage prevented the world at large from learning so, and now amends must be made. Too often the later Stravinskyan output has come in for some hard knocks in these columns. Only last summer the "Dumbarton Oaks" Concerto, as heard in the Symphony's small orchestra series, was dismissed as "pretty small acorns," while the "Pulcinella" Suite, after Pergolesi, got itself labeled a musical perversion of its model.

That the Ode, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, would likewise prove artificial, stylized, wholly cerebral was confidently expected in this particular quarter. But, lo, the opening section yielded a brief flood of genuinely moving melody; the scherzo-like Eclogue, again regrettably short, proved wholly charming. Only the Epitaph stayed on the dry side, and here a touch of austerity was certainly not out of place. Though the piece is scored for the classical orchestra, plus a piccolo and a second pair of horns, its sonorities are always individual and arresting.

Having startled the world in 1918 with his "Sacre du Printemps" ("Who wrote this fiendish 'Rite of Spring,' what right had he to write the thing, against our helpless ears to fling its crash, clash, cling, clang, bing, bang, bing?"), Stravinsky has been surprising it ever since. He is the chameleon among modern composers.

Like the painter, Picasso, who has made an excellent drawing of him, he has kept his imitators in a dither by adopting a new style as soon as they had got the hang of the old one.

First it was neo-classicism, the back-to-Bach movement, with modern dissonance grafted onto the old formulas, as though in the performance of a Bach concerto the players were reading from the wrong clefs. Subsequently there have appeared works in lighter vein, bordering now and then on the trivial, but always redeemed by their ryhthmic vitality, their astounding workmanship. Of these post-"Sacre" compositions, Paul Rosenfeld has written: "The material was a bewildering farrago of Bach, Handel, Johann Strauss, jazz, and the kitchen range, all served up half baked together." In lighter vein we have had the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, the Tchaikovskian ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," the ballet, "Card Game." We have been treated to a dry but by no means dull violin concerto and a much drier symphony. The classical simplicities of the ballet "Apollo, Leader of the Muses" might be described as limpid or insipid, according to taste.

Again, the oratorio-opera "Oedipus Rex," itself a mixture of styles, has its moments of grandeur, of tragic force. The "Symphony of Psalms," elevated and austere, does not altogether escape either ugliness or bathos. But there was one work that proved so nobly affecting, so charged with a restrained and lofty beauty, sending you back to Gluck for suitable comparison, that its subsequent neglect at Symphony Hall has been difficult to understand. The reference is to "Persephone," or as we would say, "Proserpine," for orchestra, chorus, tenor soloist and reader, that Stravinsky himself conducted here in 1935. He will make another of his fairly frequent appearances during the current Symphony season. As this department sees it, he could do no better than repeat "Persephone" and throw in the Ode for good measure. It had even been announced that he, not Dr. Koussevitzky, would preside over the latter's premiere.

* * *

At the Symphony

At this week's Symphony Concerts the first, or broadcast portion of the programme will include Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik" for strings and Beethoven's "Pastoral," the second part, the new Fourth Symphony of Nicolai Berezowsky, conducted by the composer, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." On the following Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon the supplementary series will get under way with Brahms' First Symphony and Grieg's Piano Concerto and "Peer Gynt" Suite, No. 1.

* * *

Kreisler Is Coming

Fritz Kreisler inaugurates the current Aaron Richmond Celebrity Series with a recital at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 18 1943

MUSIC

Purged Philharmonic

The new boss of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony last week made a good start at his new job. This was a great relief to all concerned with the oldest U.S. orchestra. Arturo Toscanini's resignation, in 1936, had left the Philharmonic as limp as a discarded ventriloquist's dummy. His successors, British-born John Barbirolli and a string of guest conductors, had failed really to strike up the band. But when 49-year-old, grey-thatched Artur Rodzinski left the podium last week, the audience had heard some pretty musicianly music and even the skeptics were hopeful.

Associated Press
MR. & MRS. RODZINSKI
For him, a big repair job.

Otto Hagel
MR. & MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY
For her, a comely monument.

The hopes were based on several things. Boss Rodzinski had demanded, and got, absolute powers over the Philharmonic's artistic policies and personnel, free from all board-of-directors interference. Boss Rodzinski was also a conductor of long experience, particularly famed among musicians as an orchestra builder and repairer. He had, in 1933, developed the bush-league Cleveland Orchestra into one of the Middle West's two finest (the other: the Chicago Symphony). He had been picked by Arturo Toscanini in 1937 to organize and train the NBC Symphony. Last spring Rodzinski got ready for his New York job by suddenly firing or pensioning 17 of the Philharmonic's most important musicians (including Concertmaster Mishel Piastro and practically every soloist in the brass and reed sections). It was obvious that the orchestra was in for a complete overhaul.

What the 2,500-odd listeners heard in Carnegie Hall last week was, in effect, a new ensemble. Actually only a little over 10% of the personnel had been changed. But that 10% were mostly first-desk men, whose musical and psychological effect on an orchestra is crucial. The Philharmonic had a new concertmaster, a new solo viola, a new first oboe and bassoon, two new first horns, a new trombone, a new tuba. The orchestra played with a precision and energy that led many to hope that it might soon resume its historic place as a real rival of the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras.

Artur Rodzinski has had a sketchily schooled career. The son of a Polish army surgeon, he was born in Spalato on the coast of Dalmatia. When he was still a child, his family moved to Lwów, Poland, where he took a few piano lessons and got a job as head of the claque at the Opera House. But his father had cut out a soberer career than music for his son—Artur studied law at the University of Lwów.

World War I interrupted this by mustering him as an Austrian soldier. Severely wounded by shrapnel, he resumed his law studies in Vienna, took his doctor's degree by which he is sometimes addressed today but which has no connection with music. Then revolution blasted eastern Europe. Rodzinski went to the Ukraine as an Austrian agent in charge of food imports. Returning stability found him back in Lwów, as a price fixer on eggs, meat and vegetables. In the evenings he played the piano in a honky-tonk.

This led to more piano pounding as a backstage accompanist to Lwów's opera singers. Rodzinski began taking avid notes on what opera conductors did in rehearsals. But when he was given chances to conduct Ernani and Carmen he produced terrific fiascos. For some reason Rodzinski has always shone to better advantage in unfamiliar music than in the classics. This trait appeared in Lwów when he was put in charge of the première of a Polish opera called Eros and Psyche. The result got him a job at the Warsaw Opera. There in 1925 Leopold Stokowski met him and offered him an assistant conductorship in Philadelphia.

Intelligence, audacity, a strong personality and a fine if not a surpassing conductorial talent have taken Artur Rodzinski the rest of the way. In Cleveland he made some of the biggest headlines in U.S. music. Using the splendid theatrical facilities of Severance Hall, he produced some of the finest opera the Middle West had ever heard. From Russia, in 1935, he imported Dmitri Shostakovich's celebrated Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, made a Cleveland and Manhattan sensation with it.

Today Rodzinski lives with his handsome, golden-haired Polish wife on a large estate near Stockbridge, Mass. He tackles vegetable gardening and beekeeping with a fanatic concentration which is already becoming familiar to the members of the Philharmonic. Says he: "I wouldn't give in to the extent of one inch in matters of musical perfection. The challenge of my life and the ambition of my life is to put the Philharmonic where it belongs—on top."

• • •

Some 200 other U.S. orchestras last week dug into their scores for the winter season. The widely acknowledged finest of them all, Sergei Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, began the conductor's 20th year by playing a dignified Ode specially composed by his good friend Igor Stravinsky in memory of Madame Koussevitzky, who died nearly two years ago. Said visiting Music Critic Virgil Thomson, an all-out admirer of Stravinsky's recent neoclassicism: "The work as a whole is restrained, comely without ostentation and daintily noble, as befits the funeral monument of a lady who was not in her own right a public character."

Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra, runner-up to the Bostonians, began its concerts in the dowdy, acoustically perfect Academy of Music. In Manhattan's Radio City, the NBC Symphony (ranking as one of the four finest with the Boston, Philadelphia and Philharmonic) got ready to be shunted between Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski.

The most promising of the remaining U.S. orchestras as the season opened were: the Chicago (Belgian-born Désiré Defauw succeeded the late Frederick Stock); Cleveland (Austrian-born Erich Leinsdorf, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera House, succeeded the Philharmonic's Rodzinski); Minneapolis (Dimitri Mitropoulos); San Francisco (Pierre Monteux); Cincinnati (Eugene Goossens); St. Louis (Vladimir Golschmann); Detroit (U.S.-born Karl Krueger had managed to pull things together again after the orchestra became the temporary charge of Sam's Cut-Rate, Inc.—TIME, Oct. 19); Los Angeles (U.S.-born Alfred Wallenstein succeeded a string of guests); National Symphony of Washington, D.C. (Hans Kindler); Pittsburgh (Fritz Reiner); Rochester (José Iturbi); Indianapolis (Fabien Sevitzky). Of the 18 major-league orchestras only one looked like a war casualty: the Kansas City Philharmonic had lost its conductor, Karl Krueger, to Detroit and had as yet no plans.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 20 1943

MUSIC

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Marks His 20th Anniversary with Program.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Serge Koussevitzky, who has many 20th anniversaries to observe this season, observed one last night in Providence. A fond and respectful audience welcomed him back to Metropolitan Theatre, and listened with profound attention to the orchestra that, in his 20 years as conductor, he has brought to superb achievement.

The evening commenced wtih a reminder of his first program in America, the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra, edited by Siloti. It is an engaging work, apt for bringing forth the beauties of the string section. This it did, though with such untoward vigor, at times, that the woodwinds were playing to the eye rather than to the ear. An Ode by Stravinsky in memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky was the second item. It is a skillful blending, clashing and balancing of tones and timbres and it was performed with exquisite clarity. The second part (the three parts are eulogy, eclogue and epitaph) has an animation that cara ries the listener deftly along; the two other parts seemed, at a first hearing to convey nothing in particular.

The familiar and effective "Pic tures at an Exhibition," written fo piano by Ravel and promoted to or chestra by Moussorgsky, followec Dr. Koussevitzky exhibited thes pictures of pictures in all the exci ing colors and lights at his disposa calling for individual virtuosity an brilliant teamwork, and never fai ing to receive it. As a matter fact (as nearly as these things ca be reduced to fact) there is not much meat for the soul in this gli tering business as there is in "Swi Low, Sweet Chariot." It is one the virtues and dangers of a magni cent orchestra that, as in the case a spectacular orator, one tends n to care much what is being said long as it is being said vividly.

The Brahms symphony No. 1 is a other matter. Here, indeed, is som thing that worthily sets in motion t tremendous engine that is a sy phony orchestra. The brief h solo in the finale is enough in its to make the evening worthwh something to carry in the head to week or two afterwards, at le and bring to mind at odd mome

Dr. Koussevitzky disclosed this fin work with care and sympathy, light ing it with the understanding gaine in a long and distinguished career.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

OCT 30 1943

Young Pianist Scores In Boston Debut

BOSTON, Oct. 30—(AP)—Twenty-one-year-old Pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Syphony Hall yesterday and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, which rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an inter-settlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia Conservatory, continued his studies at the ~~Juilliard~~ Graduate School and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

MUSIC

Globe 26

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With the first pair of concerts of the "shorter series" upon us, the Boston Symphony season is really in full stride.

In these concerts (last evening, and this afternoon at 3 at Symphony Hall) Serge Koussevitzky belatedly observes the 100th anniversary of the birth of Edvard Grieg with the performance of the First Suite from his incidental music to "Peer Gynt" and the Piano Concerto in which Ania Dorfmann is soloist. The program begins with the First Symphony of Brahms.

In public acceptance, Grieg's music has traversed the whole range from the widest popularity in his lifetime to the point in recent times when it has been customary to sniff at him as lesser talent. Ordinarily we hear only a few of the songs, some of the sections of the "Peer Gynt" Suite and the Piano Concerto, his largest instrumental work. But it is not fair to sniff at a man who by choice confined his efforts mainly to the smaller forms, and who had Grieg's rare gift of melody.

The Concerto, for instance, fairly bursts with wrothy tunes. And Miss Dorfmann gave them warm attention. She approached the Concerto in a frame of mind which brought out the best of its lyric romanticism. She earned the hearty applause bestowed upon her at the end of the first movement. Albeit, she has a tendency to allow phrase endings to trail off, and there were moments when some passage work was not clearly wrought. The adagio she played beautifully, while in the final movement Miss Dorfmann maintained the several themes in sensitive balance.

One is tempted to think of the "Peer Gynt" Suite as obvious and second rate music. But Mr. Koussevitzky gave it substance and life
—J. W. R.

MUSIC

Herald Oct 23

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Nicolai Berezowsky was the guest conductor in the first performance of his own Fourth Symphony. The program was as follows:

Mozart
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K.525)
Beethoven...Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68 ("Pastoral") Berezowsky......Symphony No. 4, Op. 29
Rimsky-Korsakov
Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34

If it still holds true that once is nothing, twice is a coincidence but three times is moral certainty, then, on the basis of the third concert of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky's 20th anniversary year is indeed going to exceed anything in recent seasons both in programmatic interest and in orchestral virtuosity. Yesterday's concert was the best so far and certainly one of the best in memory.

One of the factors in making it so was the first performance of Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony, the composer conducting. Six years have elapsed since Mr. Berezowsky's Third Symphony was given its first performance at these concerts, and in those years the composer seems to have mellowed considerably. For the fourth is an outspokenly grateful and attractive work throughout, filled with an easy, flowing melody of immediate appeal. As always, Mr. Berezowsky's craftsmanship is expert, even astonishing, but there is rather less of the cleverness for cleverness' sake which has sometimes marred previous works.

Its first movement, while setting the lyric character of the symphony, rather fails to establish a firm enough impression and so leaves the subsequent movements without an anchor. The scherzo, with its amusing five-note motto, is suitably bustling and exciting; the andante, one of the most attractive slow movements in recent symphonies, is a really fine lyric conception, and the finale, a little bit too obviously maestoso, is nonetheless strong and vigorous. If these three movements had sprung compulsively from a more powerful first movement, Mr. Berezowsky's Fourth would have proved far more effective than it did.

Moreover, it is impossible to down the conviction that the symphony would have been a good deal more effective if the composer himself had not conducted it. Only one composer in a hundred really knows how to make his own music sound, and Mr. Berezowsky, although a competent enough composer, is not one of them. I am certain, at any rate, that in addition to tidying up the loose ends, Dr. Koussevitzky could have made a different story of the Fourth through his enormous interpretative authority. It is well worth a try, anyhow, for on the whole it is a well-wrought and a thoroughly musical symphony, and a very welcome addition to the repertoire.

As for the Mozart, the Beethoven and the Rimsky-Korsakov, it is to be doubted if any of them were ever more wonderfully done. The orchestral tone in the Pastoral especially, was incredibly transparent, while the conductor's conception of them all was magnificent. And a word must be said, too, for the performances of the various solo passages in the "Capriccio Espagnol." They were perfection.

Berezowsky Introduces His Fourth Symph

Monitor, October 23 1943

By L. A. Sloper

A new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, his fourth, was performed in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first time anywhere. The composer conducted. For the rest of the third program of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky directed Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol.

We have had the opportunity of hearing a great deal of Mr. Berezowsky's music in the last decade, including three symphonies, two concertos and a composition for string quartet and orchestra. The new symphony leaves an impression similar to that made by the previous works.

The composer is at his best in lively, humorous movements, such as the Scherzo and a part of the Finale of this piece. There he displays a vigor, a rhythmic variety and an orchestral palette which hold the attention. He is at his weakest in formal movements such as the first movement of a symphony, which is traditionally its strongest; and in lyrical passages.

He has a formidable orchestral technique but little melodic invention. In the slow movement of this fourth symphony, for example, a nostalgic flavor is achieved by instrumental colors and acidulous harmonies, but there is no arresting beauty of line. Mr. Berezowsky owes a great deal to his Russian musical forebears, but he does not seem to have inherited their lyricism.

In the Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky gave a brilliant demonstration of the precision, flexibility, and glorious tone of the string choirs, and a completely un-Mozartean reading. There was an absence of charm and grace, and a great deal too much "interpretation." The first movement and the Trio of the third were taken at too fast a pace, and the Finale was rushed to the point of blurring. The Romanza dragged.

The Beethoven, on the other hand, had one of the most beautiful performances within recollection. Dr. Koussevitzky is much closer in spirit to the romantic Beethoven of the "Pastoral" than to the Mozart of the Serenade. The symphony from beginning to end was a song of country life, of homely pleasures, of little frights, of tender thoughts, of humble gratitude, expressed with simplicity and lyric grace. The orchestra realized vividly the conductor's vision. Individually and collectively their playing was without audible flaw. It was a performance to be treasured in memory.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 18

MUSIC

Purged Philharmonic

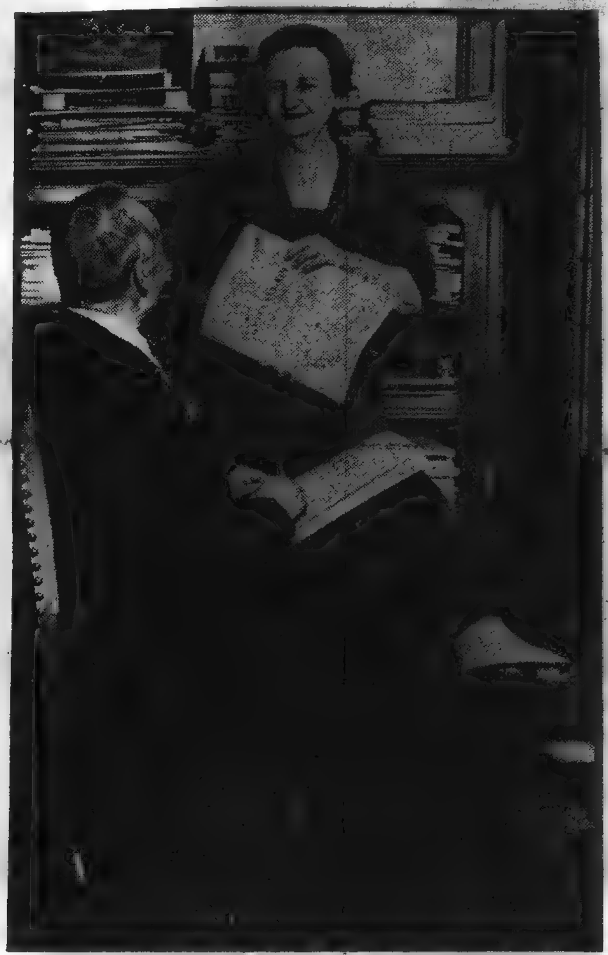
The new boss of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony last week made a good start at his new job. This was a great relief to all concerned with the oldest U.S. orchestra. Arturo Toscanini's resignation, in 1936, had left the Philharmonic as limp as a discarded ventriloquist's dummy. His successors, British-born John Barbirolli and a string of guest conductors, had failed really to strike up the band. But when 49-year-old, grey-thatched Artur Rodzinski left the podium last week, the audience had heard some pretty musicianly music and even the skeptics were hopeful.

The hopes were based on several things. Boss Rodzinski had demanded, and got, absolute powers over the Philharmonic's artistic policies and personnel, free from all board-of-directors interference. Boss Rodzinski was also a conductor of long experience, particularly famed among musicians as an orchestra builder and repairer. He had, in 1933, developed the bush-league Cleveland Orchestra into one of the Middle West's two finest (the other: the Chicago Symphony). He had been picked by Arturo Toscanini in 1937 to organize and train the NBC Symphony. Last spring Rodzinski got ready for his New York job by suddenly firing or pensioning 17 of the Philharmonic's most important musicians (including Concertmaster Mishel Piastro and practically every soloist in the brass and reed sections). It was obvious that the orchestra was in for a complete overhaul.

What the 2,500-odd listeners heard in Carnegie Hall last week was, in effect, a new ensemble. Actually only a little over 10% of the personnel had been changed. But that 10% were mostly first-desk men, whose musical and psychological effect on an orchestra is crucial. The Philharmonic had a new concertmaster, a new solo viola, a new first oboe and bassoon, two new first horns, a new trombone, a new tuba. The orchestra played with a precision and energy that led many to hope that it might soon resume its historic place as a real rival of the Boston and Philadelphia orchestras.

Associated Press

MR. & MRS. RODZINSKI
For him, a big repair job.



Otto Hagel

MR. & MRS. KOUSSEVITZKY
For her, a comely monument.

Artur Rodzinski has had a sketchily schooled career. The son of a Polish army surgeon, he was born in Spalato on the coast of Dalmatia. When he was still a child, his family moved to Lwów, Poland, where he took a few piano lessons and got a job as head of the claque at the Opera House. But his father had cut out a soberer career than music for his son—Artur studied law at the University of Lwów.

World War I interrupted this by mustering him as an Austrian soldier. Severely wounded by shrapnel, he resumed his law studies in Vienna, took his doctor's degree by which he is sometimes addressed today but which has no connection with music. Then revolution blasted eastern Europe. Rodzinski went to the Ukraine as an Austrian agent in charge of food imports. Returning stability found him back in Lwów, as a price fixer on eggs, meat and vegetables. In the evenings he played the piano in a honky-tonk.

This led to more piano pounding as a backstage accompanist to Lwów's opera singers. Rodzinski began taking avid notes on what opera conductors did in rehearsals. But when he was given chances to conduct Ernani and Carmen he produced terrific fiascos. For some reason Rodzinski has always shone to better advantage in unfamiliar music than in the classics. This trait appeared in Lwów when he was put in charge of the première of a Polish opera called Eros and Psyche. The result got him a job at the Warsaw Opera. There in 1925 Leopold Stokowski met him and offered him an assistant conductorship in Philadelphia.

Intelligence, audacity, a strong personality and a fine if not a surpassing conductorial talent have taken Artur Rodzinski the rest of the way. In Cleveland he made some of the biggest headlines in U.S. music. Using the splendid theatrical facilities of Severance Hall, he produced some of the finest opera the Middle West had ever heard. From Russia, in 1935, he imported Dmitri Shostakovich's celebrated Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, made a Cleveland and Manhattan sensation with it.

Today Rodzinski lives with his handsome, golden-haired Polish wife on a large estate near Stockbridge, Mass. He tackles vegetable gardening and beekeeping with a fanatic concentration which is already becoming familiar to the members of the Philharmonic. Says he: "I wouldn't give in to the extent of one inch in matters of musical perfection. The challenge of my life and the ambition of my life is to put the Philharmonic where it belongs—on top."

• • •

Some 200 other U.S. orchestras last week dug into their scores for the winter season. The widely acknowledged finest of them all, Sergei Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, began the conductor's 20th year by playing a dignified Ode specially composed by his good friend Igor Stravinsky in memory of Madame Koussevitzky, who died nearly two years ago. Said visiting Music Critic Virgil Thomson, an all-out admirer of Stravinsky's recent neoclassicism: "The work as a whole is restrained, comely without ostentation and daintily noble, as befits the funeral monument of a lady who was not in her own right a public character."

Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra, runner-up to the Bostonians, began its concerts in the dowdy, acoustically perfect Academy of Music. In Manhattan's Radio City, the NBC Symphony (ranking as one of the four finest with the Boston, Philadelphia and Philharmonic) got ready to be shunted between Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski.

The most promising of the remaining U.S. orchestras as the season opened were: the Chicago (Belgian-born Désiré Defauw succeeded the late Frederick Stock); Cleveland (Austrian-born Erich Leinsdorf, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera House, succeeded the Philharmonic's Rodzinski); Minneapolis (Dimitri Mitropoulos); San Francisco (Pierre Monteux); Cincinnati (Eugene Goossens); St. Louis (Vladimir Golschmann); Detroit (U.S.-born Karl Krueger had managed to pull things together again after the orchestra became the temporary charge of Sam's Cut-Rate, Inc.—TIME, Oct. 19); Los Angeles (U.S.-born Alfred Wallenstein succeeded a string of guests); National Symphony of Washington, D.C. (Hans Kindler); Pittsburgh (Fritz Reiner); Rochester (José Iturbi); Indianapolis (Fabien Sevitzky). Of the 18 major-league orchestras only one looked like a war casualty: the Kansas City Philharmonic had lost its conductor, Karl Krueger, to Detroit and had as yet no plans.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 20 1943

MUSIC

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Marks His 20th Anniversary with Program.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Serge Koussevitzky, who has many 20th anniversaries to observe this season, observed one last night in Providence. A fond and respectful audience welcomed him back to Metropolitan Theatre, and listened with profound attention to the orchestra that, in his 20 years as conductor, he has brought to superb achievement.

The evening commenced with a reminder of his first program in America, the Vivaldi concerto in D minor for orchestra, edited by Siloti. It is engaging work, apt for bringing n the beauties of the string sec-
This it did, though with such ward vigor, at times, that the dwinds were playing to the eye r than to the ear. An Ode by vinsky in memory of Mme lie Koussevitzky was the second
It is a skillful blending, clash-nd balancing of tones and tim-and it was performed with exte clarity. The second part (the parts are eulogy, eclogue and
ph) has an animation that cara he listener deftly along; the two parts seemed, at a first hearing nvey nothing in particular.

familiar and effective "Pic at an Exhibition," written fo by Ravel and promoted to or ra by Moussorgsky, followed Koussevitzky exhibited thes res of pictures in all the exci olors and lights at his disposa g for individual virtuosity an nt teamwork, and never fai o receive it. As a matter as nearly as these things ca duced to fact) there is not meat for the soul in this gli business as there is in "Swi Sweet Chariot." It is one rtues and dangers of a magni orchestra that, as in the case ctacular orator, one tends n re much what is being said as it is being said vividly.

e Brahms symphony No. 1 is a r matter. Here, indeed, is som that worthily sets in motion endous engine that is a sy y orchestra. The brief h in the finale is enough in its ake the evening worthwh thing to carry in the head fo or two afterwards, at le bring to mind at odd mome

Dr. Koussevitzky disclosed this fin work with care and sympathy, ligh ing it with the understanding gaine in a long and distinguished career.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
OCT 30 1943

Young Pianist Scores In Boston Debut

BOSTON, Oct. 30—(AP)—Twenty-one-year-old Pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Syphony Hall yesterday and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, which rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an inter-settlement contest in New York shortly afte he began to study the piano. The he obtained a scholarship at th Philadelphia Conservatory, continue his studies at the [redacted] Graduat School and won a youth contest o the Philadelphia Orchestra.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With the first pair of concerts of the "shorter series" upon us, the Boston Symphony season is really in full stride.

In these concerts (last evening and this afternoon at 3 at Symphony Hall) Serge Koussevitzky belatedly observes the 100th anniversary of the birth of Edvard Grieg with the performance of the First Suite from his incidental music to "Peer Gynt" and the Piano Concerto in which Ania Dorfmann is soloist. The program begins with the First Symphony of Brahms.

In public acceptance, Grieg's music has traversed the whole range from the widest popularity in his lifetime to the point in recent times when it has been customary to sniff at him as lesser talent. Ordinarily we hear only a few of the songs, some of the sections of the "Peer Gynt" Suite and the Piano Concerto, his largest instrumental work. But it is not fair to sniff at a man who by choice confined his efforts mainly to the smaller forms, and who had Grieg's rare gift of melody.

The Concerto, for instance, fairly bursts with wrothy tunes. And Miss Dorfmann gave them warm attention. She approached the Concerto in a frame of mind which brought out the best of its lyric romanticism. She earned the hearty applause bestowed upon her at the end of the first movement. Albeit, she has a tendency to allow phrase endings to trail off, and there were moments when some passage work was not clearly wrought. The adagio she played beautifully, while in the final movement Miss Dorfmann maintained the several themes in sensitive balance.

One is tempted to think of the "Peer Gynt" Suite as obvious and second rate music. But Mr. Koussevitzky gave it substance and life.
—J. W. R.

MUSIC

Herald Oct 23

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Nicolai Berezowsky was the guest conductor in the first performance of his own Fourth Symphony. The program was as follows:

Mozart
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (K.525)
Beethoven..Symphony No. 6 in F major, Op. 68 ("Pastoral") Berezowsky......Symphony No. 4, Op. 29
Rimsky-Korsakov
Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34

If it still holds true that once is nothing, twice is a coincidence but three times is moral certainty, then, on the basis of the third concert of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky's 20th anniversary year is indeed going to exceed anything in recent seasons both in programmatic interest and in orchestral virtuosity. Yesterday's concert was the best so far and certainly one of the best in memory.

One of the factors in making it so was the first performance of Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony, the composer conducting. Six years have elapsed since Mr. Berezowsky's Third Symphony was given its first performance at these concerts, and in those years the composer seems to have mellowed considerably. For the fourth is an outspokenly grateful and attractive work throughout, filled with an easy, flowing melody of immediate appeal. As always, Mr. Berezowsky's craftsmanship is expert, even astonishing, but there is rather less of the cleverness for cleverness' sake which has sometimes marred previous works.

Its first movement, while setting the lyric character of the symphony, rather fails to establish a firm enough impression and so leaves the subsequent movements without an anchor. The scherzo, with its amusing five-note motto, is suitably bustling and exciting; the andante, one of the most attractive slow movements in recent symphonies, is a really fine lyric conception, and the finale, a little bit too obviously maestoso, is nonetheless strong and vigorous. If these three movements had sprung compulsively from a more powerful first movement, Mr. Berezowsky's Fourth would have proved far more effective than it did.

Moreover, it is impossible to down the conviction that the symphony would have been a good deal more effective if the composer himself had not conducted it. Only one composer in a hundred really knows how to make his own music sound, and Mr. Berezowsky, although a competent enough composer, is not one of them. I am certain, at any rate, that in addition to tidying up the loose ends, Dr. Koussevitzky could have made a different story of the Fourth through his enormous interpretative authority. It is well worth a try, anyhow, for on the whole it is a well-wrought and a thoroughly musical symphony, and a very welcome addition to the repertoire.

As for the Mozart, the Beethoven and the Rimsky-Korsakov, it is to be doubted if any of them were ever more wonderfully done. The orchestral tone in the Pastoral especially, was incredibly transparent, while the conductor's conception of them all was magnificent. And a word must be said, too, for the performances of the various solo passages in the "Capriccio Espagnol." They were perfection.

Berezowsky Introduces His Fourth Symph

Monitor, October 23 1943

By L. A. Sloper

A new symphony by Nicolai Berezowsky, his fourth, was performed in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon for the first time anywhere. The composer conducted. For the rest of the third program of the Boston Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky directed Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol.

We have had the opportunity of hearing a great deal of Mr. Berezowsky's music in the last decade, including three symphonies, two concertos and a composition for string quartet and orchestra. The new symphony leaves an impression similar to that made by the previous works.

The composer is at his best in lively, humorous movements, such as the Scherzo and a part of the Finale of this piece. There he displays a vigor, a rhythmic variety and an orchestral palette which hold the [illegible]. He is at his weakest in formal movements such as the first movement of a symphony, which is traditionally its strongest; and in lyrical passages.

He has a formidable orchestral technique but little melodic invention. In the slow movement of this fourth symphony, for example, a nostalgic flavor is achieved by instrumental colors and acidulous harmonies, but there is no arresting beauty of line. Mr. Berezowsky owes a great deal to his Russian musical forebears, but he does not seem to have inherited their lyricism.

In the Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky gave a brilliant demonstration of the precision, flexibility, and glorious tone of the string choirs, and a completely un-Mozartean reading. There was an absence of charm and grace, and a great deal too much "interpretation." The first movement and the Trio of the third were taken at too fast a pace, and the Finale was rushed to the point of blurring. The Romanza dragged.

The Beethoven, on the other hand, had one of the most beautiful performances within recollection. Dr. Koussevitzky is much closer in spirit to the romantic Beethoven of the "Pastoral" than to the Mozart of the Serenade. The symphony from beginning to end was a song of country life, of homely pleasures, of little frights, of tender thoughts, of humble gratitude, expressed with simplicity and lyric grace. The orchestra realized vividly the conductor's vision. Individually and collectively their playing was without audible flaw. It was a performance to be treasured in memory.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

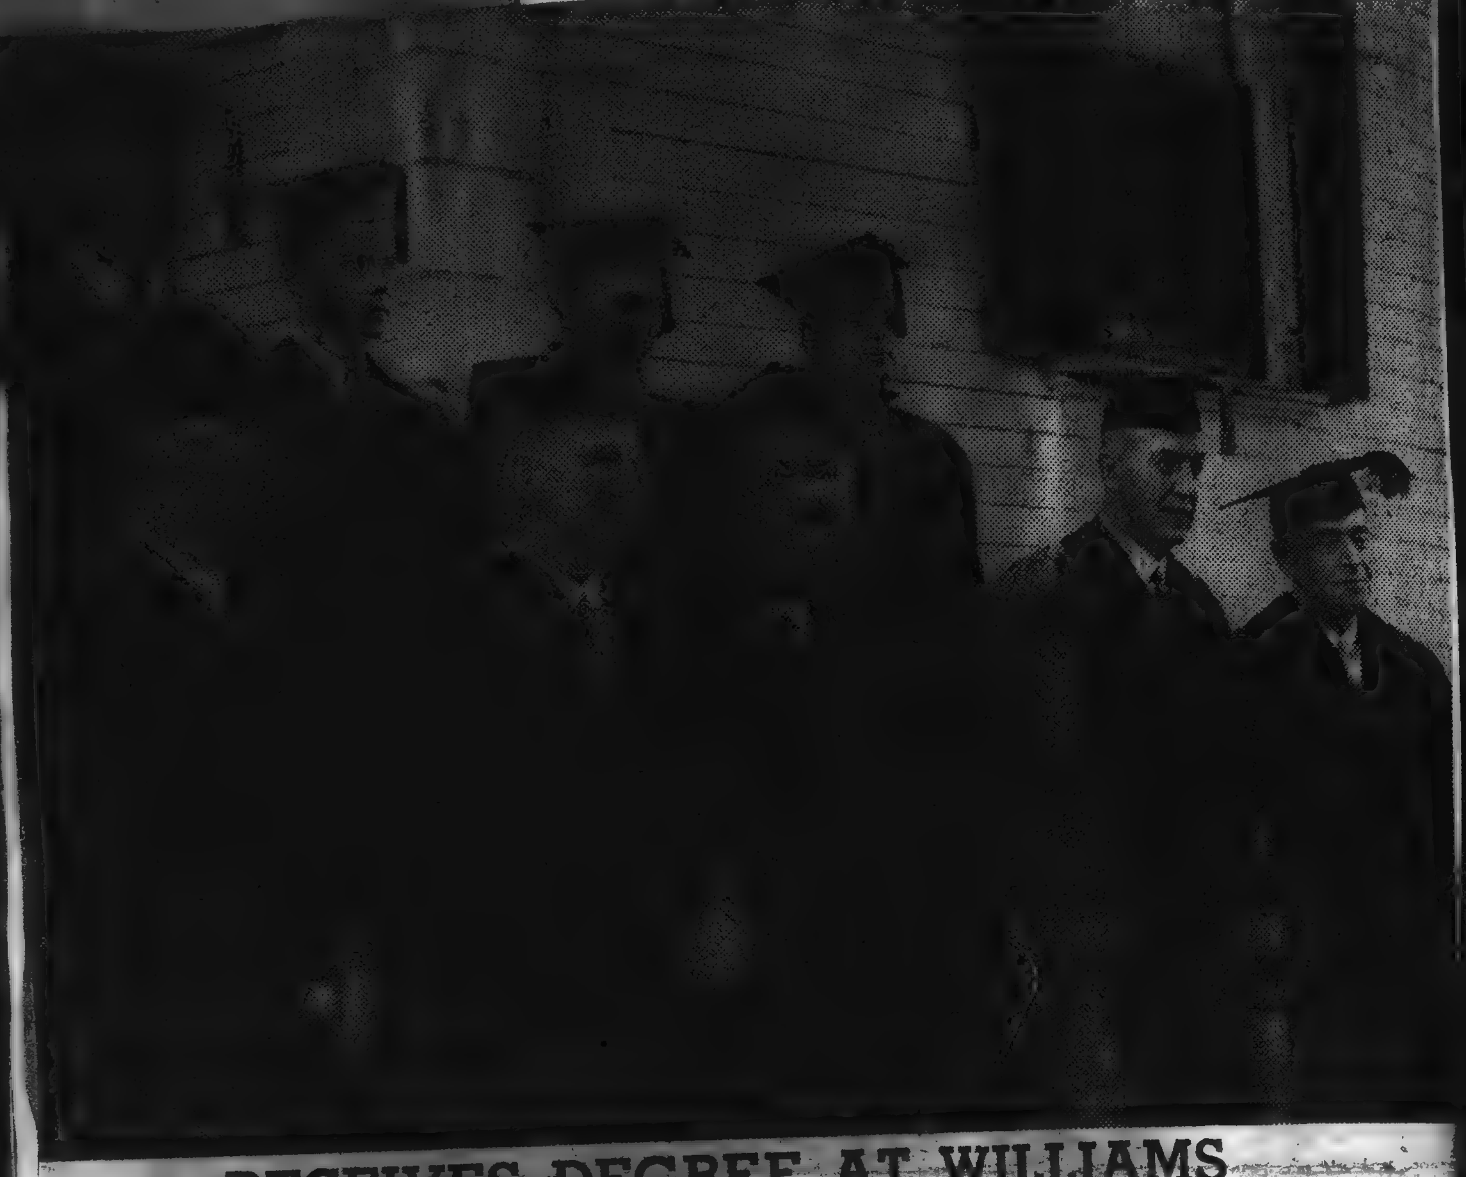
OCT 25 1943

Becomes Doctor of Music

. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival, heard Dr. Baxter's citation as he receives honorary degree, doctor of music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 25 1943



RECEIVES DEGREE AT WILLIAMS

Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th Anniversary Commencement exercises of Williams College, Williamstown yesterday. Front row, from left to right: ALFRED N. RICHARDS of the University of Pennsylvania; FRANK KNOX, Secretary of the Navy; JAMES P. BAXTER, president of Williams; CHARLES SEYMOUR, president of Yale University; SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back row, from left to right: ELMO ROPER, director of the Fortune Survey; C. HUNSAKER, Massachusett sInstitute of Technology; ROGER W. RIIS, vice-president Williams Alumni Society. (Associated Press Photo.)

Citations Read as Honorary Degrees Are Awarded At Williams College

W I L LIAMSTOWN—President ames P. Baxter 3d, read the folowing citations yesterday as he warded honorary degrees during he 150th commencement exerises:

Franklin Knox, secretary of he navy, doctor of laws.

A great publisher, who has brought to journalism, to politics and to the conduct of war the dash and courage of the Rough Riders of 1898, both in wisdom nd in character to guide the Navy which he now orders to eek out and destroy the enemy.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor ince 1924 of the Boston Symhony Orchestra, doctor of muic.

Beloved master of a magnifient orchestra, under the magic pell of whose baton millions of mericans have been transported to realms of pure delight, he as fulfilled both in Boston and hrough the Berkshire Symhonic Festival the hope expressed by the first trustees of his college that Massachusetts would become "the Athens of merica."

Charles Seymour, president of ale University, doctor of laws, distinguished historian known he world over for his contribuions to the history of the first World War, who with sure hand nd ripe wisdom guides, in a second World War, the destinies of the great university from whose side this college sprang.

This candidate for an honorary degree is the fourth member of his family to become an adopted son of Williams' for his great-grandfather, Jeremiah Day, who was destined to an illustrious career as president of Yale and his great-great uncle, Thomas Day, both members of the Williams faculty in its first decade received honorary degrees from Williams in 1798 and 1800; and his maternal grandfather, Henry Lawrence Hitchcock, then president of Western Reserve University, became an honorary doctor of divinity of Williams in 1855.

Alfred Newton Richards, professor of pharmacology and vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania, doctor of science.

World famous for his researches on the kidneys this wise leader in biological science ha been charged, as chairman of the committee on medical researc of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, with the production of many substances, notably penicillin, of vast significance to humanity in peace as well as war.

Roger William Riis of the class of 1917, vice-president of the Society of Alumni, master of arts

Blessed with the charm an fired by the liberal spirit whic made his father an outstandin figure in American life, he ha revealed the same discriminat ing sense of values and capacit for achievement for which toda we do honor to the founders this college.

Elmo Roper, director of Fortune Survey, consultant to th War Production Board, the Office of Strategic Services and th Office of War Information, master of arts.

Elmer Roper, pioneer in th field of public opinion researc who has developed and refine more precise methods of gaugin the public mind and thereb given us a new tool of grea promise for merchandising, fo education, and for the bette functioning of the democrati process.

William Edgar Parks of the class of 1930, president of the Northfield Schools, doctor of divinity.

Outstanding among recent Williams graduates who have embraced the sacred calling of the ministry, he is making an admirable record as wartime pilot of two great schools both of them destined under his wise leadership to make still greater contributions to the education of American youth.

Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, head of the departments of mechanical and aeronautical engineering at the Massachusetts Insti e of Technology, doctor of scie.

great aeronautical engineer, gner of the Shenandoah and he NC-4, the first flying boat fly the Atlantic, his long experience as a naval officer and creative scientist enables him to render notable service in this war as chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

Secretary Knox Gives Peace Talk

WILLIAMSTOWN, Oct. 25 (UP)—Recognition by the American and British people of the interdependence of their nations is the greatest factor that will contribute to their common victory in World War II, Secretary of Navy Knox believes.

"These two great nations must work together and do the job as equals because both are made up of free men who intend to remain free," he declared yesterday at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises at Williams College.

"We are not fighting alone for peace. We want peace with righteousness and justice . . . The march toward victory must not be short of Berlin and Tokyo . . . Unconditional surrender must be a lesson to show that wars are unprofitable . . . There must be no truce such as we had after the last war."

Knox was awarded an honorary doctorate of laws while other honorary degrees went to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pres. Charles Seymour of Yale University, Alfred Newton Richards, vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania; Jerome C. Hunsaker, head of the mechanical and aeronautical engineering departments at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Rev. William Edgar Park, president of the Northfield Schools; Roger W. Riis, roving editor for Reader's Digest, and Elmo Roper, director of the Fortune survey of public opinion.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony programme has a timeliness that orchestral concerts do not always exhibit. The oldest music was that of Debussy, heard after the intermission: the "Two Nocturnes and "The Sea." All the rest was new, either to Boston or to the Symphony Concerts proper.

This last qualification applies to the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian, played in both the past season and the previous one at the Pops, with Bernhard Weiser as the soloist. There was a new pianist yesterday, 21-year-old William Kapell, who won his audience instantly and completely. Some of this enthusiasm was undoubtedly aroused by the Concerto itself, which despite arid and meaningless episodes has elements of popularity. The exotic note, in this case Armenian and Caucasian, is one factor in its appeal—the second movement immediately conjures up Near Eastern vistas. There are also forthright themes and brilliant writing for both orchestra and solo instrument. The close is of the hair-raising variety.

Your customary composer tends to shun the 19th century like the plague and hark back to the forms and manners of the 18th and 17th. This is what Walter Piston has done in his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, which received its first concert performance on this occasion with E. Power Biggs at the organ. This is a fine piece, any way you look at it, and deserves to become a part of the repertory. The excellence of the playing might be taken for granted but a word should be said for the uncommon virtuosity of Mr. Biggs.

Mr. Piston came to the stage yesterday in acknowledgment of warm applause, and so did Samuel Barber (wearing the uniform of the air force), to be tumultuously greeted after the first Boston and first symphonic performance of his Commando March, written for military band. It is a rousing piece, with some un-Sousa-like harmonies, but it will hardly add greatly to its composer's reputation.

Lowell Telegram Oct 30

20th Century Music On Symphony Program

Using only music of the 20th century, Dr. Koussevitzky presented a programme of difference —in musical form, in nationality of composers, in individual styles— to those who attended last Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall.

Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, soloist, E. Power Biggs, was first played last summer on the enterprising Mr. Biggs' Sunday morning broadcasts. A second hearing only confirms one's first opinion that the adjectives sparce and academic have no longer any descriptive value for this rich and emotional creation. Both an amazing concern for melody—amazing for Mr. Pison—and a toccata organ part, which Mr. Biggs performed with pungency, contributed to the conviction that Mr. Piston's mature works are gaining in expressiveness while continuing from an intellectual foundation.

The performance of Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto by William Kapell brought a new performer to Boston. This young American played with all the technical valor of many older and wiser artists, nor were interpretive powers lacking in the infrequent passages requiring them. More often, the piano part consisted of technical rather than musical achievements.

The concerto contained its best material in the second movement, with the prominent first theme of the first movement also provocative. Also worthy of attention were the succession of solo instruments in the first movement and among them, the conspicuous bass clarinet.

The Commando March by Samuel Barber was stirring in true Sousa tradition as well as musical entertainment. The audience was delighted with it.

Also included on the programme were Debussy's Two Nocturnes and "La Mer."

Next week's programme will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 and his Piano Concerto No. 1.

Globe Oct 30

ATURDAY. THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Friday afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were treated to three pieces of comparatively new music yesterday afternoon. None of the three is remarkable. They are Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, with E. Power Briggs as soloist; the "Commando March," by Samuel Barber, and the Piano Concerto by the Soviet Aram Khatchatourian. In the latter William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York, made his Boston debut. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Piston's is the smoothest of the new music, although organ and strings make a rather indigestible combination. There is, too, the necessity of keeping the organ down so that the smaller volume of tone from the strings will not be obscured. The Prelude is slow and quiet, the Allegro brisk and full of movement. Harmonically (or contrapuntally, if you prefer) the style is but mildly dissonant.

The Commandos, one of the finest outfits of the armed forces, deserve a better march than Mr. Barber's noisy and relatively tuneless work. A good march means, among other things, a good tune. Think of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "La Marseillaise," "From the Halls of Montezuma" and "Stars and Stripes Forever." Any one of these is a fine, swinging march when taken at the right tempo, and every one has a good tune.

As it happened, I had not heard Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto before, though it has been done twice at the Pops. Probably it is one of very few works to reach the Symphony repertory by way of Pops. The Concerto is vigorous, masculine music, but also pretty crude and far too long. Khatchatourian's orchestration is tricky but not especially skilled, though the slow movement exploits beautifully the nocturnal color of the bass clarinet. The finale winds up in a burst of keyboard fireworks.

Mr. Kapell is a pianist with a bright future. Furthermore he is a technical virtuoso. He ought to be invited back to play again with the Boston Symphony. I'll make a bet that the applause and stamping which followed his performance were more for Kapell than for the Concerto. Messrs. Piston and Barber, whose pieces were heard for the first time at these concerts (the Piston was also first concert performance) were cordially greeted when they appeared on the stage.

The remainder of the afternoon was given over to Debussy of the wonderfully evocative Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and that magnificent depiction, "The Sea."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 30 1943

William Kapell Given Ovation

N. Y. Pianist, 21, Scores at Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP) — Twenty-one-years-old pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Symphony Hall today—and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, racing thorough two intricate cadenzas with masterly ease and handling the many bravura passages with smoothness and competence amazing in one so young.

The audience rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an intersettlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia Conservatory, continued his studies at the Juilliard Graduate School and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

[17]

1

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
OCT 25 1943

Becomes Doctor of Music

r. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival, hear Dr. Baxter's citation as he receives honorary degree, doctor of music.

Citations Read as Honorary Degrees Are Awarded At Williams College

WILLIAMSTOWN—President James P. Baxter 3d, read the following citations yesterday as he awarded honorary degrees during the 150th commencement exercises:

Franklin Knox, secretary of the navy, doctor of laws.

A great publisher, who has brought to journalism, to politics and to the conduct of war the dash and courage of the Rough Riders of 1898, both in wisdom and in character to guide the Navy which he now orders to seek out and destroy the enemy.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor since 1924 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, doctor of music.

Beloved master of a magnificent orchestra, under the magic spell of whose baton millions of Americans have been transported to realms of pure delight, he has fulfilled both in Boston and through the Berkshire Symphonic Festival the hope expressed by the first trustees of this college that Massachusetts would become "the Athens of America."

Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, doctor of laws, a distinguished historian known the world over for his contributions to the history of the first World War, who with sure hand and ripe wisdom guides, in a second World War, the destinies of the great university from whose side this college sprang.

This candidate for an honorary degree is the fourth member of his family to become an adopted son of Williams' for his great-grandfather, Jeremiah Day, who was destined to an illustrious career as president of Yale and his great-great uncle, Thomas Day, both members of the Williams faculty in its first decade received honorary degrees from Williams in 1798 and 1800; and his maternal grandfather, Henry Lawrence Hitchcock, then president of Western Reserve University, became an honorary doctor of divinity of Williams in 1855.

Alfred Newton Richards, professor of pharmacology and vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania, doctor of science.

World famous for his researches on the kidneys this wise leader in biological science has been charged, as chairman of the committee on medical research of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, with the production of many substances, notably penicillin, of vast significance to humanity in peace as well as war.

Roger William Riis of the class of 1917, vice-president of the Society of Alumni, master of arts.

Blessed with the charm an fired by the liberal spirit whic made his father an outstandin figure in American life, he ha revealed the same discriminat ing sense of values and capacit for achievement for which toda we do honor to the founders of this college.

Elmo Roper, director of Fortune Survey, consultant to th War Production Board, the Office of Strategic Services and th Office of War Information, master of arts.

Elmer Roper, pioneer in th field of public opinion researc who has developed and refine more precise methods of gaugin the public mind and thereb given us a new tool of grea promise for merchandising, fo education, and for the bette functioning of the democrati process.

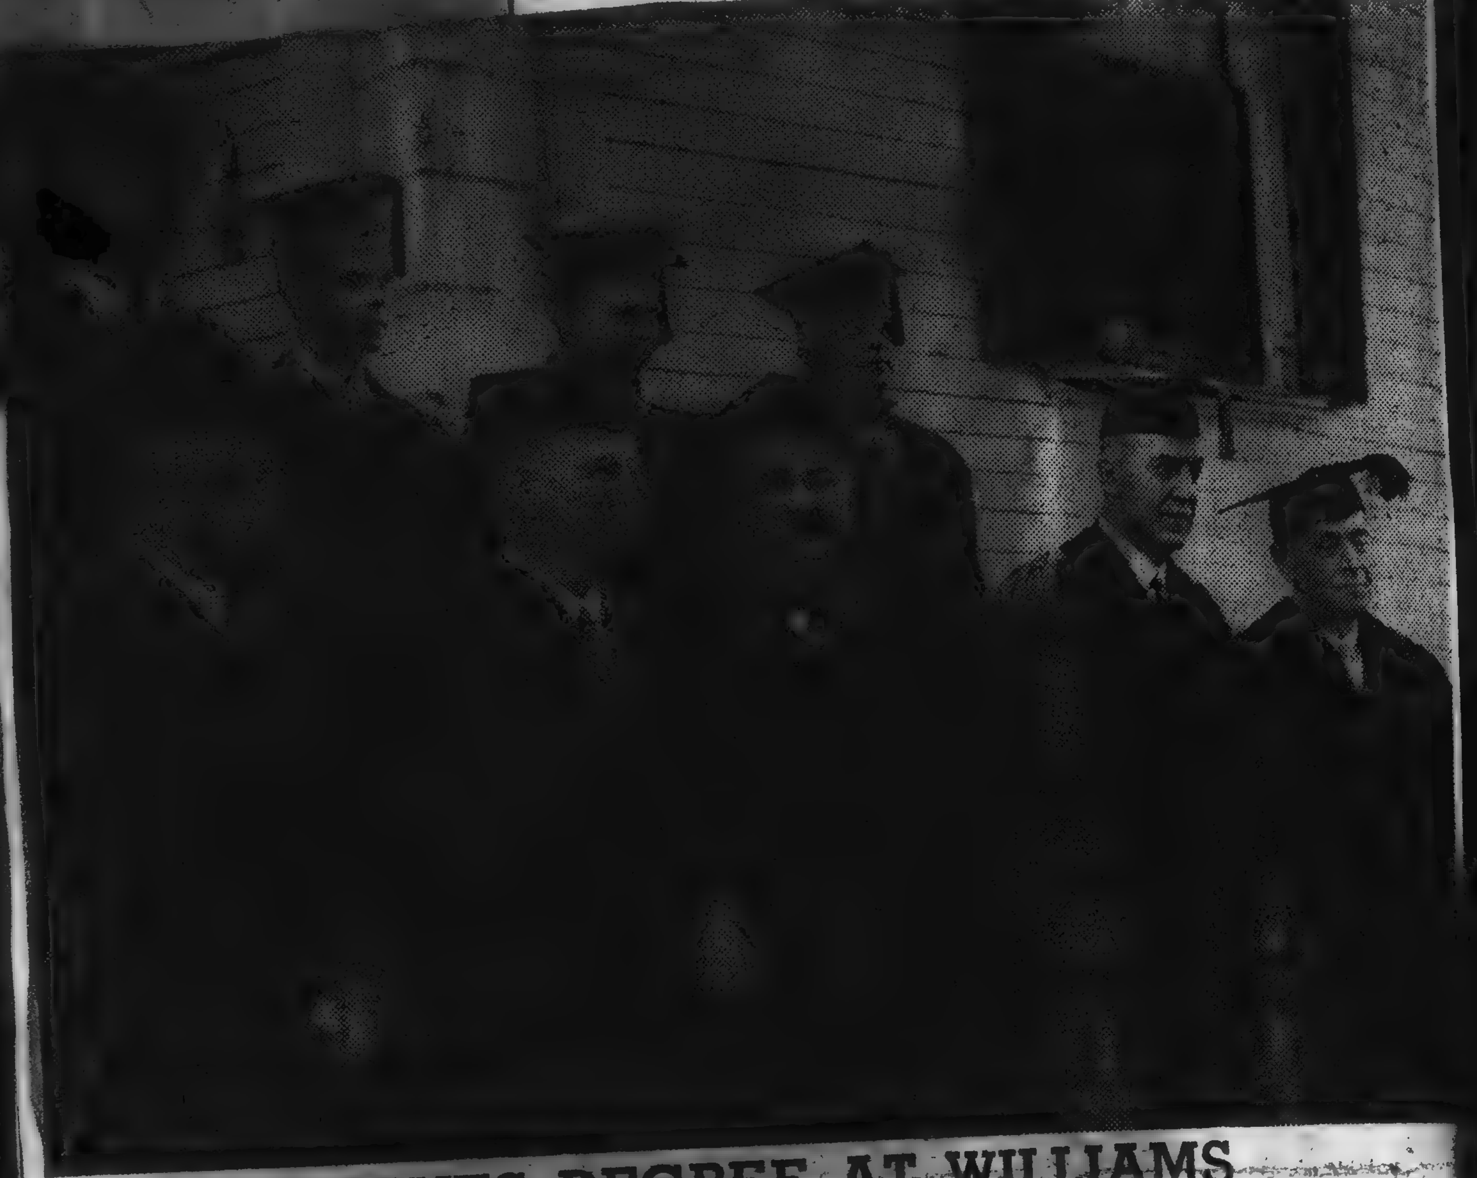
William Edgar Parks of the class of 1930, president of the Northfield Schools, doctor of divinity.

Outstanding among recent Williams graduates who have embraced the sacred calling of the ministry, he is making an admirable record as wartime pilot of two great schools both of them destined under his wise leadership to make still greater contributions to the education of American youth.

Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, head of the departments of mechanical and aeronautical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, doctor of science.

A great aeronautical engineer, designer of the Shenandoah and of the NC-4, the first flying boat to fly the Atlantic, his long experience as a naval officer and a creative scientist enables him to render notable service in this war as chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
OCT 25 1943



RECEIVES DEGREE AT WILLIAMS

Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th Anniversary Commencement exercises of Williams College, Williamstown yesterday. Front row, from left to right: ALFRED N. RICHARDS of the University of Pennsylvania; FRANK KNOX, Secretary of the Navy; JAMES P. BAXTER, president of Williams; CHARLES SEYMOUR, president of Yale University; SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back row, from left to right: ELMO ROPER, director of the Fortune Survey; C. HUNSAKER, Massachusett sInstitute of Technology; ROGER W. RIIS, vice-president Williams Alumni Society. (Associated Press Photo.)

Secretary Knox Gives Peace Talk

WILLIAMSTOWN, Oct. 25 (UP)—Recognition by the American and British people of the interdependence of their nations is the greatest factor that will contribute to their common victory in World War II, Secretary of Navy Knox believes.

"These two great nations must work together and do the job as equals because both are made up of free men who intend to remain free," he declared yesterday at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises at Williams College.

"We are not fighting alone for peace. We want peace with righteousness and justice . . . The march toward victory must not be short of Berlin and Tokyo . . . Unconditional surrender must be a lesson to show that wars are unprofitable . . . There must be no truce such as we had after the last war."

Knox was awarded an honorary doctorate of laws while other honorary degrees went to Conductor Serge [illegible]vitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pres. Charles Seymour of Yale University, Alfred Newton Richards, vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania; Jerome C. Hunsaker, head of the mechanical and aeronautical engineering departments at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Rev. William Edgar Park, president of the Northfield Schools; Roger W. Riis, roving editor for Readers Digest, and Elmo Roper, director of the Fortune survey public opinion.

Oct 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony programme has a timeliness that orchestral concerts do not always exhibit. The oldest music was that of Debussy, heard after the intermission; the "Two Nocturnes and "The Sea." All the rest was new, either to Boston or to the Symphony Concerts proper.

This last qualification applies to the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian, played in both the past season and the previous one at the Pops, with Bernhard Weiser as the soloist. There was a new pianist yesterday, 21-year-old William Kapell, who won his audience instantly and completely. Some of this enthusiasm was undoubtedly aroused by the Concerto itself, which despite arid and meaningless episodes has elements of popularity. The exotic note, in this case Armenian and Caucasian, is one factor in its appeal—the second movement immediately conjures up Near Eastern vistas. There are also forthright themes and brilliant writing for both orchestra and solo instrument. The close is of the hair-raising variety.

Your customary composer tends to shun the 19th century like the plague and hark back to the forms and manners of the 18th and 17th. This is what Walter Piston has done in his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, which received its first concert performance on this occasion with E. Power Biggs at the organ. This is a fine piece, any way you look at it, and deserves to become a part of the repertory. The excellence of the playing might be taken for granted but a word should be said for the uncommon virtuosity of Mr. Biggs.

Mr. Piston came to the stage yesterday in acknowledgment of warm applause, and so did Samuel Barber (wearing the uniform of the air force), to be tumultuously greeted first Boston and first symph formance of his Command written for military band. It ing piece, with some un-Sousa monies, but it will hardly ad to its composer's reputation.

Lowell Telegram Oct 30

20th Century Music On Symphony Program

Using only music of the 20th century, Dr. Koussevitzky presented a programme of difference —in musical form, in nationalit of composers, in individual styles— to those who attended last Frida afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hal

Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, soloist, E. Power Biggs, was fir played last summer on the enterprising Mr. Biggs' Sunday morning broadcasts. A second hearin only confirms one's first opinio that the adjectives sparce and academic have no longer any descriptive value for this rich and emotional creation. Both an amazin concern for melody—amazing fo Mr. Pison—and a toccata orga part, which Mr. Biggs performe with pungency, contributed to th conviction that Mr. Piston's matur works are gaining in expressivenes while continuing from an intellectual foundation.

The performance of Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto by William Kapell brought a new performer to Boston. This young American played with all the technical valor of many older and wiser artists, nor were interpretive powers lacking in the infrequent passages requiring them. More often, the piano part consisted of technical rather than musical achievements.

The concerto contained its best material in the second movement, with the prominent first theme of the first movement also provocative. Also worthy of attention were the succession of solo instruments in the first movement and among them, the conspicuous bass clarinet.

The Commando March by Samuel Barber was stirring in true Sousa tradition as well as musical entertainment. The audience was delighted with it.

Also included on the programme were Debussy's Two Nocturnes and "La Mer."

Next week's programme will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 and his Piano Concerto No. 1.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 30 1943

William Kapell Given Ovation

N. Y. Pianist, 21, Scores at Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP) — Twenty-one-years-old pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Symphony Hall today—and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, racing thorugh two intricate cadenzas with masterly ease and handling the many bravura passages with smooothness and competence amazing in one so young.

The audience rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an intersettlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia Conservatory, continued his studies at the Juilliard Graduate School and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Globe Oct 30

ATURDAY, THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Friday afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were treated to three pieces of comparatively new music yesterday afternoon. None of the three is remarkable. They are Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, with E. Power Briggs as soloist; the "Commando March," by Samuel Barber, and the Piano Concerto by the Soviet Aram Khatchatourian. In the latter William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York, made his Boston debut. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Piston's is the smoothest of the new music, although organ and strings make a rather indigestible combination. There is, too, the necessity of keeping the organ down so that the smaller volume of tone from the strings will not be obscured. The Prelude is slow and quiet, the Allegro brisk and full of movement. Harmonically (or contrapuntally, if you prefer) the style is but mildly dissonant.

The Commandos, one of the finest outfits of the armed forces, deserve a better march than Mr. Barber's noisy and relatively tuneless work. A good march means, among other things, a good tune. Think of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "La Marseillaise," "From the Halls of Montezuma" and "Stars and Stripes Forever." Any one of these is a fine, swinging march when taken at the right tempo, and every one has a good tune.

As it happened, I had not heard Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto before, though it has been done twice at the Pops. Probably it is one of very few works to reach the Symphony repertory by way of Pops. The Concerto is vigorous, masculine music, but also pretty crude and far too long. Khatchatourian's orchestration is tricky but not especially skilled, though the slow movement exploits beautifully the nocturnal color of the bass clarinet. The finale winds up in a burst of keyboard fireworks.

Mr. Kapell is a pianist with a bright future. Furthermore he is a technical virtuoso. He ought to be invited back to play again with the Boston Symphony. I'll make a bet that the applause and stamping which followed his performance were more for Kapell than for the Concerto. Messrs. Piston and Barber, whose pieces were heard for the first time at these concerts (the Piston was also first concert performance) were cordially greeted when they appeared on the stage.

The remainder of the afternoon was given over to Debussy of the wonderfully evocative Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and that magnificent depiction, "The Sea."

[17]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Becomes Doctor of Music

r. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival, heard Dr. Baxter's citation as he receives honorary degree, doctor of music.

Citations Read as Honorary Degrees Are Awarded At Williams College

WILLIAMSTOWN—President James P. Baxter 3d, read the following citations yesterday as he awarded honorary degrees during the 150th commencement exercises:

Franklin Knox, secretary of the navy, doctor of laws.

A great publisher, who has brought to journalism, to politics and to the conduct of war the dash and courage of the Rough Riders of 1898, both in wisdom and in character to guide the Navy which he now orders to seek out and destroy the enemy.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor since 1924 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, doctor of music.

Beloved master of a magnificent orchestra, under the magic spell of whose baton millions of Americans have been transported to realms of pure delight, he has fulfilled both in Boston and through the Berkshire Symphonic Festival the hope expressed by the first trustees of this college that Massachusetts would become "the Athens of America."

Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, doctor of laws, a distinguished historian known the world over for his contributions to the history of the first World War, who with sure hand and ripe wisdom guides, in a second World War, the destinies of the great university from whose side this college sprang.

This candidate for an honorary degree is the fourth member of his family to become an adopted son of Williams' for his great-grandfather, Jeremiah Day, who was destined to an illustrious career as president of Yale and his great-great uncle, Thomas Day, both members of the Williams faculty in its first decade received honorary degrees from Williams in 1798 and 1800; and his maternal grandfather, Henry Lawrence Hitchcock, then president of Western Reserve University, became an honorary doctor of divinity of Williams in 1855.

Alfred Newton Richards, professor of pharmacology and vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania, doctor of science.

World famous for his researches on the kidneys this wise leader in biological science has been charged, as chairman of the committee on medical research of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, with the production of many substances, notably penicillin, of vast significance to humanity in peace as well as war.

Roger William Riis of the class of 1917, vice-president of the Society of Alumni, master of arts.

Blessed with the charm and fired by the liberal spirit which made his father an outstanding figure in American life, he has revealed the same discriminating sense of values and capacity for achievement for which today we do honor to the founders of this college.

Elmo Roper, director of Fortune Survey, consultant to the War Production Board, the Office of Strategic Services and the Office of War Information, master of arts.

Elmer Roper, pioneer in the field of public opinion research who has developed and refined more precise methods of gauging the public mind and thereby given us a new tool of great promise for merchandising, for education, and for the better functioning of the democratic process.

William Edgar Parks of the class of 1930, president of the Northfield Schools, doctor of divinity.

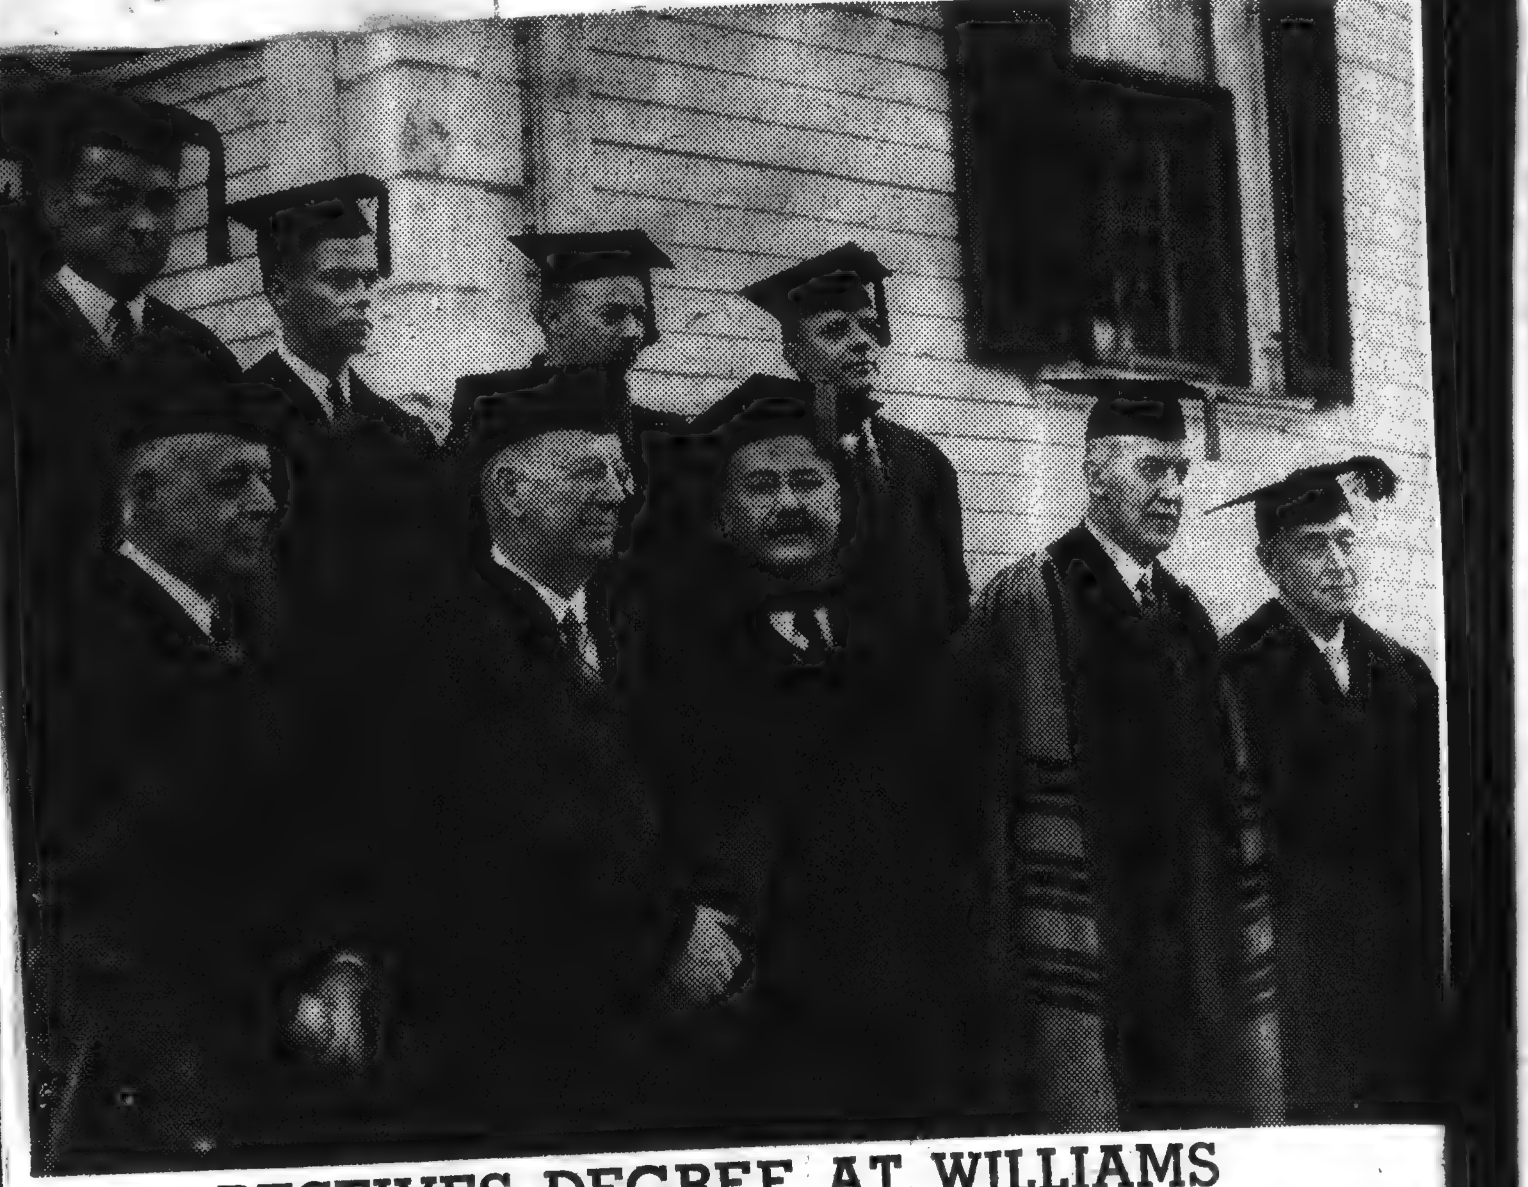
Outstanding among recent Williams graduates who have embraced the sacred calling of the ministry, he is making an admirable record as wartime pilot of two great schools both of them destined under his wise leadership to make still greater contributions to the education of American youth.

Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, head of the departments of mechanical and aeronautical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, doctor of science.

A great aeronautical engineer, designer of the Shenandoah and of the NC-4, the first flying boat to fly the Atlantic, his long experience as a naval officer and a creative scientist enables him to render notable service in this war as chairman of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 25 1943



RECEIVES DEGREE AT WILLIAMS

Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th Anniversary Commencement exercises of Williams College, Williamstown yesterday. Front row, from left to right: ALFRED N. RICHARDS of the University of Pennsylvania; FRANK KNOX, Secretary of the Navy; JAMES P. BAXTER, president of Williams; CHARLES SEYMOUR, president of Yale University; SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back row, from left to right: ELMO ROPER, director of the Fortune Survey; C. HUNSAKER, Massachusett sInstitute of Technology; ROGER W. RIIS, vice-president Williams Alumni Society. (Associated Press Photo.)

Secretary Knox Gives Peace Talk

WILLIAMSTOWN, Oct. 25 (UP)—Recognition by the American and British people of the interdependence of their nations is the greatest factor that will contribute to their common victory in World War II, Secretary of Navy Knox believes.

"These two great nations must work together and do the job as equals because both are made up of free men who intend to remain free," he declared yesterday at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises at Williams College.

"We are not fighting alone for peace. We want peace with righteousness and justice . . . The march toward victory must not be short of Berlin and Tokyo . . . Unconditional surrender must be a lesson to show that wars are unprofitable . . . There must be no truce such as we had after the last war."

Knox was awarded an honorary doctorate of laws while other honorary degrees went to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pres. Charles Seymour of Yale University, Alfred Newton Richards, vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania; Jerome C. Hunsaker, head of the mechanical and aeronautical engineering departments at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Rev. William Edgar Park, president of the Northfield Schools; Roger W. Riis, roving editor for Readers Digest, and Elmo Roper, director of the Fortune survey of public opinion.

Globe Oct 30

ATURDAY, THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Friday afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were treated to three pieces of comparatively new music yesterday afternoon. None of the three is remarkable. They are Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, with E. Power Briggs as soloist; the "Commando March," by Samuel Barber, and the Piano Concerto by the Soviet Aram Khatchatourian. In the latter William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York, made his Boston debut. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Piston's is the smoothest of the new music, although organ and strings make a rather indigestible combination. There is, too, the necessity of keeping the organ down so that the smaller volume of tone from the strings will not be obscured. The Prelude is slow and quiet, the Allegro brisk and full of movement. Harmonically (or contrapuntally, if you prefer) the style is but mildly dissonant.

The Commandos, one of the finest outfits of the armed forces, deserve a better march than Mr. Barber's noisy and relatively tuneless work. A good march means, among other things, a good tune. Think of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "La Marseillaise," "From the Halls of Montezuma" and "Stars and Stripes Forever." Any one of these is a fine, swinging march when taken at the right tempo, and every one has a good tune.

As it happened, I had not heard Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto before, though it has been done twice at the Pops. Probably it is one of very few works to reach the Symphony repertory by way of Pops. The Concerto is vigorous, masculine music, but also pretty crude and far too long. Khatchatourian's orchestration is tricky but not especially skilled, though the slow movement exploits beautifully the nocturnal color of the bass clarinet. The finale winds up in a burst of keyboard fireworks.

Mr. Kapell is a pianist with a bright future. Furthermore he is a technical virtuoso. He ought to be invited back to play again with the Boston Symphony. I'll make a bet that the applause and stamping which followed his performance were more for Kapell than for the Concerto. Messrs. Piston and Barber, whose pieces were heard for the first time at these concerts (the Piston was also first concert performance) were cordially greeted when they appeared on the stage.

The remainder of the afternoon was given over to Debussy of the wonderfully evocative Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and that magnificent depiction, "The Sea."

Oct 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony programme has a timeliness that orchestral concerts do not always exhibit. The oldest music was that of Debussy, heard after the intermission: the "Two Nocturnes and "The Sea." All the rest was new, either to Boston or to the Symphony Concerts proper.

This last qualification applies to the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian, played in both the past season and the previous one at the Pops, with Bernhard Weiser as the soloist. There was a new pianist yesterday, 21-year-old William Kapell, who won his audience instantly and completely. Some of this enthusiasm was undoubtedly aroused by the Concerto itself, which despite arid and meaningless episodes has elements of popularity. The exotic note, in this case Armenian and Caucasian, is one factor in its appeal—the second movement immediately conjures up Near Eastern vistas. There are also forthright themes and brilliant writing for both orchestra and solo instrument. The close is of the hair-raising variety.

Your customary composer tends to shun the 19th century like the plague and hark back to the forms and manners of the 18th and 17th. This is what Walter Piston has done in his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, which received its first concert performance on this occasion with E. Power Biggs at the organ. This is a fine piece, any way you look at it, and deserves to become a part of the repertory. The excellence of the playing might be taken for granted but a word should be said for the uncommon virtuosity of Mr. Biggs.

Mr. Piston came to the stage yesterday in acknowledgment of warm applause, and so did Samuel Barber (wearing the uniform of the air force), to be tumultuously greeted after the first Boston and first symphonic performance of his Commando March, written for military band. It is a stirring piece, with some un-Sousa-like harmonies, but it will hardly add to its composer's reputation.

20th Century Music On Symphony Program

Using only music of the 20th century, Dr. Koussevitzky presented a programme of difference—in musical form, in nationality of composers, in individual styles—to those who attended last Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall.

Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, soloist, E. Power Biggs, was first played last summer on the enterprising Mr. Biggs' Sunday morning broadcasts. A second hearing only confirms one's first opinion that the adjectives sparce and academic have no longer any descriptive value for this rich and emotional creation. Both an amazing concern for melody—amazing for Mr. Pison—and a toccata organ part, which Mr. Biggs performed with pungency, contributed to the conviction that Mr. Piston's mature works are gaining in expressiveness while continuing from an intellectual foundation.

The performance of Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto by William Kapell brought a new performer to Boston. This young American played with all the technical valor of many older and wiser artists, nor were interpretive powers lacking in the infrequent passages requiring them. More often, the piano part consisted of technical rather than musical achievements.

The concerto contained its best material in the second movement, with the prominent first theme of the first movement also provocative. Also worthy of attention were the succession of solo instruments in the first movement and among them, the conspicuous bass clarinet.

The Commando March by Samuel Barber was stirring in true Sousa tradition as well as musical entertainment. The audience was delighted with it.

Also included on the programme were Debussy's Two Nocturnes and "La Mer."

Next week's programme will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 and his Piano Concerto No. 1.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 30 1943

William Kapell Given Ovation

N. Y. Pianist, 21, Scores at Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP) — Twenty-one-years-old pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Symphony Hall today—and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, racing thorugh two intricate cadenzas with masterly ease and handling the many bravura passages with smooothness and competence amazing in one so young.

The audience rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an intersettlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia Conservatory, continued his studies at the Juilliard Graduate School and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 25 194

Becomes Doctor of Music

r. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Berkshire Festival, heard Dr. Baxter's citation as he receives honorary degree, doctor of music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 25 1943

RECEIVES DEGREE AT WILLIAMS

Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th Anniversary Commencement exercises of Williams College, Williamstown yesterday. Front row, from left to right:
ALFRED N. RICHARDS of the University of Pennsylvania; FRANK KNOX, Secretary of the Navy; JAMES P. BAXTER, president of Williams; CHARLES SEYMOUR, president of Yale University; SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back row, from left to right: ELMO ROPER, director of the Fortune Survey; C. HUNSAKER, Massachusett sInstitute of Technology; ROGER W. RIIS, vice-president Williams Alumni Society. (Associated Press Photo.)

W. Riis, roving editor for Readers Digest, and Elmo Roper, director of the Fortune survey public opinion.

Citations Read as Honorary Degrees Are Awarded At Williams College

WILLIAMSTOWN—President James P. Baxter 3d, read the following citations yesterday as he awarded honorary degrees during the 150th commencement exercises:

Franklin Knox, secretary of the navy, doctor of laws.

A great publisher, who has brought to journalism, to politics and to the conduct of war the dash and courage of the Rough Riders of 1898, both in wisdom and in character to guide the Navy which he now orders to seek out and destroy the enemy.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor since 1924 of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, doctor of music.

Beloved master of a magnificent orchestra, under the magic spell of whose baton millions of Americans have been transported to realms of pure delight, he has fulfilled both in Boston and through the Berkshire Symphonic Festival the hope expressed by the first trustees of this college that Massachusetts would become "the Athens of America."

Charles Seymour, president of Yale University, doctor of laws, a distinguished historian known the world over for his contributions to the history of the first World War, who with sure hand and ripe wisdom guides, in a second World War, the destinies of the great university from whose side this college sprang.

This candidate for an honorary degree is the fourth member of his family to become an adopted son of Williams' for his great-grandfather, Jeremiah Day, who was destined to an illustrious career as president of Yale and his great-great uncle, Thomas Day, both members of the Williams faculty in its first decade received honorary degrees from Williams in 1798 and 1800; and his maternal grandfather, Henry Lawrence Hitchcock, then president of Western Reserve University, became an honorary doctor of divinity of Williams in 1855.

Alfred Newton Richards, professor of pharmacology and vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania, doctor of science.

World famous for his researches on the kidneys this wise leader in biological science has been charged, as chairman of the committee on medical research of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, with the production of many substances, notably penicillin, of vast significance to humanity in peace as well as war.

Roger William Riis of the class of 1917, vice-president of the Society of Alumni, master of arts.

Blessed with the charm and fired by the liberal spirit which made his father an outstanding figure in American life, he has revealed the same discriminating sense of values and capacity for achievement for which today we do honor to the founders of this college.

Elmo Roper, director of Fortune Survey, consultant to the War Production Board, the Office of Strategic Services and the Office of War Information, master of arts.

Elmer Roper, pioneer in the field of public opinion research who has developed and refined more precise methods of gauging the public mind and thereby given us a new tool of great promise for merchandising, for education, and for the better functioning of the democratic process.

William Edgar Parks of the class of 1930, president of the Northfield Schools, doctor of divinity.

Outstanding among recent Williams graduates who have embraced the sacred calling of the ministry, he is making an admirable record as wartime pilot of two great schools both of them destined under his wise leadership to make still greater contributions to the education of American youth.

Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, head of the departments of mechanical and aeronautical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, doctor of sci- ce.

A great aeronautical engineer, gner of the Shenandoah and the NC-4, the first flying boat fly the Atlantic, his long experience as a naval officer and a creative scientist enables him to render notable service in this war as chairman of the National Advistory Committee for Aeronautics.

Secretary Knox Gives Peace Talk

WILLIAMSTOWN, Oct. 25 (UP)—Recognition by the American and British people of the interdependence of their nations is the greatest factor that will contribute to their common victory in World War II, Secretary of Navy Knox believes.

"These two great nations must work together and do the job as equals because both are made up of free men who intend to remain free," he declared yesterday at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises at Williams College.

"We are not fighting alone for peace. We want peace with righteousness and justice . . . The march toward victory must not be short of Berlin and Tokyo . . . Unconditional surrender must be a lesson to show that wars are unprofitable . . . There must be no truce such as we had after the last war."

Knox was awarded an honorary doctorate of laws while other honorary degrees went to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pres. Charles Seymour of Yale University, Alfred Newton Richards, vice-president in charge of medical affairs at the University of Pennsylvania; Jerome C. Hunsaker, head of the mechanical and aeronautical engineering departments at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Rev. William Edgar Park, president of the Northfield Schools; Roger

---

Globe Oct 30

ATURDAY, THE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Friday afternoon subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts were treated to three pieces of comparatively new music yesterday afternoon. None of the three is remarkable. They are Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, with E. Power Briggs as soloist; the "Commando March," by Samuel Barber, and the Piano Concerto by the Soviet Aram Khatchatourian. In the latter William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York, made his Boston debut. Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

Mr. Piston's is the smoothest of the new music, although organ and strings make a rather indigestible combination. There is, too, the necessity of keeping the organ down so that the smaller volume of tone from the strings will not be obscured. The Prelude is slow and quiet, the Allegro brisk and full of movement. Harmonically (or contrapuntally, if you prefer) the style is but mildly dissonant.

The Commandos, one of the finest outfits of the armed forces, deserve a better march than Mr. Barber's noisy and relatively tuneless work. A good march means, among other things, a good tune. Think of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," "Onward, Christian Soldiers," "La Marseillaise," "From the Halls of Montezuma" and "Stars and Stripes Forever." Any one of these is a fine, swinging march when taken at the right tempo, and every one has a good tune.

As it happened, I had not heard Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto before, though it has been done twice at the Pops. Probably it is one of very few works to reach the Symphony repertory by way of Pops. The Concerto is vigorous, masculine music, but also pretty crude and far too long. Khatchatourian's orchestration is tricky but not especially skilled, though the slow movement exploits beautifully the nocturnal color of the bass clarinet. The finale winds up in a burst of keyboard fireworks.

Mr. Kapell is a pianist with a bright future. Furthermore he is a technical virtuoso. He ought to be invited back to play again with the Boston Symphony. I'll make a bet that the applause and stamping which followed his performance were more for Kapell than for the Concerto. Messrs. Piston and Barber, whose pieces were heard for the first time at these concerts (the Piston was also first concert performance) were cordially greeted when they appeared on the stage.

The remainder of the afternoon was given over to Debussy of the wonderfully evocative Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and that magnificent depiction, "The Sea."

Oct 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's Symphony programm has a timeliness that orchestral concerts do not always exhibit. The oldest music was that of Debussy, heard after the intermission: the "Two Nocturnes and "The Sea." All the rest was new, either to Boston or to the Symphony Concerts proper.

This last qualification applies to the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian, played in both the past season and the previous one at the Pops, with Bernhard Weiser as the soloist. There was a new pianist yesterday, 21-year-old William Kapell, who won his audience instantly and completely. Some of this enthusiasm was undoubtedly aroused by the Concerto itself, which despite arid and meaningless episodes has elements of popularity. The exotic note, in this case Armenian and Caucasian, is one factor in its appeal—the second movement immediately conjures up Near Eastern vistas. There are also forthright themes and brilliant writing for both orchestra and solo instrument. The close is of the hair-raising variety.

Your customary composer tends to shun the 19th century like the plague and hark back to the forms and manners of the 18th and 17th. This is what Walter Piston has done in his Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, which received its first concert performance on this occasion with E. Power Biggs at the organ. This is a fine piece, any way you look at it, and deserves to become a part of the repertory. The excellence of the playing might be taken for granted but a word should be said for the uncommon virtuosity of Mr. Biggs.

Mr. Piston came to the stage yesterday in acknowledgment of warm applause, and so did Samuel Barber (wearing the uniform of the air force), to be tumultuously greeted after the first Boston and first symphonic performance of his Commando March, written for military band. It is a rousing piece, with some un-Sousa-like harmonies, but it will hardly add greatly to its composer's reputation.

Lowell

20th Century Music On Symphony Program

Using only music of the 20th century, Dr. Koussevitzky presented a programme of difference—in musical form, in nationality of composers, in individual styles—to those who attended last Friday afternoon's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall.

Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, soloist, E. Power Biggs, was first played last summer on the enterprising Mr. Biggs' Sunday morning broadcasts. A second hearing only confirms one's first opinion that the adjectives sparce and academic have no longer any descriptive value for this rich and emotional creation. Both an amazing concern for melody—amazing for Mr. Pison—and a toccata organ part, which Mr. Biggs performed with pungency, contributed to the conviction that Mr. Piston's mature works are gaining in expressiveness while continuing from an intellectual foundation.

The performance of Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto by William Kapell brought a new performer to Boston. This young American played with all the technical valor of many older and wiser artists, nor were interpretive powers lacking in the infrequent passages requiring them. More often, the piano part consisted of technical rather than musical achievements.

The concerto contained its best material in the second movement, with the prominent first theme of the first movement also provocative. Also worthy of attention were the succession of solo instruments in the first movement and among them, the conspicuous bass clarinet.

The Commando March by Samuel Barber was stirring in true Sousa tradition as well as musical entertainment. The audience was delighted with it.

Also included on the programme were Debussy's Two Nocturnes and "La Mer."

Next week's programme will be Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 and his Piano Concerto No. 1.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

OCT 30 1943

William Kapell Given Ovation

N. Y. Pianist, 21, Scores at Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP) — Twenty-one-years-old pianist William Kapell successfully bridged the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Symphony Hall today—and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourian piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, racing thorugh two intricate cadenzas with masterly ease and handling the many bravura passages with smooothness and competence amazing in one so young.

The audience rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kapell first attracted attention when he won an intersettlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia Conservatory, continued his studies at the Juilliard Graduate School and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

[17]

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

WILLIAMS GIVES DEGREES TO KNOX AND KOUSSEVITSKY

150th Commencement Held Climaxing Observance of Founding

Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox and Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were among prominent persons who yesterday afternoon received honorary degrees at the 150th Commencement of Williams College. The ceremony at the college was the climax of a two-day program in observance of the sesquicentennial of its founding in 1793.

Other honorary degrees were awarded to Charles Seymour, president of Yale University; Dr. A. Newton Richards, American Academy of Science; Prof. J. C. Hunsaker, department of mechanical engineering, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Elmo Roper, New York, director of the Fortune poll of public opinion; Roger W. Riis, New York, roving editor of Readers' Digest, and Rev. William E. Park, head of Northfield Schools.

Among the guests at the ceremony were Governor Leverett Saltonstall, of Massachusetts; Stanley King, president of Amherst College; Victor Lloyd Butterfield, president of Wesleyan University and Lewis Webster Jones, president of Bennington College.

Yesterday morning James P. Baxter, 3rd, president of the college, delivered the sesquicentennial baccalaureate address. As part of the celebration there was a naval review in which the V-5 and V-12 units stationed at the college took part. As a result of these units, the college has the greatest enrollment in its history, 1,226 students.

The college was founded on land owned by Col. Ephraim Williams, a native of Newton, Mass., who received the land as a grant for his service in the French and English war of 1740-1748.

Speaking at the anniversary exercises, Navy Secretary Knox declared the interdependence of the British empire and the United States was the "greatest factor that will contribute to our ultimate victory." He asserted that "we must learn to work and fight together as one people and that is just as important to apply to the American people as it is to the British."

Knox spoke of the fine cooperation of military commanders o Great Britain and the United State and declared there had been a profound change in the spirit of th British people, "especially in thei attitude toward Americans."

"The British learned a bitter lesson in the last few war years," Knox said. "The lesson is that the interdependence of the British Empire and the United States is the greatest factor that will contribute to our ultimate victory. We must learn to work and fight together as one people—work and fight shoulder to shoulder as equals, because we are both made up of free men, working and fighting as free men."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 30 1943

Youthful Pianist Acclaimed at Boston Concert

William Kapell Wins Ovation for Playing Of Khatchatourian Piano Concerto

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Oct. 29 (AP)—Twenty-one year old pianist William Kapell successfully bridges the gap between the streets of New York and the sanctum of Symphony hall today—and won a tremendous ovation for his performance of the difficult Khatchatourain piano concerto.

Making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, the young New Yorker electrified the capacity audience, racing through two intricate cadenzas with masterly ease and handling the many bravura passages with smoothness and competence amazing in one so young.

The audience rewarded him with prolonged applause and much noisy stamping of feet, calling him back to the platform three times.

Kappell first attracted attention when he won an inter-settlement contest in New York shortly after he began to study the piano. Then he obtained a scholarship at the Philadelphia conservatory, continued his studies at the Julliard Graduate school and won a youth contest of the Philadelphia orchestra.

The Khatchatourian piano concerto, heard for the first time at these concerts, was not up to the caliber of the youthful soloist's interpretation. A sort of minor Shostakovitch, the work contained lyric passages vaguely reminiscent of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue". Interesting thematic treatment never actually developed into anything significant, and one was constantly bothered by the feeling that somebody else had said the same thing before, and said it better.

His concert also featured two other first performances here: Walter Piston's charming Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings, with E. Power Biggs as soloist; and Samuel Barber's Commando March, arranged for full orchestra. Barber, now in the Army Air Corps, and Piston both were present to acknowledge the appluase.

The Commando March originally was composed for a military band in February of this year and then was orchestrated at the suggestion of Serge Koussevitzky. We do not know what it sounded like as band music, but the symphonic version seemed extraordinarily blatant for the stealthy advance of a commando outfit.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Claude DeBussy's nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals", and his three orchestral sketches entitled "The Sea". Koussevitzky is justly noted for his interpretations of DeBussy and today both conductor and orchestra were in magnificent form.

BOSTON HERALD

1943 - October 30

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fourth concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were E. Power Biggs, organist, and William Kapell, pianist. The program was as follows:

Piston..Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings
Barber ....Commando March
Khatchatourian ....Piano Concerto
Debussy......Two Nocturnes ("Nuages," "Fetes"); "La Mer"

It is not often a 21-year-old pianist literally "stops" a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but one did yesterday, and he will most certainly do so again tonight. His name is William Kapell, he's a native born New Yorker, and he seems to possess as formidable a technical and musical equipment as any newcomer (or oldcomer, for that matter) who ever appeared with the orchestra.

A more comprehensive analysis of his musicianship must wait, however, for it is foolhardy to go overboard at this stage of the game and claim for him a profundity or a musical feeling that only the cruel glare of the recital hall can fully reveal. That he has an enormous technical command of the instrument; that he appears to have the great gift of temperament and that he made an exceedingly strong impression in the performance of Khatchatourian's bright and brittle piano concerto cannot be denied.

Occasionally it seemed Mr. Kapell was wasting the audience's time with the work he chose to play. It is very dashing and all that; and it does have a most attractive slow movement. It frequently seems to lose sight of its goal, though, and there are long passages of thrashing about for no audible reasons. As suddenly, it seems to collect itself, and there follows an episode of real power. All in all, while the work seems destined for a career of popularity (it is already more or less standard on the Pops programs, for Arthur Fiedler discovered its effectiveness in 1942 with Bernhard Weiser playing the piano part), it is not by any means a major contribution to the literature.

The concert opened with the first concert performance of Walter Piston's decidedly attractive Prelude and Allegro for Organ and String orchestra, E. Power Biggs playing the solo part. The Prelude was especially gratifying in its lyric conception while the Allegro, suitably bustling, made its point easily. For novelty the orchestra played Samuel Barber's "Commando March," originally scored for military band. Although its material was not particularly distinguished, its treatment was, so it deserved its place on the program. Both Mr. Barber and Mr. Piston were in the audience, and both were given warm receptions.

After the interval Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave one of their incredibly sensitive performances of Debussy's "Nuages," "Fetes" and "La Mer." Familiar items on the repertoire, they never cease to be a delight in the myriad wonders of their textures.

SYMPHON CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitsky is marking the 50th anniversary of the death of Tchaikovsky at this week's Symphony concerts (today is the day) by presenting two of his compatriot's best loved compositions, the Fifth Symphony and the First Piano Concerto, the latter with Alexander Brailowsky as soloist. While the performances of both works yesterday aroused a capacity audience to a high pitch of excitement, that of the Concerto, because freer from extravagance and distortion, was by far the finer of the two.

Hitherto known here only as recitalist, Mr. Brailowsky gave us the most brilliant projection of the Concerto we have heard since that of Vladimir Horowitz. None could have been cleaner and clearer, and while Mr. Brailowsky seemed possessed of fingers of steel, his tone was never hard or harsh and for the gentler moods of the music it had the proper caressing quality.

The Fifth Symphony has long been one of Dr. Koussevitsky's warhorses. In certain respects yesterday's performance was little short of sensational. Nevertheless, it was possible to believe that the conductor tried too hard, though from this verdict most of the enraptured listeners would probably dissent.

Not an ounce of the music's potential effectiveness was overlooked. Its sensuous richness was realized to the full. There was drama aplenty. However, those who are always a bit suspicious of readings with a capital "R" could feel that every "t" was crossed twice, that there were two dots on every "i." To point to specific examples, the slow movement was dragged to the point to langourousness, the finale pushed close to that of frenzy. As was said by another reviewer on an-

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

George Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess," in an orchestral synthesis by Robert Russell Bennett, saved yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, conducted for the most part by Richard Burgin, from a paralyzing dullness which had begun with a pedestrian performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony (surely the poorest of the lot) and had progressed through an exhibition of Schoenberg's tasteless transcription of Bach's organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat and another and generally dreadful Second Symphony, that of 30-year-old Gardner Read, conducted by the composer in its initial public performance. To be sure, the "Porgy and Bess" fantasia, adroitly put together by the resourceful Bennett at the behest of Pittsburgh's Fritz Reiner, is hardly music for a symphony concert. These operatic potpourris, even in the case of so original and distinguished a work as "Porgy," are better suited to the Pops, and the fastidious Alfredo Casella, during his three-year tenure of office, forbade their presence even there. But in a desert any stream is welcome.

A mild looking young man, decidedly professorial of aspect, Mr. Read has concocted one of the most violent and, withal, most depressing symphonies that this observer has encountered in the course of a long career of concert-going. By token of the Italian marks of expression, the first movement is "ferocious" and the third "frenetic." The Adagio, e molto mesto, which separates them, is plunged in Stygian gloom. Here, to give the devil his due, come moments of serene and, under the circumstances, decidedly soothing beauty. There are also pleasant spots in the two Largamente sections which enclose the Finale's Allegro frenetico.

As quoted in the programme notes, Dr. Hans Rosenwald of Chicago has characterized Mr. Read's style in this symphony as based more upon "dynamics and sonorities than the pursuit of conventional melodic formulae." Right you are, Doctor. Incidentally, the piece received last March the Paderewski Prize of $1000!

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The four works on this week's Boston Symphony program are poles apart. Hearing them at one session is a rather bizarre, not too satisfactory, experience. They do not complement one another.

Richard Burgin conducts three of the four, offering Beethoven's Second Symphony, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E-flat (the "St. Anne Fugue") for organ, as arranged by Arnold Schoenberg for full orchestra, also Robert Russell Bennett's "Symphonic Picture" from Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess." Gardner Read, young American composer, conducts the premiere of his new Second Symphony.

The relationship of Bach and Beethoven on a symphony program is quite normal. Mr. Burgin makes the Second Symphony sound wholly lovely. But he is hard put to make Schoenberg's overblown arrangement of Bach's great work sound at all. It rattles and thumps in a way to destroy the character of the piece and one longs for some of the precision the organ affords. The musical greatness of the Prelude and Fugue perhaps is responsible for Schoenberg's attempt to give them a larger vehicle of expression. But greatness and bigness are not the same thing.

Mr. Burgin did his very best by the Beethoven Symphony. The larghetto was built of soft, transparent layers of tone and Burgin played it a trifle faster than indicated, thereby making it full and round. After he composed the Symphony, Beethoven changed his mind about the tempo of this movement. In making a piano-trio version of it, he indicated quasi andante as the tempo, the rate at which Mr. Burgin took it. The three-cornered tunes of the scherzo were bright and spirited, and the final movement a pure delight.

As if there were not contrast enough between the epoch-making yet classic Beethoven of the Second Symphony and the "modernized" Bach, we also had the lush tunefulness of Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess" set against the harsh, esoteric Second Symphony of Mr. Read.

The work is cast in three relatively short movements—presto, adagio and allegro, the last bounded at each end by a largamente. It was possible to discover a tune only in the latter. But even then it sounded by the Debussy of "La Damoiselle elue." The first movement went by fits and starts, with short turbulent sections punctuated by crashing chords. There were melodic echoes of Stravinsky, without the Russian's driving energy and artistic force. Nevertheless, Mr. Read, who ably conducted his own work, has quite a flair for stirring up dramatic tension. There was somber atmosphere to the middle movement where muted brass and lower strings converse in sorrowful tones.

The program will be repeated this evening at 8:15.—J. W. R.

[18]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 24 1943

MUSIC ANNOUNCING

By VIRGIL THOMSON

FAVORABLE comments received on a recent discussion here of the state of program-note writing have encouraged me to continue the subject. Particularly do the presentation speeches that accompany radio broadcasts of cultural music seem to me, for the most part, unsatisfactory. Printed notes for house programs present no novel literary problem. All they need is real scholarship and some care in the writing—in other words, a return to the way they have always been done whenever they have been done properly. But a proper formula for radio introductions of music has never been established; it still needs to be built from the ground up. And though such a building up involves, of necessity, a large part of proceeding by trial and error, it appears to the present writer that there is already a tendency in radio circles to accept as standard practice far more error than is necessary.

• • •

Errors of Fact and of Manner

BY ERROR I do not mean merely mistatements of fact, though these are numerous. I mean also every detail of material, style and attitude that makes the framework in which music is presented appear unworthy beside the music itself and that tends, therefore, to trivialize the music. When an announcer tells us, as I heard one do recently, that François Couperin's "Tic-Toc Choc, ou Les Maillotins" is a picture of bloodthirsty women knitting as they watch heads roll from the guillotine, that is merely a factual mistake. (It is really two mistakes. One is that the word maillotin does not refer to knitting but to the hammering of metal; and the other is that the author of the piece died about fifty years before the good Dr. Guillot had even invented his famous machine for making decapitation quick, painless and efficient.) But when historical matter, even if true, is presented in an irrelevant context by men of uncouth speech and patronizing tone, it tends, I am sure, rather to offend the cultivated listener (for whom the broadcasts of classical music are, after all, intended) than to instruct him.

It is not desirable, I should think, that American radio speakers attempt B. B. C. pronunciation, though I see no objection to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's being introduced in good Bostonian or to the Philharmonic's being associated in the nation's mind with cultivated New York speech. But certainly such informative matter as is provided with cultural broadcasts should be addressed to persons of the same intellectual attainments as the programs themselves postulate. Cultivated speech need not sound affected. Indeed, the use of anything else in association with distinguished musical executions can easily appear to a cultivated listener as both affected and patronizing.

• • •

Shall We Have Discussion, or Just Blurbs and Games?

HOW much talk really is needed with musical broadcasts is still uncertain. Obviously, the listener needs to be told what is being performed. Sometimes a further identification of work or author is valuable. Also, when the program originates at a public concert the intermission has to be filled up with something. I do not think lengthy explanations heard before a rendition are ever very enlightening, except when they recount a plot, as at the opera. Comment and analysis that take place after a piece has been played are, on the other hand, capable of being used by the listener as aids both to memory and to the formation of taste. I have always thought it would be valuable to hear the first part of a concert discussed by competent musicians while it was still fresh in everybody's mind. Instead of quiz programs that are nothing more than a game or of historical and patriotic diversions that are mere time fillers, I should like to hear a real argument about the work just played, with fair statement of opposing points of view. I think some such discussion as goes on in a real intermission among real musicians and music lovers would help any listener to form his own opinion and remove from the broadcasts of serious art music their present unfortunate air of being handouts from on high. In any case, by whatever formula this is to be operated, radio needs more of free discussion with its music and less of both tomfoolery and pompous exposition. The latter, especially when it precedes the hearing of the music, has a way of turning itself into blurb that is unbecoming to at serious musical presentation.

• • •

Nobody Likes the Present Practice

THERE is no bad will involved, I think, in the neglect by radio companies to observe the intellectual amenities. There just hasn't been time so far to bother about the framing of art in business establishments where the presence of art at all is still something of a surprise to everybody. But the time has come for framing to be considered. Virtually every first-class musical organization in the United States is now available on the air, and there are special ensembles in addition playing rare music ancient and modern all the time. Radio has long since surpassed the concert-giving agencies in the quantity of high-class music furnished weekly to the public. Real concerts, though a fine thing, are no longer what we musically live by. Processed music is nine-tenths, at least, of every music lover's diet; and the radio furnishes a big part of this. It is a matter of universal regret that the verbal presentation of it is almost invariably unworthy and as often as not ignoble. I have never encountered a habitual listener to sericus radio music who did not deplore the way it is currently commented and announced.

If my observation has been correct, if nobody at all likes the way music is being presented on the air, then some change in this may no doubt be anticipated. The purpose of this article is not, however, to encourage my readers in overhopefulness about quick results but rather to remind the radio people of what we would like, of what most of the radio world itself, in fact, knows to be the next step in radio's amazing musical advance. Experiment all you like, gentlemen, with the dramatic form of your presentations. That is the way to find out a good one. But please couldn't you maybe right now establish some minimum intellectual requirements among the boys that emcee Beethoven and Stravinsky.

Burgin Leads Orchestra At Bushnell Hall

Associate Conductor of Boston Symphony Replaces Koussevitzky, Who Is Indisposed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Richard Burgin, associate conductor, was presented in concert at the Bushnell Memorial, Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony No. 5 Tschaikowsky
Ode Stravinsky
Pictures At An Exposition Moussorgsky

Well, Comrades, it looks like a long, Russian winter in the concert halls, now that the Moscow pact has been signed. When the Finns were having their fling, you may remember the long siege of Sibelius we went through, causing Muriel Draper to cry out that if she had to listen to "another noble theme dragged through a forest of pine trees," she would scream.

With all deference to Richard Burgin, there was of course a moment of disappointment through the audience last night when it was announced from the stage that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was indisposed and thus would not be able to lead the Boston Symphony in the first of another season of Bushnell concerts. In fact, the disappointment was distinctly audible in a murmur which ran through the house. A half hour later, however, Mr. Burgin was receiving something close to an ovation. He had just finished the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, concluding it with such an outburst of spirit and zeal that shouts of appreciation almost drowned out the concluding bars. It was a ringing conclusion and it was ringingly met in applause.

Unenviable Task.

Dr. Koussevitzky's shoes are difficult to fill, and nowhere, more so than when the Fifth Tschaikovsky and the Moussorgsky "Pictures At An Exposition" are on the Boston Symphony's program. No one makes Russian music more Russian, more huge or more intense, than he does, or more showy. Tschaikowsky has frightened the living daylights out of some of our leading conductors. When, some six or more years ago, Arturo Toscanini finally decided to do Tschaikowsky, he rushed the Sixth Symphony all over the ring, lest he be accused of sentimentalizing it. Eugene Ormandy makes the Fifth as young and gay as if it had been edited by Cornelia Otis Skinner and Emily Kimbrough, the non-lonely-hearted girls. But Dr. Koussevitzky, unafraid, builds Tschaikowsky's anguishes to monumental proportions until they are too impersonal to be sentimental, and makes the Fifth Symphony into the most superb pile-up of emotion in musical history.

Exciting Finish.

Mr. Burgin was inclined to treat the lower depths of Tschaikowsky's Russian-soul-searching, in the first and second movements, a little too temperately, but where the fire and excitement breaks out in the next-to-closing sections of the fourth movement, he boosted the tempo to the last notch, and created one of the vigorous endings the symphony has had since the year of the Big Blizzard. If it lacked the weight and fever which Dr. Koussevitzky works up in these final sections, it did not lack for the excitement of swiftness.

Mr. Burgin was not to equal this achievement during the rest of the evening. His readings and direction were ever sound, thoroughly musical and musicianly, and straightforward. During the Moussorgsky there were many beautifully read and beautifully executed passages. The tremendous dramatic power of the "Gates Of Kiev," however, was reached but not sustained. While Mr. Burgin does excellently with the more temperate sections of a score, power and intensity are insufficient when needed.

My own impression is that Mr. Burgin himself recognizes the powerful and burning moments in the pages lying open before him, but somehow cannot prevail upon the orchestra to deliver them. You see him working himself up into a heat, but the orchestra fails to come through. Why, of course, can only be guessed at. Nor do the members play with sufficient precision. They work, but they do not work carefully, or certainly they did not last night. In point of performance there was a lot that was patchy and tentative about this concert.

Stravinsky Disappointing.

The Stravinsky Ode, played here for the first time on this occasion, was a disappointment to this Stravinsky idolater. A tribute to Nathalie Koussevitzky, who had been the Boston conductor's wife, it is in three sections, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph" and takes about 10 minutes to play. It is cut right out of the primordial temper, sounds and rhythms of "Sacre Du Printemps," but on first hearing, at least, seemed sketchy in means, and vague, not to say inept, in intent. It certainly is far from crys-

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 5 1943

SIGN UP BOSTON SYMPHONY FOR BLUE NETWORK

The Boston Symphony, heard on Saturday nights over the Blue network, is the third of the network weekly symphonies to sign a long term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC Symphony, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Sponsorship of the Boston musical organization will be on a year 'round schedule and will cover broadcasts of the symphony's three series of concerts—the winter season concerts, the Boston "Pops," and the Esplanade programs.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Russian composer Tchaikovsky died just 50 years ago today. Serge Koussevitzky, ever one to remember anniversaries, is therefore devoting this week's Boston Symphony concerts to a pair of the best-known Tchaikovsky works: the Fifth Symphony and the B-flat minor Piano Concerto. For the lat-

For those who like music that takes its hair down, Tchaikovsky means a pleasant but respectable orgy. For those with opposite tastes, Tchaikovsky means lurid banalities not willingly to be suffered. In between are people who can take Tchaikovsky or leave him alone.

These, probably, are the ones who recognize in the E minor Symphony the work in which Tchaikovsky attained the most solid texture of all his half dozen symphonies. They also recognize, probably, that the B-flat minor Concerto is music whose display qualities are legitimatized by their truly virtuoso nature.

But when all the arguments have been raised one must reach the conclusion that Tchaikovsky was very persuasive and certainly gifted. One may grow tired of his lamentations, and of his sequential repetition of tunes, but the tunes themselves are usually distinctive and in some cases of imperishable beauty. And even his lamentations have a ring of authenticity that makes its own effect.

In addition to his knack for emotional melody and harmony Tchaikovsky handled form and orchestra more than competently. In such a unique confession as the "Pathetic" Symphony he achieved music not only his most original, but unique among all symphonies.

Tchaikovsky was musically more objective (in the sense that he was not wailing about himself) in such works as the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasy, the C major Serenade and the Third Symphony.

There was much to admire in yesterday's performances, and Mr. Koussevitzky is, of course, unequalled in the conducting of Tchaikovsky. Yet, somehow, one missed the super-drive, that ultimate emotional power that has characterized other Tchaikovsky performances in the past. Much of the orchestral detail was beautifully clear, and at the same time prominent instruments were not together at the beginning of the first and second movements.

Mr. Brailowsky, who had given several recitals in Boston, had never played here before with the Boston Symphony. Nor had he played here at all since 1927. His performance of the Concerto was technically virtuosic. He was cordially applauded.—C. W. D.

[illegible] Mass

NOV 1 - 1943

Conductor and Composer

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Private 1st Class Samuel Barber, noted American composer, accepts a biscuit from Conductor Serge Koussevitzky during intermission at rehearsal of Private Barber's new "C mando March," to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Barber is a native of Philadelphia and came to Boston for the performance of his new work.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS IN NEWPORT

Famed Orchestra Gives Concert for Sailors at Training Station

Serge Koussevitzky brought his Boston Symphony Orchestra to Newport yesterday, the first time the famed orchestra had played in Rhode Island outside of Providence, and gave a concert for thousands of bluejackets and officers at the Naval Training Station. The appearance was arranged through the co-operation of the trustees and management of the Symphony and the USO Camp Shows, Inc.

After the regular concert program, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the podium, raised his baton and the rafters of the huge auditorium resounded to Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

The playing of the familiar march, to which the bluejackets had marched on many a day, brought the entire audience to its feet in an ovation for the orchestra and its conductor.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

NOV 1 - 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CONCERT HERE

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra in Progrm at Training Station

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, presented a program of classical music at the Naval Training Station Sunday under the auspices of the USO Camp Shows, Inc. The director, in recognition of the appreciation expressed by the audience, led the orchestra in "Stars and Stripes Forever," a John Philip Sousa march at the close of the scheduled program.

The program included "Commando March," Barber; "Symphony No. 8 in E Minor (Unfinished)", Schubert; Suite No 1 from the incidental music to Ibsen's "Peer Gyth," Grieg.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

Herald

NOV 1 - 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Concert at Training Station

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Eerge Koussevitzky conducting, made it's first appearance here yesterday as it presented a program at the Naval Training Station for the officers and men. The concert was arranged through the cooperation of the trustees and management of the orchestra and the USO Camp Shows Inc.

The program was particularly adopted to the audience, many of whom had probably never witnessed a major symphony orchestra before but there was no doubt that the concert was well appreciated by all who attended.

At the conclusion of the regular program Dr. Koussevitzky gave as an encore—an almost unheralded thing for the Boston Symphony to do—Sousa's famous "Stars and Stripes Forever". It was magnificently played, needless to say, and being familiar to the thousands of sailors present, it made a tremendous hit.

The program.

Commando March Barber
Symphony No. 8 in E Minor ("Unfinished") Schubert
  1. Allegro moderato
  2. Andante con moto
Suite No. 1 from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" Grieg
  1. Moorning Mood
  2. Aase's Death
  3. Anitra's Dance
  . In the Hall of the Troll King
"Pictures at an Exhibition" Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel Moussorgsky Gnomus, Tuileries, Ballet of Charles in their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg and Schmuyle, Limoges; The Marketplace, Catacombs, ("Con mortus in lingua mortua"), The Hut on Fowls' Legs, The Great Gate at Kiev.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

NOV 3 - 1943

Boston Symphony Orchestra Draws Large Audience

Portland proved its reputation as a music loving City, Tuesday night when it packed City Hall Auditorium to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Prolonged applause greated the famed conductor and his splended ensemble of musicians, and each number played brought thundering repetition of the audience's appreciation.

The program presented afforded a wide range of selections that brought forth every quality and feature of the orchestra. The string section was outstanding in the Vivaldi Concerto in D minor. Tonal delicacy was displayed in the DeBussey's Prelude a L'Apres Midi d' un Faune. The Capriccio Espagnol of Rimsky Korsakoff was marked by its vivid color and magnificent rhythms. Koussevitzky's choice of a symphony was the Tschaikowsky Fifth, in E minor, which the orchestra presented with an interpretive brilliance that was breathtaking.

The Boston Symphony's appearance was the second offering in the current Community Concert series, and its first time in Portland in 15 years.

Herald

Tchaikovsky Casts Spell Over Symphony Audience

Popularity Evidenced at Yesterday's Concert by Enthusiasm of All Ages

By ALISON ARNOLD

Without a doubt, Bostonians are Tchaikovsky fans, judging by the large and enthusiastic audience at Symhony Hall yesterday afternoon. For the concert was all Tchaikovsky and the program included his fifth Symphony in E Minor and his Concerto for Pianoforte in B-flat Minor, with Alexander Brailowsky as soloist. And the fact that this great composer was a Russian makes for even greater popularity in these days when Russia figures so favorably in world news.

Tchaikovsky seems to be a favorite with all ages. While there were many in the large hall who have attended every Friday afternoon concert for years, service men by the score and schoolgirls, hatless and carrying their books, were much in evidence. Patsy Perrin came from the Winsor School and a group from the Beaver Country Day School included Nancy Breed, Jeannette Brewer, Joan Hayward, Cynthia Rugg, Joan Tenney, Joan Hanson and Mary Katharine Arnold. Mary Gallan came from Milton Academy.

With Mrs. Parker Converse was her 11-year-old son, Courtland, and Mrs. Charles Higginson was accompanied by her elder daughter, Sally. Among the debutantes present were Miss Augusta Wolcott and Miss Joan McCagg. Miss Lucy Cochrane and Mrs. Wallace McI. Scudder (Elizabeth Cram) arrived together, both in smart black, their blond locks sleekly snooded.

Clifton Webb, who is appearing in "Blithe Spirit" at the Wilbur Theater, caused many excited comments by his presence. Chatting together in the lobby before the concert were Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Hector Holmes and Mrs. Frederic W. Matheis. Attending together were Miss Dorothy Rackemann, president of the Junior League, Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker and Miss Marian Minot.

Shades of purple were much in evidence yesterday. Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley, who arrived with Mrs. Frank Sawtell, wore it, as did Mrs. Henry A. Murray and Mrs. Harris J. Nelson. Mrs. Robert Treat Paine was chic in black with touches of white. Among others present were Mrs. Francis P. Sears and her daughter, Mrs. Benjamin O. Gardiner, Mrs. Edward A. Taft, Mrs. Arthur Bell, Mrs. Albert Cameron Burrage, Jr., Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Augustus Rantoul, Mrs. Charles P. Ware, Mrs. William B. Long, Mrs. Morris LaCroix, Mrs. Phineas W. Sprague, Mrs. Sydney Harwood, Mrs. Paul Reed, Mrs. Walter Atherton, Mrs. John MacDuffie, 2nd, Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, Mrs. Augustus W. Soule, Mrs. Robert Cushman, Mrs. James Phelan and Mrs. Basil Gavin.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fifth concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, was the soloist. The all-Tchaikovsky program consisted of the Fifth Symphony, in E minor, Op. 64; and the B-flat minor Piano Concerto, Op. 23.

In the 50 years since his death in 1893, the position in music of Tchaikovsky has been pretty generally conceded as a paradox. On one hand there is the undeniable sound evaluation which denies him a position in the company of the great. On the other hand there is the equally sound school of thought which recognizes the bombast, the indecision, the hysteria, the gaudy sentimentality, but at the same time stoutly maintains that the music itself weaves a hypnotic spell impossible, under the best conditions, to combat.

The "best" conditions were present yesterday as Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra observed, to the day, the 50th anniversary of the celebrated Russian composer's death. Thus the performance of the Fifth, certainly, with the Sixth, the finest thing Tchaikovsky wrote, was not short of electrifying. In point of fact, until the appearance of the frenetic finale, it is to be doubted if the symphony ever received a more sympathetic, a more glowing and a more effective performance. If the finale fell apart a little, it was a small matter; what went before was of such perfection it mattered not at all. On the contrary, the conductor and the orchestra achieved their warmest Friday afternoon reception of the season.

Alexander Brailowsky, easily one of the day's really foremost pianists, brought the concert to a close with a formidably virtuoso performance of the battle-scarred B-flat minor Piano Concerto. He used a piano of especially hard and brittle tone quality which diminished, to some extent, the quality of the sonority and balance, but his superb musicianship, his ear nuance and his extreme sensitivity to phrasing, overcame the harsh voice of the piano. He was given an ovation by the audience, too. But the chief and basic ovation of the day was undoubtedly for one not present: P. I. Tchaikovsky, who would appear to remain, after 50 long years, the symphonic best-seller of the century.

Next week's program offers the first performance of William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and th First and Fifth Symphonies Shostakovitch

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Koussevitzky With Symphony 20 Years

Nineteen years ago this Autumn Serge Koussevitzky came to America for the first time to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At that time he knew little of our ways and our music and could scarcely speak our language. Now as he begins his 20th year in America, Koussevitzky is an American citizen who has identified himself with this Country and made Boston's orchestra his own, raising it to a new height of virtuosity and significance in the Country's musical life.

Koussevitzky has traversed a vast repertory in 20 years, and part of that repertory has been the inclusion of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom he has introduced to the concert public and developed by repeated performances. These include Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman and others.

Music of these composers will figure upon the programs of the anniversary season, togethr with classical and contemporary works which have taken an important part in the seasons past.

The regular Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as given in Symphony Hall Boston, are broadcast over the Blue Network from 8.15 to 9.15.

Fifth Concert Dedicated To Tchaikovsky

By BETSY WARREN

The fifth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall was dedicated to Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky, who died Nov. 6, 1893.

The two compositions which were performed were Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 5 and his concerto for piano No. 1. To evaluate this music now, fifty years after his death, does not seem difficult: For the majority of concert goers, his music is very popular. That is because it offers continual sweet melody, infrequent counterpoint (of the greatest artlessness) a basic treatment of the orchestra that does not bore with refinements, a rhythm which is consistent enough within sections to allow head wagging, and an attention to the display value of music. So we see that the audience of today has, as it always has had, an appreciation and quick response to the fundamental elements of music.

What it attempts, it does well. But it attempts too little. Sweet melodies are fine, so are sour. Meagre counterpoint is an unforgetable shortcoming. Because it is a kind of music which is happiest when it can parade itself rather than stand modestly waiting for the connoisseur, the concerto is far more successful musically than the symphony.

Praise cannot be lavished too highly on Alexander Brailowsky's performance of this concerto. First one is struck by the vast power of his tone, then almost immediately, the listener is swept into the vortex of a living, inspired interpretation. This was no phonograph performance. Then as technical achievement upon technical achievement pulsated with dash and most tasteful shading, one sat not with gaping mouth, but instead listened to music! Certainly a great artist—a mature artist.

The programme for next week will be: William Schumann, Symphone for Strings (first performance); Shostakovitch, symphonies No. 1 and No. 5.

BETSY WARREN.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
NOV 8 1943

MUSIC

Bohuslav's Week

The 25th anniversary of Czecho-Slovakian independence was celebrated musically last week by two U.S. symphony orchestras. The musical Czech of the hour was the occupied nation's foremost living composer, Bohuslav Martinu, now of Manhattan. In Cleveland (which has one of the largest Czech populations to be found in any U.S. city), Erich Leinsdorf conducted the première of Martinu's Second Symphony. In Manhattan, Artur Rodzinski conducted the première of a Martinu symphonic poem called Memorial to Lidice. In Philadelphia, Eugene Ormandy was rehearsing a third new Martinu composition, a Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra, with the help of duo-Pianists Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. In Boston, Sergei Koussevitzky was planning a December première for Martinu's third Violin Concerto.

Martinu's music got a fine critical reception. Though he inherits the great Czech tradition of Bedrich Smetana and Antonin Dvorak, Martinu does not work in their sunlit, melodically fecund vein. The emotional tone of his music is measured, but it has genuine dignity, drama and decided individuality. Soft-spoken, shy, 52-year-old Martinu grew up in the little Czech town of Policka, where his father was a shoemaker, played the violin for a decade with the famed Czech Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague. In 1923 he went to Paris, stayed for nearly 20 years. A very serious man, who studies physics and biology for relaxation, he is too busy with new music to try to reconstruct many scores he was forced to leave in Europe.

Associated Press

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S MARTINU, BOSTON'S KOUSSEVITZKY
They have a date in December.

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL
NOV 12 1943

Composer Says War Cause Of Today's Restless Rhythms

Boston, Nov. 12.—(AP)—American composers are writing vigorous, restless, rhythmic music reflecting the nervous energy of a nation at war, according to 33-year-old New York born William Schuman whose Fifth Symphony is being performed for the first time anywhere today by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall prior to the world premiere of his symphony—the fifth in six years—the tall, young American emphasized that today's musicians are bound to be influenced by the world in which they live.

The young New Yorker was educated in his native city and was graduated from Columbia University. Later he studied composition with Roy Harris, one of this country's leading symphonists, and at present is on the arts faculty of Sarah Lawrence college, Bronxville, N. Y.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
NOV 12

Third Network Symphony Gets Sponsor

Price To Be Paid Boston Orchestra Not Announced

NEW YORK, Nov. 12—(AP)—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts, that supplied on the Blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC Symphony on NBC, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston Orchestra will continue its present 8:15 p. m. schedule on the Blue. The price paid by the sponsor was not announced, but the figure for the NBC Symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday. These contracts covered a year, with the Boston Orchestra arrangement understood to be for a similar period.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM
NOV 12 1943

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With Sponsor

NEW YORK, Nov. 12 (AP).—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts, that supplies on Blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC symphony on NBC, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston orchestra will continue its present 7:15 p. m. schedule on the Blue. The price paid by the sponsor (Allis Chalmers) was not announced, but the figure for the NBC symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday. These contracts covered a year, with the Boston orchestra arrangement understood to be for a similar period.

This Clipping From MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
NOV 10 1943

Riding the Airwaves
with Richard K. Bellamy

Allis-Chalmers to Sponsor Boston Symphony?

WHAT would be the biggest radio deal ever involving a Milwaukee firm is reported to be in the "hot" stage down east. Under it the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Wisconsin's largest, would sponsor the famed Boston symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, on the full Blue network in a long series of one hour concerts. The orchestra is now heard as a sustaining feature at 7:15 p. m. on a number of Blue stations (WCFL in this area).

No contracts have been signed as yet, and no large sums are being bandied about in conversation, but to get an idea of the size of the deal, you'll recall that the United States Rubber Co. is shelling out a reported $1,500,000 annually to sponsor the New York Philharmonic on the air an hour and a half each Sunday; and General Motors is broadcasting the one hour NBC symphony concerts at an estimated cost of around $800,000 a year.

Sponsoring the Bostons then, would put Allis-Chalmers definitely in the big league. Other Milwaukee firms have spent considerable sums in radio advertising—Pabst is not getting the current Groucho Marx series for nothing, you may be sure—but "buying symphonies" hitherto has been strictly a matter for the country's very largest operators. They have gone in for it since the war expanded their volume of business to staggering proportions. Symphonic programs are considered a costly but dignified way to keep the firm name before the public and to build good will for the postwar days.

Many musically minded persons consider the Boston symphony to be the finest in the country, even ahead of the New York and Philadelphia groups. Koussevitzky they rate the equal of any conductor alive. To have the orchestra playing for a Milwaukee firm would be sure to add prestige to the name of our town.

Allis-Chalmers began to branch into radio advertising last year. It currently is sponsoring a half hour program of semiclassical music, "Made in Milwaukee," Sunday nights over WTMJ and W55M from Radio City.

* * *

We hate to pop off about Bob Hope, who has done a wonderful job of entertaining in the war. But was that Tuesday night routine of his on divorce good radio, or was it in bad taste and extremely unfunny? After all, we are having a good deal of worry over loose morality due to the unsettled state of the world; and a program that goes into millions of homes ought to be careful in choosing subjects to joke about. Even if you don't agree with us on the moral angle, don't you think that Hope's gag writers are scraping the bottom of the barrel?

* * *

Rumors and Facts

Bill Thompson, missing this year in his "Old-Timer" and "Wallace Wimple" roles on the Fibber McGee and Molly show because he preferred to remain in Chicago with his ailing parents, may soon embark on his own network program. He is under option to a soap company. . . . Don't be surprised if Joan Davis leaves the Village Store around the first of the year. Her agents are reported to be asking $12,000 weekly for her services. . . . Xavier Cugat's Saturday morning show soon will move to another network on a Wednesday night period. . . . A show starring Monty Woolley is being prepped to replace Sammy Kaye's production. . . . Mortimer Snerd celebrated his eighth birthday Nov. 1. Edgar Bergen's "other dummy" came to life on the tablecloth of a Chicago night club when Bergen realized he needed an encore to McCarthy.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS
NOV 12 19

~~Boston Symph~~ony Signs Up Sponsor; May Pay Million

NEW YORK—(AP)—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts that supplies on blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC Symphony on NBC, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston orchestra will continue its present 7:15 p. m. (CWT) schedule on the blue. The price paid by the sponsor (Allis Chalmers) was not announced, but the figure for the NBC Symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 8 1943

Boston Leader

The latest portrait of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky is the dean of the conductors in the Bushnell Memorial's Symphony Series which he will open this year by bringing the Boston Symphony to the Bushnell for a concert on Tuesday evening, Nov. 16. The Boston will play another concert here in January. The remaining other events of the series will be performed by the National Orchestra, Cleveland, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestras.

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

NOV 7 - 1943

Koussevitzky With Symphony 20 Years

Nineteen years ago this Autumn Serge Koussevitzky came to America for the first time to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At that time he knew little of our ways and our music and could scarcely speak our language. Now as he begins his 20th year in America, Koussevitzky is an American citizen who has identified himself with this Country and made Boston's orchestra his own, raising it to a new height of virtuosity and significance in the Country's musical life.

Koussevitzky has traversed a vast repertory in 20 years, and part of that repertory has been the inclusion of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom he has introduced to the concert public and developed by repeated performances. These include Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman and others.

Music of these composers will figure upon the programs of the anniversary season, togethr with classical and contemporary works which have taken an important part in the seasons past.

The regular Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as given in Symphony Hall Boston, are broadcast over the Blue Network from 8.15 to 9.15.

Fifth Concert Dedicated To Tchaikovsky

Lowell Tel Nov 7

By BETSY WARREN

The fifth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall was dedicated to Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky, who died Nov. 6, 1893.

The two compositions which were performed were Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 5 and his concerto for piano No. 1. To evaluate this music now, fifty years after his death, does not seem difficult: For the majority of concert goers, his music is very popular. That is because it offers continual sweet melody, infrequent counterpoint (of the greatest artlessness) a basic treatment of the orchestra that does not bore with refinements, a rhythm which is consistent enough within sections to allow head wagging, and an attention to the display value of music. So we see that the audience of today has, as it always has had, an appreciation and quick response to the fundamental elements of music.

What it attempts, it does well. But it attempts too little. Sweet melodies are fine, so are sour. Meagre counterpoint is an unforgetable shortcoming. Because it is a kind of music which is happiest when it can parade itself rather than stand modestly waiting for the connoisseur, the concerto is far more successful musically than the symphony.

Praise cannot be lavished too highly on Alexander Brailowsky's performance of this concerto. First one is struck by the vast power of his tone, then almost immediately, the listener is swept into the vortex of a living, inspired interpretation. This was no phonograph performance. Then as technical achievement upon technical achievement pulsated with dash and most tasteful shading, one sat not with gaping mouth, but instead listened to music! Certainly a great artist—a mature artist.

The programme for next week will be: William Schumann, Symphone for Strings (first performance); Shostakovitch, symphonies No. 1 and No. 5.

BETSY WARREN.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
NOV

MUSIC

Bohuslav's Week

The 25th anniversary of Czecho-Slovakian independence was celebrated musically last week by two U.S. symphony orchestras. The musical Czech of the hour was the occupied nation's foremost living composer, Bohuslav Martinu, now of Manhattan. In Cleveland (which has one of the largest Czech populations to be found in any U.S. city), Erich Leinsdorf conducted the première of Martinu's Second Symphony. In Manhattan, Artur Rodzinski conducted the première of a Martinu symphonic poem called Memorial to Lidice. In Philadelphia, Eugene Ormandy was rehearsing a third new Martinu composition, a Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra, with the help of duo-Pianists Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff. In Boston, Sergei Koussevitzky was planning a December première for Martinu's third Violin Concerto.

Martinu's music got a fine critical reception. Though he inherits the great Czech tradition of Bedrich Smetana and Antonin Dvorak, Martinu does not work in their sunlit, melodically fecund vein. The emotional tone of his music is measured, but it has genuine dignity, drama and decided individuality. Soft-spoken, shy, 52-year-old Martinu grew up in the little Czech town of Policka, where his father was a shoemaker, played the violin for a decade with the famed Czech Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague. In 1923 he went to Paris, stayed for nearly 20 years. A very serious man, who studies physics and biology for relaxation, he is too busy with new music to try to reconstruct many scores he was forced to leave in Europe.

Associated Press

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA'S MARTINU, BOSTON'S KOUSSEVITZKY
They have a date in December.

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL

NOV 12 1943

Composer Says War Cause Of Today's Restless Rhythms

Boston, Nov. 12—(AP)—American composers are writing vigorous, restless, rhythmic music reflecting the nervous energy of a nation at war, according to 33-year-old New York born William Schuman whose Fifth Symphony is being performed for the first time anywhere today by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Interviewed at Symphony Hall prior to the world premiere of his symphony—the fifth in six years—the tall, young American emphasized that today's musicians are bound to be influenced by the world in which they live.

The young New Yorker was educated in his native city and was graduated from Columbia University. Later he studied composition with Roy Harris, one of this country's leading symphonists, and at present is on the arts faculty of Sarah Lawrence college, Bronxville, N. Y.

This Clipping From MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 10 1943

Riding the Airwaves
with Richard K. Bellamy

Allis-Chalmers to Sponsor Boston Symphony?

WHAT would be the biggest radio deal ever involving a Milwaukee firm is reported to be in the "hot" stage down east. Under it the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., Wisconsin's largest, would sponsor the famed Boston symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, on the full Blue network in a long series of one hour concerts. The orchestra is now heard as a sustaining feature at 7:15 p. m. on a number of Blue stations (WCFL in this area).

No contracts have been signed as yet, and no large sums are being bandied about in conversation, but to get an idea of the size of the deal, you'll recall that the United States Rubber Co. is shelling out a reported $1,500,000 annually to sponsor the New York Philharmonic on the air an hour and a half each Sunday; and General Motors is broadcasting the one hour NBC symphony concerts at an estimated cost of around $800,000 a year.

Sponsoring the Bostons then, would put Allis-Chalmers definitely in the big league. Other Milwaukee firms have spent considerable sums in radio advertising—Pabst is not getting the current Groucho Marx series for nothing, you may be sure—but "buying symphonies" hitherto has been strictly a matter for the country's very largest operators. They have gone in for it since the war expanded their volume of business to staggering proportions. Symphonic programs are considered a costly but dignified way to keep the firm name before the public and to build good will for the postwar days.

Many musically minded persons consider the Boston symphony to be the finest in the country, even ahead of the New York and Philadelphia groups. Koussevitzky they rate the equal of any conductor alive. To have the orchestra playing for a Milwaukee firm would be sure to add prestige to the name of our town.

Allis-Chalmers began to branch into radio advertising last year. It currently is sponsoring a half hour program of semiclassical music, "Made in Milwaukee," Sunday nights over WTMJ and W55M from Radio City.

* * *

We hate to pop off about Bob Hope, who has done a wonderful job of entertaining in the war. But was that Tuesday night routine of his on divorce good radio, or was it in bad taste and extremely unfunny? After all, we are having a good deal of worry over loose morality due to the unsettled state of the world; and a program that goes into millions of homes ought to be careful in choosing subjects to joke about. Even if you don't agree with us on the moral angle, don't you think that Hope's gag writers are scraping the bottom of the barrel?

* * *

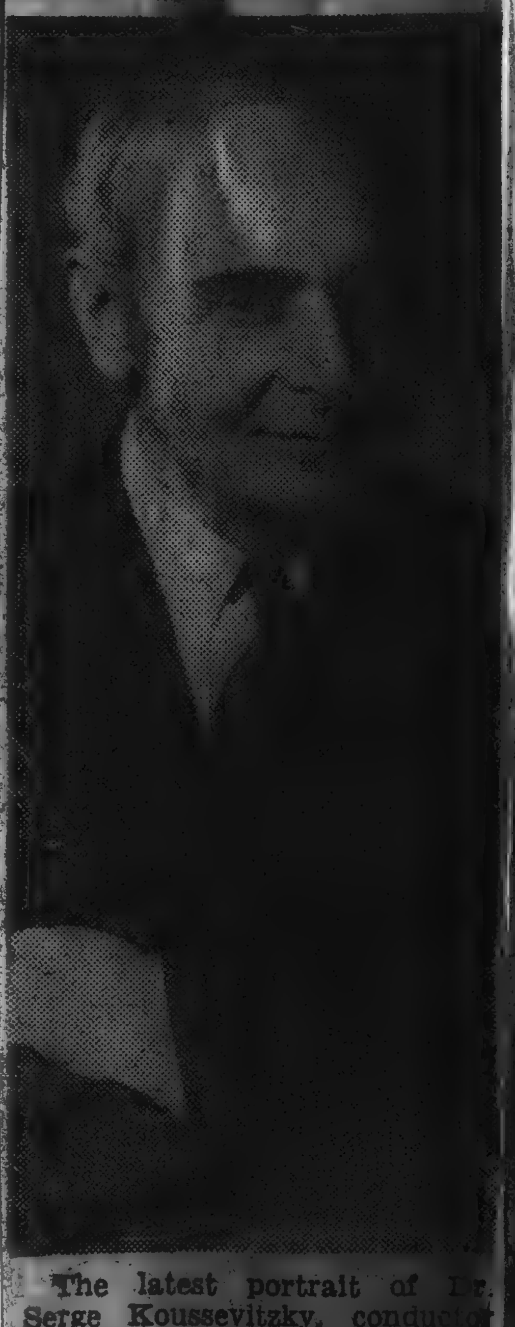
Rumors and Facts

Bill Thompson, missing this year in his "Old-Timer" and "Wallace Wimple" roles on the Fibber McGee and Molly show because he preferred to remain in Chicago with his ailing parents, may soon embark on his own network program. He is under option to a soap company. . . . Don't be surprised if Joan Davis leaves the Village Store around the first of the year. Her agents are reported to be asking $12,000 weekly for her services. . . Xavier Cugat's Saturday morning show soon will move to another network on a Wednesday night period. . . . A show starring Monty Woolley is being prepped to replace Sammy Kaye's production. . . . Mortimer Snerd celebrated his eighth birthday Nov. 1. Edgar Bergen's "other dummy" came to life on the tablecloth of a Chicago night club when Bergen realised he needed an encore to McCarthy.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 8 - 1943

Boston Leader



The latest portrait of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky is the dean of the conductors in the Bushnell Memorial's Symphony Series which he will open the year by bringing the Boston Symphony to the Bushnell for a concert on Tuesday evening, Nov. 16. The Boston will play another concert here in January. The remaining [illegible] events of the series [illegible] formed by the Nation[illegible]

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

NOV 12 1943

Third Network Symphony Gets Sponsor

Price To Be Paid Boston Orchestra Not Announced

NEW YORK, Nov. 12—(AP)—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts that supplied on the Blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC Symphony on NBC also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston Orchestra will continue its present 8:15 p. m. schedule on the Blue. The price paid by the sponsor was not announced, but the figure for the NBC Symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday. These contracts covered a year, with the Boston Orchestra arrangement understood to be for a similar period.

FORT WORTH, TEX.
MORNING STAR-TELEGRAM

NOV 12 1943

Boston Symphony Signs Contract With Sponsor

NEW YORK, Nov. 12 (AP).—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts, that supplies on Blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC symphony on NBC, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston orchestra will continue its present 7:15 p. m. schedule on the Blue. The price paid by the sponsor (Allis Chalmers) was nor announced, but the figure for the NBC symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday. These contracts covered a year, with the Boston orchestra arrangement understood to be for a similar period.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS

NOV 12 1943

Boston Symphony Signs Up Sponsor; May Pay Million

NEW YORK—(AP)—The third of the network weekly symphony concerts that supplies on blue Saturday nights by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has signed a long-term contract with a sponsor. Previously the New York Philharmonic on CBS Sunday afternoons and the NBC Symphony on NBC, also Sundays, had made sponsor arrangements.

Pending the start of the series at a date to be announced, the Boston orchestra will continue its present 7:15 p. m. (CWT) schedule on the blue. The price paid by the sponsor (Allis Chalmers) was not announced, but the figure for the NBC Symphony was indicated as "approximately a million" for an hour concert weekly and that for the New York Philharmonic at "around a million and a half" for 90-minute broadcasts each Sunday.

ARRE, VT.
TIMES
Wilmington Banner
12 1943

SYMPHONY'S DEBUT TONIGHT

William Schuman's Fifth in Six Years to Have Premiere in Boston

BOSTON, Nov. 12 (AP).—American composers are writing vigorous, restless, rhythmic music reflecting the nervous energy of a nation at war, according to 33-year-old New York born William Schuman whose Fifth Symphony is being performed for the first time anywhere today by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Interviewed at Symphony hall prior to the world premiere of his symphony—the fifth in six years—the tall young American emphasized that today's musicians are bound to be influenced by the world in which they live.

"I feel very much a part of the world, not apart from it," he said, one quick, shy smile lighting his face.

"Leading American symphonists are writing in streamlined form, with long-limed melodic line and an intense rhythmic quality that is a natural outgrowth of the nervous energy of today," he declared.

Page Mr. Durocher!

"They are not arty or art riddled. They are normal, healthy individuals—more at home on a baseball field than secluded in an ivory tower.

"As to Americans in music, I think that any self-conscious Americanism is most unfortunate, music being as it is an international language. However, we do have local emphasis or local idiosyncrasy which makes our music recognizable as such, just as in the case of Spanish or Russian music.

"More specifically, American music has a very great rhymthic interest which, however complicated, always seems to be an indigenous artistic expression rather than a sort of intellectual fire works.

"This is closely related to our popular music, even though the composer is not attempting to write in a symphonic jazz idiom."

Schuman shrugged his shoulders—as much as to say he was glad to get that off his chest—and then said:

Mass Production?

The young New Yorker was educated in his native city and was graduated from Columbia university. Later he studied composition with Roy Harris, one of this country's leading symphonists, and at present is on the arts faculty of Sarah Lawrence college, Bronxville, N. Y.

His new work, a streamlined "Symphony for Strings" in three movements instead of the customary four, is his third symphonic undertaking to have a world premiere by the Boston Symphony. Conductor Koussevitzky also has performed a number of the composer's shorter creations.

Schumann said he had now withdrawn his first two symphonies from general circulation and "just must go back and revise them."

"Furthermore," he added, "maybe I'll run out of ideas in the next 50 years and those symphonies will give me something to fall back on."

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 13 1943

Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of Lenox has begun his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 13 1943

Koussevitzky and Stravinsky

Boston Conductor, Now in 20th Season, to Introduce New 'Ode' on Thursday.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

This is Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony. At the beginning of the orchestra's home season, there were speeches and a fanfare—the one by Walter Piston that was first played at Harvard when Winston Churchill received an honorary degree there last summer. Only tributes of applause are to be expected at the Bostonians' opening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday.

If scarcely the dean of conductors now before the American public, Dr. Koussevitzky qualifies as the one who has been longest on the job. No other leader of a major orchestra in this country can point to two decades of unbroken activity in a post he now holds. We must turn to the past for instances of longer tenure. Relatively recently, Leopold Stokowski left the Philadelphia Orchestra after twenty-four years as its conductor. Frederick Stock died in harness at the beginning of his thirty-eighth season as the director of the Chicago Symphony.

The record, of course, is held by Walter Damrosch, who presided over the concerts of the New York Symphony from the death of his father in 1885 to the time of the orchestra merger with the Philharmonic in 1928, a period of forty-two years. Arturo Toscanini's connection with the Philharmonic endured for just a decade. Josef Stransky was that orchestra's conductor for eleven years. Theodore Thomas led the Chicago Symphony for fourteen. Most of the others whose names are remembered held their posts for much shorter periods.

There is no present need to particularize the fruits of Dr. Koussevitzky's long and memorable service, for it is to be assumed that he will come back to us with the Boston Symphony through seasons to come, and that the playing of the ensemble will continue to be its own eulogy and testimonial. Under the one conductor that playing has been remarkably consistent. The only occasional "guests" have influenced it in no degree or manner. The orchestra is what Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared it to be, concert after concert and season after season. In timbre, flexibility, precision and essential response to the wishes of the conductor the Boston Symphony of today is perhaps the least variable that this country has known.

Dr. Koussevitzky's zeal in the performance of new music has not slackened and his novelties promise to be among the most interesting of the year. The first of these will be heard Thursday night, when he will introduce Igor Stravinsky's newly composed "Ode," an orchestral work dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the conductor's helpmate, who died in January of last year.

"Ode" is in three parts and scored for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, timpani and strings. Part I has been described by the composer as "'Eulogy,' praise, a song in sustained melody with accompaniment, the whole in fugal treatment"; Part II, "'Eclogue,' a piece in lively mood, a kind of concert champetre, suggesting outdoor music, an idea cherished by Natalie Koussevitzky and brilliantly materialized at Tanglewood by her husband"; Part III, "'Epitaph,' an inscription, serein air," closing the triptych.

The Boston reviews were agreed on at least one point: this ode is not an emotional lament. The Stravinsky of the latest years, as represented by the Symphony that was given a broadcast performance by Leopold Stokowski last season, maintains a classic, or neo-classic, control over his feelings, or they otherwise are no very stubborn obstacle to his particular kind of intellectual serenity in composition. "Ode," of course, is still to be heard here; and in view of its introduction five days hence the temptation to base surmises on its Boston reception must be sternly brushed aside.

Argentinita

Spanish dancer who will appear with her company in Carnegie Hall tonight and tomorrow night and Sunday, November 21.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

NOV 13 1943

Radio Sponsor Aids Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was added Friday to the growing list of symphonic organizations being aided financially by a commercial radio sponsor. Beginning within the next few weeks the concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will be heard on a year-round basis with a Milwaukee manufacturer of electrical equipment footing the bill.

Broadcast over the Blue Network, the programs will probably be heard here from 7:15 to 8:15 Saturday evenings over WSAI.

Both the NBC and New York Philharmonic orchestras are now heard under advertising auspices. Negotiations to put the Philadelphia Orchestra on the same basis are still in the conference stage. The Cleveland Orchestra, now heard here as a sustaining program, is also about to be signed by a Mutual Network client.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

NOV 16 1943

News that the Allis Chalmers Co. is now sponsoring the Boston Symphony programs on the Blue network, entering into a year's contract at a stiff fee, generally thought to be around a million dollars, has given impetus to the drive for a sponsor for the Leinsdorfs.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sixth concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

William Schuman.... Symphony for Strings
Shostakovitch.... Symphony No. 1, Op. 10; Symphony No. 5, Op. 47

It is evident that William Schuman is well on his way to becoming the foremost American-born composer of the day. In point of fact, after hearing the first performance of his Symphony for Strings played by the always astonishing string band of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I can say that Mr. Schuman already is the foremost American-born composer of the day—and entertain no expectation of being called out for a dawn appointment at 12 paces.

That Mr. Schuman is a master of the orchestra has long been remarked. It was noted before the appearance of his exceedingly good Third Symphony, which also had its first performance at these concerts. With the Third, however, there came a flood of musical inspiration where before there had been labor, and the symphony has gone on to achieve a well-deserved popularity despite the fact that it is not a popular conception—as constrasted, say, with Shostakovitch's Fifth, which is chiefly circus music. (The Schuman Cantata, heard last year, on the other hand, seemed pretty dreary to me, as indeed do all inspirational cantatas drawn from Walt Whitman, Carl Sandburg and other triple-riveted American poets.)

Although Mr. Schuman has employed, to some extent, the wide-open intervals, the off-beat rhythms, the folksy melodic fragments and the other clap-trap devices associated perforce with purely "American" music, he has used them as a natural means, not an artificial end. That he has endowed them with a powerful, a vigorous and a sustained inspiration is the measure of his creative capacity. Few can listen to the second movement of the Symphony for Strings with its increasing melodic tension as the first violins are joined by the second and then by the violas in a soaring trio without being moved, while the sustained opening chords are among the most sonorous in the literature for the string orchestra. Unlike most of his contemporaries, Mr. Schuman does not come to grief in his slow movements, and therein lies his great potential.

The opening movement is all verve and exhilaration, obviously a tour de force for the strings without the employment of the trickery a tour de force implies. It hastens on to its climax, makes its point nicely, and comes to an end. The same holds true of the finale, although here the melodic materials are less distinguished. There is a feeling of compulsion about the whole symphony, as though the composer had conceived the whole as a complete structure, and not as little bricks to be piled one on top of another. In any case, it would seem that Dr. Koussevitzky has just the right piece to take on tour, although it didn't go any too well with the audience yesterday.

All this appears to leave practically no room for Shostakovitch's First Symphony (which is a pity since it is delightful) and the same gentleman's Fifth (which is a godsend since it is a crashing bore). Neither, however, has escaped its share of attention, so suffice it to say they were expertly set forth by orchestra and conductor, although the latter seemed to be more interested in the Fifth than the former. The orchestra undertakes its first tour of the season during the coming week, so the next concerts will be given on Nov. 26-27, Richard Burgin conducting.

Post

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last week at Symphony Hall it was all Tchaikovsky. This week it is mostly Shostakovitch, both the First and Fifth symphonies. Before them on this sixth programme is set a new symphony for strings by William Schuman, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Yesterday it came and went, in one ear and out the other. And yet it is a well-made, by no means ineffective composition from an already practiced hand. Present in the audience, the composer was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, after the latter's vivid projection of his score.

Mr. Shuman's dilemma is not an uncommon one, though it is generally the classics that discomfit our young men. Shostakovitch, in other words, has his own style, his own idiom; had it in fact in the remarkable symphony that he wrote at the age of 19, while Mr. Schuman's piece sets you to spotting contemporary influences, that of Hindemith in particular. The first two movements are much the best, the one energetic, the other a Largheissimo that after the present fashion is more sinewy than sentimental. The final Presto has a manufactured sound, and its indebtedness ranges from the pizzicato scherzo of Tchaikovsky's Fourth to the miscellaneous moderns of the previous sections.

Dr. Koussevitzky had never before conducted the Shostakovitch First, which we had heard previously from Mr. Burgin, Mr. Mako and from the Cleveland orchestra under Rodzinsky. For the music of his brilliant compatriot, the Boston conductor has both a fondness and a flair, and the performance of the first was a fine one. In this work, boyish high spirits, a youthful freshness and an almost childlike fancy are set forth with a firm command of musical and orchestral resource. By contrast, the Fifth Symphony seems a work of full maturity; there is more consistency and cohesion. Yet its musical ideas are less salient, less strikingly original.

Globe Nov 13

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This week's Boston Symphony program, composed of three symphonies, all modern, is both unusual and musically exciting.

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the first performances of William Schuman's exuberant and highly interesting Symphony for Strings, the composer's fifth work in this form, and his own first reading in Boston of the Shostakovitch First Symphony, which with the same composer's Fifth, completes the program.

These are works exciting both for their musical ideas and for the contrasts they offer. The listener can observe to begin with the methods and approaches of the two artists represented. William Schuman has grown away from his early absorption of European musical culture, and moved toward a personal idiom of expression. You are tempted to call it "American," because like the work of some other Americans, it is solid, vital and forward-looking. He no longer depends alone on a distillation of classic form and medium. He is striking out on his own.

Meanwhile, Shostakovitch has carried to a far degree his particular method, which seems to be the complete absorption of the European culture. And that, perhaps, is why his work is so often met with talk of "melodic derivation." In other words, you begin to point out melodic references in his symphonies that hark back to his musical ancestors. Shostakovitch has gone far afield in the employment of new forms. And his sense of dramatic cohesion and unity has grown, even though his later works seem to be more diffused than the earlier ones. But melodically his ideas are not as fresh today (the Fifth, for instance) as they were when he composed the Puckish, talkative First Symphony at the age of 20.

At the same time Schuman and Shostakovitch are alike in their musical awareness and driving energy. They have imagination and they use it.

Schuman's Fifth Symphony will bear repeated hearings, for it is a work of much attractiveness. The first of three movements is weighty with rugged counterpoint. It is perhaps too heavy for, despite its seeming authority, it lacks definition. Mr. Schuman has employed the utmost technical resourcefulness. Although he uses only strings, the Symphony throughout is alive with the widest range of color effects and contrasting sororities. Harmonically, you might describe the whole work as incisive, rather than astringent, a term used frequently in speaking of the moderns!

Schuman has produced a second movement of elusive, distant beauty that is quite affecting. And his final movement is bright with a vigorous humor. Herein, he employs a most effective use of short rests, which point up his inventive figurations.

Although the final soft chords of Schuman's slow movement were a trifle fuzzy, performances of the three symphonies swept the listener along in a wonderful current of sound and musical drama. Mr. Koussevitzky has a feeling for modern works and young minds that makes him a most sympathetic interpreter of new works.—J. W. R.

[2]

ARRE, VT.
~~TIMES~~
Burlington Banner
NOV 1 2 1943

SYMPHONY'S DEBUT TONIGHT

William Schuman's Fifth in Six Years to Have Premiere in Boston

BOSTON, Nov. 12 (AP).—American composers are writing vigorous, restless, rhythmic music reflecting the nervous energy of a nation at war, according to 33-year-old New York born William Schuman whose Fifth Symphony is being performed for the first time anywhere today by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Interviewed at Symphony hall prior to the world premiere of his symphony—the fifth in six years—the tall young American emphasized that today's musicians are bound to be influenced by the world in which they live.

"I feel very much a part of the world, not apart from it," he said, one quick, shy smile lighting his face.

"Leading American symphonists are writing in streamlined form, with long-limed melodic line and an intense rhythmic quality that is a natural outgrowth of the nervous energy of today," he declared.

Page Mr. Durocher!

"They are not arty or art riddled. They are normal, healthy individuals—more at home on a baseball field than secluded in an ivory tower.

"As to Americans in music, I think that any self-conscious Americanism is most unfortunate, music being as it is an international language. However, we do have local emphasis or local idiosyncrasy which makes our music recognizable as such, just as in the case of Spanish or Russian music.

"More specifically, American music has a very great rhymthic interest which, however complicated, always seems to be an indigenous artistic expression rather than a sort of intellectual fire works.

"This is closely related to our popular music, even though the composer is not attempting to write in a symphonic jazz idiom."

Schuman shrugged his shoulders—as much as to say he was glad to get that off his chest—and then said:

Mass Production?

The young New Yorker was educated in his native city and was graduated from Columbia university. Later he studied composition with Roy Harris, one of this country's leading symphonists, and at present is on the arts faculty of Sarah Lawrence college, Bronxville, N. Y.

His new work, a streamlined "Symphony for Strings" in three movements instead of the customary four, is his third symphonic undertaking to have a world premiere by the Boston Symphony. Conductor Koussevitzky also has performed a number of the composer's shorter creations.

Schumann said he had now withdrawn his first two symphonies from general circulation and "just must go back and revise them."

"Furthermore," he added, "maybe I'll run out of ideas in the next 50 years and those symphonies will give me something to fall back on."

—V—

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 1 3 1943

Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of Lenox has begun his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 1 3 1943

Koussevitzky and Stravinsky

Boston Conductor, Now in 20th Season, to Introduce New 'Ode' on Thursday.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

This is Serge Koussevitzky's twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony. At the beginning of the orchestra's home season, there were speeches and a fanfare—the one by Walter Piston that was first played at Harvard when Winston Churchill received an honorary degree there last summer. Only tributes of applause are to be expected at the Bostonians' opening concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday.

If scarcely the dean of conductors now before the American public, Dr. Koussevitzky qualifies as the one who has been longest on the job. No other leader of a major orchestra in this country can point to two decades of unbroken activity in a post he now holds. We must turn to the past for instances of longer tenure. Relatively recently, Leopold Stokowski left the Philadelphia Orchestra after twenty-four years as its conductor. Frederick Stock died in harness at the beginning of his thirty-eighth season as the director of the Chicago Symphony.

The record, of course, is held by Walter Damrosch, who presided over the concerts of the New York Symphony from the death of his father in 1885 to the time of the orchestra merger with the Philharmonic in 1928, a period of forty-two years. Arturo Toscanini's connection with the Philharmonic endured for just a decade. Josef Stransky was that orchestra's conductor for eleven years. Theodore Thomas led the Chicago Symphony for fourteen. Most of the others whose names are remembered held their posts for much shorter periods.

There is no present need to particularize the fruits of Dr. Koussevitzky's long and memorable service, for it is to be assumed that he will come back to us with the Boston Symphony through seasons to come, and that the playing of the ensemble will continue to be its own eulogy and testimonial. Under the one conductor that playing has been remarkably consistent. The only occasional "guests" have influenced it in no degree or manner. The orchestra is what Dr. Koussevitzky has prepared it to be, concert after concert and season after season. In timbre, flexibility, precision and essential response to the wishes of the conductor the Boston Symphony of today is perhaps the least variable that this country has known.

Dr. Koussevitzky's zeal in the performance of new music has not slackened and his novelties promise to be among the most interesting of the year. The first of these will be heard Thursday night, when he will introduce Igor Stravinsky's newly composed "Ode," an orchestral work dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the conductor's helpmate, who died in January of last year.

"Ode" is in three parts and scored for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, two trumpets, timpani and strings. Part I has been described by the composer as "'Eulogy,' praise, a song in sustained melody with accompaniment, the whole in fugal treatment"; Part II, "'Eclogue,' a piece in lively mood, a kind of concert champetre, suggesting outdoor music, an idea cherished by Natalie Koussevitzky and brilliantly materialized at Tanglewood by her husband"; Part III, "'Epitaph,' an inscription, serein air," closing the triptych.

The Boston reviews were agreed on at least one point: this ode is not an emotional lament. The Stravinsky of the latest years, as represented by the Symphony that was given a broadcast performance by Leopold Stokowski last season, maintains a classic, or neo-classic, control over his feelings, or they otherwise are no very stubborn obstacle to his particular kind of intellectual serenity in composition. "Ode," of course, is still to be heard here; and in view of its introduction five days hence the temptation to base surmises on its Boston reception must be sternly brushed aside.

Argentinita

Spanish dancer who will appear with her company in Carnegie Hall tonight and tomorrow night and Sunday, November 21.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST
1 3 1943

Radio Sponsor Aids Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was added Friday to the growing list of symphonic organizations being aided financially by a commercial radio sponsor. Beginning within the next few weeks the concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will be heard on a year-round basis with a Milwaukee manufacturer of electrical equipment footing the bill.

Broadcast over the Blue Network, the programs will probably be heard here from 7:15 to 8:15 Saturday evenings over WSAI.

Both the NBC and New York Philharmonic orchestras are now heard under advertising auspices. Negotiations to put the Philadelphia Orchestra on the same basis are still in the conference stage. The Cleveland Orchestra, now heard here as a sustaining program, is also about to be signed by a Mutual Network client.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge vitzky conducting, gave the sixth of its 63d season in Symphony Hall ay afternoon. The program was as n Schuman....Symphony for Strings kovitch....Symphony No. 1, Op. 10; Symphony No. 5, Op. 47

s evident that William Schuis well on his way to becoming foremost American-born comof the day. In point of fact, hearing the first performance s Symphony for Strings played he always astonishing string of the Boston Symphony Ortra, I can say that Mr. Schuman dy is the foremost American composer of the day—and enain no expectation of being called for a dawn appointment at 12 es.

That Mr. Schuman is a master of e orchestra has long been remarked. It was noted before the appearance of his exceedingly good Third Symphony, which also had its first performance at these concerts. With the Third, however, there came a flood of musical inspiration where before there had been labor, and the symphony has gone on to achieve a well-deserved popularity despite the fact that it is not a popular conception—as constrasted, say, with Shostakovitch's Fifth, which is chiefly circus music. (The Schuman Cantata, heard last year, on the other hand, seemed pretty dreary to me, as indeed do all inspirational cantatas drawn from Walt Whitman, Carl Sandburg and other triple-riveted American poets.)

Although Mr. Schuman has employed, to some extent, the wide-open intervals, the off-beat rhythms, the folksy melodic fragments and the other clap-trap devices associated perforce with purely "American" music, he has used them as a natural means, not an artificial end. That he has endowed them with a powerful, a vigorous and a sustained inspiration is the measure of his creative capacity. Few can listen to the second movement of the Symphony for Strings with its increasing melodic tension as the first violins are joined by the second and then by the violas in a soaring trio without being moved, while the sustained opening chords are among the most sonorous in the literature for the string orchestra. Unlike most of his contemporaries, Mr. Schuman does not come to grief in his slow movements, and therein lies his great potential.

The opening movement is all verve and exhilaration, obviously a tour de force for the strings without the employment of the trickery a tour de force implies. It hastens on to its climax, makes its point nicely, and comes to an end. The same holds true of the finale, although here the melodic materials are less distinguished. There is a feeling of compulsion about the whole symphony, as though the composer had conceived the whole as a complete structure, and not as little bricks to be piled one on top of another. In any case, it would seem that Dr. Koussevitzky has just the right piece to take on tour, although it didn't go any too well with the audience yesterday.

All this appears to leave practically no room for Shostakovitch's First Symphony (which is a pity since it is delightful) and the same gentleman's Fifth (which is a godsend since it is a crashing bore). Neither, however, has escaped its share of attention, so suffice it to say they were expertly set forth by orchestra and conductor, although the latter seemed to be more interested in the Fifth than the former. The orchestra undertakes its first tour of the season during the coming week, so the next concerts will be given on Nov. 26-27, Richard Burgin conducting.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last week at Symphony Hall it was all Tchaikovsky. This week it is mostly Shostakovitch, both the First and Fifth symphonies. Before them on this sixth programme is set a new symphony for strings by William Schuman, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. Yesterday it came and went, in one ear and out the other. And yet it is a well-made, by no means ineffective composition from an already practiced hand. Present in the audience, the composer was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, after the latter's vivid projection of his score.

Mr. Shuman's dilemma is not an uncommon one, though it is generally the classics that discomfit our young men. Shostakovitch, in other words, has his own style, his own idiom; had it in fact in the remarkable symphony that he wrote at the age of 19, while Mr. Schuman's piece sets you to spotting contemporary influences, that of Hindemith in particular. The first two movements are much the best, the one energetic, the other a Largheissimo that after the present fashion is more sinewy than sentimental. The final Presto has a manufactured sound, and its indebtedness ranges from the pizzicato scherzo of Tchaikovsky's Fourth to the miscellaneous moderns of the previous sections.

Dr. Koussevitzky had never before conducted the Shostakovitch First, which we had heard previously from Mr. Burgin, Mr. Mako and from the Cleveland orchestra under Rodzinsky. For the music of his brilliant compatriot, the Boston conductor has both a fondness and a flair, and the performance of the first was a fine one. In this work, boyish high spirits, a youthful freshness and an almost childlike fancy are set forth with a firm command of musical and orchestral resource. By contrast, the Fifth Symphony seems a work of full maturity; there is more consistency and cohesion. Yet its musical ideas are less salient, less strikingly original.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

This week's Boston Symphony program, composed of three symphonies, all modern, is both unusual and musically exciting.

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the first performances of William Schuman's exuberant and highly interesting Symphony for Strings, the composer's fifth work in this form, and his own first reading in Boston of the Shostakovitch First Symphony, which with the same composer's Fifth, completes the program.

These are works exciting both for their musical ideas and for the contrasts they offer. The listener can observe to begin with the methods and approaches of the two artists represented. William Schuman has grown away from his early absorption of European musical culture, and moved toward a personal idiom of expression. You are tempted to call it "American," because like the work of some other Americans, it is solid, vital and forward-looking. He no longer depends alone on a distillation of classic form and medium. He is striking out on his own.

Meanwhile, Shostakovitch has carried to a far degree his particular method, which seems to be the complete absorption of the European culture. And that, perhaps, is why his work is so often met with talk of "melodic derivation." In other words, you begin to point out melodic references in his symphonies that hark back to his musical ancestors. Shostakovitch has gone far afield in the employment of new forms. And his sense of dramatic cohesion and unity has grown, even though his later works seem to be more diffused than the earlier ones. But melodically his ideas are not as fresh today (the Fifth, for instance) as they were when he composed the Puckish, talkative First Symphony at the age of 20.

At the same time Schuman and Shostakovitch are alike in their musical awareness and driving energy. They have imagination and they use it.

Schuman's Fifth Symphony will bear repeated hearings, for it is a work of much attractiveness. The first of three movements is weighty with rugged counterpoint. It is perhaps too heavy for, despite its seeming authority, it lacks definition. Mr. Schuman has employed the utmost technical resourcefulness. Although he uses only strings, the Symphony throughout is alive with the widest range of color effects and contrasting sororities. Harmonically, you might describe the whole work as incisive, rather than astringent, a term used frequently in speaking of the moderns!

Schuman has produced a second movement of elusive, distant beauty that is quite affecting. And his final movement is bright with a vigorous humor. Herein, he employs a most effective use of short rests, which point up his inventive figurations.

Although the final soft chords of Schuman's slow movement were a trifle fuzzy, performances of the three symphonies swept the listener along in a wonderful current of sound and musical drama. Mr. Koussevitzky has a feeling for modern works and young minds that makes him a most sympathetic interpreter of new works.—J. W. R.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 1 6 1943

News that the Allis Chalmers Co. is now sponsoring the Boston Symphony programs on the Blue network, entering into a year's contract at a stiff fee, generally thought to be around a million dollars, has given impetus to the drive for a sponsor for the Leinsdorfs.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

4 1943

Opens Symphony Series Tuesday

With an all-Russian program in celebration of the great Soviet victories, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening of this week when he leads the Boston Symphony in the following program: "Fifth Symphony" of Tschaikowsky, "Ode in three parts for Orchestra," by Stravinski and "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

Dr. Koussevitzky Plans All-Russian Program Tuesday

Because of his jubilation over the present Soviet victories, Russian-born Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is presenting an all-Russian program when he brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Bushnell Memorial for the opening event of the Bushnell Symphony Series on Tuesday evening of this week.

This program has been announced as follows:

Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5"; Stravinsky's "Ode in Three Parts for Orchestra," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

In regard to the Moussorgsky work, Sigmund Spaeth in his book "Great Orchestral Music," wrote:

"'Pictures at an Exhibition' was completed as a piano piece in July, 1874, and later orchestrated by Cailliet, Touschmaloff, Leonardi, Sir Henry Wood and Maurice Ravel.

"The last-named composer undertook the instrumentation at the request of Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced the Ravel version at one of his Paris concerts, May 3, 1923.

"The music was suggested by pictures and designs in an exhibit of the work of the architect Victor Hartmann, who died in the summer of 1873. There are eleven pictures altogether, preceded and interrupted by Promenades, representing the composer at the exhibition, loitering, walking to and fro, occasionally hurrying to look at some congenial work, and then slackening his gait in sadness at the memory of his dead friend.

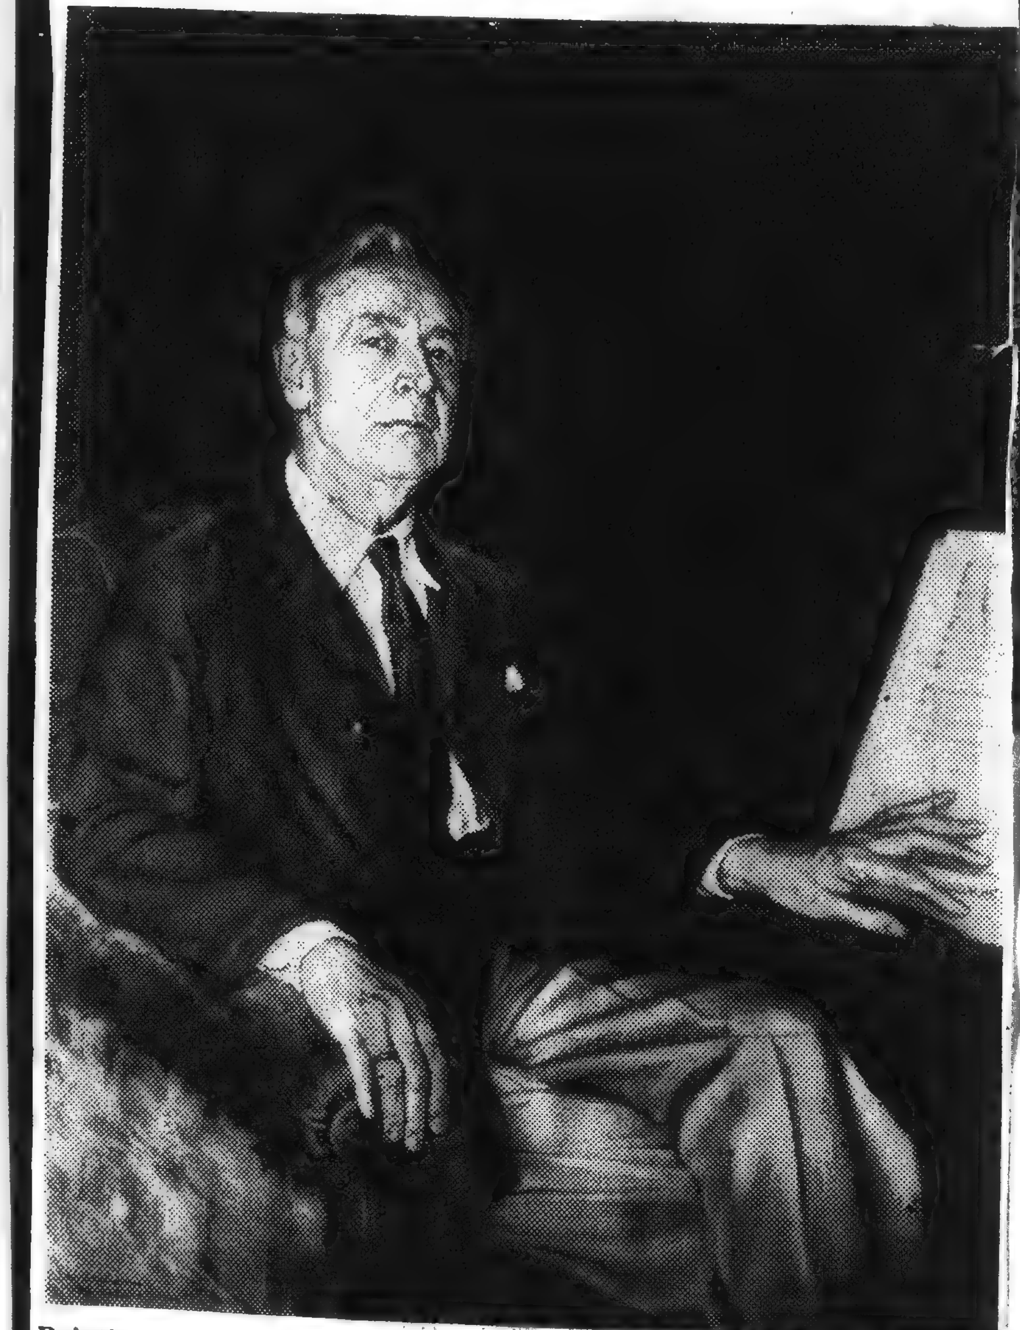
"The eleven subjects and the pictorial details which they represent are as follow: 1. The Gnome (Gnomus. 'Waddling, awkward steps.' 2. Il Vecchio Castello. A medieval castle, with troubadours singing. 3. Children at the Tuileries Gardens in Paris. Quarrels and romping, with nurses included. 4 Bydlo. A Polish wagon, drawn by oxen. (The music is a folk-song in the Aeolian mode.) 5. Ballet of the Chickens in Thin Egg-shells. A sketch for the ballet 'Trilby' by Hartmann. 6. Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle. Two Polish Jews, one rich and laconic, the other poor and restless. 7. Market place at Limoges. Women wrangling in the market place. 8. Catacombs. Hartmann himself exploring the Catacombs of Paris with a lantern. (Moussorgsky marked this episode. 'um mortuis in lingua mortua,' 'ith the dead in a dead language,' d added 'His creative spirit leads to the place of skulls and calls them; the skulls begin to glow intly from within.') 9. The Hut Baba-Yaga. Design for a clock. th the Russian witch, Baba-Yaga, fowls' legs,' or rather held in rds' claws. 10. The Golden Gate Kieff. Bogatyr's Gate, a proposed sign in the old Russian massive le, with a cupola in the form of a avonian helmet.

"The original piano composition, ctures at an Exhibition,' was dicated to Vladimir Stassoff, o had suggested and carried out memorial to Hartmann.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 14 1943

Portrait of a Conductor



Painting of Serge Koussevitzky by Boris Chaliapin. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in its first New York ~~visit of the~~ season this week.

THURSDAY

Haarlem Philharmonic Society, Waldorf-Astoria, 11 A. M. Don Cossack Chorus; Patricia Travers, violin.

Boston Symphony, Carnegie Hall, 8.45 P. M. Conductor, Koussevitzky

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64. Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts..........Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition. Mussorgsky-Ravel

Boston Symphony, Brooklyn Academy, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Koussevitzky; William Kapell, piano.

Commando March ....Barber
Piano Concerto ....Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68. Brahms

SATURDAY

Boston Symphony, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Koussevitzky; William Kapell, piano.

Classical Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Piano Concerto.........Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovich

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 14 1943

OVERTONES

Return of Koussevitzky Marks 20th Year With Boston Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

When the Boston Symphony comes to Brooklyn and New York this week, as it has been doing for over half a century, Serge Koussevitsky will enter upon his twentieth year as its conductor. It was 19 years ago this Autumn that he first came to America to lead the Boston Symphony. He knew little of our ways, perhaps less of our music, scarcely any of our language. But in the score of years that have intervened he has identified himself so completely with his orchestra and its city that they are commonly thought of as inseparable. He knows enough of our ways to have become an American citizen in spirit as well as in fact. He is also considerably more at home linguistically than others who have been here as long and circulated about the country even more. As for showing concern for our music, he has built into the repertory of the orchestra the works of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom, including Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, he has introduced to the concert public and developed through repeated performances of their music.

Certainly this is achievement itself. But what he has done for the orchestra is more, for he has made it the first orchestra of the land. How it plays needs no elaborating comment, because here in Brooklyn we fill the Academy of Music to capacity when it comes. Those who have been listening for a quarter of a century or more, as so many of this distinguished audience have, can tell their own story of the early beginnings of his career, his progress with the orchestra, and the culmination of the happy combination of conductor and players in the performances of the last decade.

Characteristically he has planned to introduce more new works during his twentieth season. No conductor has served the cause of the modern composer more faithfully, more enthusiastically or the more successfully. Always he has presented his music with such conviction that it would be hard to conceive of finer introductions for these new scores. In fact, there are times when one wonders whether in doing so much for the composer he may not have made it more difficult to appreciate the music when done by lesser orchestras not gifted with the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony or with the understanding of its master.

His complete identification with the Boston Symphony has led more than a few to believe that having conducted no other orchestra his success as a conductor might be an isolated instance. When he appeared as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony during its Centennial programs, he proved how far astray his detractors had wandered. If he has been considered a great conductor before this time, he certainly clinched his position the two weeks that he was in New York. The report that he had been offered the position of the musical directorship of the Philharmonic-Symphony led to betting in favor of his acceptance, but he decided to remain with the organization that he had made as famous as it had made him.

This decision seemed quite characteristic. Is it any wonder, then, that he is held with the greatest affection by the audiences that attend concerts of the Boston Symphony and that the orchestra plays for him as it would rarely play for any other man. Far from breeding contempt, familiarity with one another has created the ultimate in unanimity.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

NOV 14 1943

ORCHESTRA GETS SPONSOR

Boston Group On Air Year Around

NEW YORK, Nov. 13—(Special)—The weekly broadcast concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra which ~~for the past year have been~~ an outstanding musical presentation of the Blue Network and station WGH, will come under commercial sponsorship, Mark Woods, Blue Network president, has announced.

The starting date of the concerts under sponsorship will be announced shortly. Meanwhile they will continue as an outstanding sustaining feature of the network, Woods said.

Under the new arrangement, which is covered by long term contracts between the orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the sponsor and the network, the nation's listeners will be assured a continuing series of programs.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the orchestra's three series of concerts — the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under Koussevitzky; the Boston "pops" concerts during the spring and early summer, and the Esplanade concerts in an outdoor setting on the Esplanade flanking the Charles river in Boston. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "pops" and the Esplanade concerts. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full Blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the United States, every Saturday evening from 8:15 to :15 p. m., (EWT).

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 14

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will give a series of five concerts next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Occasion will mark the opening of the orchestra's 58th season in this borough.

Boston Symphony Will Have Kapell As Piano Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season this Friday evening, Nov. 19, at 8:30 in the Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

The program will open with the Commando March, a new work by the contemporary American, Samuel Barber. Mr. Barber, now a member of the armed forces, composed the March in February for military band. Its present orchestral version, prepared at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky was given its first performance last month in Boston.

The program also includes the Symphony No. 1 in C minor of Brahms and the piano concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, living Armenian composer. The guest soloist will be William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York City.

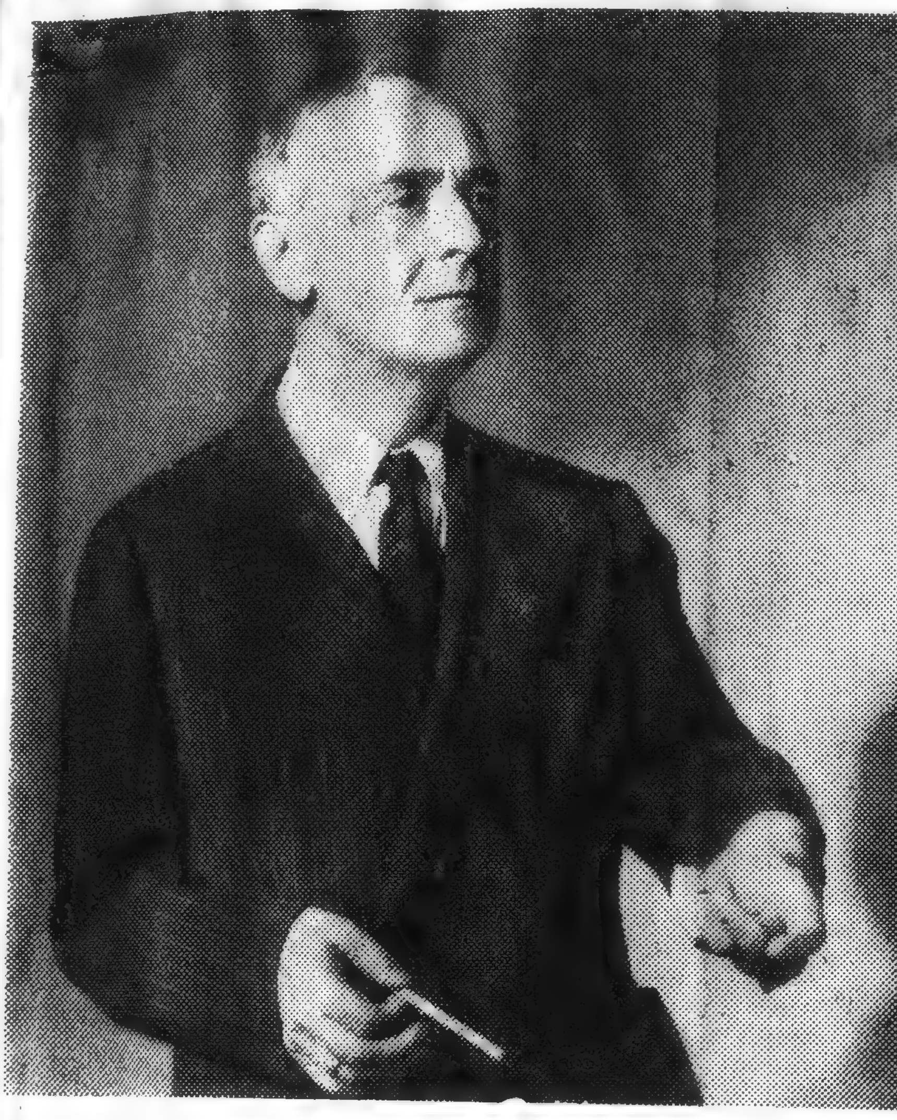
A pupil of Mme. Olga Samaroff-Stokowski, Mr. Kapell has received many honors and awards, including that of the youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Town Hall endowment award. Mr. Kapell first played the Khatchatourian concerto last Summer at Lewisohn Stadium and gave it most recently in Boston on Oct. 29.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn committee. The current series of five concerts is completely sold out on subscription and standing room only will be available this Friday evening, Nov. 19.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

4 1943

Opens Symphony Series Tuesday



With an all-Russian program in celebration of the great Soviet victories, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will open the Bushnell Symphony Series at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening of this week when he leads the Boston Symphony in the following program: "Fifth Symphony" of Tschaikowsky; "Ode in three parts for Orchestra," by Stravinski and "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

Dr. Koussevitzky Plans All-Russian Program Tuesday

Because of his jubilation over the present Soviet victories, Russian-born Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is presenting an all-Russian program when he brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Bushnell Memorial for the opening event of the Bushnell Symphony Series on Tuesday evening of this week.

This program has been announced as follows:

Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 5"; Stravinsky's "Ode in Three Parts for Orchestra," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

In regard to the Moussorgsky work, Sigmund Spaeth in his book "Great Orchestral Music," wrote:

" 'Pictures at an Exhibition' was completed as a piano piece in July, 1874, and later orchestrated by Cailliet, Touschmaloff, Leonardi, Sir Henry Wood and Maurice Ravel.

"The last-named composer undertook the instrumentation at the request of Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced the Ravel version at one of his Paris concerts, May 3, 1923.

"The music was suggested by pictures and designs in an exhibit of the work of the architect Victor Hartmann, who died in the summer of 1873. There are eleven pictures altogether, preceded and interrupted by Promenades, representing the composer at the exhibition, loitering, walking to and fro, occasionally hurrying to look at some congenial work, and then slackening his gait in sadness at the memory of his dead friend.

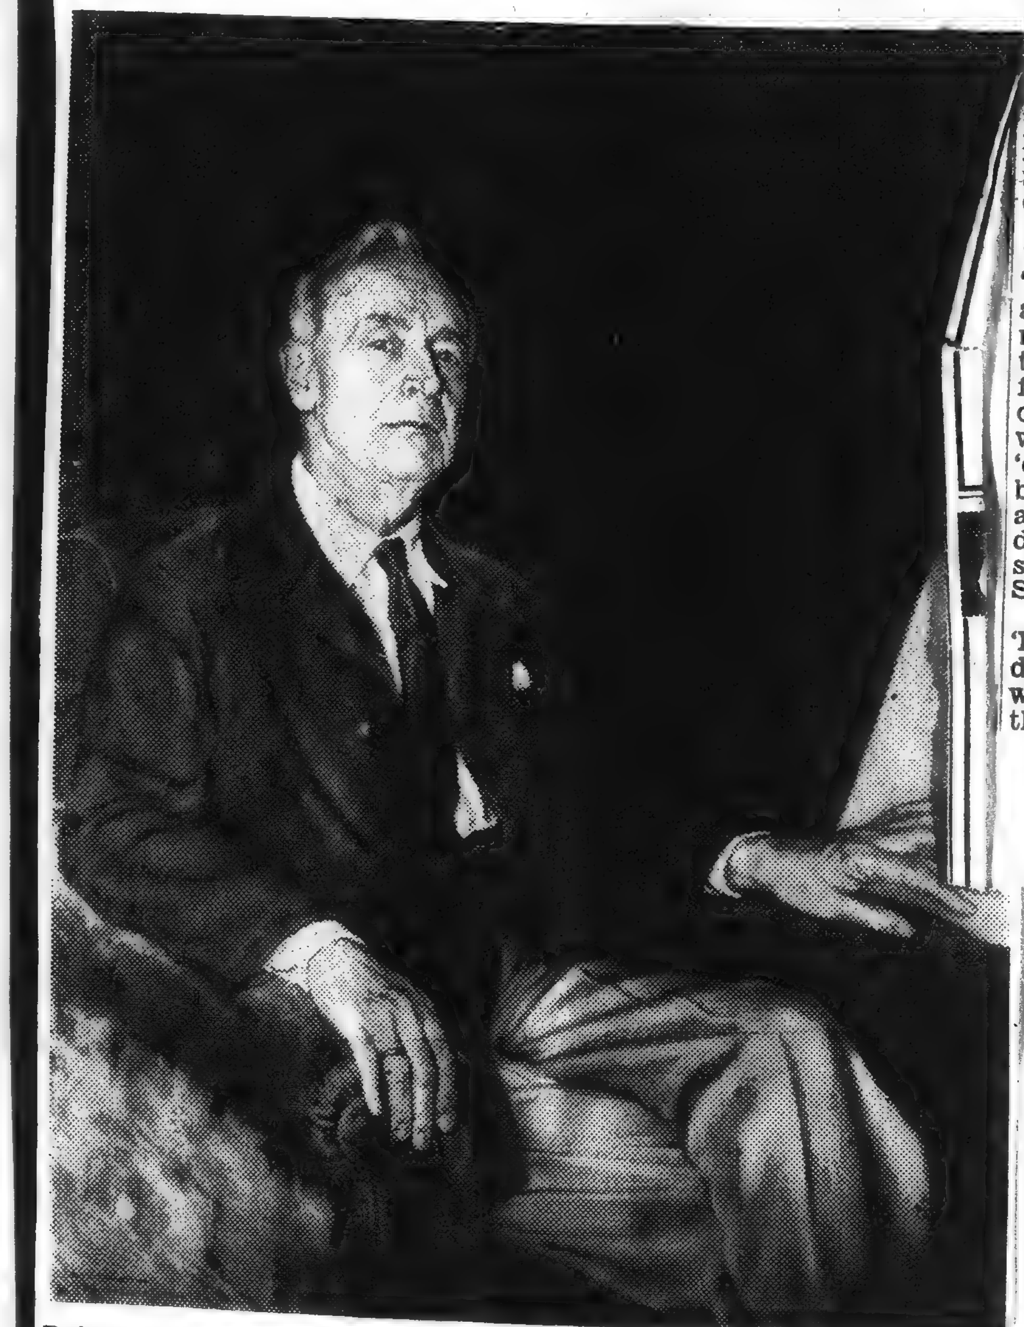
"The eleven subjects and the pictorial details which they represent are as follow: 1. The Gnome (Gnomus. 'Waddling, awkward steps.' 2. Il Vecchio Castello. A medieval castle, with troubadours singing. 3. Children at the Tuileries Gardens in Paris. Quarrels and romping, with nurses included. 4 Bydlo. A Polish wagon, drawn by oxen. (The music is a folk-song in the Aeolian mode.) 5. Ballet of the Chickens in Thin Egg-shells. A sketch for the ballet 'Trilby' by Hartmann. 6. Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle. Two Polish Jews, one rich and laconic, the other poor and restless. 7. Market place at Limoges. Women wrangling in the market place. 8. Catacombs. Hartmann himself exploring the Catacombs of Paris with a lantern. (Moussorgsky marked this episode. 'Cum mortuis in lingua mortua,' 'with the dead in a dead language,' and added 'His creative spirit leads me to the place of skulls and calls to them; the skulls begin to glow faintly from within.') 9. The Hut of Baba-Yaga. Design for a clock, with the Russian witch, Baba-Yaga, 'on fowls' legs,' or rather held in birds' claws. 10. The Golden Gate at Kieff. Bogatyr's Gate, a proposed design in the old Russian massive style, with a cupola in the form of a Slavonian helmet.

"The original piano composition, 'Pictures at an Exhibition,' was dedicated to Vladimir Stassoff, who had suggested and carried out the memorial to Hartmann.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 14 1943

Portrait of a Conductor



Painting of Serge Koussevitzky by Boris Chaliapin. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in its first New York ~~visit of the~~ season this week.

THURSDAY

Haarlem Philharmonic Society, Waldorf-Astoria, 11 A. M. Don Cossack Chorus; Patricia Travers, violin.

Boston Symphony, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P M Conductor, Koussevitzky

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64. .... Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts.........Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition. .... Mussorgsky-Ravel

Boston Symphony, Brooklyn Academy, 8:30 P. M. Conductor, Koussevitzky; William Kapell, piano.

Commando March ....Barber
Piano Concerto ....Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 1. in C minor, Op. 68. .... Brahms

SATURDAY

Boston Symphony, Carnegie Hall, 2:30 P. M. Conductor, Koussevitzky; William Kapell, piano.

Classical Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Piano Concerto..........Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovich

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

NOV 14 1943

ORCHESTRA GETS SPONSOR

Boston Group On Air Year Around

NEW YORK, Nov. 13—(S The weekly broadcast co the Boston Symphony which for the past year an outstanding music tion of the Blue Netw tion WGH, will com mercial sponsorship Blue Network pres nounced.

The starting da under sponsorship shortly. Meanwh tinue as an out feature of the netw

Under the new arrangement, which is covered by long term contracts between the orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the sponsor and the network, the nation's listeners will be assured a continuing series of programs.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the orchestra's three series of concerts — the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under Koussevitzky; the Boston "pops" concerts during the spring and early summer, and the Esplanade concerts in an outdoor setting on the Esplanade flanking the Charles river in Boston. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "pops" and the Esplanade concents. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full Blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the United States, every Saturday evening from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., (EWT).

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 14 1943

OVERTONES

Return of Koussevitzky Marks 20th Year With Boston Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

When the Boston Symphony comes to Brooklyn and New York this week, as it has been doing for over half a century, Serge Koussevitsky will enter upon his twentieth year as its conductor. It was 19 years ago this Autumn that he first came to America to lead the Boston Symphony. He knew little of our ways, perhaps less of our music, scarcely any of our language. But in the score of years that have intervened he has identified himself so completely with his orchestra and its city that they are commonly thought of as inseparable. He knows enough of our ways to have become an American citizen in spirit as well as in fact. He is also considerably more at home linguistically than others who have been here as long and circulated about the country even more. As for showing concern for our music, he has built into the repertory of the orchestra the works of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom, including Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris, William Schuman, he has introduced to the concert public and developed through repeated performances of their music.

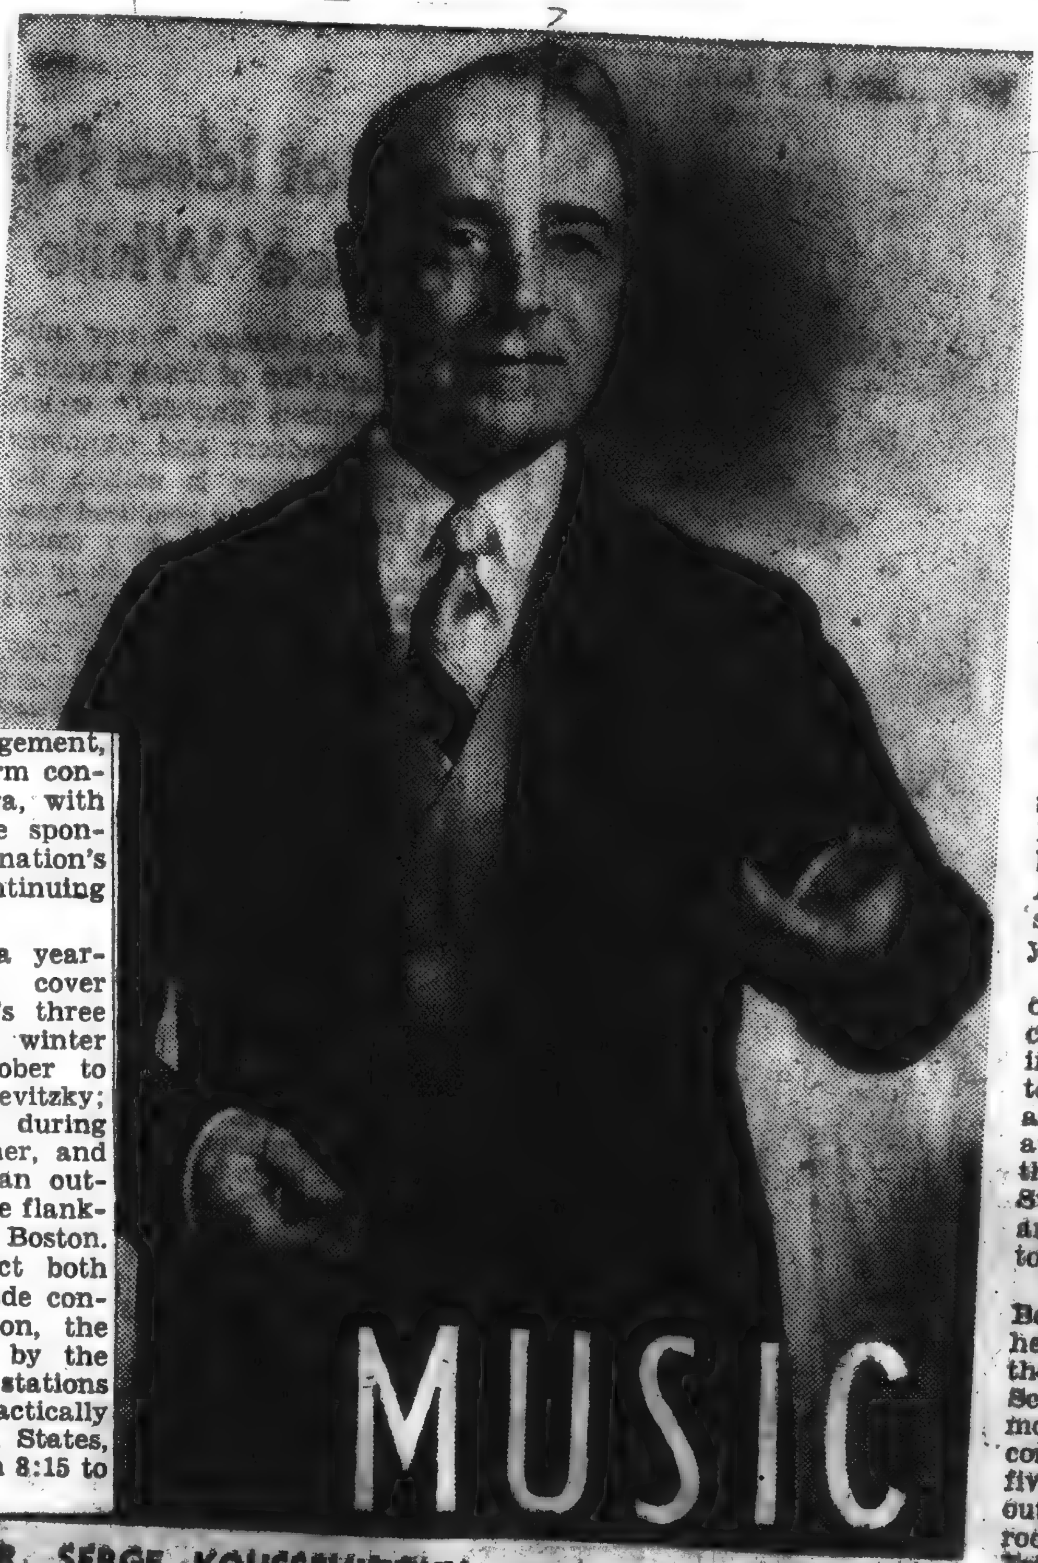
Certainly this is achievement itself. But what he has done for the orchestra is more, for he has made it the first orchestra of the land. How it plays needs no elaborating comment, because here in Brooklyn we fill the Academy of Music to capacity when it comes. Those who have been listening for a quarter of a century or more, as so many of this distinguished audience have, can tell their own story of the early beginnings of his career, his progress with the orchestra, and the culmination of the happy combination of conductor and players in the performances of the last decade.

Characteristically he has planned to introduce more new works during his twentieth season. No conductor has served the cause of the modern composer more faithfully, more enthusiastically or the more successfully. Always he has presented his music with such conviction that it would be hard to conceive of finer introductions for these new scores. In fact, there are times when one wonders whether in doing so much for the composer he may not have made it more difficult to appreciate the music when done by lesser orchestras not gifted with the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony or with the understanding of its master.

His complete identification with the Boston Symphony has led more than a few to believe that having conducted no other orchestra his success as a conductor might be an isolated instance. When he appeared as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony during its Centennial programs, he proved how far astray his detractors had wandered. If he has been considered a great conductor before this time, he certainly clinched his position the two weeks that he was in New York. The report that he had been offered the position of the musical directorship of the Philharmonic-Symphony led to betting in favor of his acceptance, but he decided to remain with the organization that he had made as famous as it had made him.

This decision seemed quite characteristic. Is it any wonder, then, that he is held with the greatest affection by the audiences that attend concerts of the Boston Symphony and that the orchestra plays for him as it would rarely play for any other man. Far from breeding contempt, familiarity with one another has created the ultimate in unanimity.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will give a series of five concerts next Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Occasion will mark the opening of the orchestra's 58th season in this borough.

Boston Symphony Will Have Kapell As Piano Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season this Friday evening, Nov. 19, at 8:30 in the Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

The program will open with the Commando March, a new work by the contemporary American, Samuel Barber. Mr. Barber, now a member of the armed forces, composed the March in February for military band. Its present orchestral version, prepared at the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky was given its first performance last month in Boston.

The program also includes the Symphony No. 1 in C minor of Brahms and the piano concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, living Armenian composer. The guest soloist will be William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist of New York City.

A pupil of Mme. Olga Samaroff-Stokowski, Mr. Kapell has received many honors and awards, including that of the youth contest of the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Town Hall endowment award. Mr. Kapell first played the Khatchatourian concerto last Summer at Lewisohn Stadium and gave it most recently in Boston on Oct. 29.

The Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn committee. The current series of five concerts is completely sold out on subscription and standing room only will be available this Friday evening, Nov. 19.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1943

SERGE KOUSSIVITZKY BEGINS 20TH SEASON

Famous Conductor Is Now a Regular Fixture On Symphonic Network Programs

Nineteen years ago this fall Serge Koussevitzky came to America for the first time to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At that time, he knew little of our ways and our music and could scarcely speak our language. Now as he begins his 20th year in America, Koussevitzky is an American citizen who has identified himself with this country and made Boston's orchestra his own, raising it to a new hight of virtuosity and significance in the country's musical life.

Koussevitzky has traversed a vast repertory in 20 years, and part of that repertory has been the inclusion of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom he has introduced to the concert public and developed by repeated performances. These include Aaron Capland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris and William Schuman and others.

Music of these composers will figure upon the program of the anniversary season, together with classical and contemporary works which have taken an important part in the seasons past.

The weekly broadcast concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which for the past year have been the outstanding musical presentation of the Blue network, now will come under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing company, it was announced Thursday.

The starting dates of the concerts under the sponsorship of the company will be announced shortly. Meanwhile they will continue as an outstanding feature of the network.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the Symphony's three series of concerts—the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under the baton of Dr Koussevitzky; the celebrated Boston "Pops" concerts which are given during the spring and early summer, and the Esplanade concerts which are performed in an outdoor setting. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "Pops" and the Esplanade concerts. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full Blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the country every Saturday evening from 8.15 to 9.15.

Schuman's Symphony Heard Last Friday

Nov. 14. 43

By BETSY WARREN

Again twentieth century music, Shostakovitch's fifth and first symphonies topped off by a first performance of William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, comprised the whole of the programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon.

To pass judgment on Schuman's String Symphony after one hearing may not be wise, but right now it sounds nebulous, lacks direction, and impresses one as background music to an invisible soloist. It is filled with diffuse organ-like sonorities and contains a minimum of clear lines. There are some interesting reminiscences of Tchaikowsky in the pizzicato passages belonging to the third movement.

The first symphony of Shostakovitch presents a more whimsical side of his music than acquaintances with his later symphonies would have expected. Its light scoring with preponderant woodwinds are one of its many delights, especially as heard in the introduction to the first movement. Its catchy themes, as well as its dramatically short and violent crescendos in the fourth movement make the work sparkle with youth. Yet perhaps even more youthful are the Wagnerian harmonies and theme at the beginning of the third movement.

Shostakovitch's fifth symphony ever gains respect at repeated performances. Dr. Koussevitzky's devotion and belief in his music has marked the famous conductor once more as a prophet who has advanced his cause with the confidence of a virtuoso upon a priceless instrument, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next regular pair of concerts, November 26 and 27, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. It will contain: Bach-Schoenberg, Prelude nad Fugue in E-flat; Beethoven, Symphony No. 2; Gardner Read, Symphony No. 2 (first performance, conducted by the composer); Gershwin-Bennett, "Porgy and Bess."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1943

More on Symphony

New York trade reports say tha the big Milwaukee manufacturing firm sponsoring the Boston symphony on the Blue network will pay about $600,000 for the privilege. The company is mum on the point, but the figure seems reasonable.

The sponsored series is to start sometime in December and presumably will run for at least a year, including the famed Boston "Pops" concerts in the spring and the outdoor "Esplanade" concerts in the summer. The latest word is that the time may be from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m. instead of the present 7:15 to 8:15.

A considerable number of sober minded adults should be available as a listening audience, since the 7:30 slot on NBC is occupied by Ralph Edwards' "Truth or Consequences" (strongly juvenile in appeal) and on CBS by "Inner Sanctum" mysteries (appealing to children from 6 to 106). At 8 o'clock these two chains have the "Barn Dance" and "Hit Parade," "popular" type programs offering little—or let's say nothing—to those who like really fine music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1943

Group who received degrees were: front row, Alfred N. Richards, Doctor of Science; Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox, Doctor of Laws; James P. Baxter 3rd, President of Williams college; Charles Seymour, President of Yale, Doctor of Laws; Serge Koussevitzky, Doctor of Music. Back row: Elmo Roper, Master of Arts; William Edgar Parks, Doctor of Divinity; Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, Doctor of Science; Roger William Riis, Master of Arts.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 16 1943

A Triumph In Art

It is pleasant, in these times of war, to acknowledge a triumph in one of the arts. The triumph is that of 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein, who, at a few hours' notice, and without rehearsal, conducted the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in a full program of difficult symphonic music. Such an achievement is one that usually comes only to masters of great experience.

Perhaps the average listener believes that a well trained orchestra could have played this music proficiently whoever conducted it, and that the sudden illness of Bruno Walter would have been only a minor crisis, except for the condition of unfortunate gentleman himself. There is an element of truth in this. Undoubtedly the orchestra, given a downbeat at certain intervals, could have played the music.

But that would not have been a symphony orchestra performance, for such a performance is the playing of the orchestra to the woven design of emotion and color and plasticity as it is created in the artistry of the conductor. The players play their instruments. The orchestra is the instrument of the conductor, and as he brings his choirs and sections in with sensitive control of volume and tempo, adjusting them to each other as his concept of the composer's meaning is illuminated by his own response to it, he weaves a pattern that must be at once faithful to both and faithful to a complete and unified work.

Only vision, held constantly in the conductor's mind through mastery of the complete work, can accomplish this. Only the most gifted and sensitive musicians attain it to a degree of symphonic mastery.

One of the gratifying parts of the story, from the point of view of this neighborhood, is that the young conductor is a native of Lawrence, and that he is a pupil and protege of Sergei Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NO

Repertory Enriched by Kouss

The enrichment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra repertory during the 20 years that Koussevitsky has been its conductor is the subject of an article by Alfred H. Meyer in the orchestra's program. Excerpts from the article follow:

"It was a concert prophetic of things to come which we heard on October 10 or 11, 1924. It brought to the programs for th first time in a symphonic wor one of the great contemporarie of Bach: Vivadil. . . . Also a novelty fresh from the pen of a contemporary composer, in the startling "Pacific 231" of Honegger.

"Out of 110 compositions performed that year, 37, or almost exactly one-third, were new to these concerts! Only eight new composers were introduced, one the American Copland, another the long neglected 17th century Corelli. These 37 works included, in addition to four new American works (by Copeland, Eichheim, Hadley, Hill), only 22 that could be by any chance called "modernistic." The rest were new discoveries among the ancients or among the beloved Classicists and Romanticists: C. P. E. Bach, two; Borodin, one; Corelli, one; Glazounov, one; Moussorgsky, two; Vivaldi, one; Weber, one.

Repertory Enriched

"The repertoire has been greatly enriched (1) by the introduction of a host of new composers and their works, many of them American, many from the only partially explored 17th and early 18th centuries, (2) by the introduction of new works by composers from all periods already represented in the repertoire, (3) by re-introducing important works that had been neglected for many years, (4) by the revivified choral performances and the introduction of concert versions of operatic acts and scenes, (5) by the festivals devoted to individual composers.

"The composers of high rank whose works have come for the first time to Symphony Hall during these 19 years number 38, among them the ancients, Corelli, Gabrieli, Locatelli, Monteverdi, Purcell, D. Scarlatti, and the Americans Barber, Berezowski, Copland, Gershwin, Gruenberg, Hanson, Harris, Piston, Schuman, Sessions.

New Works Found

"Perhaps even more amazing is the number of works new to the repertoire Dr. Koussevitsky has found among composers already well established at these concerts. The outstanding example is that of J. S. Bach, 12 of whose works the conductor brought to Symphony Hall for the first time. Is it perhaps fair to say that the orchestral Bach renaissance in Boston dates from this period?

"Finally one comes to the list of those works which had remained forgotten for many years. Ph. Em. Bach had remained unplayed from '13 to '24. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, now a popular phonograph classic, had not been heard here for 19 years until the conductor restored it in 1934; and the same composer's Eighth had to wait 20 years for its revival. The list can be extended through significant works of Dvorak, Elgar, Glazounov, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and, even Sibelius. It includes the Americans Chadwick, Foot, Griffes and Loeffler."

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

COMING TO BORO—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be ~~at the Acad~~emy of Music on Nov. 19 when the Boston Symphony's season begins.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1943

SERGE KOUSSIVITZKY BEGINS 20TH SEASON

Famous Conductor Is Now a Regular Fixture On Symphonic Network Programs

Nineteen years ago this fall Serge Koussevitzky came to America for the first time to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At that time, he knew little of our ways and our music and could scarcely speak our language. Now as he begins his 20th year in America, Koussevitzky is an American citizen who has identified himself with this country and made Boston's orchestra his own, raising it to a new hight of virtuosity and significance in the country's musical life.

Koussevitzky has traversed a vast repertory in 20 years, and part of that repertory has been the inclusion of more than 50 American composers, the foremost of whom he has introduced to the concert public and developed by repeated performances. These include Aaron Capland, Walter Piston, Roy Harris and William Schuman and others.

Music of these composers will figure upon the program of the anniversary season, together with classical and contemporary works which have taken an important part in the seasons past.

The weekly broadcast concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which for the past year have been the outstanding musical presentation of the Blue network, now will come under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing company, it was announced Thursday.

The starting dates of the concerts under the sponsorship of the company will be announced shortly. Meanwhile they will continue as an outstanding feature of the network.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the Symphony's three series of concerts—the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under the baton of Dr Koussevitzky; the celebrated Boston "Pops" concerts which are given during the spring and early summer, and the Esplanade concerts which are performed in an outdoor setting. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "Pops" and the Esplanade concerts. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full Blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the country every Saturday evening from 8.15 to 9.15.

Schuman's Symphony Heard Last Friday

By BETSY WARREN

Again twentieth century music, Shostakovitch's fifth and first symphonies topped off by a first performance of William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, comprised the whole of the programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon.

To pass judgment on Schuman's String Symphony after one hearing may not be wise, but right now it sounds nebulous, lacks direction, and impresses one as background music to an invisible soloist. It is filled with diffuse organ-like sonorities and contains a minimum of clear lines. There are some interesting reminiscences of Tchaikowsky in the pizzicato passages belonging to the third movement.

The first symphony of Shostakovitch presents a more whimsical side of his music than acquaintances with his later symphonies would have expected. Its light scoring with preponderant woodwinds are one of its many delights, especially as heard in the introduction to the first movement. Its catchy themes, as well as its dramatically short and violent crescendos in the fourth movement make the work sparkle with youth. Yet perhaps even more youthful are the Wagnerian harmonies and theme at the beginning of the third movement.

Shostakovitch's fifth symphony ever gains respect at repeated performances. Dr. Koussevitzky's devotion and belief in his music has marked the famous conductor once more as a prophet who has advanced his cause with the confidence of a virtuoso upon a priceless instrument, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next regular pair of concerts, November 26 and 27, will be conducted by Richard Burgin. It will contain: Bach-Schoenberg, Prelude nad Fugue in E-flat; Beethoven, Symphony No. 2; Gardner Read, Symphony No. 2 (first performance, conducted by the composer); Gershwin-Bennett, "Porgy and Bess."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

NOV 14 1943

Group who received degrees were: front row, Alfred N. Richards, Doctor of Science; Secretary of the Navy, Frank Knox, Doctor of Laws; James P. Baxter 3rd, President of Williams college; Charles Seymour, President of Yale, Doctor of Laws; Serge Koussevitzky, Doctor of Music. Back row: Elmo Roper, Master of Arts; William Edgar Parks, Doctor of Divinity; Jerome Clarke Hunsaker, Doctor of Science; Roger William Riis, Master of Arts.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 15 1943

More on Symphony

New York trade reports say tha the big Milwaukee manufacturing firm sponsoring the Boston symphony on the Blue network will pay about $600,000 for the privilege. The company is mum on the point, but the figure seems reasonable.

The sponsored series is to start sometime in December and presumably will run for at least a year, including the famed Boston "Pops" concerts in the spring and the outdoor "Esplanade" concerts in the summer. The latest word is that the time may be from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m. instead of the present 7:15 to 8:15.

A considerable number of sober minded adults should be available as a listening audience, since the 7:30 slot on NBC is occupied by Ralph Edwards' "Truth or Consequences" (strongly juvenile in appeal) and on CBS by "Inner Sanctum" mysteries (appealing to children from 6 to 106). At 8 o'clock these two chains have the "Barn Dance" and "Hit Parade," "popular" type programs offering little—or let's say nothing—to those who like really fine music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

NOV 16 1943

A Triumph In Art

It is pleasant, in these times of war, to acknowledge a triumph in one of the arts. The triumph is that of 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein, who, at a few hours' notice, and without rehearsal, conducted the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in a full program of difficult symphonic music. Such an achievement is one that usually comes only to masters of great experience.

Perhaps the average listener believes that a well trained orchestra could have played this music proficiently whoever conducted it, and that the sudden illness of Bruno Walter would have been only a minor crisis, except for the condition of unfortunate gentleman himself. There is an element of truth in this. Undoubtedly the orchestra, given a downbeat at certain intervals, could have played the music.

But that would not have been a symphony orchestra performance, for such a performance is the playing of the orchestra to the woven design of emotion and color and plasticity as it is created in the artistry of the conductor. The players play their instruments. The orchestra is the instrument of the conductor, and as he brings his choirs and sections in with sensitive control of volume and tempo, adjusting them to each other as his concept of the composer's meaning is illuminated by his own response to it, he weaves a pattern that must be at once faithful to both and faithful to a complete and unified work.

Only vision, held constantly in the conductor's mind through mastery of the complete work, can accomplish this. Only the most gifted and sensitive musicians attain it to a degree of symphonic mastery.

One of the gratifying parts of the story, from the point of view of this neighborhood, is that the young conductor is a native of Lawrence, and that he is a pupil and protege of Sergei Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

N

Repertory Enriched by Kouss

The enrichment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra repertory during the 20 years that Koussevitsky has been its conductor is the subject of an article by Alfred H. Meyer in the orchestra's program. Excerpts from the article follow:

"It was a concert prophetic of things to come which we heard on October 10 or 11, 1924. It brought to the programs for th first time in a symphonic wor one of the great contemporarie of Bach: Vivadil. . . . Also a novelty fresh from the pen of a contemporary composer, in the startling "Pacific 231" of Honegger.

"Out of 110 compositions performed that year, 37, or almost exactly one-third, were new to these concerts! Only eight new composers were introduced, one the American Copland, another the long neglected 17th century Corelli. These 37 works included, in addition to four new American works (by Copeland, Eichheim, Hadley, Hill), only 22 that could be by any chance called "modernistic." The rest were new discoveries among the ancients or among the beloved Classicists and Romanticists: C. P. E. Bach, two; Borodin, one; Corelli, one; Glazounov, one; Moussorgsky, two; Vivaldi, one; Weber, one.

Repertory Enriched

"The repertoire has been greatly enriched (1) by the introduction of a host of new composers and their works, many of them American, many from the only partially explored 17th and early 18th centuries, (2) by the introduction of new works by composers from all periods already represented in the repertoire, (3) by re-introducing important works that had been neglected for many years, (4) by the revivified choral performances and the introduction of concert versions of operatic acts and scenes, (5) by the festivals devoted to individual composers.

The composers of high rank whose works have come for the first time to Symphony Hall during these 19 years number 38, among them the ancients, Corelli, Gabrieli, Locatelli, Monteverdi, Purcell, D. Scarlatti, and the Americans Barber, Berezowski, Copland, Gershwin, Gruenberg, Hanson, Harris, Piston, Schuman, Sessions.

New Works Found

"Perhaps even more amazing is the number of works new to the repertoire Dr. Koussevitsky has found among composers already well established at these concerts. The outstanding example is that of J. S. Bach, 12 of whose works the conductor brought to Symphony Hall for the first time. Is it perhaps fair to say that the orchestral Bach renaissance in Boston dates from this period?

"Finally one comes to the list of those works which had remained forgotten for many years. Ph. Em. Bach had remained unplayed from '13 to '24. Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, now a popular phonograph classic, had not been heard here for 19 years until the conductor restored it in 1934: and the same composer's Eighth had to wait 20 years for its revival. The list can be extended through significant works of Dvorak, Elgar, Glazounov, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann and, even Sibelius. It includes the Americans Chadwick, Foot, Griffes and Loeffler."

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

COMING TO BORO—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be ~~at the Acad~~emy of Music on Nov. 19 when the Boston Symphony's season begins.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 17 1943

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Ill For Bushnell Concert

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Although the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from last night's Bushnell concert due to illness could not but be regretted, Richard Burgin, associate conductor, who took over the baton, is no stranger to Hartford audiences. Twice before he has conducted in similar circumstances and he was once guest leader at a concert by the Hartford Symphony Orchestra.

His baton technique consists of a driving, business-like beat, and that's about all there is to it. There is nothing here for the eye at all and considerably more of the listener's attention accrues to the music. This is all to the good.

Burgin's Leadership

The orchestra delivers for Burgin. Through countless rehearsals they have made smooth the rough spots together and they speak the same language. There is no question of authority. His will, to the last detail of tempo, nuance, expression, was made to seem implicit in the music. He kept the orchestral stream clear and unsullied with good manipulation of color effects and considerable surface brilliance.

As an interpreter Mr. Burgin goes about his work with a fine objectivity, making him, in the estimation of this reviewer, a superior Tschaikowsky exponent. The famous Fifth was purged of its oppressive pessimism, its emotional glut, its intemperance. Or are these things the product of the virtuoso conductor rather than of Tschaikowsky? Burgin was all for direct, contained statements and the symphony was a greater piece of art for the simple telling. Beautifully executed for buoyancy and delicacy was the Valse movement; the andante was never lovelier.

New Stravinsky Music

Stravinsky's Ode was assuredly no hit. The applause which followed it was barely perfunctory. Perhaps not a great piece of music it was certainly neither abstruse nor unfriendly. Its melodies were well defined its counterpoint lucid and only midyl dissonantal. One was reminded of a detail of Hellenic ruin seen through the mist. I imagine Ravel's Pavane must have sounded something like this on first hearing.

One of the most unforgettable pages of the concert was the chant of the brass choir in the Catacombs section of Moussorgsky's "Pictures." The masterly shaping of these golden sonorities was a triumph both for players and leader. In fact, the players had an unusually fine evening of it even for these virtuosi. The first desks of French horn, oboe and trumpet had reason to feel satisfied with themselves.

The "Pictures at an Exhibition" made their mark as they always do. Graphic, boldly painted, with an attractive mixture of human interest and legendary material the suite, both for listeners and players proved rewarding.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

NOV 17 1943

Storybook Symphony

The unknown understudy goes on in place of the suddenly absent star and registers a smashing triumph. The plot is old. Playwrights shy at using it now, not alone because of its age. The situation is set down as storybook stuff without much basis in reality. The thing has occasionally happened, none the less—on the stage, in sports and otherwise. But rarely has any instance included all the dramatic features surrounding the performance the other day of Leonard Bernstein, 25-year-old American, as conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra.

Sunday morning Conductor Bruno Walter fell ill. Sunday afternoon in Carnegie hall the great orchestra must play its concert, scheduled also for radio broadcast over a national network. With these few hours' notice and no opportunity for rehearsal, young Mr. Bernstein must lead it through an exacting program. He had never conducted a public concert with a major symphony. He conducted this one, not only without sign of strain or nervousness, but to the enthusiastic applause of the several thousand persons attending, the congratulations of the orchestra members and the high praise of so authoritative a critic as the New York Times' Olin Downes. Coincidentally the call came on a broadcast day; and while Bernstein's parents and brother, who live in Massachusetts, were visiting him, thus to share first-hand the happy occasion.

The young man was hardly an unknown, of course, except perhaps to the public. He would not have been appointed assistant conductor at the start of the current season except he had previously proved himself. A Harvard graduate four years ago, he majored in music, worked thereafter under Fritz Reiner and Sergei Koussevitzky in conducting. His First Symphony will have its premiere under ~~Koussevitzky in~~ Boston this season; his operatic and other compositions have already been heard there.

Nevertheless, it was finally the fates which gave him this chance to lead the New York orchestra and established him, in Olin Downes' words, as "one of the very few conductors of the rising generation indubitably to be reckoned with." A youthful New England native acquitting himself thus brilliantly in so high an artistic test speaks again America's cultural rise and augurs its growing contribution to great music.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 18 1943

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITSKY AND ORCHESTRA BRILLIANT HERE

The second concert in the Woolsey Hall 1943-44 series was played last evening before a sold out house. For hours before the doors were opened there was not a seat to be had for love nor money. And it was worth all the planning it takes a war busy community these days to arrange to be within hearing distance of this superb orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra conductor, who for many years has introduced his public to new works of significance or promise, led his incomparable band through a difficult program made up entirely of modern music.

The Prokofieff Classical Symphony which opened the concert is light and engaging in type and structure and is different from much of this composer's work in that it has a continuity of line to which we are well accustomed.

And it would seem that this cause for awareness could be taken for granted in the case of both the numbers that followed—for the audience figuratively rose en masse to the mighty performance of them projected by Mr. Koussevitsky and his men.

The soloist for the piano concerto by Khatchatourian was William Kapell, a brilliant pupil of Olga Samaroff-Stokowski whose interest in the development of young artists is well known. The composer has done something with folk music of the Near East that results in being sometimes violent, sometimes beautiful with many a meeting place for the two along the strange but majestic way his genius takes him. Mr. Kapell, 21 years old, and with appearances with four of the major symphonic groups already to his credit, played the "hammer-and-anvil" passages so characteristic of some modern writers, with tremendous power (not every one liked that hammer stroke!); he played rapid passages at speed that defied credence, and he played the rare legato pianissimo passages with rounded beauty and fine restraint. Decidedly it was the soloist's night as well as Mr. Koussevitsky's and the orchestra's.

Mr. Khatchatourian by the way is an Armenian by birth, with his musical education received mostly at Moscow.

Shaslokovitch's 5th Symphony took the second half of the program. It is a work so terrific in its impact both on the consciousness and the eardrums that its proportions can best be described as colossal—almost beyond the confines of even a large concert hall.

The composer's use of winds and brasses in combination is startlingly effective. The largo was of such beauty that a tension of breathlessness was felt in the listening auditorium, while the opening of the Finale with its racing tumbling floods of tonal grandeur completed an impression of a full evening.

It was Russia's night and a memorable one for New Haven.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 19 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS SERIES

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

There was no pother about anniversaries in Carnegie Hall last night, when the Boston Symphony began its fifty-eighth season in New York. The audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky warmly, as it does at his every return, but there was nothing to indicate that the conductor had entered his twentieth year with the orchestra. Yet many of those present remembered, no doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert here on ~~November 27~~, 1924.

Last night's inaugural program contained a novelty, only recently accorded its first performance anywhere in Boston. This was the "Ode" which Igor Stravinsky composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of the conductor's wife. Its three parts—"Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph"—were conceived as a memorial triptych.

This music by the Stravinsky of 1943 is much more cerebral than emotional. It is clearly written and moves directly and easily from bar to bar and page to page. The instrumentation is neat and sometimes even sweet. The lively middle part, which the composer has said represents a kind of "concert champetre," may have reminded some listeners of "Apollon musagetes." But there is reticence in its gaiety, as there is reticence in the praise and the mourning of the other sections. Indeed, reticence has been carried so far that this polished "Ode" appears to have little to say.

Of course, for those who want emotion frankly avowed there is always Tchaikovsky. His Fifth Symphony began this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was a highly particularized one, with such changes of pace as he has seldom invoked in this symphony before. This reviewer found the slow passages too slow, the fast ones too fast, and the whole effect theatrical and self-conscious. But the orchestra played as only the Boston Symphony does play, with a precision, a unity and a timbre all its own.

The evening closed with Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—shorn for some reason of the beguiling "Il Vecchio Castello." The performance was an exemplary one. With only five changes in the personnel, the Boston Symphony has come back to us the same magical band.

American Lumberman
CHICAGO, ILL.

NOV 27 1943

THE ALLIS-CHALMERS MANUFACTURING CO., Milwaukee, Wis., producers of industrial equipment, will sponsor weekly broadcast concerts of the Boston Symphony on the Blue Network, it has been announced by Walter Geist, Allis-Chalmers president. The broadcasts, to begin on a date to be announced shortly, will be heard on Saturday evenings from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., EWT.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 19 1943

Dissonant But Simple Music

The Boston Symphony, with its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, started its annual series at Carnegie Hall Thursday night bringing along the Ode which Igor Stravinsky composed last Summer for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in memory of Mrs. Koussevitzky. It is dissonant music throughout but a simple, modest and moving tribute to the lady's spirit, written in three short parts entitled Eulogy, Eclogue and Epitaph.

The dissonance comes from the use of more than one key at a time, but the ingredients themselves are straight, flowing melody with—in the first two parts—an accompaniment that is almost Verdian in the beat of the rhythm. The middle movement, livelier than the other two, is supposed to suggest the open-air concerts at Tanglewood; but even this section is restrained in tone and extremely economical in orchestration. All three fade out at the end into quietness. Appropriately, the audience did not feel like noisily applauding this devotional tribute from a deeply sincere and highly sophisticated composer.

The all-Russian program opened with a performance of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony that made a striking contrast to the more restrained and literal Tchaikowsky we have been treated to by Artur Rodzinski and Arturo Toscanini. Dr. Koussevitzky played up the passion for all there was in it, slowing down here, livening the tempo there, and building up smashing climaxes in short, quick takes. The splendidly clear outlines of the symphony suffer somewhat from such treatment, but most audiences, like Thursday's, take to it.

The Moussorgsky-Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition brought the concert [illegible]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

NOV 19 1943

Koussevitzky Leads First Boston Symphony Concert

By John Briggs

Before an eager audience Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played their first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last evening and demonstrated that the Boston brand of orchestral virtuosity is as dazzling as ever.

Mr. Koussevitzky apparently has experimented with his seating arrangement—at any rate, I don't recall the Bostonians' using in recent seasons the steeply-tiered platforms that brought the woodwinds to the level of Mr. Koussevitzky's head. Whether or not that was the cause, last evening the famed Boston sonorities were even more sensational than I remembered them. The Boston Symphony is not unique in owning a rich, sonorous quality of tone, but it is one of the few orchestras whose tone never loses clarity and transparency. Possibly this phenomenon is occasioned by nothing more earthshaking than ninety-odd musicians playing strictly in tune. At all events, Mr. Koussevitzky seems to have exclusive rights to the process.

The all-Russian program last evening was especially rewarding, for it is just the sort of thing that conductor and orchestra seem to do best. After hearing Mr. Koussevitzky do the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, one is more certain than ever that only [illegible] the first rank ought to be [illegible] with the scores of Tchaikovsky, for they are delicately-balanced mechanists and easily thrown out of kilter by the slightest overplaying or underplaying. This reviewer last evening, as on similar occasions in the past, listened to the Fifth Symphony as if to a revelation.

New Stravinsky Work

A new Stravinsky work, the "Ode for Orchestra," which was, I believe, a tribute to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky, had its first local hearing at the concert. The new piece, which combines appropriate solemnity and Stravinsky in his more astringent manner, made a deep impression and the audience was visibly affected.

The Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which might have been written expressly as a showpiece for the Bostonians, brought the concert to a brilliant conclusion.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE.

NOV 19 1943

New Stravinsky Work Is Played By Bostonians

Koussevitzky Gives 'Ode' Premiere; Its New York Program Is All Russian

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:

Symphony No. 5, E minor.....Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts..........Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Interest in Mr. Koussevitzky's all-Russian program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night centered in Stravinsky's "Ode," which was given its first New York performance. The composition is in three short movements, entitled, respectively, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph." For this writer it is the Russian composer's most felicitous recent product. The fear that Stravinsky no longer could turn out a piece of music not permeated solely by the processes of the intellect alone is dispelled here.

This "Ode" is an intimately poetic creation. The "Eulogy" is no rhetorical panegyric but a wistfully regretful memory of one who has been tenderly regarded but whose passing does not cause the tear ducts to overflow. The "Eclogue," as its title implies, is bucolic in mood. The "Epitaph," with its transparent, remote harmonies is touched by an other-world spirit. That this delicately conceived work should still linger in the listener's mind so unforgettably speaks well for its intrinsic value. For it was sandwiched in between the lavishly scored and teemingly romantic Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky and Ravel's cannily brilliant version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with its grandiose closing pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the new Stravinsky score, with its unpretentious apposite orchestration, was a flawless realization thereof from every aspect. Aside from exaggerated rubati in the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Symphony, which occasionally terminated in something not far from sentimentality, the conductor's conception of this thrice-familiar work was unusually eloquent, even the slow movement being paced flowingly, so that its melancholy melodies did not sob too abjectly. Both here and in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in their multicolored instrumental garb, the orchestra played with its customary

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

NOV 27 1943

THE annual visit of the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky to Carnegie Hall began Thursday night. Mr. Koussevitzky was welcomed like an old friend, which he is, this being his twentieth year with the orchestra, and the familiar glories of the Boston tone and finesse were as notable as ever. A new work for New York was Igor Stravinsky's "Ode," dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It was a restrained and affectionate score, which, apart from its personal content, was an artist's demonstration of subtle musical balance.

2637-

[24]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

943

Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Ill For Bushnell Concert

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Although the absence of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from last night's Bushnell concert due to illness could not but be regretted, Richard Burgin, associate conductor, who took over the baton, is no stranger to Hartford audiences. Twice before he has conducted in similar circumstances and he was once guest leader at a concert by the Hartford Symphony Orchestra.

His baton technique consists of a driving, business-like beat, and that's about all there is to it. There is nothing here for the eye at all and considerably more of the listener's attention accrues to the music. This is all to the good.

Burgin's Leadership

The orchestra delivers for Burgin. Through countless rehearsals they have made smooth the rough spots together and they speak the same language. There is no question of authority. His will to the last detail of tempo, nuance, expression, was made to seem implicit in the music. He kept the orchestral stream clear and unsullied with good manipulation of color effects and considerable surface brilliance.

As an interpreter Mr. Burgin goes about his work with a fine objectivity, making him, in the estimation of this reviewer, a superior Tschaikowsky exponent. The famous Fifth was purged of its oppressive pessimism, its emotional glut, its intemperance. Or are these things the product of the virtuoso conductor rather than of Tschaikowsky? Burgin was all for direct, contained statements and the symphony was a greater piece of art for the simple telling. Beautifully executed for buoyancy and delicacy was the Valse movement; the andante was never lovelier.

New Stravinsky Music

Stravinsky's Ode was assuredly no hit. The applause which followed it was barely perfunctory. Perhaps not a great piece of music it was certainly neither abstruse nor unfriendly. Its melodies were well defined its counterpoint lucid and only midyl dissonantal. One was reminded of a detail of Hellenic ruin seen through the mist. I imagine Ravel's Pavane must have sounded something like this on first hearing.

One of the most unforgettable pages of the concert was the chant of the brass choir in the Catacombs section of Moussorgsky's "Pictures." The masterly shaping of these golden sonorities was a triumph both for players and leader. In fact, the players had an unusually fine evening of it even for these virtuosi. The first desks of French horn, oboe and trumpet had reason to feel satisfied with themselves.

The "Pictures at an Exhibition" made their mark as they always do. Graphic, boldly painted, with an attractive mixture of human interest and legendary material the suite, both for listeners and players proved rewarding.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

NOV 17 1943

Storybook Symphony

The unknown understudy goes on in place of the suddenly absent star and registers a smashing triumph. The plot is old. Playwrights shy at using it now, not alone because of its age. The situation is set down as storybook stuff without much basis in reality. The thing has occasionally happened, none the less—on the stage, in sports and otherwise. But rarely has any instance included all the dramatic features surrounding the performance the other day of Leonard Bernstein, 25-year-old American, as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra.

Sunday morning Conductor Bruno Walter fell ill Sunday afternoon in Carnegie hall the great orchestra must play its concert, scheduled also for radio broadcast over a national network. With these few hours' notice and no opportunity for rehearsal, young Mr. Bernstein must lead it through an exacting program. He had never conducted a public concert with a major symphony. He conducted this one, not only without sign of strain or nervousness, but to the enthusiastic applause of the several thousand persons attending, the congratulations of the orchestra members and the high praise of so authoritative a critic as the New York Times' Olin Downes. Coincidentally the call came on a broadcast day; and while Bernstein's parents and brother, who live in Massachusetts, were visiting him, thus to share first-hand the happy occasion.

The young man was hardly an unknown, of course, except perhaps to the public. He would not have been appointed assistant conductor at the start of the current season except he had previously proved himself. A Harvard graduate four years ago, he majored in music, worked thereafter under Fritz Reiner and Sergei Koussevitzky in conducting. His First Symphony will have its premiere under ~~Koussevitzky in~~ Boston this season; his operatic and other compositions have already been heard there.

Nevertheless, it was finally the fates which gave him this chance to lead the New York orchestra and established him, in Olin Downes' words, as "one of the very few conductors of the rising generation indubitably to be reckoned with." A youthful New England native acquitting himself thus brilliantly in so high an artistic test speaks again America's cultural rise and augurs its growing contribution to great music.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 18 1943

MUSIC

KOUSSEVITSKY AND ORCHESTRA BRILLIANT HERE

The second concert in the Woolsey Hall 1943-44 series was played last evening before a sold out house. For hours before the doors were opened there was not a seat to be had for love nor money. And it was worth all the planning it takes a war busy community these days to arrange to be within hearing distance of this superb orchestra. Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra conductor, who for many years has introduced his public to new works of significance or promise, led his incomparable band through a difficult program made up entirely of modern music.

The Prokofieff Classical Symphony which opened the concert is light and engaging in type and structure and is different from much of this composer's work in that it has a continuity of line to which we are well accustomed.

And it would seem that this cause for awareness could be taken for granted in the case of both the numbers that followed—for the audience figuratively rose en masse to the mighty performance of them projected by Mr. Koussevitsky and his men.

The soloist for the piano concerto by Khatchatourian was William Kapell, a brilliant pupil of Olga Samaroff-Stokowski whose interest in the development of young artists is well known. The composer has done something with folk music of the Near East that results in being sometimes violent, sometimes beautiful with many a meeting place for the two along the strange but majestic way his genius takes him. Mr. Kapell, 21 years old, and with appearances with four of the major symphonic groups already to his credit, played the "hammer-and-anvil" passages so characteristic of some modern writers, with tremendous power (not every one liked that hammer stroke!); he played rapid passages at speed that defied credence, and he played the rare legato pianissimo passages with rounded beauty and fine restraint. Decidedly it was the soloist's night as well as Mr. Koussevitsky's and the orchestra's.

Mr. Khatchatourian by the way is an Armenian by birth, with his musical education received mostly at Moscow.

~~Shaslakovitch's~~ 5th Symphony took the second half of the program. It is a work so terrific in its impact both on the consciousness and the eardrums that its proportions can best be described as colossal—almost beyond the confines of even a large concert hall.

The composer's use of winds and brasses in combination is startlingly effective. The largo was of such beauty that a tension of breathlessness was felt in the listening auditorium, while the opening of the Finale with its racing tumbling floods of tonal grandeur completed an impression of a full evening.

It was Russia's night and a memorable one for New Haven.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 19 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS ITS SERIES

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

There was no pother about anniversaries in Carnegie Hall last night, when the Boston Symphony began its fifty-eighth season in New York. The audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky warmly, as it does at his every return, but there was nothing to indicate that the conductor had entered his twentieth year with the orchestra. Yet many of those present remembered, no doubt, Dr. Koussevitzky's first concert here on ~~November 27~~, 1924.

Last night's inaugural program contained a novelty, only recently accorded its first performance anywhere in Boston. This was the "Ode" which Igor Stravinsky composed for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of the conductor's wife. Its three parts—"Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph"—were conceived as a memorial triptych.

This music by the Stravinsky of 1943 is much more cerebral than emotional. It is clearly written and moves directly and easily from bar to bar and page to page. The instrumentation is neat and sometimes even sweet. The lively middle part, which the composer has said represents a kind of "concert champetre," may have reminded some listeners of "Apollon musagetes." But there is reticence in its gaiety, as there is reticence in the praise and the mourning of the other sections. Indeed, reticence has been carried so far that this polished "Ode" appears to have little to say.

Of course, for those who want emotion frankly avowed there is always Tchaikovsky. His Fifth Symphony began this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was a highly particularized one, with such changes of pace as he has seldom invoked in this symphony before. This reviewer found the slow passages too slow, the fast ones too fast, and the whole effect theatrical and self-conscious. But the orchestra played as only the Boston Symphony does play, with a precision, a unity and a timbre all its own.

The evening closed with Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition"—shorn for some reason of the beguiling "Il Vecchio Castello." The performance was an exemplary one. With only five changes in the personnel, the Boston Symphony has come back to us the same magical band.

American Lumberman
CHICAGO, ILL.

NOV 27 1943

THE ALLIS-CHALMERS MANUFACTURING CO., Milwaukee, Wis., producers of industrial equipment, will sponsor weekly broadcast concerts of the Boston Symphony on the Blue Network, it has been announced by Walter Geist, Allis-Chalmers president. The broadcasts, to begin on a date to be announced shortly, will be heard on Saturday evenings from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., EWT.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

New Stravinsky Work Is Played By Bostonians

Koussevitzky Gives 'Ode' Premiere; Its New York Program Is All Russian

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:

Symphony No. 5, E minor.....Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts.............Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Interest in Mr. Koussevitzky's all-Russian program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night centered in Stravinsky's "Ode," which was given its first New York performance. The composition is in three short movements, entitled, respectively, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph." For this writer it is the Russian composer's most felicitous recent product. The fear that Stravinsky no longer could turn out a piece of music not permeated solely by the processes of the intellect alone is dispelled here.

This "Ode" is an intimately poetic creation. The "Eulogy" is no rhetorical panegyric but a wistfully regretful memory of one who has been tenderly regarded but whose passing does not cause the tear ducts to overflow. The "Eclogue," as its title implies, is bucolic in mood. The "Epitaph," with its transparent, remote harmonies is touched by an otherworld spirit. That this delicately conceived work should still linger in the listener's mind so unforgettably speaks well for its intrinsic value. For it was sandwiched in between the lavishly scored and teemingly romantic Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky and Ravel's cannily brilliant version of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with its grandiose closing pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the new Stravinsky score, with its unpretentious apposite orchestration, was a flawless realization thereof from every aspect. Aside from exaggerated rubati in the first movement of the Tchaikovsky Symphony, which occasionally terminated in something not far from sentimentality, the conductor's conception of this thrice-familiar work was unusually eloquent, even the slow movement being paced flowingly, so that its melancholy melodies did not sob too abjectly. Both here and in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in their multicolored instrumental garb, the orchestra played with its customary tonal allure.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

THE annual visit of the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky to Carnegie Hall began Thursday night. Mr. Koussevitzky was welcomed like an old friend, which he is, this being his twentieth year with the orchestra, and the familiar glories of the Boston tone and finesse were as notable as ever. A new work for New York was Igor Stravinsky's "Ode," dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It was a restrained and affectionate score, which, apart from its personal content, was an artist's demonstration of subtle musical balance.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

NOV 19 1943

Dissonant But Simple Music

The Boston Symphony, with its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, started its annual series ~~at~~ Carnegie Hall Thursday night bringing along the Ode which Igor Stravinsky composed last Summer for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation in memory of Mrs. Koussevitzky. It is dissonant music throughout but a simple, modest and moving tribute to the lady's spirit, written in three short parts entitled Eulogy, Eclogue and Epitaph.

The dissonance comes from the use of more than one key at a time, but the ingredients themselves are straight, flowing melody with—in the first two parts—an accompaniment that is almost Verdian in the beat of the rhythm. The middle movement, livelier than the other two, is supposed to suggest the open-air concerts at Tanglewood; but even this section is restrained in tone and extremely economical in orchestration. All three fade out at the end into quietness. Appropriately, the audience did not feel like noisily applauding this devotional tribute from a deeply sincere and highly sophisticated composer.

The all-Russian program opened with a performance of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony that made a striking contrast to the more restrained and literal Tchaikowsky we have been treated to by Artur Rodzinski and Arturo Toscanini. Dr. Koussevitzky played up the passion for all there was in it, slowing down here, livening the tempo there, and building up smashing climaxes in short, quick takes. The splendidly clear outlines of the symphony suffer somewhat from such treatment, but most audiences, like Thursday's, take to it.

The Moussorgsky-Ravel Pictures at an Exhibition brought the concert to a colorful close.

—HENRY SIMON

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

9 43

Koussevitzky Leads First Boston Symphony Concert

By John Briggs

Before an eager audience Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played their first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last evening and demonstrated that the Boston brand of orchestral virtuosity is as dazzling as ever.

Mr. Koussevitzky apparently has experimented with his seating arrangement—at any rate, I don't recall the Bostonians' using in recent seasons the steeply-tiered platforms that brought the woodwinds to the level of Mr. Koussevitzky's head. Whether or not that was the cause, last evening the famed Boston sonorities were even more sensational than I remembered them. The Boston Symphony is not unique in owning a rich, sonorous quality of tone, but it is one of the few orchestras whose tone never loses clarity and transparency. Possibly this phenomenon is occasioned by nothing more earth-shaking than ninety-odd musicians playing strictly in tune. At all events, Mr. Koussevitzky seems to have exclusive rights to the process.

The all-Russian program last evening was especially rewarding, for it is just the sort of thing that conductor and orchestra seem to do best. After hearing Mr. Koussevitzky do the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony, one is more certain than ever that only artists of the first rank ought to be entrusted with the scores of Tchaikovsky, for they are delicately-balanced mechanists and easily thrown out of kilter by the slightest overplaying or underplaying. This reviewer last evening, as on similar occasions in the past, listened to the Fifth Symphony as if to a revelation.

New Stravinsky Work

A new Stravinsky work, the "Ode for Orchestra," which was, I believe, a tribute to the memory of Mme. Koussevitzky, had its first local hearing at the concert. The new piece, which combines appropriate solemnity and Stravinsky in his more astringent manner, made a deep impression and the audience was visibly affected.

The Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition," which might have been written expressly as a showpiece for the Bostonians, brought the concert to a brilliant conclusion.

WORLD TELEGRAM
NY

NOV 19 1943

Boston Symphony All Koussevitzky

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is really a great organization, probably the greatest in the world today. It sounds great even when its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, chooses to give a very personalized reading of a symphony, as he did the Tschaikowsky Fifth in Carnegie Hall last evening. But the band made wonderful sounds. It even made interesting noises—when the score called for fortissimos.

Mr. Koussevitzky has complete control of his men, a control that is so perfect it is almost a psychic arrangement. What he wants them to do they generally do, to the hilt. All of which comes about through (a) mutual respect, and (b) a long comradeship in the service of music.

One can bank on it, therefore, that how the orchestra plays is pretty much how Mr. Koussevitzky wants it to play. So the reading of the Tschaikowsky was a Koussevitzky reading or, perhaps, the next thing to it.

Personalized Interpretation.

The conductor, as evidenced by the performance, looks upon this symphony very fondly. He loves it, and loving it he lingers over its luscious phrases, dragging them out, letting them linger around as long as possible. All that went on in the first three movements gave, I should think, ample testimony of that.

Luckily for those who don't want their Tschaikowsky all done up in areolar tissue, the last movement came through quite naturally devoid of artificial trimmings and, to be blunt about it, musically. That movement had a lot to say, as compared to its predecessors, and it was said in a most comprehensive manner.

The second number, a local premiere, was Stravinsky's Ode in Three Parts, for Orchesera. It was completed recently on commission by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and it is dedicated to the memory of the conductor's wife Natalie.

Stravinsky of Old.

In a way this music is prewar (meaning World War I) Stravinsky, which some of us—deluded, maybe—think is very good Stravinsky. The memorial spirit is in it. There is much sensitiveness and, at the same time, point to the writing. And again one noted a magnificent orchestral technique that has scarcely its counterpart among contemporary composers. The work was excellently performed.

To close the program Mr. Koussevitzky had selected the Moussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition, as orchestrated by Ravel. This number, it almost goes without saying, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's special oysters. The combination of Moussorgsky and Ravel, you see.

Anyway, the hall was jammed with enthusiasts for this first local appearance of the Bostonians. And what an orchestra!

---

titles were "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph," a memorial tryptich of no special musical value or appeal. The orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition" concluded the program. An audience that tested the capacity of the hall attended the event.

• • •

Paula Crystal, soprano, assisted by pianist H. Maurice-Jacquet, gave a recital last night at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. She presented works by Torelli, Scarlatti, Handel, Chausson, Chabrier, Faure, Georges, Delibes, Bruch, Verdi, Grieg, Quilter, Charles and Bishop.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 19 1943

Hub Orchestra In All-Russian Presentation

By GRENA BENNETT

A deep sentiment was attached to the season's first concert of the Boston Symphony which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. In observing the 50th anniversary of the death of Peter Ilyitch Tschaikovsky, Conductor Serge Koussevitsky began the all-Russian program with that composer's Fifth Symphony. All students of music are aware of the devastating disappointments and dismal frustrations that punctuated the life of Tschaikovsky, experiences that definitely colored his compositions, but in the reading last night much of the sombre matter of the first two movements was played so slowly as to merit the charge of sentimentality instead of sentiment and to transform pathos into bathos. Consequently, the interpretation by one of the finest orchestras in the world suffered by these distortions in tempo and rhythm and so came near to defeating much of the intent of the renowned composer. On the other hand the brilliant finale, as if to counteract the early shortcomings in performance, was speeded up and the obvious beauties of that part of the score received a too hasty "change from clouds to sunshine, from defeat to triumph" in the words of a famous commentator.

The second number was Stravinsky's "Ode" in three sections, composed at the instance of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, as an appreciation of the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the orchestra's conductor. The sub-

---

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Observes Tchaikovsky Anniversary in Opening Concert

Two Koussevitzky war horses were the chief substance of the eminent conductor's program opening his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. The excuse for the Tchaikovsky Fifth Symphony was the anniversary of the Russian composer's death 50 years ago on Nov. 6. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration helped round out the All-Russian program, but its presence on the program served to emphasize how limited is the range of Koussevitzky's programs in the light of only 10 Carnegie Hall concerts a year. This work needs to be shelved for some years to come.

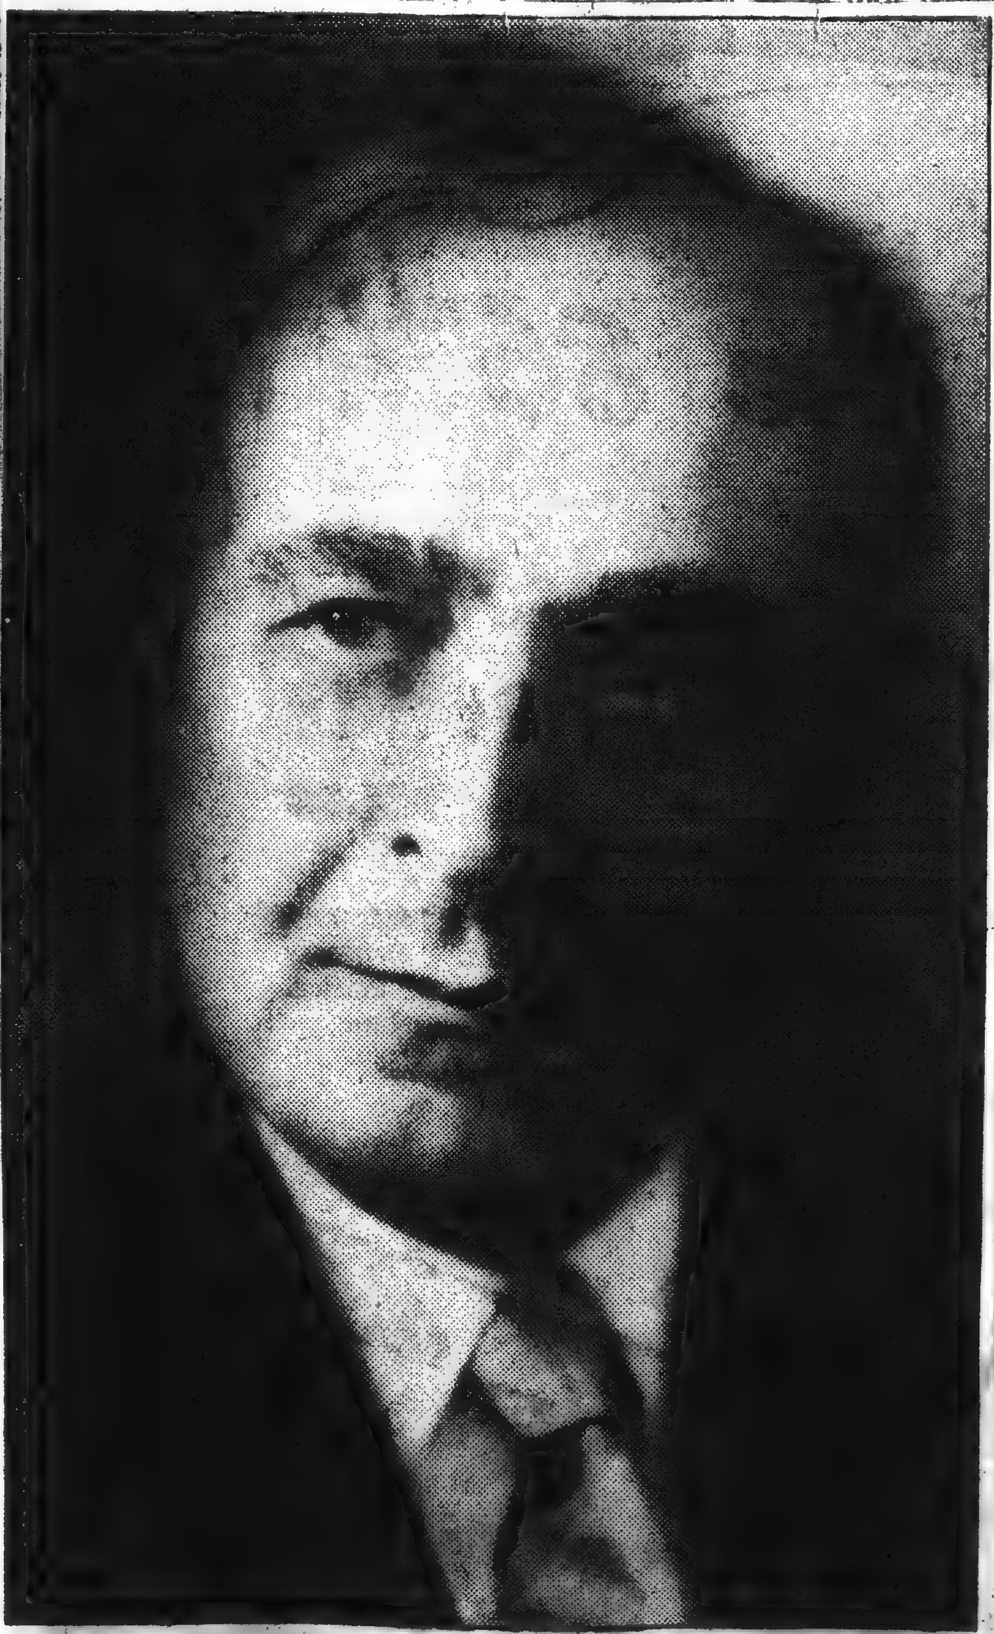
Standing as something of an idyll between these massive-sounding works was Stravinsky's Ode in Three Parts, granted its first New York hearing on this occasion. The brief work is actually a chant "in appreciation of Natalie Koussevitzky's spiritual contribution "to the art of her husband. As a memorial triptych, it consists of a Eulogy of praise, an Eclogue suggesting out-of-door music and an Epitaph or musical inscription. It is tastefully, sincerely, and expertly written and has all the earmarks of a Stravinsky score. This listener experienced no great depth of feeling in it, but more of a graceful gesture.

To say that the orchestra played marvelously is to sum up the concert succinctly. The luxury of just listening to the texture of orchestral sound that poured forth during this concert was like sipping nectar fit only for the gods. Koussevitzky broadened his tempos in the Tchaikowsky to the limit, but he conducted a stunning performance. The final pages, however, came as an anti-climax at a moment when all is supposed to be radiantly triumphant. The work itself testified to its own posterity in the quality and color of its content.

The orchestra will open its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music tonight before another capacity house. The program consists of Barber's Commando March, the Khatchatourian Piano Concerto, with William Kapell, soloist, and the Brahms First Symphony.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

NOV 28 1943



Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear with that organization in the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art on Dec. 9 in the peristyle.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 22 1943

SOLOISTS PERFORM PIANO CONCERTOS

By ARTHUR V. BERGER.

Two young men whose development should certainly be followed with great interest appeared as soloists with major symphonic organizations over the week end in Carnegie Hall. One was William Kapell, 21-year-old pianist, who was the Boston Symphony's guest Saturday afternoon in the rather thankless role of soloist in Aram Khatchaturian's superficial concerto which the young New York musician had already presented here at the Lewisohn Stadium earlier this year. The other was Eugene Istomin, 17-year-old winner of the Leventritt award, who undertook the ambitious project of making his debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony yesterday afternoon in the Brahms piano concerto in B-flat major, a work which is rarely undertaken by any one but a very experienced performer.

From all that one could judge from the very small degree of genuine musical content in the Soviet concerto, Mr. Kapell is a musician of honesty, directness, and ability to concentrate on the dynamic flow of a musical construction. A less sensitive performer would have made more of the score's many opportunities for showmanship. The playing was technically accurate, alert and fluent. While the soloist achieved adequate loudness for Serge Koussevitzky's brilliant accompaniment, the apparently great physical effort was often incommensurate with the resonance of his tone.

What seemed in advance to be a rather grandiose choice of music for his initial orchestral appearance here, turned out to be a rather justifiable one for Mr. Istomin, since his full-bodied tone and his solid grasp of the keys are precisely the qualities for the execution of Brahms. It goes without saying that in fifteen years he will approach more closely the necessary insight, and it also seems clear that if he had waited a year or two he might have had the work sufficiently under control to inject an appropriate admixture of impulsiveness. But the seriousness of his attitude, his solicitous handling of the keys, the excellent relaxation and easy muscular control and the varied beauty of tone were most impressive. There seemed to be fine sympathy between him and the orchestra under Artur Rodzinski's direction.

The Boston Symphony opened the Saturday program with "The International" and the American anthem, and, with the American and Soviet flags adorning the platform, restricted itself to Soviet works, which included, in addition to the Khatchaturian, Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony. At yesterday's program of the Philharmonic, Dr. Rodzinski repeated Carpenter's "The Anxious Bugler" and Gershwin's "American in Paris," presented earlier in the week, and opened the program with Mozart's "Figaro" Overture.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN CONCERT

Igor Stravinsky's 'Ode' in 3 Parts Led by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

or the first New York concert his twentieth season as conduc- of the Boston Symphony Or- stra, last night in Carnegie ll, Dr. Koussevitzky had ar- ged a program exclusively of ssian music. There was a per- al element in this arrangement, also, without doubt, thought of relations of America and Rus- today, and the heroic contribu- n of the Russian people to the and the future of the world.

The personal equation was also sent in the first New York per- mance of Igor Stravinsky's de" in three parts for orchestra, nmissioned for him by the Kous- itzky Musical Foundation and licated to the late Natalie Kous- itsky. This work had been given première by Dr. Koussevitzky Boston the 8th of last October. The program included Tchai- sky's Fifth Symphony — like ethoven's of the same number, true "V" symphony, with its motif which snatches victory n defeat and paean of triumph ch closes the work and which a chant of liberated mankind; Stravinsky memorial "Ode," the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pic- s at an Exhibition."

his program served to display orchestra at the very height ts perfection. The audience had son to marvel again at the sup- ess, sensitivity and precision n exquisitely tempered instru- t, for the Boston Symphony is —a single instrument of nu- ous component elements fused matchless ensemble, and po- to interpret a leader's proud- dream.

t was also evident that, despite fact that everything except the Stravinsky score had been ed times without number by Koussevitzky and his men in and in other cities, everything been restudied and polished it shone, from the top note to bottom, and every note and y instrument between. Such, east, was the effect. It is hard magine Tchaikovsky presented more care and finish. And this there were rewards of uoso achievement.

ther results were not consist- y for the good of the sym- ny. The reading, markedly dif nt from others of the same k which Dr. Koussevitzky has n in this city, appeared to be -studied and too solicitous of il. The dramatic and the sensu were unfortunately interspersed the episodic and sophisti d. The symphony invites to dom of tempo, which is more n once specifically called for in score. But one asks why the essive langour of the lachry- se waltz theme of the first vement and the hectic pace ich weakened the effect of the ale, which should progress to its oration with the drama and the ndeur of the Winged Victory? bably no other orchestra could e played the finale as swiftly as clearly as the one that per med last night, but the Tchaik- y Fifth symphony is greater that, and Dr. Koussevitzky, in recollection, has given greater formances of the work in this y.

he "Ode" of Stravinsky, which ked memories of Dr. Kousse- ky's devoted wife, and, in the poser's explanatory words, her uence upon her husband's art, conspicuous for its simplicity lack of the merely ostenta- s or theatrical. The music may accorded these negative vir- . But candor compels the ad- sion that it is conspicuously in thematic invention or emo- al import. It was courteously ived.

he most brilliant playing was t of pieces from the set that ssorgsky wrote for piano in mory of his friend Hartmann, architect, and that Ravel, at Koussevitzky's commission, instrumentated. It is a Mussorgsky never heard We venture the statement he had he would have thanks for an orchestral tion, not only of his idea his imaginative concepts, was never able by himself to pass. The score fulfill ally the ideas of the compo Koussevitzky and the Bosto phony Orchestra in turn with magnificent color and ical eloquence every implica the masterly partition.

WORLD TELEGRAM
NY

NOV 19 1943

Boston Symphony All Koussevitzky

By ROBERT BAGAR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is really a great organization, probably the greatest in the world today. It sounds great even when its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, chooses to give a very personalized reading of a symphony, as he did the Tschaikowsky Fifth in Carnegie Hall last evening. But the band made wonderful sounds. It even made interesting noises—when the score called for fortissimos.

Mr. Koussevitzky has complete control of his men, a control that is so perfect it is almost a psychic arrangement. What he wants them to do they generally do, to the hilt. All of which comes about through (a) mutual respect, and (b) a long comradeship in the service of music.

One can bank on it, therefore, that how the orchestra plays is pretty much how Mr. Koussevitzky wants it to play. So the reading of the Tschaikowsky was a Koussevitzky reading or, perhaps, the next thing to it.

Personalized Interpretation.

The conductor, as evidenced by the performance, looks upon this symphony very fondly. He loves it, and loving it he lingers over its luscious phrases, dragging them out, letting them linger around as long as possible. All that went on in the first three movements gave, I should think, ample testimony of that.

Luckily for those who don't want their Tschaikowsky all done up in areolar tissue, the last movement came through quite naturally devoid of artificial trimmings and, to be blunt about it, musically. That movement had a lot to say, as compared to its predecessors, and it was said in a most comprehensive manner.

The second number, a local premiere, was Stravinsky's Ode in Three Parts, for Orchesera. It was completed recently on commission by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and it is dedicated to the memory of the conductor's wife Natalie.

Stravinsky of Old.

In a way this music is prewar (meaning World War I) Stravinsky, which some of us—deluded, maybe—think is very good Stravinsky. The memorial spirit is in it. There is much sensitiveness and, at the same time, point to the writing. And again one noted a magnificent orchestral technique that has scarcely its counterpart among contemporary composers. The work was excellently performed.

To close the program Mr. Koussevitzky had selected the Moussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition, as orchestrated by Ravel. This number, it almost goes without saying, is one of Mr. Koussevitzky's special oysters. The combination of Moussorgsky and Ravel, you see.

Anyway, the hall was jammed with enthusiasts for this first local appearance of the Bostonians. And what an orchestra!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 19 1943

Hub Orchestra In All-Russian Presentation

By GRENA BENNETT

A deep sentiment was attached to the season's first concert of the Boston Symphony which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. In observing the 50th anniversary of the death of Peter Ilyitch Tschaikovsky, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky began the all-Russian program with that composer's Fifth Symphony. All students of music are aware of the devastating disappointments and dismal frustrations that punctuated the life of Tschaikovsky, experiences that definitely colored his compositions, but in the reading last night much of the sombre matter of the first two movements was played so slowly as to merit the charge of sentimentality instead of sentiment and to transform pathos into bathos. Consequently, the interpretation by one of the finest orchestras in the world suffered by these distortions in tempo and rhythm and so came next to defeating much of the intent of the renowned composer. On the other hand the brilliant finale, as if to counteract the early shortcomings in performance, was speeded up and the obvious beauties of that part of the score received a too hasty "change from clouds to sunshine, from defeat to triumph" in the words of a famous commentator.

The second number was Stravinsky's "Ode" in three sections, composed at the instance of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, as an appreciation of the late Natalie Koussevitzky, wife of the orchestra's conductor. The subtitles were "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph," a memorial tryptich of no special musical value or appeal. The orchestral arrangement of Moussorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition" concluded the program. An audience that tested the capacity of the hall attended the event.

* * *

Paula Crystal, soprano, assisted by pianist H. Maurice-Jacquet, gave a recital last night at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. She presented works by Torelli, Scarlatti, Handel, Chausson, Chabrier, Faure, Georges, Delibes, Bruch, Verdi, Grieg, Quilter, Charles and Bishop.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 19 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Observes Tchaikovsky Anniversary in Opening Concert

Two Koussevitzky war horses were the chief su of the eminent conductor's program opening his 20th with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie H night. The excuse for the Tchaikovsky Fifth Sympho the anniversary of the Russian composer's death 50 years ago on Nov. 6. Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" in the Ravel orchestration helped round out the All-Russian program, but its presence on the program served to emphasize how limited is the range of Koussevitzky's programs in the light of only 10 Carnegie Hall concerts a year. This work needs to be shelved for some years to come.

Standing as something of an idyll between these massive-sounding works was Stravinsky's Ode in Three Parts, granted its first New York hearing on this occasion. The brief work is actually a chant "in appreciation of Natalie Koussevitzky's spiritual contribution "to the art of her husband. As a memorial triptych, it consists of a Eulogy of praise, an Eclogue suggesting out-of-door music and an Epitaph or musical inscription. It is tastefully, sincerely, and expertly written and has all the earmarks of a Stravinsky score. This listener experienced no great depth of feeling in it, but more of a graceful gesture.

To say that the orchestra played marvelously is to sum up the concert succinctly. The luxury of just listening to the texture of orchestral sound that poured forth during this concert was like sipping nectar fit only for the gods. Koussevitzky broadened his tempos in the Tchaikowsky to the limit, but he conducted a stunning performance. The final pages, however, came as an anti-climax at a moment when all is supposed to be radiantly triumphant. The work itself testified to its own posterity in the quality and color content.

The orchestra will ope
Brooklyn season at the Ac of Music tonight before a capacity house. The program sists of Barber's Commando
the Khatchatourian Piano certo, with William Kapell, and the Brahms First Symph

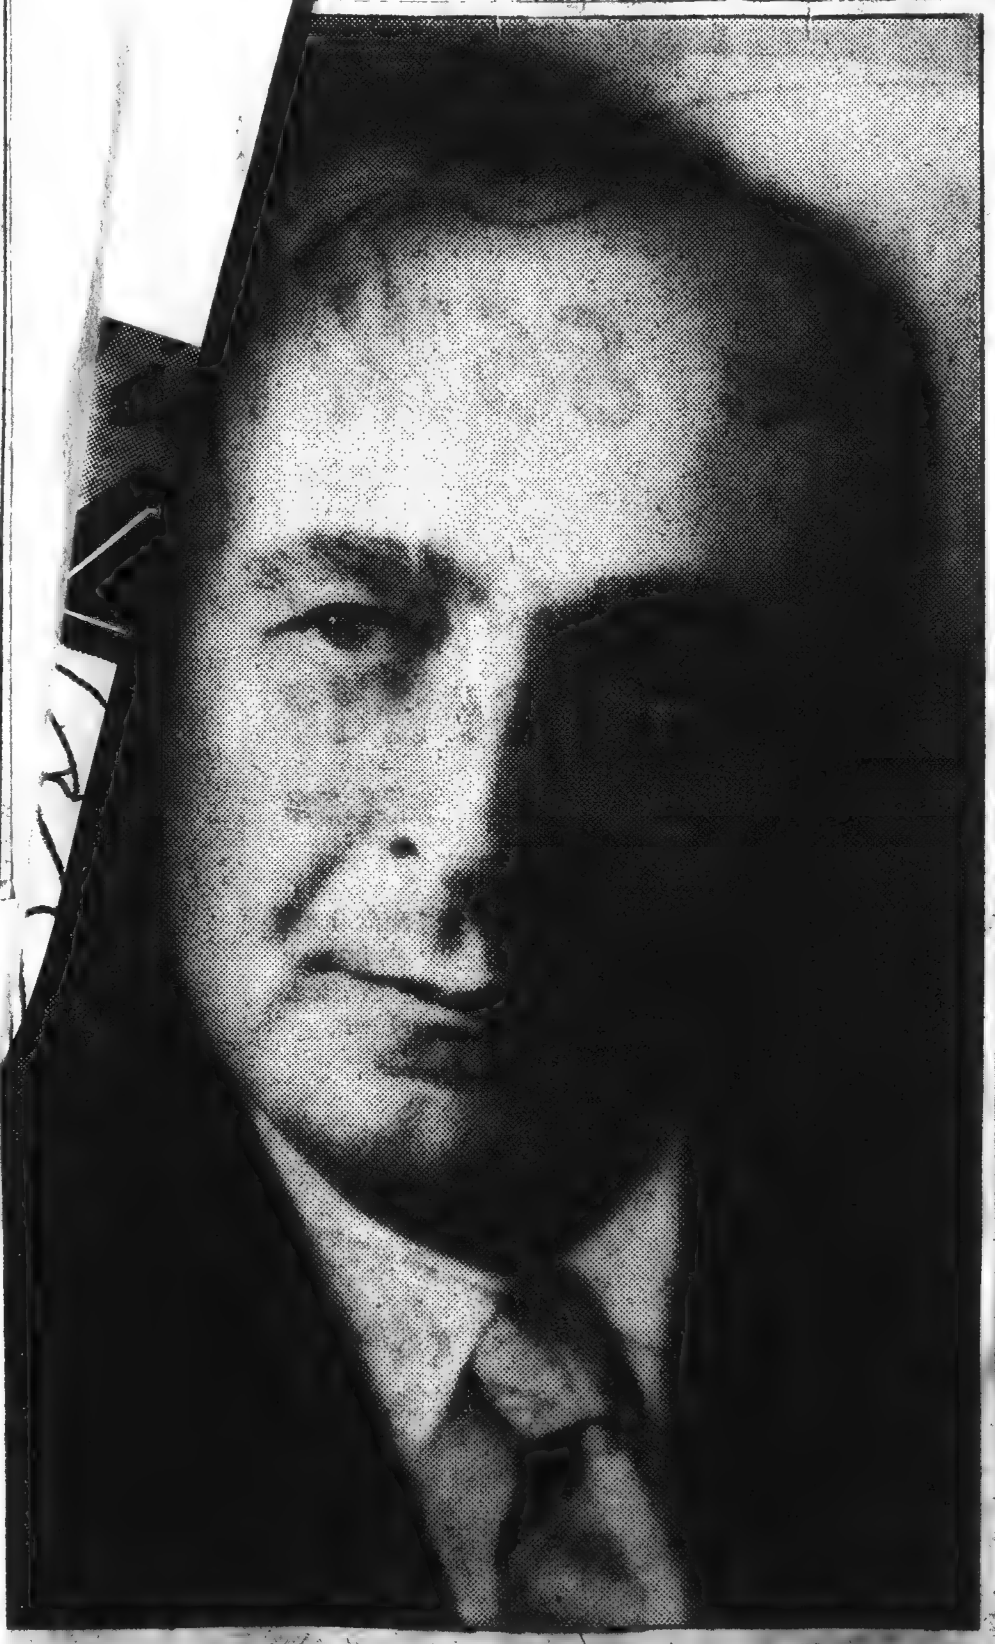
OHIO



Symphony Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will appear with that organization in the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art on Dec. 9 in the peristyle.

NEW YORK, N
SUN

NOV 22

SOLOISTS PERFO
PIANO CONCE

By ARTHUR V. BERG

Two young men whose d
ment should certainly be fo with great interest appea soloists with major sym organizations over the we in Carnegie Hall. One was Kapell, 21-year-old piani was the Boston Symphony Saturday afternoon in th thankless role of soloist Khatchaturian's superfic certo which the young N musician had already p here at the Lewisohn earlier this year. The ot Eugene Istomin, 17-year-ner of the Leventritt aw undertook the ambitiou of making his debut
Philharmonic-Symphon day afternoon in the piano concerto in B-flat work which is rarely u
by any one but a ver
enced performer.

From all that one co
from the very small genuine musical conte Soviet concerto, Mr. K musician of honesty, and ability to concent dynamic flow of a m struction. A less ser former would have of the score's many op for showmanship. T was technically accu and fluent. While achieved adequate lo Serge Koussevitzky's b companiment, the a great physical effort incommensurate with nance of his tone.

What seemed in adva
a rather grandiose music for his initial appearance here, turn be a rather justifiabl
Mr. Istomin, since his tone and his solid gra keys are precisely th for the execution of goes without saying teen years he will app closely the necessary it also seems clear th waited a year or tw have had the work under control to inject priate admixture of ness. But the seriousne attitude, his solicitous of the keys, the excellent relaxa tion and easy muscular contro and the varied beauty of ton were most impressive. Ther seemed to be fine sympathy be tween him and the orchestra un der Artur Rodzinski's direction

The Boston Symphony opened the Saturday program with "The International and the American anthem, and, with the American and Soviet flags adorning the platform, restricted itself to Soviet works, which included, in addition to the Khatchaturian, Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony. At yesterday's program of the Philharmonic, Dr. Rodzinski repeated Carpenter's "The Anxious Bugler" and Gershwin's "American in Paris," presented earlier in the week, and opened the program with Mozart's "Figaro" Overture.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN CONCERT

Igor Stravinsky's 'Ode' in 3 Parts Led by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall Program

By OLIN DOWNES

For the first New York concert of his twentieth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night in Carnegie Hall, Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program exclusively of Russian music. There was a personal element in this arrangement, as also, without doubt, thought of the relations of America and Russia today, and the heroic contribution of the Russian people to the life and the future of the world.

The personal equation was also present in the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Ode" in three parts for orchestra, commissioned for him by the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and dedicated to the late Natalie Koussevitsky. This work had been given its première by Dr. Koussevitzky in Boston the 8th of last October.

The program included Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony—like Beethoven's of the same number, a true "V" symphony, with its fate motif which snatches victory from defeat and paean of triumph which closes the work and which is as a chant of liberated mankind; the Stravinsky memorial "Ode," and the Mussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

This program served to display the orchestra at the very height of its perfection. The audience had reason to marvel again at the suppleness, sensitivity and precision of an exquisitely tempered instrument, for the Boston Symphony is that—a single instrument of numerous component elements fused in a matchless ensemble, and potent to interpret a leader's proudest dream.

It was also evident that, despite the fact that everything except the new Stravinsky score had been played times without number by Dr. Koussevitzky and his men in this and in other cities, everything had been restudied and polished till it shone, from the top note to the bottom, and every note and every instrument between. Such, at least, was the effect. It is hard to imagine Tchaikovsky presented with more care and finish. And for this there were rewards of virtuoso achievement.

Other results were not consistently for the good of the symphony. The reading, markedly different from others of the same work which Dr. Koussevitzky has given in this city, appeared to be over-studied and too solicitous of detail. The dramatic and the sensuous were unfortunately interspersed with the episodic and sophisticated. The symphony invites to freedom of tempo, which is more than once specifically called for in the score. But one asks why the excessive langour of the lachrymose waltz theme of the first movement and the hectic pace which weakened the effect of the finale, which should progress to its peroration with the drama and the grandeur of the Winged Victory? Probably no other orchestra could have played the finale as swiftly and as clearly as the one that performed last night, but the Tchaikovsky Fifth symphony is greater than that, and Dr. Koussevitzky, in our recollection, has given greater performances of the work in this city.

The "Ode" of Stravinsky, which invoked memories of Dr. Koussevitzky's devoted wife, and, in the composer's explanatory words, her influence upon her husband's art, is conspicuous for its simplicity and lack of the merely ostentatious or theatrical. The music may be accorded these negative virtues. But candor compels the admission that it is conspicuously poor in thematic invention or emotional import. It was courteously received.

The most brilliant playing was that of pieces from the set that Mussorgsky wrote for piano in memory of his friend Hartmann, the architect, and that Ravel, at Dr. Koussevitzky's commission, instrumentated. It is a p
Mussorgsky never heard th
We venture the statement he had he would have thanks for an orchestral tion, not only of his ideas, his imaginative concepts, was never able by himself to pass. The score fulfills ally the ideas of the compo Koussevitzky and the Bosto phony Orchestra in turn f with magnificent color and ical eloquence every implic the masterly partition.

[25]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

1943

RUSSIAN CONCERT BY BOSTON GROUP

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Living Composers' Music —Kappel, Pianist, Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

When Dr. Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra he announced briefly that the concert would be prefaced by two national hymns, not one. The first would be the Russian national anthem. The second would be America's.

The announcement brought hearty applause. The orchestra played "The Internationale." Then the audience sang, with the orchestra, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

The nature of this symbolic ceremony was sustained in the performances which followed, when an internationally famous American orchestra and a conductor whose career and citizenship make him the possession of both countries discoursed music exclusively by living Russian composers. The concert also witnessed the appearance of a young American pianist, William Kappel, who had the good fortune to present with exceptional success an unfamiliar and highly interesting Soviet concerto. These factors, and a series of superlative performances, made a memorable occasion.

Concerto of Katchatourian

The piano concerto of Arâm Katchatourian, an arresting exotic and masterfully articulated score, was first played in this city by Maro Arjemian on March 14 of last year under Albert Stoessel at the Juilliard School of Music. It was first heard in Boston when Bernard Weiser presented it at a "Pop" concert on July 13 under Arthur Fiedler's baton. There was a later performance at a Russian Relief concert in this city last Fall, but this was the first time that this concerto had a hearing at a major symphony concert in New York.

In view of the fact that it was composed as early as 1935, one wonders why it has been this long coming into its own. For it is going to be a very popular concerto, and a much needed addition to the numbers of the few remaining works in that form that maintain their place in the repertory.

So much, at least, is immediately evident, and so much was endorsed by the delighted audience of yesterday afternoon. The music is really oriental, but not in a merely local way, or in superficial exterior traits of the music. This is racial. These exotic themes, now barbaric and powerful, like the theme, a true descendant of Borodin, which opens the work; or the curious harmonic dress and ululation of the second theme of the same section that might sound from the bazaar; or the theme as slant-eyed as an odalisque, the languorous song which is the major idea of the middle movement, or the dervish dance motives of the whirling finale—these things come from something deeper than conscious thought; they are ancestral voices.

Part of Symphonic Fabric

Then there is the piano style. Part of the time this writing is properly a part of the symphonic fabric, or of passages most effectively conceived for virtuoso display. But there is another element in what would constitute in other hands mere solo cadenzas. In this concerto cadenzas mean really free and masterly developments, in an idiom particularly pianist, and Eastern, and rhapsodic in spirit, of the themes. The second theme of the first movement, for example, is thus given a special and immediate development by this means. This is one of several instances of the kind.

But the symphonic line is never lost. All the movements are on a broad plan, with needed contrasts of material and mood and original combinations of piano and orchestra, but all knit together, and at last the barbaric theme of the beginning returning for a thundering peroration and a devouring climax for piano and orchestra.

The concerto has a special technique, fresh and idiomatic for the solo instrument, requiring not only sure rhythm, force, speed, but also imagination and poetical coloring. Mr. Kappel me[illegible]hese demands with a fine physical equipment, a musician's sensibility and responsiveness to Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. He can acquire more depth of tone, more authority and breadth. In a word, he can mature as an artist only matures, with much practical experience and routine. But in conception and execution he gave an excellent accoun of himself, and Dr. Koussevitzk brought him back to the stag many times in response to the ap plause.

Listeners Assured Year 'Round Concerts of Finest Symphony

With the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's broadcast would soon be heard under commercial spon sorship, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra is added to the list of the nation's great musical organizations whose radio programs are heard under the sponsorship of great American industries. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the NBC Smyphony, and the Metropolitan Opera Company are all so sponsored.

Koussevitsky

Score Often Heard Here

The concert found Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in the highest interpretative vein. He has often performed the "Classic Symphony" here, but probably never as convincingly as yesterday. The score was put in such a light that what had appeared to this commentator as a rather obvious set of tricks in the pseudo-classic manner became now true music-notes transmuted into something entirely sun-lit, songful Italianate; a score seen to be a true jeux d'esprit on the part of a modern master; one which in its substance and its mercurial by-play would fittingly companion the commedia dell' arte. This, indeed, was virtuoso conducting, interpretation, performance in the utmost meaning of the word.

Dr. Koussevitzky did everything that he might for Shostakovich's symphony, of which it can be said that repeated hearings confirm its palpable weakness and its inescapable strengths. We believe it to be by far the best of Shostakovich's symphonies up to the present. It is uneven, in substance eclectic and mainly derivative from many composers who thoughtlessly anticipated Mr. Shostakovich in their scores, such as Strauss of "Rosenkavalier" in the second theme of the first movement; Mahler, particularly in the second movement, which is the slickest and essentially the most superficial part of the score.

The great movement is the slow movement, which touches rare heights of lyricism. The finale has a violence and a dramatic culmination which may not be of the most beautiful or elevated kind. But things which are not beautiful, indeed are most horrible and in earnest, in which Mr. Shostakovich and his countrymen have recently taken part. Anyone who has seen even a documentary film of certain Russian war episodes will feel responsive to the fiery, brutal and finally triumphant conclusion of this Fifth symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading was powerfully dramatic and even mystical in the slow movement.

A remarkable concert! What nation, besides Russia, can offer the world such important and indispensable compositions, by composers living, creating, taking their own part in battles that are not esthetic diversion, but terrible reality, fruitful for humanity and for art in the world of today?

The starting date of the Boston Symphony's sponsored concerts will be announced shortly. Meanwhile they will continue as an outstanding sustained feature of the network, Mark Woods, Blue Network president, said.

Under the new arrangement, which is covered by long-term contracts between the symphony, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the sponsor and the network, the nation's listeners will be assured a continuing series of programs bringing them the world's greatest symphonic music, both classical and modern, performed by the Boston Symphony, which is not only the oldest permanent symphony orchestra in the United States but is adjudged by musical authorties the finest of them all.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the symphony's three series of concerts — the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under the baton of Dr. Koussevitsky; the celebrated Boston "pops" concerts which are given during the spring and early summer, and the esplanade concerts which are performed in an outdoor setting on the esplanade flanking the Charles river in Boston. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "pops" and the esplanade concerts. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the United States, every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m.

The Boston symphony was founded in 1881 by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson and eyer since that time, under a succession of great conductors, has maintained its position of leadership. The symphony first took to the airwaves in 1926 and later, following a lapse of some years,

---

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

NOV 22 1943

Kapell With Boston Symphony; Estomin Plays Brahms Concerto

By Harriett Johnson

William Kapell, American pianist, created an extraor nary impression in his first Carnegie Hall appearance Satu day afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Ser Koussevitzky, conducting. The young artist has a big vi tuosity and a beautiful piano tone, but for his years th most remarkable thing about his playing is that his technical means is never an end in itself. His fiery nature gives the impression of intense concentration on expresing music as a language, to him evidently a much more important job than individual exploitation. He has grown immensely since his last appearance in Town Hall and in the Khatchatourian concerto gave evidence of being a mature, definitive personality, one of the most interesting among pianists performing today.

The concerto is a brilliant and colorful piece, well written pianistically, and a welcome addition to the repertory.

Mr. Koussevitzky provided Mr. Kapell with first rate support and the ensemble was excellent. The orchestra in general played superbly. The Prokofieff "Classical Symphony" has never sounded more delightful. As you gather, it was an exciting concert which closed with the stirring Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony and opened with the Russian, as well as our own National Anthem.

Estomin With Philharmonic

Eugene Estomin, who will apparently reach the ripe age of 18 this week, played the Brahms B Flat Major Piano Concerto yesterday afternoon with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Estomin was this year's winner of the Leaventritt award with the current appearance as his prize. Artur Rodzinski conducted the concert which included the "Anxious Bugler," by John Alden Carpenter, and Mozart's Overture from "Marriage of Figaro."

The pianist disclosed a pr digious piano technique, in fact remarkable command of his i strument, plus a warm, rich me ody tone, and obviously most u usual musical talent. His basi equipment and fine trainin would indicate unlimited poter tialities of development. The i spired Brahms concerto, however is one of the most difficult work in the piano repertory to give it full due of poetry, color and musical sensitivity. From the i terpretive standpoint, Mr. Estomin left much to be desired. I is a rare experience to hear anybody not yet 18 play this wor with the technical and musica command of this young man. A great art, however, the conception showed limited inner comprehension. But the gifted p anist certainly gives every indication of immense promise.

Friends of Music

The Friends of Music presented the Busch Trio, Adolph Busch violinist; Hermann Busch, 'cellist, and Rudolf Serkin, pianist plus Victor Polatschek, clarinetist, in a program of three trios in the third of its all-Beethoven concerts in Town Hall yesterday at 5:30 p. m. The blend of the three instruments in the two piano trios was unusually good. Mr. Serkin's enormous vitality, occasionally led him to indulge in a few virtuoso flourishes, but his musical understanding and power of expression made up for any minor indiscretions. Mr. Polatschek played well, if a bit timidly.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1943

Kapell Play Concerto Wit The Bostonian

Pianist Performs Unde Koussevitsky in Anothe All-Russian Progra

By Paul Bowles

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, wi William Kapell, pianist, as soloist, in all-Russian program yesterday afterno at Carnegie Hall.

The program:
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofi
Piano Concerto...........Khatchatouri
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovit

The vogue for all-Russian con certs is still in full swing; it h been going on for quite a whi and will doubtless continue. The would seem to be no reason to o ject to it, particularly since duri this war we are fortunate enou to be allowed to hear our Germ friends as well. Yesterday aft noon Dr. Koussevitzky presen us with his second all-Russi program of the week, and the o chestra as usual sounded like t perfect instrument that it is.

First the orchestra tossed o the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony. No sparks flew, but present were the inimitable nonchalance, verve and finesse with which the Boston gentlemen always approach the work, and which make it a recurrent delight.

Then came the Khatchatourian Concerto, which carries on, in a way, the tradition of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Kapell advanced boldly into its Near-Eastern labyrinths. The composer made the solo pathway relatively clear at the start, and the piano writing was grateful and functional, without much waste motion. In the first movement this effectiveness was often present in the surrounding orchestration. One section of the development showed a gleaming cloth-of-gold texture which was not equaled in originality, alas, elsewhere in the work.

On arriving at the second movement, one shortly realized that Mr. Khatchatourian had already said in the first movement what there was to be said. Themes here were childishly repetitive, the Oriental element was stressed in harmonies of rosewater and musk. (Near-Eastern melodic turns are always offensive when combined with the harmonic traditions of the West. Only in Spain with the taking over of guitar harmonies has it been possible to preserve some sort of integrity in this matter.) The third movement was energetic and playful, and in spots was reminiscent of the last movement of the Gershwin Concerto in F, if not so successful rhythmically as that work.

There was just about enough itality and inventiveness in the ncerto for a piece the length of e first movement. The rest was unwelcome bonus. Mr. Kapell, wever, with incisive energy and great sense of direction, rode ning through the frivolous- nding cadenzas, skirting the rasses of blatant instrumenta- on, to the triumphant end.

Coming on the heels of the Khatchatourian piece, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony made a startling impression of seriousness. The dramatic impact present in the opening of the first movement and in the whole third movement make it particularly regrettable that the rest of the frame should rely on such flimsy harmonic stays and struts, and that the emotional evocation should be constantly dissipated rather than becoming cumulative.

Only the Boston Symphony could have created the wonderful sense of hollow magnitude which emerged yesterday from the largo, with its cobwebs of string sounds and its diaphanous close. Dr. Koussevitzky made the tempo remarkably slow, and precisely because of that managed to sustain the mood of this peculiarly elongated movement to its last breath. This is excellent Shostakovich, and it is typical of him to follow it with an unwanted, callow finale. Like our own Saroyan in literature, Shostakovich has the careless and destructive habit of treating old sentimentalities and platitudes and tender personal discoveries with equal solicitude.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1943

New Stravinsky Work Is Playe By Boston SymphonyOrchestr

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Symphony No. 5, E minor.....Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts..........Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Interest in Mr. Koussevitzky's all-Russian program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday night centered in Stravinsky's "Ode," which was given its first New York performance. The composition is in three short movements, entitled respectively, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph." For this writer it is the Russian composer's most felicitous recent product. The fear that Stravinsky no longer could turn out a piece of music not permeated solely by the processes of the intellect alone is dispelled here.

This "Ode" is an intimately poetic creation. The "Eulogy" is no rhetorical panegyric but a wistfully regretful memory of one who has been tenderly regarded but whose passing does not cause the tear ducts to overflow. The "Eclogue," as its title implies, is bucolic in mood. The "Epitaph," with its transparent, remote har monies is touched by an other world spirit. That this delicatel conceived work should still linge in the listener's mind so unfor gettably speaks well for its in trinsic value. For it was sand wiched in between the lavishl scored and teemingly romant Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsk and Ravel's cannily brilliant ve sion of Moussorgsky's "Pictures an Exhibition," with its grandio closing pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment the new Stravinsky score, with i unpretentious apposite orchestra tion, was a flawless realizatio thereof from every aspect. Asi from exaggerated rubati in t first movement of the Tchaikovs Symphony, which occasional terminated in something not f from sentimentality, the co ductor's conception of this thric familiar work was unusually el quent, even the slow moveme being paced flowingly, so that melancholy melodies did not s too abjectly. Both here and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an hibition" in their multicolored strumental garb, the orche played with its customary t allure.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
WEEKLY INDEPENDENT

NOV 27 1943

Gardner Read, composer-pianist, a member of the music faculty of The Conservatory of Music.

Gardner Read, young American composer who became a member of the faculty of the Kansas City Conservatory of Music last September, has been invited to conduct the premiere of his Second Symphony in Boston, this Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rated America's finest, an invitation to conduct it is a rare honor indeed, as Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has not pursued a "guest conductor" policy. But very few have been accorded this honor, men of international fame such as Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud and Paul Hindemith. Mr. Read's First Overture had its world premiere in Indianapolis, November 6, when Fabien Savitzky conducted the Indianapolis Orchestra, with Mr. and Mrs. Read present. The Symphony No. 2, begun in 1937 and finished in 1942, was awarded the Paderewski prize this year, a $1,000 award from a fund set up by the late Polish pianist, for the encouragement of American composition. However, Dr. Koussevitzky had accepted the symphony for performance before the Paderewski fund award was made.

* * *

---

ted. It is a pity never heard this the statement would have an orchestral of his ideas,
e concepts, whi
by himself to score fulfills of the compose and the Boston
stra in turn fu ent color and r every implicati partition.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 21 1943

RUSSIAN CONCERT BY BOSTON GROUP

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Living Composers' Music —Kappel, Pianist, Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

When Dr. Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra he announced briefly that the concert would be prefaced by two national hymns, not one. The first would be the Russian national anthem. The second would be America's.

The announcement brought hearty applause. The orchestra played "The Internationale." Then the audience sang, with the orchestra, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

The nature of this symbolic ceremony was sustained in the performances which followed, when an internationally famous American orchestra and a conductor whose career and citizenship make him the possession of both countries discoursed music exclusively by living Russian composers. The concert also witnessed the appearance of a young American pianist, William Kappel, who had the good fortune to present with exceptional success an unfamiliar and highly interesting Soviet concerto. These factors, and a series of superlative performances, made a memorable occasion.

Concerto of Katchatourian

The piano concerto of Aram Katchatourian, an arresting exotic and masterfully articulated score, was first played in this city by Maro Arjemian on March 14 of last year under Albert Stoessel at the Juilliard School of Music. It was first heard in Boston when Bernard Weiser presented it at a "Pop" concert on July 13 under Arthur Fiedler's baton. There was a later performance at a Russian Relief concert in this city last Fall, but this was the first time that this concerto had a hearing at a major symphony concert in New York.

In view of the fact that it was composed as early as 1935, one wonders why it has been this long coming into its own. For it is going to be a very popular concerto, and a much needed addition to the numbers of the few remaining works in that form that maintain their place in the repertory.

So much, at least, is immediately evident, and so much was endorsed by the delighted audience of yesterday afternoon. The music is really oriental, but not in a merely local way, or in superficial exterior traits of the music. This is racial. These exotic themes, now barbaric and powerful, like the theme, a true descendant of Borodin, which opens the work; or the curious harmonic dress and ululation of the second theme of the same section that might sound from the bazaar; or the theme as slant-eyed as an odalisque, the languorous song which is the major idea of the middle movement, or the dervish dance motives of the whirling finale—these things come from something deeper than conscious thought; they are ancestral voices.

Part of Symphonic Fabric

Then there is the piano style. Part of the time this writing is properly a part of the symphonic fabric, or of passages most effectively conceived for virtuoso display. But there is another element in what would constitute in other hands mere solo cadenzas. In this concerto cadenzas mean really free and masterly developments, in an idiom particularly pianist, and Eastern, and rhapsodic in spirit, of the themes. The second theme of the first movement, for example, is thus given a special and immediate development by this means. This is one of several instances of the kind.

But the symphonic line is never lost. All the movements are on a broad plan, with needed contrasts of material and mood and original combinations of piano and orchestra, but all knit together, and at last the barbaric theme of the beginning returning for a thundering peroration and a devouring climax for piano and orchestra.

The concerto has a special technique, fresh and idiomatic for the solo instrument, requiring not only sure rhythm, force, speed, but also imagination and poetical coloring. Mr. Kappel meets these demands with a fine physical equipment, a musician's sensibility and responsiveness to Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. He can acquire more depth of tone, more authority and breadth. In a word, he can mature as an artist only matures, with much practical experience and routine. But in conception and execution he gave an excellent account of himself, and Dr. Koussevitzky brought him back to the stag many times in response to the ap plause.

Score Often Heard Here

The concert found Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in the highest interpretative vein. He has often performed the "Classic Symphony" here, but probabl never as convincingly as yester day. The score was put in such light that what had appeared t this commentator as a rather ob vious set of tricks in the pseudo classic manner became now tru music-notes transmuted into something entirely sun-lit, songful Italianate; a score seen to be true jeux d'esprit on the part of modern master; one which in its substance and its mercurial by-play would fittingly companion the commedia dell' arte. This, indeed, was virtuoso conducting, interpretation, performance in the utmost meaning of the word.

Dr. Koussevitzky did everything that he might for Shostakovich's symphony, of which it can be said that repeated hearings confirm its palpable weakness and its inescapable strengths. We believe it to be by far the best of Shostakovich's symphonies up to the present. It is uneven, in substance eclectic and mainly derivative from many composers who thoughtlessly anticipated Mr. Shostakovich in their scores, such as Strauss of "Rosenkavalier" in the second theme of the first movement Mahler, particularly in the second movement, which is the slickest and essentially the most superficial part of the score.

The great movement is the slow movement, which touches rare heights of lyricism. The finale has a violence and a dramatic culmination which may not be of the most beautiful or elevated kind. But things which are not beautiful, indeed are most horrible and in earnest, in which Mr. Shostakovich and his countrymen have recently taken part. Anyone who has seen even a documentary film of certain Russian war episodes will feel responsive to the fiery, brutal and finally triumphant conclusion of this Fifth symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading was powerfully dramatic and even mystical in the slow movement.

A remarkable concert! What nation, besides Russia, can offer the world such important and indispensable compositions, by composers living, creating, taking their own part in battles that are not esthetic diversion, but terrible reality, fruitful for humanity and for art in the world of today?

Listeners Assured Year Round Concerts of Finest Symphony

With the announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra's broadcast would soon be heard under commercial sponsorship, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's orchestra is added to the list of the nation's great musical organizations whose radio programs are heard under the sponsorship of great American industries. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the NBC Smyphony, and the Metropolitan Opera Company are all so sponsored.

Koussevitsky

The starting date of the Boston Symphony's sponsored concerts will be announced shortly. Meanwhile they will continue as an outstanding sustained feature of the network, Mark Woods, Blue Network president, said.

Under the new arrangement, which is covered by long-term contracts between the symphony, with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the sponsor and the network, the nation's listeners will be assured a continuing series of programs bringing them the world's greatest symphonic music, both classical and modern, performed by the Boston Symphony, which is not only the oldest permanent symphony orchestra in the United States but is adjudged by musical authorties the finest of them all.

Sponsorship will be on a year-round schedule and will cover broadcast of the symphony's three series of concerts — the winter season concerts, from October to the end of May, under the baton of Dr. Koussevitsky; the celebrated Boston "pops" concerts which are given during the spring and early summer, and the esplanade concerts which are performed in an outdoor setting on the esplanade flanking the Charles river in Boston. Arthur Fiedler will conduct both the "pops" and the esplanade concerts. Originating in Boston, the broadcasts will be carried by the full blue network of 170 stations and will be heard in practically every section of the United States, every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m.

The Boston symphony was founded in 1881 by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson and eyer since that time, under a succession of great conductors, has maintained its position of leadership. The symphony first took to the airwaves in 1926 and later, following a lapse of some years.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

NOV 22 1943

Kapell With Boston Symphony; Estomin Plays Brahms Concerto

By Harriett Johnson

William Kapell, American pianist, created an extraor nary impression in his first Carnegie Hall appearance Satu day afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serg Koussevitzky, conducting. The young artist has a big vi tuosity and a beautiful piano tone, but for his years th most remarkable thing about his playing is that his technical means is never an end in itself. His fiery nature gives the impression of intense concentration on expresing music as a language, to him evidently a much more important job than individual exploitation. He has grown immensely since his last appearance in Town Hall and in the Khatchatourian concerto gave evidence of being a mature, definitive personality, one of the most interesting among pianists performing today.

The concerto is a brilliant and colorful piece, well written pianistically, and a welcome addition to the repertory.

Mr. Koussevitzky provided Mr. Kapell with first rate support and the ensemble was excellent. The orchestra in general played superbly. The Prokofieff "Classical Symphony" has never sounded more delightful. As you gather, it was an exciting concert which closed with the stirring Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony and opened with the Russian, as well as our own National Anthem.

Estomin With Philharmonic

Eugene Estomin, who will apparently reach the ripe age of 18 this week, played the Brahms B Flat Major Piano Concerto yesterday afternoon with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Estomin was this year's winner of the Leaventritt award with the current appearance as his prize. Artur Rodzinski conducted the concert which included the "Anxious Bugler," by John Alden Carpenter, and [illegible] Overture from "[illegible] garo."

The pianist disclosed a pr digious piano technique, in fact remarkable command of his i strument, plus a warm, rich me ody tone, and obviously most u usual musical talent. His bas equipment and fine trainin would indicate unlimited poter tialities of development. The i spired Brahms concerto, howeve is one of the most difficult work in the piano repertory to give it full due of poetry, color and mu sical sensitivity. From the i terpretive standpoint, Mr. Esto min left much to be desired. I is a rare experience to hear any body not yet 18 play this wor with the technical and musica command of this young man. A great art, however, the concep tion showed limited inner com prehension. But the gifted p anist certainly gives every indi cation of immense promise.

Friends of Music

The Friends of Music present ed the Busch Trio, Adolph Busch violinist; Hermann Busch, 'cell ist, and Rudolf Serkin, pianist plus Victor Polatschek, clarinet ist, in a program of three trios in the third of its all-Beethover concerts in Town Hall yesterday at 5:30 p. m. The blend of the three instruments in the two pi ano trios was unusually good Mr. Serkin's enormous vitality occasionally led him to indulge in a few virtuoso flourishes, bu his musical understanding and power of expression made up for any minor indiscretions. Mr. Polatschek played well, if a bit timidly.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 21 1943

Kapell Plays Concerto Wit The Bostonian

Pianist Performs Unde Koussevitsky in Anothe All-Russian Progra

By Paul Bowles

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTR conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, wi William Kapell, pianist, as soloist, in all-Russian program yesterday afterno at Carnegie Hall.

The program:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25.. Prokof
Piano Concerto.........Khatchatouri
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovit

The vogue for all-Russian co certs is still in full swing; it h been going on for quite a wh and will doubtless continue. The would seem to be no reason to o ject to it, particularly since duri this war we are fortunate enou to be allowed to hear our Germ friends as well. Yesterday aft noon Dr. Koussevitzky presen us with his second all-Russ program of the week, and the chestra as usual sounded like perfect instrument that it is.

First the orchestra tossed the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony. No sparks flew, but present were the inimitable nonchalance, verve and finesse with which the Boston gentlemen always approach the work, and which make it a recurrent delight.

Then came the Khatchatourian Concerto, which carries on, in a way, the tradition of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Kapell advanced boldly into its Near-Eastern labyrinths. The composer made the solo pathway relatively clear at the start, and the piano writing was grateful and functional, without much waste motion. In the first movement this effectiveness was often present in the surrounding orchestration. One section of the development showed a gleaming cloth-of-gold texture which was not equaled in originality, alas, elsewhere in the work.

On arriving at the second movement, one shortly realized that Mr. Khatchatourian had already said in the first movement what there was to be said. Themes here were childishly repetitive, the Oriental element was stressed in harmonies of rosewater and musk. (Near-Eastern melodic turns are always offensive when combined with the harmonic traditions of the West. Only in Spain with the taking over of guitar harmonies has it been possible to preserve some sort of integrity in this matter.) The third movement was energetic and playful, and in spots was reminiscent of the last movement of the Gershwin Concerto in F, if not so successful rhythmically as that work.

There was just about enough itality and inventiveness in the ncerto for a piece the length of e first movement. The rest was unwelcome bonus. Mr. Kapell, wever, with incisive energy and great sense of direction, rode ping through the frivolous nding cadenzas, skirting the rasses of blatant instrumenta on, to the triumphant end.

Coming on the heels of the Khatchatourian piece, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony made a startling impression of seriousness. The dramatic impact present in the opening of the first movement and in the whole third movement make it particularly regrettable that the rest of the frame should rely on such flimsy harmonic stays and struts, and that the emotional evocation should be constantly dissipated rather than becoming cumulative.

Only the Boston Symphony could have created the wonderful sense of hollow magnitude which emerged yesterday from the largo, with its cobwebs of string sounds and its diaphanous close. Dr. Koussevitzky made the tempo remarkably slow, and precisely because of that managed to sustain the mood of this peculiarly elongated movement to its last breath. This is excellent Shostakovich, and it is typical of him to follow it with an unwanted, callow finale. Like our own Saroyan in literature, Shostakovich has the careless and destructive habit of treating old sentimentalities and platitudes and tender personal discoveries with equal solicitude.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 20 1943

New Stravinsky Work Is Playe By Boston Symphony Orchestr

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:

Symphony No. 5, E minor.....Tchaikovsky
Ode in Three Parts.............Stravinsky
Pictures at an Exhibition
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Interest in Mr. Koussevitzky's all-Russian program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Thursday night centered in Stravinsky's "Ode," which was given its first New York performance. The composition is in three short movements, entitled respectively, "Eulogy," "Eclogue" and "Epitaph." For this writer it is the Russian composer's most felicitous recent product. The fear that Stravinsky no longer could turn out a piece of music not permeated solely by the processes of the intellect alone is dispelled here.

This "Ode" is an intimately poetic creation. The "Eulogy" is no rhetorical panegyric but a wistfully regretful memory of one who has been tenderly regarded but whose passing does not cause the tear ducts to overflow. The "Eclogue," as its title implies, is bucolic in mood. The "Epitaph," with its transparent, remote harmonies is touched by an other world spirit. That this delicatel conceived work should still linge in the listener's mind so unfor gettably speaks well for its in trinsic value. For it was sand wiched in between the lavishl scored and teemingly romant Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsk and Ravel's cannily brilliant ve sion of Moussorgsky's "Pictures an Exhibition," with its grandio closing pages.

Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment the new Stravinsky score, with i unpretentious apposite orchestr tion, was a flawless realizati thereof from every aspect. Asi from exaggerated rubati in t first movement of the Tchaikovs Symphony, which occasional terminated in something not f from sentimentality, the co ductor's conception of this thric familiar work was unusually el quent, even the slow moveme being paced flowingly, so that melancholy melodies did not s too abjectly. Both here and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an hibition" in their multicolored strumental garb, the orch played with its customary allure.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
WEEKLY INDEPENDENT

NOV 27 1943

Gardner Read, composer-pianist, a member of the music faculty of The Conservatory of Music.

Gardner Read, young American composer who became a member of the faculty of the Kansas City Conservatory of Music last September, has been invited to conduct the premiere of his Second Symphony in Boston, this Saturday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rated America's finest, an invitation to conduct it is a rare honor indeed, as Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has not pursued a "guest conductor" policy. But very few have been accorded this honor, men of international fame such as Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud and Paul Hindemith. Mr. Read's First Overture had its world premiere in Indianapolis, November 6, when Fabien Savitzky conducted the Indianapolis Orchestra, with Mr. and Mrs. Read present. The Symphony No. 2, begun in 1937 and finished in 1942, was awarded the Paderewski prize this year, a $1,000 award from a fund set up by the late Polish pianist, for the encouragement of American composition. However, Dr. Koussevitzky had accepted the symphony for performance before the Paderewski fund award was made.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
Nov 22 1943

Symphony Stresses U.S.-Soviet Relations

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Comrades Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky lending a helping baton, The Internationale is becoming quite a repertory item on concert programs these days. Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony—flanked by the American and Soviet colors—opened an all-Soviet program in Carnegie Hall with both anthems, rendered in smart, fraternal style.

Mr. Koussevitzky couldn't have chosen a better program for the occasion, intended as a tribute to a gallant ally. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, steeped in a fastidious cosmopolitan idiom, showed a side of Russian music more broadly identified with the finesse and taste of Mozart tradition.

Then, Aram Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto stressed the folk lore always cropping up in Slav music and, of course, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony is a monument to the gusty confidence keynoting the brave, new world. All three gave a neat idea of the rich-hued mosaic of Soviet music.

Possibly the Khatchatourian concerto stood out Saturday because of its relative novelty. Young William Kapell, who appeared in the work at a Philharmonic Stadium concert last summer, ran off the brilliant solo writing in ringing fashion, the orchestra following suit.

* * *

Soloist Scored Hit.

When first publicly rendered at Mecca Temple last year, with a young Armenian girl, Maro Ajemian, as soloist, the Soviet-Armenian concerto struck me as the likeliest contender to date for the popularity crown long held by the Tschaikowsky classic. Frank, rip-roaring bravura, haunting motifs tinged with fresh Oriental hues, and brash headlong drive blended in surefire appeal.

Saturday's rendering was added proof that Khatchatourian's sizzling score is a new hit for any major repertory. Picking esthetic flaws in the music would be a cinch; for instance, some pages of the finale brim with claptrap sound effects. But the defects are overlooked in the dizzy rush of new themes and rhythms. The music has fire in its veins. Aram Khatchatourian and William Saroyan ought to get together for a Soviet-Armeno-American opera, flying trapeze and all.

* * *

Smooth Performance.

The Boston ensemble never sounded so slick and glossy as in Prokofieff's Classical Symphony. Precision went without saying. Tiny detail snuggled nimbly into clear patterns, the whole weaving into a gleaming web of art. It takes loving care to keep the symphony from falling apart. Mr. Koussevitzky led it as if he wrote it.

To my thinking Artur Rodzinski's is the only reading of Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony matching Mr. Koussevitzky's in depth. Between their renderings of the Adagio—maybe the greatest slow movement since Beethoven's Eroica—there is no choice. Both are planned in equally gripping dynamics of feeling and drama. But I like Mr. Rodzinski's tenser-paced Allegretto more.

The performance was massive without getting out of bounds. Lyric spots nestled cozily between peaks of jubilant chanting. Shostakovich and his country seemed to bulk even larger Saturday afternoon.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
NOV 22 1943

Koussevitzky At His Best In Concert In N. Y.

Boston Symphony Program Highlight Of Music Program

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, Nov. 22 (Special)—The past week brought a new star to New York's musical firmament. It happened when 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society, was called upon at the 11th hour to substitute for Bruno Walter, ill at home with influenza, in conducting the Philharmonic concert. Opening a taxing program without rehearsal, young Bernstein handled the Philharmonic musicians like a veteran, and gave exciting and individualistic readings of the respective scores. A big and enthusiastic audience gave the young conductor the ovation that he deserved, and he stepped out of the concert hall with an established reputation not only as a first rate musician, but as a conductor to be reckoned with.

Trained by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Bernstein gave evidence of that admirable schooling. In the audience when the Boston Symphony opened its season at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Bernstein went back to see his former teacher.

Incidentally, the coming of Koussevitsky and the Bostonians was, as had been anticipated, a high point of the music season thus far. The master of the baton was in the minds of most of his audience, at his best, and the program was of the all-Russian character in which Dr. Koussevitsky revels. The opening number, Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, with its opulent melodies, the new Stravinsky Ode, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation and dedicated to the conductor's deceased wife—which as one critic said was happily reminiscent of the earlier Stravinsky—and Ravel's arrangement of Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, which in its vividness and variety is a peculiarly effective concert piece, constituted the program. The house was of "standing room only" variety, and critics and audience alike gave rapt attention. Reviews again pointed out, as invariably happens when the Boston Symphiny comes to New York, that it is unquestionably the finest orchestra in America today, possibly the finest orchestra in the world.

Pennario Acclaimed

Private Leonard Pennario, 19-year-old pianist, who flew from the Army Air Field at Palm Springs, California, to be soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony at its midweek concert, built himself a substantial concert reputation with his brilliant rendering of the Liszt E Flat Major Piano Concerto. Dr. Autur Rodzinski conducted. The young private is a handsome lad whose compelling appearance in his trim uniform detracted in no way from the success of his performance. Like Bernstein, he received an ovation that was definitely "fortissimo." Here, also, is youthful talent that will loom large if the exigencies of war do not remove Private Pennario from the concert scene.

John Charles Thomas, perennial favorite, particularly with those who like their baritone music alternately lusty and mellow, was early-week soloist in a program composed largely of old favorites. Mr. Thomas is one of those singers you can depend upon, always seeming in good voice, always master of himself, and now, after years of recital giving, so apt at his program numbers that an audience can relax with a feeling of complete ease, knowing that everything will go forward with precision. On the list this time were such selections as Duparc's Phidyle, Pierne's Em Barque, Widor's Contemplation, Torelli's Tu lo sai, Beethoven's In questa tomba, Strausa's Ruhe meine Seele, all trusted and tried baritone numbers, and a considerable array of songs in English. Although no longer in the first flush of youth, Thomas still remains a "matinee idol" for a lot of youthful music lovers who were present in large numbers to greet their favorite.

Jennie Tourel, former star of the Opera Comique, who fled Paris before the German hordes, and has already made herself known in this Country through appearance with The New Opera Company, and as soloist with major orchestras, demonstrated in a recital program at Town Hall this past week that she is equally at home on the concert platfrom. Here is a new concert singer that is sure to travel far, for her beauty of voice, ease of delivery and charm of personality are all first rate concert assets. The French-Canadian soprano sang a group of French songs, a group of Russian songs, and as her piece de resistance Rossini's La Cenerentola.

The Metropolitan Opera's "Diamond Horseshoe" will blaze tonight as the Diamond Jubilee season of America's premier temple of opera is ushered in. The bill will be Boris Godunoff and that dependable basso and fine actor, Ezio Pinza, will have the title role in the Moussorgsky opera once identified primarily with Feodor Chaliapin. A big subscription list with the old, brilliant New York names and a lot of new ones among the boxholder occupants of the "horseshoe" and a packed house, with hundreds pleading for a chance to buy even admission, augur one of the "Met's" most spectacular openings.

Following closely upon "Boris," will come some of the major offerings of the season's opera. Wednesday evening will bring Tristan and Isolde; Thursday Lucia with Lily Pons in the title role; Friday Der Rosenkavalier of Richard Strauss; Saturday afternoon La Forza del Destino and Saturday evening the tear-jerking La Boheme with Jarmila Novotna as the ill-fated Mimi and Armand Tokatyan as Ru-

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
~~BULLETIN~~
Jan
NOV 24 1943

MUSIC

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony with Smeterlin at Piano

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, was soloist, in the Chopin concerto in F minor.

The weather did its best to keep people away, but they attended in the customary large numbers, and they seemed to feel that they had been well repaid. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Smeterlin, and the orchestra were applauded often and long.

The program comprised three easy pieces—the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture," the Beethoven symphony in D major, and the Chopin concerto—and one that wasn't too difficult, a symphonic picture contrived by Robert Russell Bennett from the music to Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess."

The first three, at least, could be played by the orchestra without rehearsal, and it may be that they were. The performance was not up to the last one that Mr. Burgin gave here. There was plenty of life in all his work last night, and that is a very desirable element, but there was often a want of finish. The larghetto in the symphony, for instance, did not achieve the luminous quality that so well becomes the melodies; Mr. Burgin was more in the vein of the livelier third and fourth movements. But, if his reading was notable for vigor rather than subtlety, it was still a reading that communicated something to the listener and was pleasant and satisfying.

The concerto, as has been said frequently, is no great shakes as a concerto; the orchestra is rather impolitely ignored most of the time, while the piano is provided with a set of such sweet and beguiling sounds as only Chopin has been able to invent. What could be done with the orchestral background was done capably by Mr. Burgin. Mr. Smeterlin, as master of Chopin, presided in his own department with suavity and feeling. Perfection of tone, rhythmic urge, and refined contrasts in volume contributed to a performance that transported the audience. It might have been transported even further if Mr. Smeterlin had foregone the soulful glances and distracting gestures that he added to the score from time to time.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 22 1943

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

RUSSIAN CONCERT BY BOSTON GROUP

Koussevitzky Leads Symphony in Living Composers' Music —Kappel, Pianist, Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

When Dr. Koussevitzky appeared on the stage of Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra he announced briefly that the concert would be prefaced by two national hymns, not one. The first would be the Russian national anthem. The second would be America's.

The announcement brought hearty applause. The orchestra played "The Internationale." Then the audience sang, with the orchestra, "The Star-Spangled Banner."

The nature of this symbolic ceremony was sustained in the performances which followed, when an internationally famous American orchestra and a conductor whose career and citizenship make him the possession of both countries discoursed music exclusively by living Russian composers. The concert also witnessed the appearance of a young American pianist, William Kappel, who had the good fortune to present with exceptional success an unfamiliar and highly interesting Soviet concerto. These factors, and a series of superlative performances, made a memorable occasion.

Concerto of Katchatourian

The piano concerto of Aram Katchatourian, an arresting exotic and masterfully articulated score, was first played in this city by Maro Arjemian on March 14 of last year under Albert Stoessel at the Juilliard School of Music. It was first heard in Boston when Bernard Weiser presented it at a "Pop" concert on July 13 under Arthur Fiedler's baton. There was a later performance at a Russian Relief concert in this city last Fall, but this was the first time that this concerto had a hearing at a major symphony concert in New York.

In view of the fact that it was composed as early as 1935, one wonders why it has been this long coming into its own. For it is going to be a very popular concerto, and a much needed addition to the numbers of the few remaining works in that form that maintain their place in the repertory.

So much, at least, is immediately evident, and so much was endorsed by the delighted audience of yesterday afternoon. The music is really oriental, but not in a merely local way, or in superficial exterior traits of the music. This is racial. These exotic themes, now barbaric and powerful, like the theme, a true descendant of Borodin, which opens the work; or the curious harmonic dress and ululation of the second theme of the same section that might sound from the bazaar; or the theme as slant-eyed as an odalisque, the languorous song which is the major idea of the middle movement, or the dervish dance motives of the whirling finale—these things come from something deeper than conscious thought; they are ancestral voices.

Part of Symphonic Fabric

Then there is the piano style. Part of the time this writing is properly a part of the symphonic fabric, or of passages most effectively conceived for virtuoso display. But there is another element in what would constitute in other hands mere solo cadenzas. In this concerto cadenzas mean really free and masterly developments, in an idiom particularly pianist, and Eastern, and rhapsodic in spirit, of the themes. The second theme of the first movement, for example, is thus given a special and immediate development by this means. This is one of several instances of the kind.

But the symphonic line is never lost. All the movements are on a broad plan, with needed contrasts of material and mood and original combinations of piano and orchestra, but all knit together, and at last the barbaric theme of the beginning returning for a thundering peroration and a devouring climax for piano and orchestra.

The concerto has a special technique, fresh and idiomatic for the solo instrument, requiring not only sure rhythm, force, speed, but also imagination and poetical coloring. Mr. Kappel met these demands with a fine physical equipment, a musician's sensibility and responsiveness to Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. He can acquire more depth of tone, more authority and breadth. In a word, he can mature as an artist only matures, with much practical experience and routine. But in conception and execution he gave an excellent account of himself, and Dr. Koussevitzky brought him back to the stage many times in response to the applause.

Score Often Heard Here

The concert found Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in the highest interpretative vein. He has often performed the "Classic Symphony" here, but probably never as convincingly as yesterday. The score was put in such a light that what had appeared to this commentator as a rather obvious set of tricks in the pseudo-classic manner became now true music-notes transmuted into something entirely sun-lit, songful, Italianate; a score seen to be a true jeux d'esprit on the part of a modern master; one which in its substance and its mercurial by-play would fittingly companion the commedia dell' arte. This, indeed, was virtuoso conducting, interpretation, performance in the utmost meaning of the word.

Dr. Koussevitzky did everything that he might for Shostakovich's symphony, of which it can be said that repeated hearings confirm its palpable weakness and its inescapable strengths. We believe it to be by far the best of Shostakovich's symphonies up to the present. It is uneven, in substance eclectic and mainly derivative from many composers who thoughtlessly anticipated Mr. Shostakovich in their scores, such as Strauss of "Rosenkavalier" in the second theme of the first movement; Mahler, particularly in the second movement, which is the slickest and essentially the most superficial part of the score.

The great movement is the slow movement, which touches rare heights of lyricism. The finale has a violence and a dramatic culmination which may not be of the most beautiful or elevated kind. But things which are not beautiful, indeed are most horrible and in earnest, in which Mr. Shostakovich and his countrymen have recently taken part. Anyone who has seen even a documentary film of certain Russian war episodes will feel responsive to the fiery, brutal and finally triumphant conclusion of this Fifth symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading was powerfully dramatic and even mystical in the slow movement.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

I may be fabulously mistaken, but it seems to me that Gardner Read has written the most original, most remarkable and most compelling symphony of this war in his Second Symphony.

"Of this war" is purely my own speculation; maybe in Mr. Read's conception it is a tone picture of Kansas City, where he is currently working and living or, for all I know, an etude in orchestral sonority. But to me it is a vividly contemporary musical utterance with the stark authenticity of a newsreel of Marines landing on Bougainville or a dispatch from Sicily.

From beginning to end there is a sense of nervous compulsion about the symphony as though the composer were desperately anxious to get what he felt down on paper somehow. It is true that he could not cram all this urgency into his symphony and achieve, at the same time, a perfectly finished structure. There are many unfulfilled moments and many awkward ones. Sometimes the level of inspiration falters, as in the section of the slow movement from the entrance of the trumpet to the return of the theme in the low strings, which is perilously near banality. Let these lapses are ridiculously unimportant when you come face to face with inspiration so intense as Mr. Read's.

If the audience expected to hear "escape" music in the symphony, it was disappointed yesterday. It is harsh and driving and uncompromising, but these are harsh and uncompromising times. And it is bracing to know that an American composer can forget technical slickness and face his responsibility to convey, at white heat, music which smacks, not of the ivory tower or the slide-rule, but of the times. As I say, unless I am colossally misled by my senses, Mr. Read's symphony is as much of the times as a letter from the front lines, just as faltering, and nearly as awesome. The regrettable thing is it will not be broadcast, for while few might feel as I do, many might find its curiously feverish quality sticks with them, and that, after all, is enough.

The rest of the program was so-so. The Beethoven is always good, of course, and Mr. Burgin did well with it. The Bach was wretched in the worst orchestral transcription of the generation, and the "Porgy and Bess" thing was painful throughout. Indeed (and with all respect to Gershwin) a "cornier" piece could not be imagined. Ah well, symphony orchestras never seem to learn they sound as ridiculous trying to play like Duke Ellington as Duke Ellington does trying to play like a symphony orchestra. Jazz is an art with as much integrity as any other, and it should be respected.

Next week's program offers Mahler's great "Das Lied von der Erde" and Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the seventh concert of the 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gardner Read was the guest conductor in the first performance of his Second Symphony. The program was as follows:

Beethoven	Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 36
Bahch	Prelude and Fugue in E flat for organ (arr. Schoenberg)
Read	Symphony No. 2, Op. 45
Gershwin	"Porgy and Bess," Symphonic Picture by Robert Russell Bennett

---

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Three master symphonists—Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—make this week's Boston Symphony program one of classic strength and symmetrical beauty. Serge Koussevitzky, having recovered from a bout with one of the prevalent illnesses, returns to conduct the orchestra, after its annual Midwest tour, in Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88; Mozart's Symphony in E-flat (K. 543); and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

There are two standard views on such a program. Because nothing new is offered, you immediately can expect that old chestnut which puts familiarity and contempt in juxtaposition. At the opposite pole is the thought that familiar things are often good, for they promote mental and emotional relaxation.

The three symphonies are akin in mood. The Haydn Symphony is graceful and urbane with a bit of fancy here, a delicious turn of phrase there. Mozart's E-flat Symphony, one of three priceless jewels in the crown of his orchestral writing (the other two: The G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies), is limpid and lyrical, gay throughout, and quite different from the equal perfecton of the other two. Various meanings, in as many periods, have been read into the Beethoven Seventh. But it seems to reveal the most when considered as absolute music. The "unbuttoned joy" of the finale, the forward drive, the caprice and the dance rhythms are all to be taken in stride.

Curiously, the orchestra failed to sustain the dramatic tension of the slow introductions to the three works. Yet the faster movements were played with fair precision and sureness. Otherwise the Boston Symphony's familiar persuasiveness and energy were happily present.

Beginning a week from tonight, the Saturday concerts will commence at 8:30, when radio broadcasts will be sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee. At that time the program will include Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12; the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius; three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," and Schumann's Cello Concerto in which Gregor Piatigorsky will be soloist (not at this week's concerts as incorrectly reported on this page yesterday.)—J. W. R.

[27]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1943

Kapell Plays Concerto With The Bostonians

Pianist Performs Under Koussevitsky in Another All-Russian Program

By Paul Bowles

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with William Kapell, pianist, as soloist, in an all-Russian program Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The program:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Piano Concerto..........Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovitch

The vogue for all-Russian concerts is still in full swing; it has been going on for quite a while and will doubtless continue. There would seem to be no reason to object to it, particularly since during this war we are fortunate enough to be allowed to hear our German friends as well. Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky presented us with his second, all-Russian program of the week, and the orchestra as usual sounded like the perfect instrument that it is.

First the orchestra tossed off the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony. No sparks flew, but present were the inimitable nonchalance, verve and finesse with which the Boston gentlemen always approach the work, and which make it a recurrent delight.

Then came the Khatchatourian Concerto; which carries on, in a way, the tradition of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Kapell advanced boldly into its Near-Eastern labyrinths. The composer made the solo pathway relatively clear at the start, and the piano writing was grateful and functional, without much waste motion. In the first movement this effectiveness was often present in the surrounding orchestration. One section of the development showed a gleaming cloth-of-gold texture which was not equaled in originality alas, elsewhere in the work.

On arriving at the second movement, one shortly realized that Mr. Khatchatourian had already said in the first movement what there was to be said. Themes here were childishly repetitive, the Oriental element was stressed in harmonies of rosewater and musk. (Near-Eastern melodic turns are always offensive when combined with the harmonic traditions of the West. Only in Spain with the taking over of guitar harmonies has it been possible to preserve some sort of integrity in this matter.) The third movement was energetic and playful, and in spots was reminiscent of the last movement of the Gershwin Concerto in F, if not so successful rhythmically as that work.

There was just about enough vitality and inventiveness in the concerto for a piece the length of the first movement. The rest was an unwelcome bonus. Mr. Kapell, however, with incisive energy and a great sense of direction, rode shining through the frivolous-sounding cadenzas, skirting the morasses of blatant instrumentation, to the triumphant end.

Coming on the heels of the Khatchatourian piece, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony made a startling impression of seriousness. The dramatic impact present in the opening of the first movement and in the whole third movement make it particularly regrettable that the rest of the frame should rely on such flimsy harmonic stays and struts, and that the emotional evocation should be constantly dissipated rather than becoming cumulative.

Only the Boston Symphony could have created the wonderful sense of hollow magnitude which emerged yesterday from the largo, with its cobwebs of string sounds and its diaphanous close. Dr. Koussevitzky made the tempo remarkably slow, and precisely because of that man[illegible] to sustain the mood of this pec[illegible]arly elongated movement to its last breath. This is excellent Shostakovich, and it is typical of him to follow it with an unwanted, callow finale. Like our own Saroyan in literature, Shostakovich has the careless and destructive habit of treating old sentimentalities and platitudes and tender personal discoveries with equal solicitude.

NEWS
NOV 19 1943

RECEIVE DEGREES AT WILLIAMS

Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises of W ms College, Williamstown. Front row (l. to r.): Alfred N. Richards, University of Pennsylvania; Fra nox, Secretary of the Navy; James P. Baxter, president of Williams who presented degrees; Charles S our, president of Yale University; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back r to r.): Elmo Roper, director of Fortune survey; William E. Park, president of Northfield School; Jero Hunsaker, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Roger W. Riis, vice president Williams Alumni Socie

---

APPEARING WITHOUT its renowned conductor, the Boston Symphony carried on last night and gave a fine performance proving that it is still one of the leading orchestras in the world today.

Dr. Koussevitsky's place was filled by the concertmaster and associate conductor of the orchestra, Richard Burgin; and this substitution was accompanied by a program change. Everyone warmed up on the Classical Symphony by Prokofieff, which took the place of William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, originally planned. It must be admitted that there were misgivings as to just how the evening would turn out, for this number seemed to resemble a contest between string sections with Mr. Burgin on the sidelines. Nor did these misgivings disappear until the Shostakovitch was well under way, and from then on the evening was a success.

THE ENTIRE AUDIENCE was disappointed that Koussevitsky could not appear, and this was a handicap for the orchestra, as the natural reaction of many people was to settle down discontentedly and prepare to listen to an inferior performance. This of course was not the case; it would be illogical if such a fine group of musicians could not appear without its leader. Naturally the performance lacked a certain touch that only a master can give it, making the difference between a good performance and an excellent one; but in all fairness to Mr. Burgin, who did such a fine job, it must be remembered that he was handicapped by the necessity of watching a score.

The dramatic First Symphony of Shostakovitch was the highlight of the program. Written by the composer at the age of twenty, it is a brilliant work full of color, life and compelling rhythms. After overcoming their first timidity, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra carried the work through to a great climax in the last movement, which was the best of the four.

After intermission came three works which might have been done blindfolded. Debussy's Two Nocturnes was the first of these, followed by Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina." The last number, Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice, was popular as always and proved to be a proper ending to a very enjoyable performance. It left the audience standing in the aisles, applauding enthusiastically for an encore that was not granted.

—Jean Athay

Assistant Conductor Directs Symphony

Boston Orchestra Impressive in Concert At Toledo Art Museum

By DONNA PAYDEN

Another laurel was added to the crown of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night when it appeared in the Toledo Museum of Art, under the direction of Dr. Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor.

Dr. Burgin, who replaced Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, ill with a severe cold, did an excellent and forceful job of conducting. His interpretations of the selections presented, were not, as might easily have been, carbon copies of Dr. Koussevitsky.

Especially noticeable was the work with the string section of the orchestra, outstanding in tone and sonority.

Because of the size of the string section many passages in the first selection "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," by Brahms, ordinarily undistinquishable, were brought out.

Dr. Burgin seemed to have a long and detailed view of the First Symphony. Especially enjoyable were the two final movements of the selection.

In his interpretation of Schoenberg's "Kerklaerte Nacht, Op. 4," he was truly rhapsodic, again showing his intimate knowledge of string instruments.

For those who can not bring themselves to care for Brahms, the final number of the program was a welcome antidote. The "Capriccio Espagnol, Opus 34," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was one of the most delightful numbers on the program.

Written in the usual style of the great Russian composer, the music was pleasantly light and enjoyable. Movements included "Alborado," "Variations," "Alborado," "Scene and Gypsy Dance," and "Fandango of the Asturias."

TEXTILE WORLD
NEW YORK CITY

DEC -- 1943

Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., Milwaukee, will sponsor the weekly broadcast of concerts by the Boston Symphony on the Blue Network of 171 stations. Marking the debut of this industrial organization as a national radio advertiser, the broadcasts will be heard under Allis-Chalmers' sponsorship every Saturday evening from 8:15 to 9:15 p.m., EWT, beginning on a date to be announced. Meanwhile the concerts will continue as a sustaining feature of the Blue Network.

Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Boston Symphony Gives Its First Concert at the Academy of Music

Those magical sounds which emanate from the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Koussevitzky, setting it apart from other orchestras, fell gratifyingly on the ear at the Academy of Music last night. Listening to its orchestral texture was almost sufficiency itself. Because of it, the brief Commando March of Samuel Barber had a winning brilliance. It redeemed the Piano Concerto of Khatchatourian from degenerating into so much clatter. It made eloquent the beloved First Symphony of Brahms.

This first program placed new and old music in questionable balance. The Barber March makes no pretense of being more than it is. The composer has fashioned it adroitly and has undoubtedly served the propaganda purposes of O. W. I. most effectively. As it falls within the five-minute limit on those works of the League of Composers now being presented by the Philharmonic-Symphony, it qualifies as an excellent piece on a war theme. This music reassures us that the gifted Mr. Barber is holding his own in the army.

Of the Khatchatourian Concerto, the best that might be said is that its serviceability as a "vehicle" for 21-year-old William Kapell, who was the soloist on this occasion, is undeniable. He shone brilliantly in it because as a technical show piece, it suits him perfectly. There was no doubting his bravura style, his glistening fingerwork, and his assured obviousness.

The work sounded like Liszt's E Flat Concerto brought up to date and somewhat Sovietized. Should the Andante make it worth hearing, the Finale reduces it to sheer display with all the clap-trap available, including much kitten-on-the-keys material. Some people stomach such superficiality, but it could do little for Mr. Kapell except show off his technical ability. His fast playing was not always accurate, and he was guilty of considerable pounding.

The Brahms exerted its monumental power, set forth so majestically by Koussevitzky. Contrary to the extremes of tempo noted in his Carnegie Hall concert the preceding evening, this symphony was kept better in line, though the broadening-out and quickening-up tendencies were evident in the Finale. The dramatic ending came suddenly instead of accumulatively. But the orchestra did the work full justice, though there were a few slips, more noticeable perhaps because so unexpected.

Bathed in such effulgence of orchestral tone, however, the capacity audience could exult in its good fortune of having the Boston Symphony at its doorstep again.

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1943

Gardner Read Conducts His Second Symphony

Read and Beethoven, two original composers, had to compete at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, yesterday afternoon, against Schönberg and Bennett, a pair of facile and entertaining arrangers; and the two who stood on the merits of their own music, the disadvantages considered, came out pretty well. Gardner Read, American, was represented on the program with his Symphony No. 2, op. 45; and he himself, invited to town for the occasion, appeared on the platform of Symphony Hall directing the first presentation anywhere of his three-movement work (Presto, Adagio, Largamente). Beethoven likewise was represented with his Symphony No. 2 in D major in four-movement form, which lists among his works as op. 36.

As for Arnold Schönberg, his contribution to proceedings was his orchestration of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for Organ, known as "St. Anne's." Then for Robert Russell Bennett, his entry in the exhibition was a Symphonic Picture on George Gershwin's Negro opera, "Porgy and Bess."

To take note of the new symphony and its performance, the first movement, no mistake, took hold of the matinée listeners interest with firm grip. That the attitude of the audience was hospitable to start with needs not be said. The Boston Symphony conductor has brought his public to such a pass that any native effort in the way of composing is warmly accepted for a trial. Dr. Koussevitzky may conduct himself, he may turn the duty over to Mr. Burgin as associate conductor, or he may let the composer, as at this time, show what he can do. In any case, keen and encouraging attention on the part of the house is certain. Nor was it out of mere politeness that the people were all but gasping at a moment of high pause in that energetic, assertive Presto.

Which meant just one thing. They expected something. They were right up to edge, unexaggeratingly to remark, of ecstasy when the Presto concluded; and what a chance for the music, when it made its way into the Adagio! A chance, indeed, but a rather missed one; for no song of any particular distinction came into sound there. A few romantic, quite commonplace strains, and the opportunity went by. The last movement ran mostly in the vein of the first; contrasts and excitements abounded, though scarcely so much as a fragment of a tune to remember the day by got realized.

All the same, the Read Symphony No. 2 reaches ahead. It is no backward glance, like the Schönberg and Gershwin arrangements. It does something to a listener's aspirations, after all, where the works of the two orchestrators do little more than beguile and [illegible] recollection.

W. P. T.

[28]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 22 1943

Kapell Plays Concerto With The Bostonians

Pianist Performs Under Koussevitsky in Another All-Russian Program

By Paul Bowles

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, with William Kapell, pianist, as soloist, in an all-Russian program Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The program:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
Piano Concerto..........Khatchatourian
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47....Shostakovitch

The vogue for all-Russian concerts is still in full swing; it has been going on for quite a while and will doubtless continue. There would seem to be no reason to object to it, particularly since during this war we are fortunate enough to be allowed to hear our German friends as well. Saturday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky presented us with his second, all-Russian program of the week, and the orchestra as usual sounded like the perfect instrument that it is.

First the orchestra tossed off the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony. No sparks flew, but present were the inimitable nonchalance, verve and finesse with which the Boston gentlemen always approach the work, and which make it a recurrent delight.

Then came the Khatchatourian Concerto, which carries on, in a way, the tradition of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Kapell advanced boldly into its Near-Eastern labyrinths. The composer made the solo pathway relatively clear at the start, and the piano writing was grateful and functional, without much waste motion. In the first movement this effectiveness was often present in the surrounding orchestration. One section o the development showed a gleaming cloth-of-gold texture whic was not equaled in originality, alas, elsewhere in the work.

On arriving at the secon movement, one shortly realize that Mr. Khatchatourian had already said in the first movement what there was to be said. Themes here were childishly repetitive, the Oriental element was stressed in harmonies of rosewater and musk. (Near-Eastern melodic turns are always offensive when combined with the harmonic traditions of the West. Only in Spain with the taking over of guitar harmonies has it been possible to preserve some sort of integrity in this matter.) The third movement was energetic and playful, and in spots was reminiscent of the last movement of the Gershwin Concerto in F, if not so successful rhythmically as that work.

There was just about enough vitality and inventiveness in the concerto for a piece the length of the first movement. The rest was an unwelcome bonus. Mr. Kapell, however, with incisive energy and a great sense of direction, rode shining through the frivolous-sounding cadenzas, skirting the morasses of blatant instrumentation, to the triumphant end.

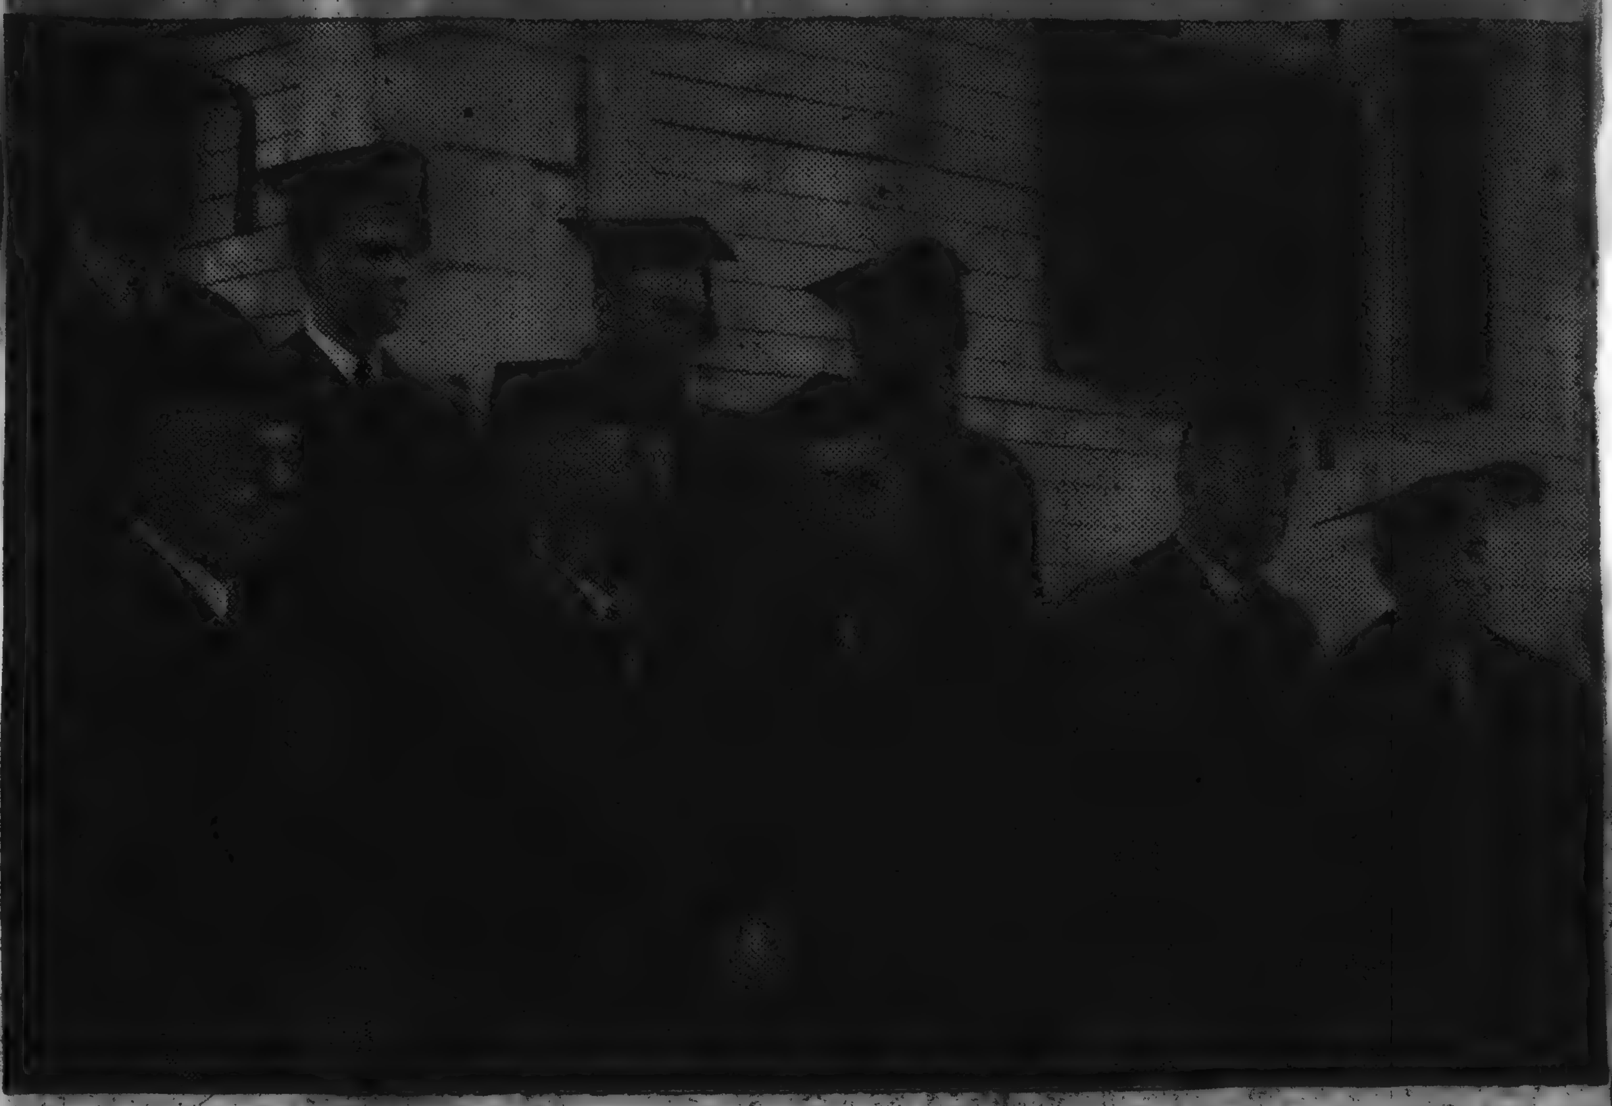
Coming on the heels of the Khatchatourian piece, the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony made a startling impression of seriousness. The dramatic impact present in the opening of the first movement and in the whole third movement make it particularly regrettable that the rest of the frame should rely on such flimsy harmonic stays and struts, and that the emotional evocation should be constantly dissipated rather than becoming cumulative.

Only the Boston Symphony could have created the wonderful sense of hollow magnitude which emerged yesterday from the largo, with its cobwebs of string sounds and its diaphanous close. Dr. Koussevitzky made the tempo remarkably slow, and precisely because of that man[illegible] to sustain the mood of this pec[illegible]arly elongated movement to its [illegible]ast breath. This is excellent Shostakovich, and it is typical of him to follow it with an unwanted, callow finale. Like our own Saroyan in literature, Shostakovich has the careless and destructive habit of treating old sentimentalities and platitudes and tender personal discoveries with equal solicitude.

ER, MASS.
NEWS

NOV 19 1943

RECEIVE DEGREES AT WILLIAMS



Honorary degrees were conferred on this group at the 150th anniversary commencement exercises of W ms College, Williamstown. Front row (l. to r.): Alfred N. Richards, University of Pennsylvania; Fra nox, Secretary of the Navy; James P. Baxter, president of Williams who presented degrees; Charles S our, president of Yale University; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra. Back r to r.): Elmo Roper, director of Fortune survey; William E. Park, president of Northfield School; Jero Hunsaker, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Roger W. Riis, vice president Williams Alumni Socie

---

Assistant Conductor Directs Symphony

Boston Orchestra Impressive in Concert At Toledo Art Museum

By DONNA FAYDEN

Another laurel was added to the crown of the Boston Symphony orchestra last night when it appeared in the Toledo Museum of Art, under the direction of Dr. Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor.

Dr. Burgin, who replaced Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, ill with a severe cold, did an excellent and forceful job of conducting. His interpretations of the selections presented, were not, as might easily have been, carbon copies of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Especially noticeable was the work with the string section of the orchestra, outstanding in tone and sonority.

Because of the size of the string section many passages in the first selection "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," by Brahms, ordinarily undistinquishable, were brought out.

Dr. Burgin seemed to have a long and detailed view of the First Symphony. Especially enjoyable were the two final movements of the selection.

In his interpretation of Schoenberg's "Kerklaerte Nacht, Op. 4," he was truly rhapsodic, again showing his intimate knowledge of string instruments.

For those who can not bring themselves to care for Brahms, the final number of the program was a welcome antidote. The "Capriccio Espagnol, Opus 34," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was one of the most delightful numbers on the program.

Written in the usual style of the great Russian composer, the music was pleasantly light and enjoyable. Movements included "Alborada," "Variations," "Alborado," "Scene and Gypsy Dance," and "Fandango of the Asturias."

TEXTILE WORLD
NEW YORK CITY

DEC -- 1943

Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co., Milwaukee, will sponsor the weekly broadcast of concerts by the Boston Symphony on the Blue Network of 171 stations. Marking the debut of this industrial organization as a national radio advertiser, the broadcasts will be heard under Allis-Chalmers' sponsorship every Saturday evening from 8:15 to 9:15 p.m., EWT, beginning on a date to be announced. Meanwhile the concerts will continue as a sustaining feature of the Blue Network.

APPEARING WITHOUT its renowned conductor, the Boston Symphony carried on la night and gave a fine performance proving tha it is still one of the leading orchestras in th world today.

Dr. Koussevitsky's place was filled by the concertmaster and associate conductor of the orchestra, Richard Burgin; and this substitutio was accompanied by a program change. Everyone warmed up on the Classical Symphony b Prokofieff, which took the place of Willia Schuman's Symphony for Strings, originall planned. It must be admitted that there wer misgivings as to just how the evening woul turn out, for this number seemed to resemble contest between string sections with Mr. Burgi on the sidelines. Nor did these misgivings disappear until the Shostakovitch was well unde way, and from then on the evening was a succes

THE ENTIRE AUDIENCE was disappointe that Koussevitsky could not appear, and thi was a handicap for the orchestra, as the natura reaction of many people was to settle down discontentedly and prepare to listen to an inferio performance. This of course was not the cas it would be illogical if such a fine group of musicians could not appear without its leader. Naturally the performance lacked a certain touc that only a master can give it, making the difference between a good performance and an excellent one; but in all fairness to Mr. Burgin who did such a fine job, it must be remembered that he was handicapped by the necessity o watching a score.

The dramatic First Symphony of Shostakovitch was the highlight of the program. Written by the composer at the age of twenty, i is a brilliant work full of color, life and compelling rhythms. After overcoming their first timidity, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra carried the work through to a great climax in the last movement, which was the best of the four.

After intermission came three works whic might have been done blindfolded. Debussy Two Nocturnes was the first of these, followe by Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina. The last number, Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanis Caprice, was popular as always and proved to b a proper ending to a very enjoyable performance. It left the audience standing in the aisles, applauding enthusiastically for an encore that wa not granted.

—Jean Atl

Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

NOV 20 1943

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Boston Symphony Gives Its First Concert at the Academy of Music

Those magical sounds which emanate from the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Koussevitzky, setting it apart from other orchestras, fell gratifyingly on the ear at the Academy of Music last night. Listening to its orchestral texture was almost sufficiency itself. Because of it, the brief Commando March of Samuel Barber had a winning brilliance. It redeemed the Piano Concerto of Khatchatourian from degenerating into so much clatter. It made eloquent the beloved First Symphony of Brahms.

This first program placed new and old music in questionable balance. The Barber March makes no pretense of being more than it is. The composer has fashioned it adroitly and has undoubtedly served the propaganda purposes of O. W. I. most effectively. As it falls within the five-minute limit on those works of the League of Composers now being presented by the Philharmonic-Symphony, it qualifies as an excellent piece on a war theme. This music reassures us that the gifted Mr. Barber is holding his own in the army.

Of the Khatchatourian Concerto, the best that might be said is that its serviceability as a "vehicle" for 21-year-old William Kapell, who was the soloist on this occasion, is undeniable. He shone brilliantly in it because as a technical show piece, it suits him perfectly. There was no doubting his bravura style, his glistening fingerwork, and his assured obviousness.

The work sounded like Liszt's E Flat Concerto brought up to date and somewhat Sovietized. Should the Andante make it worth hearing, the Finale reduces it to sheer display with all the clap-trap available, including much kitten-on-the-keys material. Some people stomach such superficiality, but it could do little for Mr. Kapell except show off his technical ability. His fast playing was not always accurate, and he was guilty of considerable pounding.

The Brahms exerted its monumental power, set forth so majestically by Koussevitzky. Contrary to the extremes of tempo noted in his Carnegie Hall concert the preceding evening, this symphony was kept better in line, though the broadening-out and quickening-up tendencies were evident in the Finale. The dramatic ending came suddenly instead of accumulatively. But the orchestra did the work full justice, though there were a few slips, more noticeable perhaps because so unexpected.

Bathed in such effulgence of orchestral tone, however, the capacity audience could exult in its good fortune of having the Boston Symphony at its doorstep again.

CIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1943

Gardner Read Conducts His Second Symphony

Read and Beethoven, two original composers, had to compete at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, yesterday afternoon, against Schönberg and Bennett, a pair of facile and entertaining arrangers; and the two who stood on the merits of their own music, the disadvantages considered, came out pretty well. Gardner Read, American, was represented on the program with his Symphony No. 2, op. 45; and he himself, invited to town for the occasion, appeared on the platform of Symphony Hall directing the first presentation anywhere of his three-movement work (Presto, Adagio, Largamente). Beethoven likewise was represented with his Symphony No. 2 in D major in four-movement form, which lists among his works as op. 36.

As for Arnold Schönberg, his contribution to proceedings was his orchestration of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat for Organ, known as "St. Anne's." Then for Robert Russell Benn[illegible] his entry in the [illegible] was [illegible]ymphonic Pictur[illegible] [illegible]'s Negro [illegible]

To take note of the new symphony and its performance, the first movement, no mistake, took hold of the matinée listeners interest with firm grip. That the attitude of the audience was hospitable to start with needs not be said. The Boston Symphony conductor has brought his public to such a pass that any native effort in the way of composing is warmly accepted for a trial. Dr. Koussevitzky may conduct himself, he may turn the duty over to Mr. Burgin as associate conductor, or he may let the composer, as at this time, show what he can do. In any case, keen and encouraging attention on the part of the house is certain. Nor was it out of mere politeness that the people were all but gasping at a moment of high pause in that energetic, assertive Presto.

Which meant just one thing. They expected something. They were right up to edge, unexaggeratingly to remark, of ecstasy when the Presto concluded; and what a chance for the music, when it made its way into the Adagio! A chance, indeed, but a rather missed one; for no song of any particular distinction came into sound there. A few romantic, quite commonplace strains, and the opportunity went by. The last movement ran mostly in the vein of the first; contrasts and excitements abounded, though scarcely so much as a fragment of a tune to remember the day by got realized.

All the same, the Read Symphony No. 2 reaches ahead. It is no backward glance, like the Schönberg and Gershwin arrangements. It does something to a listener's aspirations, after all, where the works of the two orchestrators do little more than beguile and [illegible] recollection.

W. P. T.

Boston Orchestra Presents Concert At Auditorium

By Carl Gehring

Ann Arbor, up to yesterday, was faced with one of the great events of the current musical season: the 12th annual appearance of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra at Hill auditorium. Added to this was a program which included a work apiece by two leading if not the foremost composers of this country and Russia, in the persons of William Schuman and Dmitri Shostakovitch, respectively, each of whom was to be represented by a symphony. Two Nocturnes by Debussy, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Opus 34, were to round out a program which bid fair to reveal the Boston musicians in all of their accustomed glory.

As it turned out, an enjoyable concert did transpire last evening but it was a far cry from what had been anticipated. In the first place, illness prevented Koussevitzky from directing, his place being taken by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin, who serves as concert-master when Koussevitzky wields the baton. Secondly, the Schuman Symphony for Strings was replaced by Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, a notable work which, however, did not point up the interest as much as the unfamiliar American composition might have. The recollection of the playing here of Schuman's Third Symphony two years ago still lingers and had bred a taste for further hearings of this man's music. His Secular Cantata No. 2, "A Free Song," incidentally, was awarded the Pulitzer prize in music this year and is the first musical work ever to be so honored.

Burgin Is Able Leader

In any case, the concert was more than fair if wanting the flair that had been expected. Burgin turned out to be an able leader and the Boston orchestra still was the Boston orchestra, what with an incomparable string section, woodwinds which for sheen left little to be desired, a brass choir that can really give out the most resonant trumpetings without becoming strident, and a battery that has what it takes. The program, now four to one Russian as to composers rather than the scheduled three to two, still offered plenty of interest despite the presence of several well-known old war horses.

Chief interest in this concert had to do with the Shostakovitch Symphony as a composition and the presentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio. The symphony is the first of a series of major works for orchestra and stage that have come from Shostakovitch since 1925 and which mark their composer as a representative and an outstanding figure. The piece obviously is the work of a master of his trade and points the way for the later symphonies in the modernity of its style. It says easily what it has to say but leaves a doubt as to how much real creative force motivated its conception. Examples of hesitation in the way the music unfolds, perhaps indicative of an inhibition in the free flow of its ideas, produce an effect which is at once perplexing and intriguing. This music, more objective than subjective in approach, addresses primarily the intellect rather than the impulses.

Capriccio Espagnol

With such an orchestra as the Boston performing, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol was a welcome adjunct to the program. This is one of the finest examples of instrumentation in musical literature and led Tschaikowsky, himself an outstanding orchestrator, to compliment Rimsky on his achievement. The piece, of course, is extremely well known, and dated, yet it was a real opportunity to hear an orchestra of the Boston's calibre light into Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant orchestral canvas and project it in all of its highly colored beauty.

Burgin's conducting of the concert was direct, with an attack that was convincing if wanting in subtlety. He maintained consistently good balances among the orchestral choirs and achieved some effective climaxes, the finale of the Shostakovitch Symphony and the close of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio being striking. His shadings in the woodwinds in the Gavotte from Prokofieff's Symphony were beautifully drawn, but he failed to get the most out of the second variation in the Andante Con Moto, from Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio. Here a single note, twice stated low in the clarinet, is magical in its effect and vital to the context, but on this occasion it was barely audible.

The total impact of this fifth concert of the Choral Union series, however, was favorable, and a capacity house reacted most enthusiastically, recalling Burgin repeatedly at the close.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Again we stand in debt of Richard Burgin for a Mahler revival. At this week's Boston Symphony concerts the orchestra's associate conductor produces the Bohemian master's "Song of the Earth" ("Das Lied von der Erde") with Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, as the soloists.

In consequence of the overtowering magnitude of Mahler's spiritual testament, Howard Hanson's new Fourth Symphony, which the composer conducts after the interval in the first public performances, stands in rather unfortunate circumstances. The Symphony might have made its mark were it of different cast, or had it been performed under other conditions. But when Mahler has said about all there is to say of poignant melancholy and darkening grief, when his expression has culminated in the artistic statement that only death is the release from the hurt of life, then the elegaic Hanson Symphony seems an echo of a greater force.

The Hanson Symphony might have added its own personal message (it is inscribed, "In memory of my beloved father"), or perhaps illuminated some of the obscurities of Mahler's greatness, for it is a rugged, forward driving work. But its lack of original expression, its dependence upon musical antecedents, thwarts its evident purpose.

Technically, the Symphony is most skillfully wrought. It has a wonderful sense of movement and enormously clever figurations. Its moods, too, are painted clearly, but they are lugubrious and unrestrained. Its melodic material is undistinguished, with too much dependence upon banal tunes constructed scalewise.

The four movements, each titled, have their special antecedents. The first (Kyrie), cold and bleak, sounds like Sibelius, while the second (Requiescat) is Tchaikovsky, distilled. And in the third (Dies Irae) you can hear the death rattle of some "realistic" pieces by Liszt, Berlioz and Saint-Saens. The terminal movement (Luz Aeterna) is the most individual. Over his work the composer presided, a wrathful figure, driving sonorities and rhythms to their peaks.

The text for the six sections of "Song of the Earth" Mahler took from "The Chinese Flute," Chinese lyrics of the Eighth Century, paraphrased by the German poet, Hans Bethge. Mahler adapted them to his purposes and in the Summer of 1908, after an unhappy season as conductor of the New York Philharmonic, composed "Song of the Earth."

The intensity, the emotional depth and the breadth of philosophic thought which are the heart of "Song of the Earth," are things to be felt rather than described. There are opaque hints here of what we have come to think of as the fragility of the archaic Chinese spirit. But Mahler has distilled this feeling, combined it with Western thought and philisophy to produce an artistic summation, a looking back and a harking forward. "Song of the Earth" is both earthy and rarely delicate.

Mr. Burgin has bound and unified "Song of the Earth" into the complete expression that it is. It is an enormous task, brilliantly accomplished. His soloists are more than adequate to the job. Miss Tourel's opulent tonal qualities are perfectly suited to the work. And Mr. Heinz, making his Boston debut, almost has the aspects of a "heldentenor" in his singing. Both sang in English, although not clearly enough to be understood.—J. W. R.

Baton Rouge, La.
Advocate
12-5-43

SATURDAY

Boston Symphony

The Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate its sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts over the Blue Network on Christmas Day, Saturday, December 25.

Presented every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., EWT throughout this country and via transcriptions to other corners of the globe, each broadcast will feature the world's finest music by this great orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

According to Walter Geist, president of the sponsoring organization, Allis-Chalmer's sole purpose in entering the national radio picture is to bring enjoyable relaxation to those on the home front through direct broadcasting, and to those on the fighting fronts through transcription facilities.

The sponsorship will include the orchestra's three concert series running from October to the end of May. The Boston Symphony orchestra was founded in 1881 and is the oldest permanent symphony organization in the United States. Dr. Koussevitzky has been its conductor for the past twenty years.

Boston Symphony Superb Without Koussevitzky

By WALTER BLODGETT
Music Critic

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Music Hall which will not be forgotten soon. The great crowd attending this program, presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association, under the management of Mrs. Emile Brudno, gave the orchestra and its pinch-hitting conductor a tremendous ovation.

The wave of chagrin caused by an announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's illness was of short duration, as Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, began to release the wonderful sounds for which the Boston Symphony is famed. Dr. Burgin is an excellent conductor, forceful and able to communicate his musical insight.

His readings are not attempted carbon copies of those we know so well by Koussevitzky. He achieved an excellent long view of the Brahms First Symphony without sacrificing attention to fine detail. The performance of the Schonberg "Transfigured Night" was eloquently rhapsodic. His intimate knowledge of stringed instruments was quite evident.

The final work of the program was a change occasioned by the substitution of conductors. I felt that it was a fortunate one. We heard the glittering transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." This was made by Maurice Ravel, not many years ago, for the Boston Orchestra. It was played excitingly, but did not quite measure up to the rest of the program for virtuosity of tone and precision.

It is always a revelation to hear the Boston Orchestra because of the marvelous string tone and the comforting security of the brass. The string section is unusually large, so that many passages ordinarily unheard in other orchestras stand out like "something new has been added to." The sonority of the strings may be due to the large number of players, but its superlative quality is due to the taste and specific demands of the great Boston conductor.

I welcome these visits of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland, for they provide a standard by which we may measure our own Cleveland Orchestra. In my humble opinion, we lately have been toiling with unaccustomed nimbleness up the slopes of progress.

Mahler Revival, Hanson Novelty at the Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin again directed the Boston Symphony yesterday, pending the recuperation of Dr. Koussevitzky from a slight indisposition. The program for this eighth pair of concerts reads: Mahler, "Das Lied von der Erde;" Hanson, Symphony No. 4, op. 34; Brahms, Academic Festival Overture. Dr. Hanson conducted his symphony, which was performed for the first time at a public concert. The soloists in the Mahler were Jennie Tourel and Hans J. Heinz.

"The Song of the Earth" contains the best of Mahler, and much of the best of Wagner. It is the most grateful to the ear of all the Mahler symphonic compositions that I have heard, because it has a greater simplicity, is less repetitious, and employs its means more economically than the others. The melodic material is well suited to the sense, the harmonies are exquisitely atmospheric, and the instrumentation is done with a discretion that is extraordinary, especially for Mahler.

There are few flaws in the structure. The rhythms tend to be monotonous, there is insufficient contrast between the third and fourth sections, and the final section suffers from the composer's usual fault of not knowing when to stop. This farewell is far too protracted. It reminds us of those distressing partings at steamship piers, with people ashore and people aboard waving wearily at one another, while the ship rides majestically unhurried. In Mahler's dock the contralto waves at the orchestra and the orchestra waves back, again and again, while the audience, and doubtless the artists, long for the ship to sail.

Mr. Burgin secured an excellent performance from the orchestra yesterday, with good tone, clarity of execution, and expressiveness. For the first time here the songs were sung in English, but little difference ensued from this, since neither soloist was able to make the words heard except at moments. Miss Tourel, a French artist sang here last year in "La Demoiselle Elue." Yesterday she did not seem very much at home in the Mahler work. Her voice is not strong. Her middle range is her best. Her upper tones were constricted, and her lower ones insufficiently supported. Yet she sang intelligently, and like Mr. Heinz she paid the audience the compliment of getting along without the aid of score or word book. Mr. Heinz was, I believe, new to Boston. He appeared to be very much in the spirit of the work, but his voice was unsuccessful in competition with the orchestra.

Dr. Hanson's Symphony No. 4, inscribed "In memory of my beloved father," was undoubtedly conceived and executed in a reverent mood, and I am sorry to have to say that it did not convey to me the emotional fervor which had obviously moved its composer. The subtitles from the Requiem Mass, Kyrie, Requiescat, Dies Irae, and Lux Aeterna, describe the mood rather than the manner of the four movements. Dr. Hanson has a strong lyrical sense and he is a master of the technique of composition. What is lacking is originality of treatment and the feeling of an irresistible inner musical compulsion.

Both compositions were cordially received by the Friday audience.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky was back on the job yesterday afternoon and apparently as fit as a fiddle. For this ninth programme of the current season he has assembled three classical symphonies: Haydn's in G major (No. 13 in the old listing, No. 88 in the new), the E-flat major of Mozart and Beethoven's Seventh. In all essentials the three performances were as familiar as the symphonies themselves.

If criticism is merely reporting, there is little or nothing to add to the foregoing. If it is "an adventure of the soul among masterpieces," there is still not much of interest that anyone can say at this late date. Here, however, are a few suggestions: Outside the wonderful Largo, the finest slow movement in classical symphonic literature until we reach that of Beethoven's Ninth, this No. 88, for all its sprightliness and charm, is of the lighter, lesser Haydn. For that very reason it served the better yesterday to set off the perfections of Mozart.

As for Beethoven's Seventh, the Allegretto, of course, is tops, and the first movement does not lag very far behind it. The scherzo would be twice as effective if its rather dreary trio had not come twice, and apparently you either go for the finale or you don't. Dr. Koussevitzky's orgiastic treatment of it, with the 16ths of the chief theme played so fast that only a blur of sound results, comes near to persuading this listener that it has no musical value whatsoever.

One can well believe that our great-great-grandchildren may find themselves able to get along without the Beethoven symphonies, but that the best of Mozart's could ever be consigned to oblivion seems out of the question. And to end with an old complaint, there are a lot of fine symphonies by Haydn that we never get a chance to hear, at least at Symphony Hall.

ROCHESTER NY
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1943

Hanson, Boston Orchestra Score With New Fourth Symphony

By TOM CHASE

Boston—(AP)—Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony was performed for the first time in public yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the lean, Van Dyked director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., conducting his own composition.

The new work created an immediately favorable impression. Written in memory of the composer's "beloved father," it proved an intricate, concise and thoroughly intelligent expression of personal emotion.

The customary four movements bore Latin subtitles from the requiem Mass and the 47-year-old Wahoo, Neb., native suggested words of the ritual in his thematic treatment of the instrumental score.

Here was the antithesis of sloppy sentimentality. The conductor of the Eastman-Rochester Symphony Orchestra wrote with warmth and tenderness, using woodwinds and strings with especial effectiveness to sing chorale and pastorale passages. There was a sardonic, bitter, exciting third movement "scherzo" before the emotionally disturbing notes of the finale died away on softly muted strings.

Dr. Hanson conducted his new symphony with unsparing energy and with an authority born of 19 years as director of the Eastman School. The audience was enthusiastic, with members of the orchestra joining in the general applause.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Mahler's "Song of the Earth" and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," with Associate Conductor Richard Burgin leading the orchestra in his usual scholarly, capable fashion.

Mahler's "Song of the Earth," sometimes known as his Eighth Symphony or "Symphony of a Thousand," had not been played by the orchestra since 1936. Based on a series of charming Chinese poems, this difficult and delightful work was interpreted magnificiently. Jennie Tourel and Hans J. Heinz well deserved the applause they received for the singing of the contralto and tenor roles.

BUSINESS WEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.

NEW CONCERT SPONSOR

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard over the Blue Network on Christmas day under the sponsorship of Allis-Chalmers Co., it will be the third time in six months that a big industrial advertiser has inaugurated a weekly symphonic program over a major network.

First on the symphony bandwagon was the U. S. Rubber Co. which sponsors the New York Philharmonic over the Columbia Broadcasting System Sundays. General Motors Symphony of the Air features the National Broadcasting Co. orchestra also on Sundays.

The Boston Symphony will be heard Saturday evenings (8:15 to 9:15 p.m., E.W.T.)

ADVERTISER
CINCINNATI, OHIO

Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate sponsorship of the renowned Boston Symphony airings over the complete Blue Network fittingly on Christmas Day, playing Santa Claus to the Blue and the Boston who've been sustaining to date. The Compton Agency handles account.

Another Xmas Day present will be Elgin's two-hour celebrity spread from 4 to 6 PM on CBS. This is a star-studded continuation of the holiday schedule which Elgin started last year, meteoric but effective.

[29]

Boston Orchestra Presents Concert At Auditorium

By Carl Gehring

Ann Arbor, up to yesterday, was faced with one of the great events of the current musical season: the 12th annual appearance of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra at Hill auditorium. Added to this was a program which included a work apiece by two leading if not the foremost composers of this country and Russia, in the persons of William Schuman and Dmitri Shostakovitch, respectively, each of whom was to be represented by a symphony. Two Nocturnes by Debussy, the Prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Opus 34, were to round out a program which bid fair to reveal the Boston musicians in all of their accustomed glory.

As it turned out, an enjoyable concert did transpire last evening but it was a far cry from what had been anticipated. In the first place, illness prevented Koussevitzky from directing, his place being taken by Associate Conductor Richard Burgin, who serves as concert-master when Koussevitzky wields the baton. Secondly, the Schuman Symphony for Strings was replaced by Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, a notable work which, however, did not point up the interest as much as the unfamiliar American composition might have. The recollection of the playing here of Schuman's Third Symphony two years ago still lingers and had bred a taste for further hearings of this man's music. His Secular Cantata No. 2, "A Free Song," incidentally, was awarded the Pulitzer prize in music this year and is the first musical work ever to be so honored.

Burgin Is Able Leader

In any case, the concert was more than fair if wanting the flair that had been expected. Burgin turned out to be an able leader and the Boston orchestra still was the Boston orchestra, what with an incomparable string section, woodwinds which for sheen left little to be desired, a brass choir that can really give out the most resonant trumpetings without becoming strident, and a battery that has what it takes. The program, now four to one Russian as to composers rather than the scheduled three to two, still offered plenty of interest despite the presence of several well-known old war horses.

Chief interest in this concert had to do with the Shostakovitch Symphony as a composition and the presentation of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio. The symphony is the first of a series of major works for orchestra and stage that have come from Shostakovitch since 1925 and which mark their composer as a representative and an outstanding figure. The piece obviously is the work of a master of his trade and points the way for the later symphonies in the modernity of its style. It says easily what it has to say but leaves a doubt as to how much real creative force motivated its conception. Examples of hesitation in the way the music unfolds, perhaps indicative of an inhibition in the free flow of its ideas, produce an effect which is at once perplexing and intriguing. This music, more objective than subjective in approach, addresses primarily the intellect rather than the impulses.

Capriccio Espagnol

With such an orchestra as the Boston performing, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol was a welcome adjunct to the program. This is one of the finest examples of instrumentation in musical literature and led Tschaikowsky, himself an outstanding orchestrator, to compliment Rimsky on his achievement. The piece, of course, is extremely well known, and dated, yet it was a real opportunity to hear an orchestra of the Boston's calibre light into Rimsky-Korsakoff's brilliant orchestral canvas and project it in all of its highly colored beauty.

Burgin's conducting of the concert was direct, with an attack that was convincing if wanting in subtlety. He maintained consistently good balances among the orchestral choirs and achieved some effective climaxes, the finale of the Shostakovitch Symphony and the close of Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio being striking. His shadings in the woodwinds in the Gavotte from Prokofieff's Symphony were beautifully drawn, but he failed to get the most out of the second variation in the Andante Con Moto, from Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio. Here a single note, twice stated low in the clarinet, is magical in its effect and vital to the context, but on this occasion it was barely audible.

The total impact of this fifth concert of the Choral Union series, however, was favorable, and a capacity house reacted most enthusiastically, recalling Burgin repeatedly at the close.

Baton Rouge, La.
Advocate
12-5-43

SATURDAY

Boston Symphony

The Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate its sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts over the Blue Network on Christmas Day, Saturday, December 25.

Presented every Saturday from 8:15 to 9:15 p. m., EWT throughout this country and via transcriptions to other corners of the globe, each broadcast will feature the world's finest music by this great orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

According to Walter Geist, president of the sponsoring organization, Allis-Chalmers' sole purpose in entering the national radio picture is to bring enjoyable relaxation to those on the home front through direct broadcasting, and to those on the fighting fronts through transcription facilities.

The sponsorship will include the orchestra's three concert series running from October to the end of May. The Boston Symphony orchestra was founded in 1881 and is the oldest permanent symphony organization in the United States. Dr. Koussevitzky has been its conductor for the past twenty years.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Again we stand in debt of Richard Burgin for a Mahler revival. At this week's Boston Symphony concerts the orchestra's associate conductor produces the Bohemian master's "Song of the Earth" ("Das Lied von der Erde") with Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, as the soloists.

In consequence of the over-towering magnitude of Mahler's spiritual testament, Howard Hanson's new Fourth Symphony, which the composer conducts after the interval in the first public performances, stands in rather unfortunate circumstances. The Symphony might have made its mark were it of different cast, or had it been performed under other conditions. But when Mahler has said about all there is to say of poignant melancholy and darkening grief, when his expression has culminated in the artistic statement that only death is the release from the hurt of life, then the elegaic Hanson Symphony seems an echo of a greater force.

The Hanson Symphony might have added its own personal message (it is inscribed, "In memory of my beloved father"), or perhaps illuminated some of the obscurities of Mahler's greatness, for it is a rugged, forward driving work. But its lack of original expression, its dependence upon musical antecedents, thwarts its evident purpose.

Technically, the Symphony is most skillfully wrought. It has a wonderful sense of movement and enormously clever figurations. Its moods, too, are painted clearly, but they are lugubrious, and unrestrained. Its melodic material is undistinguished, with too much dependence upon banal tunes constructed scale-wise.

The four movements, each titled, have their special antecedents. The first (Kyrie), cold and bleak, sounds like Sibelius, while the second (Requiescat) is Tchaikovsky, distilled. And in the third (Dies Irae) you can hear the death rattle of some "realistic" pieces by Liszt, Berlioz and Saint-Saens. The terminal movement (Luz Aeterna) is the most individual. Over his work the composer presided, a wrathful figure, driving sonorities and rhythms to their peaks.

The text for the six sections of "Song of the Earth" Mahler took from "The Chinese Flute," Chinese lyrics of the Eighth Century, paraphrased by the German poet, Hans Bethge. Mahler adapted them to his purposes and in the Summer of 1908, after an unhappy season as conductor of the New York Philharmonic, composed "Song of the Earth."

The intensity, the emotional depth and the breadth of philosophic thought which are the heart of "Song of the Earth," are things to be felt rather than described. There are opaque hints here of what we have come to think of as the fragility of the archaic Chinese spirit. But Mahler has distilled this feeling, combined it with Western thought and philisophy to produce an artistic summation, a looking back and a harking forward. "Song of the Earth" is both earthy and rarely delicate.

Mr. Burgin has bound and unified "Song of the Earth" into the complete expression that it is. It is an enormous task, brilliantly accomplished. His soloists are more than adequate to the job. Miss Tourel's opulent tonal qualities are perfectly suited to the work. And Mr. Heinz, making his Boston debut, almost has the aspects of a "heldentenor" in his singing. Both sang in English, although not clearly enough to be understood.—L. W. R.

Boston Symphony Superb Without Koussevitzky

By WALTER BLODGETT
Music Critic

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Music Hall which will not be forgotten soon. The great crowd attending this program, presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association, under the management of Mrs. Emile Brudno, gave the orchestra and its pinch-hitting conductor a tremendous ovation.

The wave of chagrin caused by an announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's illness was of short duration, as Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, began to release the wonderful sounds for which the Boston Symphony is famed. Dr. Burgin is an excellent conductor, forceful and able to communicate his musical insight.

His readings are not attempted carbon copies of those we know so well by Koussevitzky. He achieved an excellent long view of the Brahms First Symphony without sacrificing attention to fine detail. The performance of the Schonberg "Transfigured Night" was eloquently rhapsodic. His intimate knowledge of stringed instruments was quite evident.

The final work of the program was a change occasioned by the substitution of conductors. I felt that it was a fortunate one. We heard the glittering transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." This was made by Maurice Ravel, not many years ago, for the Boston Orchestra. It was played excitingly, but did not quite measure up to the rest of the program for virtuosity of tone and precision.

It is always a revelation to hear the Boston Orchestra because of the marvelous string tone and the comforting security of the brass. The string section is unusually large, so that many passages ordinarily unheard in other orchestras stand out like "something new has been added to." The sonority of the strings may be due to the large number of players, but its superlative quality is due to the taste and specific demands of the great Boston conductor.

I welcome these visits of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland, for they provide a standard by which we may measure our own Cleveland Orchestra. In my humble opinion, we lately have been toiling with unaccustomed nimbleness up the slopes of progress.

Mahler Revival, Hanson Novelty at the Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin again directed the Boston Symphony yesterday, pending the recuperation of Dr. Koussevitzky from a slight indisposition. The program for this eighth pair of concerts reads: Mahler, "Das Lied von der Erde;" Hanson, Symphony No. 4, op. 34; Brahms, Academic Festival Overture. Dr. Hanson conducted his symphony, which was performed for the first time at a public concert. The soloists in the Mahler were Jennie Tourel and Hans J. Heinz.

"The Song of the Earth" contains the best of Mahler, and much of the best of Wagner. It is the most grateful to the ear of all the Mahler symphonic compositions that I have heard, because it has a greater simplicity, is less repetitious, and employs its means more economically than the others. The melodic material is well suited to the sense, the harmonies are exquisitely atmospheric, and the instrumentation is done with a discretion that is extraordinary, especially for Mahler.

There are few flaws in the structure. The rhythms tend to be monotonous, there is insufficient contrast between the third and fourth sections, and the final section suffers from the composer's usual fault of not knowing when to stop. This farewell is far too protracted. It reminds us of those distressing partings at steamship piers, with people ashore and people aboard waving wearily at one another, while the ship rides majestically unhurried. In Mahler's dock the contralto waves at the orchestra and the orchestra waves back, again and again, while the audience, and doubtless the artists, long for the ship to sail.

Mr. Burgin secured an excellent performance from the orchestra yesterday, with good tone, clarity of execution, and expressiveness. For the first time here the songs were sung in English, but little difference ensued from this, since neither soloist was able to make the words heard except at moments. Miss Tourel, a French artist sang here last year in "La Demoiselle Elue." Yesterday she did not seem very much at home in the Mahler work. Her voice is not strong. Her middle range is her best. Her upper tones were constricted, and her lower ones insufficiently supported. Yet she sang intelligently, and like Mr. Heinz she paid the audience the compliment of getting along without the aid of score or word book. Mr. Heinz was, I believe, new to Boston. He appeared to be very much in the spirit of the work, but his voice was unsuccessful in competition with the orchestra.

Dr. Hanson's Symphony No. 4, inscribed "In memory of my beloved father," was undoubtedly conceived and executed in a reverent mood, and I am sorry to have to say that it did not convey to me the emotional fervor which had obviously moved its composer. The subtitles from the Requiem Mass, Kyrie, Requiescat, Dies Irae, and Lux Aeterna, describe the mood rather than the manner of the four movements. Dr. Hanson has a strong lyrical sense and he is a master of the technique of composition. What is lacking is originality of treatment and the feeling of an irresistible inner musical compulsion.

Both compositions were cordially received by the Friday audience.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky was back on the job yesterday afternoon and apparently as fit as a fiddle. For this ninth programme of the current season he has assembled three classical symphonies: Haydn's in G major (No. 13 in the old listing, No. 88 in the new), the E-flat major of Mozart and Beethoven's Seventh. In all essentials the three performances were as familiar as the symphonies themselves.

If criticism is merely reporting, there is little or nothing to add to the foregoing. If it is "an adventure of the soul among masterpieces," there is still not much of interest that anyone can say at this late date. Here, however, are a few suggestions: Outside the wonderful Largo, the finest slow movement in classical symphonic literature until we reach that of Beethoven's Ninth, this No. 88, for all its sprightliness and charm, is of the lighter, lesser Haydn. For that very reason it served the better yesterday to set off the perfections of Mozart.

As for Beethoven's Seventh, the Allegretto, of course, is tops, and the first movement does not lag very far behind it. The scherzo would be twice as effective if its rather dreary trio had not come twice, and apparently you either go for the finale or you don't. Dr. Koussevitzky's orgiastic treatment of it, with the 16ths of the chief theme played so fast that only a blur of sound results, comes near to persuading this listener that it has no musical value whatsoever.

One can well believe that our great-great-grandchildren may find themselves able to get along without the Beethoven symphonies, but that the best of Mozart's could ever be consigned to oblivion seems out of the question. And to end with an old complaint, there are a lot of fine symphonies by Haydn that we never get a chance to hear, at least at Symphony Hall.

ROCHESTER NY
DEMOCRAT
DEC 4 - 1943

Hanson, Boston Orchestra Score With New Fourth Symphony

By TOM CHASE

Boston—(AP)—Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony was performed for the first time in public yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the lean, Van Dyked director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., conducting his own composition.

The new work created an immediately favorable impression. Written in memory of the composer's "beloved father," it proved an intricate, concise and thoroughly intelligent expression of personal emotion.

The customary four movements bore Latin subtitles from the requiem Mass and the 47-year-old Wahoo, Neb., native suggested words of the ritual in his thematic treatment of the instrumental score.

Here was the antithesis of sloppy sentimentality. The conductor of the Eastman-Rochester Symphony Orchestra wrote with warmth and tenderness, using woodwinds and strings with especial effectiveness to sing chorale and pastorale passages. There was a sardonic, bitter, exciting third movement "scherzo" before the emotionally disturbing notes of the finale died away on softly muted strings.

Dr. Hanson conducted his new symphony with unsparing energy and with an authority born of 19 years as director of the Eastman School. The audience was enthusiastic, with members of the orchestra joining in the general applause.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Mahler's "Song of the Earth" and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," with Associate Conductor Richard Burgin leading the orchestra in his usual scholarly, capable fashion.

Mahler's "Song of the Earth," sometimes known as his Eighth Symphony or "Symphony of a Thousand," had not been played by the orchestra since 1936. Based on a series of charming Chinese poems, this difficult and delightful work was interpreted magnificently. Jennie Tourel and Hans J. Heinz well deserved the applause they received for the singing of the contralto and tenor roles.

BUSINESS WEEK
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 4 - 1943

NEW CONCERT SPONSOR

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard over the Blue Network on Christmas day under the sponsorship of Allis-Chalmers Co., it will be the third time in six months that a big industrial advertiser has inaugurated a weekly symphonic program over a major network.

First on the symphony bandwagon was the U. S. Rubber Co. which sponsors the New York Philharmonic over the Columbia Broadcasting System Sundays. General Motors Symphony of the Air features the National Broadcasting Co. orchestra also on Sundays.

The Boston Symphony will be heard Saturday evenings (8:15 to 9:15 p.m., E.W.T.)

ADVERTISER
CINCINNATI, OHIO

DEC 1943

Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate sponsorship of the renowned Boston Symphony airings over the complete Blue Network fittingly on Christmas Day, playing Santa Claus to the Blue and the Boston who've been sustaining to date. The Compton Agency handles account.

Another Xmas Day present will be Elgin's two-hour celebrity spread from 4 to 6 PM on CBS. This is a star-studded continuation of the holiday schedule which Elgin started last year, meteoric but effective.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

1943

Our Boys From Boston

No wildly flailing conductor is Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra

Milwaukee Firm Is Placing an Unusual Set of Men on Pay Roll

By Walter Monfried

THE Allis-Chalmers Co. of our town has had many unusual persons on its pay roll, but it can safely be said that never before has it hired anyone to match the hundred and more workers who have just been signed up for extremely fancy wages — somewhere in the hundreds of thousands of dollars for a year's toil.

This unique group of workers is the Boston symphony orchestra, which will go on the air each Saturday night shortly to proclaim the worth of Milwaukee industry, particularly Allis-Chalmers, on numerous Blue network stations throughout the land. The over-all cost of the show to Allis-Chalmers has been reported variously as $600,000 or $885,000, or somewhere in between.

Boston Orchestra Ranks as 'Best' Symphony

The Boston orchestra, which is directed by Serge Koussevitzky, is generally ranked as the best in the business. Oscar Levant, who knows his way about musical circles, calls it "unquestionably the finest in the world," and that opinion is held by many other competent observers. This humble admirer, for one, is unfailingly bowled over by the Bostonians' performances as heard in person—by a singing tone which sets the dullest ear to tingling, by precision, balance and gorgeous sonority. Whatever an orchestra needs, the Boston ensemble has in profusion.

More than 50 years ago Henry Lee Higginson, the bearer of a proud military and financial name in Boston, determined to give his home town "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price."

On Mar. 30, 1881, he informed the press that the orchestra would have 60 members, and that single tickets would cost from 25 to 75c. The first conductor was Sir George Henschel, an Anglicized German of great culture and ability. Maj. Higginson and his successors in the management of the orchestra have clung to that policy of getting the best conductors available, and lavished millions upon their project. Artur Nikisch and Karl Muck, for example, who were among the conductors before the first World war, being supremely great figures in their field.

The Boston orchestra, and American musical followers in general, were thrown into confusion in 1918 when the revered Dr. Muck was thrown into a federal penitentiary on a charge of espionage. Muck, in fact, had made little effort to hide his German sympathies and long had refused to include the "Star Spangled Banner" on his program in those war years. When he did consent, he waggishly interpolated a bit of counterpoint from "Tannhaeuser" by way of subtle insult. Muck was an unpopular figure in those days. The governor of Maryland, when he heard that the Bostonians were planning to play in Baltimore, asserted that "no true American could remain satisfied until Muck had been mobbed to death." Indignation meetings were held in several towns. Finally Muck announced that he would resign (he had long wanted to but had been dissuaded by Higginson). He was arrested while preparing his final concert and was interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., for the rest of the war.

Muck's successors were smaller men than he, the Philadelphia and New York orchestras lured away many of his best players, and the Boston orchestra suffered a sad decline. Then, in 1924, the directors induced the great Koussevitzky to come to Boston, and he restored it to its former glory.

Koussevitzky, now 69, is a trimly built, elegantly attired, aristocratic leader who directs his superlative orchestra with an ease and a lack of flailing and excitement that do not indicate the toil and passion which he puts into his preparation. In rehearsal he is a demon. "You must zing, you must blay the nawts," he shouts. "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims when he is satisfied. "Ged out, don't spik," he orders a player who is not doing as well as the maestro likes.

Tver, Russian Birthplace of Serge Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky, who comes from the north Russian town of Tver, is the son of a violin teacher. At 14 he was sent to Moscow to study music. He arrived rather late in the term and found that all classes were filled except those in trombone, bassoon and string bass (or bull fiddle, as the big instrument is irreverently termed). The boy chose the string bass, although he would have preferred violin or cello, and became the finest string bass player in all musical history. He achieved the almost impossible task of making the unwieldy instrument sound beautiful.

As the young man played his bass soulfully in concerts at Moscow, he noticed a pretty girl watching him admiringly. For two years Natalya Konstantinovna worshiped him from afar, but would never meet her idol. Finally the two young people were brought together, and they married. Her father, a millionaire, asked the young musician what gift he wanted.

"All my life I have wanted a symphony orchestra," the bridegroom replied eagerly. "Would you give me one?" The father-in-law was startled by the unique request, but he loyally agreed to supply the money, and on his honeymoon throughout Europe Koussevitzky recruited a band of excellent musicians.

In 1907 his orchestra gave its first concert in Moscow. It was a good orchestra; it introduced to Russia the works of her own great composers as well as festivals of masterworks of other nations.

It was only the city folk who could hear the performances, however. "How can we bring music to the small towns?" Koussevitzky pondered. He chartered a steamer on the Volga river in 1910 and presented hundreds of concerts in the villages and towns on its banks. It cost him $100,000 to bring his music to the marveling peasants, who thought that their visitors must surely have come from supernatural regions. Koussevitzky became an enchanted name, a legend along the Volga.

Koussevitzky resented the interference of the Soviet regime and betook himself to Paris, where he augmented his European fame and whence he was lured to Boston. He found the Boston orchestra in a somewhat lethargic state. He discharged some of the musicians peremptorily, placed others on the pension list, forbade his men to smoke or sleep during rest periods, and literally woke them up. Within a year he replaced apathy with vital energy.

For many years the Boston symphony orchestra was the only major nonunion orchestra in the nation, and feelings on both sides in the issue grew strong. The Bostonians had always had a fierce pride in their artistry as distinct from other considerations. As Oscar Levant points out, the Boston musicians always have had a self-complacency unmatched in the music business. No small talk or gossip ever comes forth from the Kremlinlike secrecy of that citadel.

After many years of argument—years in which the orchestra made no radio appearances — the musicians made their peace with the union, and Koussevitzky and his 105 players joined the American Federation of Labor just one year ago. The union had made some generous concessions in the case. Koussevitzky was permitted to go outside the local jurisdiction and to hire a player from any other unit in the nation.

Koussevitzky is conceded to have no peer as a conductor of Russian music, old and new, and he does brilliantly in all other fields. He is especially the friend of the struggling composer. He has spent fortunes in aiding unrecognized composers, and he has introduced hundreds of new works. He has likewise made his peace with the Russian government, and in hailing the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Soviet regime he declared:

"The greatest music of our day is now written in war torn Russia. It carries a message of courage, comfort and faith amidst untold suffering and destruction."

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

The Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate its sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts over KGO and the Blue Network on Christmas Day, Saturday, December 25. Heard from 5:15 to 6:15 p.m. each Saturday here, the broadcasts are also short-waved all over the world.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

DEC 1943

Boston Symphony Superb Under Burgin's Direction

By WALTER BLODGETT
Music Critic

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Music Hall which will not be forgotten soon. The great crowd attending this program, presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association, under the management of Mrs. Emile Brudno, gave the orchestra and its pinch-hitting conductor a tremendous ovation.

The wave of chagrin caused by an announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's illness was of short duration, as Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, began to release the wonderful sounds for which the Boston Symphony is famed. Dr. Burgin is an excellent conductor, forceful and able to communicate his musical insight.

His readings are not attempted carbon copies of those we know so well by Koussevitzky. He achieved an excellent long view of the Brahms First Symphony without sacrificing attention to fine detail. The performance of the Schonberg "Transfigured Night" was eloquently rhapsodic. His intimate knowledge of stringed instruments was quite evident.

The final work of the program was a change occasioned by the substitution of conductors. I felt that it was a fortunate one. We heard the glittering transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." This was made by Maurice Ravel, not many years ago, for the Boston Orchestra. It was played excitingly, but did not quite measure up to the rest of the program for virtuosity of tone and precision.

It is always a revelation to hear the Boston Orchestra because of the marvelous string tone and the comforting security of the brass. The string section is unusually large, so that many passages ordinarily unheard in other orchestras stand out like "something new has been added to." The sonority of the strings may be due to the large number of players, but its superlative quality is due to the taste and specific demands of the great Boston conductor.

I welcome these visits of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland, for they provide a standard by which we may measure our own Cleveland Orchestra. In my humble opinion, we lately have been toiling with unaccustomed nimbleness up the

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the eighth program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jennie Tourel, contralto, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, were the soloists. Howard Hanson was the guest conductor in the first performance of his Fourth Symphony. The program was as follows:

Mahler..........."Das Lied von der Erde"
Hanson ....Symphony No. 4, Op. 34
Brahms.......Academic Festival Overture

Mahler's "The Song of the Earth" remains among the most baffling musical compositions ever written. It ranges from the ridiculous to the sublime in musical content almost from bar to bar while the concept of its poetry is at once the epitome of Bacchic sensuality and delicate Chinese imagery. Yet, given the circumstances of a truly incandescent performance and a truly sympathetic audience, it can be peculiarly effective.

Even had these factors been present yesterday (and they were not), it is to be questioned if the work could have achieved its strange potential. It is music of the night; of morbid, tormented self-doubt, and is best heard on records in solitude. It is like a letter of longing and desperation and self-pity written at night and destroyed in the morning. It is music, in short, of such unique personal expression it creates in the listener the wretchedness of the unwilling auditor of a maudlin confession or intimate confidence.

Through all this, however, there is the undeniably powerful attraction of the purely musical means the composer employs. The singular sonorities, the astonishing rhythmical pulses and the sudden, soaring phrases; all combine to carry the listener away—only to bring him back with a thump at an unabashedly tormented climax, or an orgiastic sequence. It is a masterpiece, yet (and certainly its author's masterpiece), but it is so in a very special and personal sense.

Jennie Tourel, an artist of great ability, was not too appropriately cast. True, she sang very beautifully at times, but the heavy Teutonic style is not hers, and the cards were stacked against her from the outset through the generally thick orchestration of the work. As for Mr. Heinz, singing one of the most thankless roles in music, I must say I only heard him once or twice, and couldn't tell if he sang well or not, but I rather suspect he did well enough. Both soloists will doubtless be heard to greater advantage on the radio tonight when the microphones pick up their voices. The orchestra, admirably conducted by Mr. Burgin, was splendid.

Regrettably enough, I seem to have no impression worth recording of Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony, although I seem to remember thinking at the moment that the last movement started off rather pleasantly. Mr. Hanson is certainly a competent and even a very talented composer, but, like Mahler, he puts too much emotional jam between the slices of bread, and it all leaks out on one's fingers.

The program came to an end with Brahms' ever-green "Academic Festival Overture." Next week the orchestra will be out of town, but the following week it will perform Beethoven's Seventh, Mozart's E-flat, and Haydn's "Surprise" Symphonies.

Last Friday's Symphony Concert

By BETSY WARREN

The performance of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" and Howard Hanson's 4th Symphony (first performance) made up the highly interesting concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon.

The two soloists, Jennie Tourel, contralto, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, did estimable work in the not too gratifying role of orchestral instruments, and as such, their voices were often lost when the orchestra assumed the leading position. But both proved themselves to be excellent musicians with most pleasing voices; while Miss Tourel may be praised for her long-breathed phrases and Mr. Heinz for his brilliance.

The symphony itself, which Mr. Burgin conducted with laudable control and taste, is constructed on seven Chinese poems, whose topic of world weariness can only appeal to worldly and jaded minds. Now especially, they exhibit shallowness and do not seem to warrant the hour given to their musical exploitation.

Howard Hanson conducted the first performance of his 4th Symphony. Although an elegiac symphony in memory [illegible] composer's father, the work does not seem of requiem nature, but is, on the contrary, abstract, with only musical concerns. The music, which has great lyric continuity, is romantic in character, with close affinity in both mood and technique to the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The content of the movement marked Presto resembles the third movement of Dvorak's "New World Symphony".

The program was completed with a flashing performance of Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture."

The next pair of concerts will take place on December 17th and 18th and will include: Haydn, Symphony in G major; Mozart, Symphony in E-flat major; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC 5 - 1943

Our Boys From Boston

No wildly flailing conductor is Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra

Milwaukee Firm Is Placing an Unusual Set of Men on Pay Roll

By Walter Monfried

THE Allis-Chalmers Co. of our town has had many unusual persons on its pay roll, but it can safely be said that never before has it hired anyone to match the hundred and more workers who have just been signed up for extremely fancy wages — somewhere in the hundreds of thousands of dollars for a year's toil.

This unique group of workers is the Boston symphony orchestra, which will go on the air each Saturday night shortly to proclaim the worth of Milwaukee industry, particularly Allis-Chalmers, on numerous Blue network stations throughout the land. The over-all cost of the show to Allis-Chalmers has been reported variously as $600,000 or $885,000, or somewhere in between.

Boston Orchestra Ranks as 'Best' Symphony

The Boston orchestra, which is directed by Serge Koussevitzky, is generally ranked as the best in the business. Oscar Levant, who knows his way about musical circles, calls it "unquestionably the finest in the world," and that opinion is held by many other competent observers. This humble admirer, for one, is unfailingly bowled over by the Bostonians' performances as heard in person—by a singing tone which sets the dullest ear to tingling, by precision, balance and gorgeous sonority. Whatever an orchestra needs, the Boston ensemble has in profusion.

More than 50 years ago Henry Lee Higginson, the bearer of a proud military and financial name in Boston, determined to give his home town "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price."

On Mar. 30, 1881, he informed the press that the orchestra would have 60 members, and that single tickets would cost from 25 to 75c. The first conductor was Sir George Henschel, an Anglicized German of great culture and ability. Maj. Higginson and his successors in the management of the orchestra have clung to that policy of getting the best conductors available, and lavished millions upon their project, Artur Nikisch and Karl Muck, for example, who were among the conductors before the first World war, being supremely great figures in their field.

The Boston orchestra, and American musical followers in general, were thrown into confusion in 1918 when the revered Dr. Muck was thrown into a federal penitentiary on a charge of espionage. Muck, in fact, had made little effort to hide his German sympathies and long had refused to include the "Star Spangled Banner" on his program in those war years. When he assumed the leading position. But did consent, he waggishly interpolated a bit of counterpoint from "Tannhaeuser" by way of subtle insult. Muck was an unpopular figure in those days. The governor of Maryland, when he heard that the Bostonians were planning to play in Baltimore, asserted that "no true American could remain satisfied until Muck had been mobbed to death." Indignation meetings were held in several towns. Finally Muck announced that he would resign (he had long wanted to but had been dissuaded by Higginson). He was arrested while preparing his final concert and was interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., for the rest of the war.

Muck's successors were smaller men than he, the Philadelphia and New York orchestras lured away many of his best players, and the Boston orchestra suffered a sad decline. Then, in 1924, the directors induced the great Koussevitzky to come to Boston, and he restored it to its former glory.

Koussevitzky, now 69, is a trimly built, elegantly attired, aristocratic leader who directs his superlative orchestra with an ease and a lack of flailing and excitement that do not indicate the toil and passion which he puts into his preparation. In rehearsal he is a demon. "You must zing, you must blay the nawts," he shouts. "Vonderful, vonderful!" he exclaims when he is satisfied. "Ged out, don't spik," he orders a player who is not doing as well as the maestro likes.

Tver, Russian Birthplace of Serge Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky, who comes from the north Russian town of Tver, is the son of a violin teacher. At 14 he was sent to Moscow to study music. He arrived rather late in the term and found that all classes were filled except those in trombone, bassoon and string bass (or bull fiddle, as the big instrument is irreverently termed). The boy chose the string bass, although he would have preferred violin or cello, and became the finest string bass player in all musical history. He achieved the almost impossible task of making the unwieldy instrument sound beautiful.

As the young man played his bass soulfully in concerts at Moscow, he noticed a pretty girl watching him admiringly. For two years Natalya Konstantinovna worshiped him from afar, but would never meet her idol. Finally the two young people were brought together, and they married. Her father, a millionaire, asked the young musician what gift he wanted.

"All my life I have wanted a symphony orchestra," the bridegroom replied eagerly. "Would you give me one?" The father-in-law was startled by the unique request, but he loyally agreed to supply the money, and on his honeymoon throughout Europe Koussevitzky recruited a band of excellent musicians.

In 1907 his orchestra gave its first concert in Moscow. It was a good orchestra; it introduced to Russia the works of her own great composers as well as festivals of masterworks of other nations.

It was only the city folk who could hear the performances, however. "How can we bring music to the small towns?" Koussevitzky pondered. He chartered a steamer on the Volga river in 1910 and presented hundreds of concerts in the villages and towns on its banks. It cost him $100,000 to bring his music to the marveling peasants, who thought that their visitors must surely have come from supernatural regions. Koussevitzky became an enchanted name, a legend along the Volga.

Koussevitzky resented the interference of the Soviet regime and betook himself to Paris, where he augmented his European fame and whence he was lured to Boston. He found the Boston orchestra in a somewhat lethargic state. He discharged some of the musicians peremptorily, placed others on the pension list, forbade his men to smoke or sleep during rest periods, and literally woke them up. Within a year he replaced apathy with vital energy.

For many years the Boston symphony orchestra was the only major nonunion orchestra in the nation, and feelings on both sides in the issue grew strong. The Bostonians had always had a fierce pride in their artistry as distinct from other considerations. As Oscar Levant points out, the Boston musicians always have had a self-complacency unmatched in the music business. No small talk or gossip ever comes forth from the Kremlinlike secrecy of that citadel.

After many years of argument—years in which the orchestra made no radio appearances — the musicians made their peace with the union, and Koussevitzky and his 105 players joined the American Federation of Labor just one year ago. The union had made some generous concessions in the case. Koussevitzky was permitted to go outside the local jurisdiction and to hire a player from any other unit in the nation.

Koussevitzky is conceded to have no peer as a conductor of Russian music, old and new, and he does brilliantly in all other fields. He is especially the friend of the struggling composer. He has spent fortunes in aiding unrecognized composers, and he has introduced hundreds of new works. He has likewise made his peace with the Russian government, and in hailing the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Soviet regime he declared:

"The greatest music of our day is now written in war torn Russia. It carries a message of courage, comfort and faith amidst untold suffering and destruction."

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

DEC 10 1943

The Allis-Chalmers Company, one of the nation's largest manufacturers of war equipment, will inaugurate its sponsorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts over KGO and the Blue Network on Christmas Day, Saturday, December 25. Heard from 5:15 to 6:15 p.m. each Saturday here, the broadcasts are also short-waved all over the world.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

DEC 8 - 1943

Boston Symphony Superb Under Burgin's Direction

By WALTER BLODGETT
Music Critic

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in the Music Hall which will not be forgotten soon. The great crowd attending this program, presented by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association, under the management of Mrs. Emile Brudno, gave the orchestra and its pinch-hitting conductor a tremendous ovation.

The wave of chagrin caused by an announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's illness was of short duration, as Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, began to release the wonderful sounds for which the Boston Symphony is famed. Dr. Burgin is an excellent conductor, forceful and able to communicate his musical insight.

His readings are not attempted carbon copies of those we know so well by Koussevitzky. He achieved an excellent long view of the Brahms First Symphony without sacrificing attention to fine detail. The performance of the Schonberg "Transfigured Night" was eloquently rhapsodic. His intimate knowledge of stringed instruments was quite evident.

The final work of the program was a change occasioned by the substitution of conductors. I felt that it was a fortunate one. We heard the glittering transcription of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition." This was made by Maurice Ravel, not many years ago, for the Boston Orchestra. It was played excitingly, but did not quite measure up to the rest of the program for virtuosity of tone and precision.

It is always a revelation to hear the Boston Orchestra because of the marvelous string tone and the comforting security of the brass. The string section is unusually large, so that many passages ordinarily unheard in other orchestras stand out like "something new has been added to." The sonority of the strings may be due to the large number of players, but its superlative quality is due to the taste and specific demands of the great Boston conductor.

I welcome these visits of the Boston Symphony to Cleveland, for they provide a standard by which we may measure our own Cleveland Orchestra. In my humble opinion we lately have been toiling with unaccustomed nimbleness up the

---

MUSIC

Dec 4

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the eighth program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Jennie Tourel, contralto, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, were the soloists. Howard Hanson was the guest conductor in the first performance of his Fourth Symphony. The program was as follows:

Mahler..........“Das Lied von der Erde”
Hanson ....Symphony No. 4, Op. 34
Brahms.......Academic Festival Overture

Mahler's "The Song of the Earth" remains among the most baffling musical compositions ever written. It ranges from the ridiculous to the sublime in musical content almost from bar to bar while the concept of its poetry is at once the epitome of Bacchic sensuality and delicate Chinese imagery. Yet, given the circumstances of a truly incandescent performance and a truly sympathetic audience, it can be peculiarly effective.

Even had these factors been present yesterday (and they were not), it is to be questioned if the work could have achieved its strange potential. It is music of the night; of morbid, tormented self-doubt, and is best heard on records in solitude. It is like a letter of longing and desperation and self-pity written at night and destroyed in the morning. It is music, in short, of such unique personal expression it creates in the listener the wretchedness of the unwilling auditor of a maudlin confession or intimate confidence.

Through all this, however, there is the undeniably powerful attraction of the purely musical means the composer employs. The singular sonorities, the astonishing rhythmical pulses and the sudden, soaring phrases; all combine to carry the listener away—only to bring him back with a thump at an unabashedly tormented climax, or an orgiastic sequence. It is a masterpiece, yet (and certainly its author's masterpiece), but it is so in a very special personal sense.

Jennie Tourel, an artist of great ability, was not too appropriately cast. True, she sang very beautifully at times, but the heavy Teutonic style is not hers, and the cards were stacked against her from the outset through the generally thick orchestration of the work. As for Mr. Heinz, singing one of the most thankless roles in music, I must say I only heard him once or twice and couldn't tell if he sang well or not, but I rather suspect he did well enough. Both soloists will doubtless be heard to greater advantage on the radio tonight when the microphones pick up their voices. The orchestra, admirably conducted by Mr. Burgin, was splendid.

Regrettably enough, I seem to have no impression worth recording of Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony, although I seem to remember thinking at the moment that the last movement started off rather pleasantly. Mr. Hanson is certainly a competent and even a very talented composer, but, like Mahler, he puts too much emotional jam between the slices of bread, and it all leaks out on one's fingers.

The program came to an end with Brahms' ever-green "Academic Festival Overture." Next week the orchestra will be out of town, but the following week it will [illegible] Beethoven's Seventh, [illegible] and [illegible]

Last Friday's Symphony Concert

By BETSY WARREN

The performance of Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" and Howard Hanson's 4th Symphony (first performance) made up the highly interesting concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon.

The two soloists, Jennie Tourel, contralto, and Hans J. Heinz, tenor, did estimable work in the not too gratifying role of orchestral instruments, and as such their voices were often lost when the orchestra [illegible] both proved themselves to be excellent musicians with most pleasing voices; while Miss Tourel may be praised for her long-breathed phrases and Mr. Heinz for his brilliance.

The symphony itself, which Mr. Burgin conducted with laudable control and taste, is constructed on seven Chinese poems, whose topic of world weariness can only appeal to worldly and jaded minds. Now especially, they exhibit shallowness and do not seem to warrant the hour given to their musical exploitation.

Howard Hanson conducted the first performance of [illegible] Symphony. Although [illegible] er's father, the work does not seem of requiem nature, but is, on the contrary, abstract, with only musical concerns. The music, which has great lyric continuity, is romantic in character, with close affinity in both mood and technique to the Russian composer, Tschaikowsky. The content of the movement marked Presto resembles the third movement of Dvorak's "New World Symphony".

The program was completed with a flashing performance of Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture."

The next pair of concerts will take place on December 17th and 18th and will include: Haydn, Symphony in G major; Mozart, Symphony [illegible] major; Beethoven,

ROCHESTER N.Y.
DEMOCRAT
DEC 6 - 1943

Hanson's Work Appraised by Educator

Mr. Porter is dean of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Mass., and a composer of note. At the request of Norman Nairn, music editor of The Democrat and Chronicle, Mr. Porter makes a critical analysis of Dr. Hanson's new Fourth Symphony.

By QUINCY PORTER

Boston—The first public performances of Howard Hanson's Fourth Symphony were given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall here. The new symphony, written in memory of the composer's father, was heard under favorable circumstances.

Advantageously placed on the program just after the intermission, it was played with the obvious enthusiasm and approval of the members of this great orchestra and conducted in a most convincing manner by the composer.

There is never lack of effect of what is accepted by the majority of concertgoers as lyric melody nor of strong emotional impulse in the music of Hanson. In this new work his best qualities seem to exhibit themselves to even greater advantage because of a new restraint and a stronger architectural integration of his materials.

The four movements of his symphony, which he entitles "Kyrie," "Requiescat," "Dies Irae" and "Lux Aeterna," are short, the whole work taking only 20 minutes to perform.

Unity in Composition

Though each movement is in itself simply and convincingly organized, the four movements go together in such a way as to give a surprising unity through the entire composition. The third movement makes an admirable climax and is in itself a most striking example of speed of motion and strong rythmic and emotional force. The first movement, serious and troubled, rises to a strong climax; the second is calm and restrained, making a splendid offset to the third movement. The last movement makes a convincing emotional balance to the other movements.

The strong feeling of integration that is given by this symphony indicates a new and most favorable development in Hanson's writing. This shows itself in the details of writing as well as in the larger structure of the work.

Thematically the work is clearly unified by the use of easy recognizable cells of melody. There is a feeling that at all times he is dealing with musical ideas that contribute directly to the point. At the same time there is clear direction from the dynamic standpoint. The climactic points are reached by convincing, inevitable steps, the timing being admirably planned so there is no feeling of padding.

The orchestration is particularly convincing. There is plenty of light transparent treatment of the instruments with striking clear colors, but always the feeling of well-fused sound.

Here is a new symphony by an American which well deserves to attain a place in the repertory of our orchestras. It does not try to be typically American in the details of its melodic writing nor in its rhythmic details. It is Nordic in its flavor, but this is because Hanson is this way by temperment and heritage. Nevertheless, it has long been a feeling of this writer that American composers should not make a conscious effort to write music that is typically American.

Reflects National Qualities

There is no doubt in my mind that this new symphony of Hanson's reflects qualities of feeling which are very much a part of our way of life. It has the strength and vitality of a nation which will keep itself intact and free from domination.

It is not that Hanson is trying to write music that is typically American, but rather that he breathes American air and reflects our general attitude toward life and art. His music, and this symphony in particular, has qualities which will make it easily understood and appreciated by the general musical public; it is written so as to be easily absorbed.

There is a strong feeling of major tonality in the second movement. The last movement ends on a striking inversion of a major triad. There is plenty of dissonance, but it is used to give convincing emotional tension.

There is something in common in the aesthetic approach of Sibelius and Hanson, but this new symphony has a conciseness not often present in Sibelius. There is no tendency in this work to squeeze out the last drop of goodness from every idea.

I feel strongly that this new symphony will have an immediate success with the general public and that it shows new tendencies in Hanson which may make us await his next works with happy anticipation.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
DEC 8 - 1943

Koussevitzky Ill, Burgin Thrills With Bostonese

BY ELMORE BACON

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, without ~~Dr. Serge Koussevitzky~~, thrilled a near-capacity audience at Music Hall last evening.

Associate Conductor Richard Burgin directed after an announcement was made that Dr. Koussevitzky was detained in Hot Springs, Va., suffering from flu. He had been ill for about 20 days, but had recovered somewhat. He had expected to make the trip here, but canceled his plans at the last minute.

To make up for the lack of his magnetic direction and commanding personality, the orchestra gave a marvelously fine performance of the Brahms First Symphony and works by Schonberg and Moussorgsky under the dynamic direction of Burgin.

It didn't need the telegram sent by Dr. Koussevitzky commending his youthful aide to the Cleveland audience to win respect for the Burgin direction. He quite won over the big crowd. He directed with vigor, quite the opposite of the Koussevitzky style, but he got results, too. Burgin revealed a fine dramatic sense, an expressive podium technique and a poetic temperament.

Perhaps the Boston Symphony, so finely trained, could have played as well with anyone directing who could maintain the beat. But it was evident the symphonists were playing for Director Burgin just as they would have for Dr. Koussevitzky. And the result was a performance of the Brahms First that was outstanding. Burgin hastened the pace somewhat, especially in the dramatic and songful finale.

The program omitted the scheduled Debussy "La Mer" and closed with the brilliant and colorful "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

Pittsburgh Sun
Dec. 13, '43

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky directing again brought large audiences to Syria Mosque for Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Saturday night Kossevitsky paid tribute to May Beegle, under whose sponsorship the orchestra has so often played, and dedicated the Debussy nocturnes to her memory.

All that comes from these players is gold, but why these last minute changes in program? We expect authoritative readings and prepare ourselves for a perfect performance of Schoenberg, who may become the Beethoven of a future generation and whose music we have a right to hear and judge, and then we get the Moussorgsky "Pictures" which have had frequent readings here.

DYNAMIC CONTRASTS

In these "Pictures from an Exhibition" both director and orchestra are so much at home that its performance sparkles with humor and grace. Vast dynamic contrasts are at the root of this interpretation which led the Saturday concert to such a triumphant close.

Of the Brahms Second Symphony, I like to remember the colloquy between the various woodwinds in the second movement, the startling clarity of thematic fragments throughout as well as a tone and ease of expression which meant supreme well being.

Debussy is, of course, the forte of the Boston players where structure is never obscured in the infinitesimal play of nuance and color which Koussevitsky always achieves in French music.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONIES

Three symphonies for the matinee was an achievement for Pittsburgh, all Russian works—two contemporary, the Prokofieff Classic Symphony, the Shostakovitch First and the Tchaikowsky Fifth, a tour de force with this orchestra.

What nice distinctions the director made in these three works; the first, the excursion which every composer makes into classic patterns when his own invention gives out or proves too scant; the second stressing the dramatic and measuring the realistic history of today; the third, purely spiritual interpretation of the great Slav spirit which Tchaikowsky expressed through his art if not in his life. Whirlwind tempi that other orchestras would not dare lent force and excited uncontrolled response in the audience.

12/6/43

Koussevitzky Ill, Burgin Thrills With Bostonese

BY ELMORE BACON

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY, without Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, thrilled a near-capacity audience at Music Hall last evening.

Associate Conductor Richard Burgin directed after an announcement was made that Dr. Koussevitzky was detained in Boston, suffering from an attack of flu. He had been ill for about 20 days, but had recovered somewhat. He had expected to make the trip here, but canceled his plans at the last minute.

To make up for the lack of his magnetic direction and commanding personality, the orchestra gave a marvelously fine performance of the Brahms First Symphony and works by Schonberg and Moussorgsky under the dynamic direction of Burgin.

It didn't need the telegram sent by Dr. Koussevitzky commending his youthful aide to the Cleveland audience to win respect for the Burgin direction. He quite won over the big crowd. He directed with vigor, quite the opposite of the Koussevitzky style, but he got results, too. Burgin revealed a fine dramatic sense, an expressive podium technique and a poetic temperament.

Perhaps the Boston Symphony, so finely trained, could have played as well with anyone directing who could maintain the beat. But it was evident the symphonists were playing for Director Bergin just as they would have for Dr. Koussevitzky. And the result was a performance of the Brahms First that was outstanding. Burgin hastened the pace somewhat, especially in the dramatic and songful finale.

The full beauty of tone and dazzling brilliance of the string section were revealed in the Schonberg string orchestra arrangement of his own String Sextet called "Transfigured Night." This gorgeous music, a first time in Cleveland performance, is a song of utmost melodic beauty throughout, much different than some of his other compositions. It is most descriptive in its unfoldment of the mysteries of night and their transformation into the lilting loveliness of an ecstatic dawn.

The program omitted the scheduled Debussy "La Mer" and closed with the brilliant and colorful "Pictures at an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky.

The concert was the fourth feature in the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

Singers Club

The famed duo-piano team of Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin feature the Singers Club concert tonight at Severance Hall, marking the beginning of its fifty-first season. George F. Strickling, director, also has the assistance of Eric Leinsdorf, director of the Cleveland Orchestra, who directs the Schubert "Song of the Spirits Over the Water," with a double string sextet from the Cleveland Orchestra joining in the chorus.

Familiar Christmas carols form one group in the diversified choral program offered.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 11 1943

Concert Coughing And The Flu

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed ~~at Hill Auditorium this~~ week it had an unprogrammed and undesired accompaniment—an accompaniment of coughs. Coughs in solo, coughs in sections, coughs in chorus. The accompaniment was more bold in the more sonorous passages, but it blared out vigorously even in the softer measures.

The auditor who had come to revel in music such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra produces with rare distinction found coughers to the right of him, coughers to the left of him, coughers all about him blasting and barking. It was disturbing to the music lover—not only aesthetically but also to his peace of mind, particularly if he gave thought to the prevailing near-epidemic of colds and flu, and the warnings often voiced by doctors as to the spread of disease through the coughing and sneezing of infected persons.

Some of the coughers at the concert coughed discreetly into their handkerchiefs, holding possible germs well in check. Others coughed into their programs, giving microbes a chance to eddy around the edges. Others coughed out openly and explosively and how many germs they spread no one can estimate.

Right on the heels of this coughing-marred concert comes a warning from the Michigan State Health Department in regard to the possibility of an influenza epidemic. "Colds and pneumonia are attacking more persons than is usual at this time of the year," says the warning bulletin, which then lays down these simple rules to help prevent spread of infection and to further the cure of infected persons: "Cover coughs and sneezes; avoid fatigue and get plenty of sleep; eat regular and adequate meals; stay out of crowds as much as possible; and go to bed immediately after the onset of illness."

Many of the coughers at the concert would undoubtedly have been better off had they observed two of these rules: "Stay out of crowds; go to bed." And possibly many others until then uninfected would have been better off had the coughers stayed at home in bed, or had they, at the least, covered their coughs.

What applies to the Symphony concert, applies to all gatherings in these times when epidemic threatens. Everybody will be better off if persons with coughing, sneezing colds or the flu stay home and avoid exposing others.

NEWARK, O.
ADVOCATE
DEC 14 1943

Newark Man Is Affiliated With Boston Symphony

Harold L. Meek, formerly of Newark, is playing in the horn section with the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. He was playing with the orchestra when they made a short scene in the March of Time, which was released Dec. 5.

The orchestra broadcasts every Saturday at 8:15 p. m.

PITTSBURGH PRESS, TUESDAY

I Dare Say—

Under a Bomber's Moon

By FLORENCE FISHER PARRY

We walked to the Mosque under a wild clear sky. The stars blazed. One began moving higher, higher, then we knew it was not a star but a plane, night-lighted, on some high lone errand.

Mrs. Parry

Presently the moon would rise to rebuke us that we would turn its mission into carnage and destruction. The clouds hurried across the black sky to some fearsome tryst. We bent our bodies against the wind, and invisible snow pelted our cheeks.

Then we were inside, and the musicians were gathered, their instruments giving out a lovely hushed discord as they tuned for the majestic work ahead of them.

Presently there was a hush, and a small man of vast dignity and force walked to the podium. He raised his hands to his men as though to invoke a blessing upon them, and then the quiet strains of the great Brahms Second Symphony began to pour their comfort. Into every crevice and cranny the music filtered, and spent and frayed hearts, gathered there, eased and evened in their beat, and for a while there was no war or death or sorrow—only the rest that music brings; only its healing and blessing.

In Memoriam

The grave little man paused and spoke. The next number, Debussy's Nocturne, would be offered for the passing soul of Miss May Beegle. She had died but a few days before, and even on that day had been laid to rest. Now her spirit was to be invoked, it would pervade the Temple she had been dedicated to for so many years, it would return and listen, amazed and happy.

The spirit-music of Debussy beckoned her . . . the white veil shimmered, shivered, between this world and That . . . the far and eerie echoes of ghost-calls filled the spaces. If indeed there was a Language that could reach the dead, it was being spoken now. . . . The lights went up, and the halls and corridors thronged with music-lovers. And those remaining in their seats read, again, the words which Harvey Gaul had written:

We who are in music regret the passing of May Beegle, concert manager. She did much for Pittsburgh. To the people who are not in music, but who were her esteemed patrons, her going will be a profound shock.

There was only one May Beegle. Concert managers are not made in a day, and here she was, just entering her 28th year of managing, her 28th year, and her very best year, and she was stricken. It seems hard to believe that she will not be sitting in that left-aisle box listening to her many attractions.

What do you suppose it was that made her the great manager she was—and make no mistake about it she was a great manager, one of America's best! It was this: her sense of values, her faithfulness to her job (there were never any slip-ups, any loose ends with her) and her ability to think things through.

The name May Beegle became a synonym for success, but I can tell you this: it was a synonym for tireless effort, Spartan effort. She never saved herself. Her loss is irreparable.

The Last to Leave

The gray and tireless conductor, Koussevitsky, was mounting the podium again, and the great Mosque shook and vibrated under the furious impact of august sound. Forgot was the convulsion of the War, forgot self and all. And as the clashing cymbals sent up their lasting shattering blast, the magic thralldom broke and the audience stirred at last, and, bemused, groped for its wraps and slowly made its way out into the night.

The moon was high now, flying through cloudy flak and escorted by fleets of diamond stars. Presently the Mosque stood dark and deserted. The vaulted spaces where an hour before the passion of Brahms had stormed and prayed, now were empty of sound.

Yet to the spirit ear, far away pipes, ghost-calls too faint for mortal hearing, are still playing. The echoes of Debussy make delicate ghost-tracings on the ether. A spirit, restless, busy, faintly worried, moves there . . . will not, cannot depart. . . . It stands at the door . . . it sits for an uneasy moment in the left-aisle box there at entrance. . . .

. . . If you were one who is "not blinded by your eyes," you would see the smile, you would hear the happy sigh, you would observe the gesture of farewell as this Last-One-to-Leave-the-Temple turns to say Good-bye.

But you see nothing . . . only an empty temple of music deserted under a bomber's moon. You hear nothing but your own voice speaking against the wind: "It was strange, wasn't it, not having May Beegle there?"

[31]

PASTE OVER

TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

Boston Orchestra Performs In Koussevitzky Tradition

Richard Burgin Proves Master's Worthy Disciple in Museum Peristyle Concert

By ARTHUR PETERSON

Of course the Boston Orchestra will go on being Serge Koussevitzky's orchestra after he has gone from it to return no more. After such a day as his night does not fall or the next man's day begin at once.

There is a long twilight, there is afterglow, a star exults where the sun went down, and the score that another must read is illumined with such challenge that the succe[illegible] though he were only a poor mountebank, yet for a time at necessity's driving must take care to exceed himself.

That is the meaning of integrity and tradition honestly wrought; they are abiding things; they are the fire that has done its day's work and lies ready for the new coals on the morrow.

Burgin a Worthy Disciple

Last night in the Peristyle we warmed our inner selves again at the splendid hearth of Dr. Koussevitzky's music though the master was not there with us. In his stead was the worthy disciple, Richard Burgin, whose hands are wholly fit to hold integrity and tradition.

Let us say that while regretting the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, whose special interest in us was so beautifully expressed by his ready acceptance of first place on the Friends of Toledo Music advisory committee, yet we were glad to have Mr. Burgin, and in his own right.

But there is no reason to exclude last night's audience from the extra pleasure of being told that Dr. Koussevitzky also regretted the need imposed by illness to be absent. I have heard the text of a telegram he sent Emma Endres Kountz from his sickbed, and it was such a message as a disappointed man would send when he had wanted very much to be in Toledo the evening of Dec. 9, 1943.

Superbly Detailed Music

After all, Dr. Koussevitzky has never found anything here but the deepest respect and eager attentiveness . . . and those make the fire that a master musician warms himself at.

Necessarily, Mr. Burgin's different personality was registered in the performance. He does not conduct as Dr. Koussevitzky does; there is more visibility about his handling of the controls. But his different methods lead to a result in the orchestra's tradition—superbly detailed and vital music.

Whether following Dr. Koussevitzky or Mr. Burgin, this is one orchestra that is equally facile with whispers or thunder, and it is one whose separate voices always can be trusted to hew to the fidelity of a pattern without being obscured. To listen for the movements of a contrapuntal line below the top layer of melody is the same as hearing it.

The program began with Brahms "First Symphony" with its curiously reconciled overtones of tentativeness and decision, interesting influences of Beethoven in the third movement and of Wagner in the fourth.

Only One Bungle

Next was Schoenberg's "Verklaerte Nacht," an early work for strings which has references to the classic tradition and harbingers of a revolt to come.

The finale was the "Capriccio Espagnol" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, a piece of gorgeous trash that would ruin a lesser orchestra. Playing trash is the acid test of an orchestra because it must be made to seem what it seemed last night, rewarding and important.

I regret the necessity to report that one bungle interfered with the continuity of our great annual pleasure. Late comers were admitted after the first movement of the Brahms work and the thread of musical thought was needlessly interrupted by nearly five minutes of shuffling.

It could have been avoided. I hope we haven't gone down in the orchestra's books as a bunch of provincial barbarians.

PAGE 24 PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH THURSDAY, DEC. 9, 19

May Beegle's Death Breaks Her Promise To Serge Koussevitzky

By ZORA UNKOVICH

May Beegle who, as a Bedford (Pa.) girl wanted to be a pianist and instead developed into one of the nation's outstanding managers of other stars' concerts, won't be keeping her promise to Serge Koussevitzky this Saturday.

Death interfered.

Last year, when the conductor of the Boston Symphony brought his musicians here for their annual concert under "Miss May's" tutelage, she was already invalided with the sickness that led to her death.

But Koussevitzky and Miss Beegle were old friends. Bearing beautiful flowers, he called on her at the apartment. They talked of her visits to his Berkshire home . . . of the successes she had made of his Pittsburgh appearances.

PROMISED DANCE

When he was about to leave, the maestro leaned over and kissed her on each cheek. He exclaimed:

"Next time, I'll dance with you!"

And she agreed.

But she died yesterday in her home in Schenley Apartments.

Most of the country's outstanding names have been brought to Pittsburgh by Miss Beegle since she first entered the professional concert field as secretary to William T. Mossman, manager of the Old Pittsburgh Orchestra when Emil Paur was its director.

She had meant to be a pianist, but circumstances interfered. Instead she took up typing and shorthand, studying at night.

When backers of the Pittsburgh Orchestra decided to give it up and disband, young May Beegle didn't agree with them. She felt Pittsburgh should have music, especially fine orchestras, and so she was instrumental in the founding of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

LIFELONG FRIEND

Her lifelong friend and deep admirer, Mrs. Enoch Rauh, former director of the Pittsburgh Department of Charities, described her efforts thus:

"Miss Beegle to me always represented the one person responsible in the development of early classical or, shall I say, great music in Pittsburgh.

"She was the great pioneer in the field of bringing great artists to Pittsburgh."

Although women weren't welcomed in business in the early 1900's, everything Miss Beegle touched turned into gold, Victor Saudek, director of Pittsburgh's Little Symphony recalls. He says:

"When I was engaged to come to Pittsburgh from Chicago by Emil Paur in 1908, Miss Beegle was the first person I met. She was in the old Magee Building on Fourth Avenue.

BUSINESS SUCCESS

"Then as now, she would work day and night. You'd always find her in her office late at night, Sundays and holidays. Her theory was:

"'When you work real hard you're apt to get a good percentage of returns.'"

And she did, Saudek points out, for at the time of her death she was known in the East as the most successful concert manager in the United States.

Miss Beegle went about everything very carefully. She calculated well . . . knew how to pick the best.

HIGH STANDARDS

She wasn't interested in mediocrity. Everything had to be of high caliber.

Enrico Caruso she brought here twice. Paderewski was a frequent Beegle guest star. Geraldine Farrar, Rachmaninoff and Kreisler were others invited to the Steel City under terms guaranteed by the astute concert manager. In recent years Nelson Eddy, Lily Pons and Jeannette MacDonald were among the artists with which she jammed Syria Mosque.

An extremely keen sense of selling was one of the attributes which helped Miss Beegle bring music to a sell-out standing in a city where concerts had been sparsely attended. Sun-Telegraph Music Critic Fred Lissfelt, who knew her for many years, observes:

"On first hearing, Miss Beegle always could tell whether a star would be a commercial success or not. All the managers liked her. They knew she could put over their attractions.

"She always was interested in what the critics said before the concert. But at the concert she never tried to influence their opinions. She didn't give a darn what they said afterwards."

In 1933, a black financial yea for all musicians, she sponsore the Little Symphony with Victo Saudek as its leader. For 10 year she guaranteed the concerts. Wha the businesslike promoter neve allowed to be told was that at th end of every season, she gave eac musician a bonus of several hundred dollars although not oblige to do so.

For many years Miss Beeg represented Charles Ellis, conce manager of Boston, here. 1923 she decided it was time go on her own and in trying decide on a name for her ne firm, sent half a dozen titles business and personal friends New York.

SOUSA'S SUGGESTION

Bandleader John Philip Sou at whose home she had been summer guest saw the list an immediately sent this wire Pittsburgh:

"None of the titles submitted is good. Name your cours the May Beegle Concerts."

And that was the name unde which she still was working whe on August 17 she promoted th outdoor opera "Aida" at Forbe Field and insisted on attendin although she'd suffered a strok that affected one arm.

This was the last of her operatic endeavors she was to see.

Earlier in her career sh brought the Chicago Grand Oper to the Mosque for eight succes sive years at the cost of $20,00 a performance.

Despite her busy life, she belonged to a number of organizations: The Mu Phi Epsilon Sorority, National Music Sorority, the Tuesday Musical Club, the Twentieth Century Club, the Woman's City Club, the Business and Professional Women's Club, the Civic Club of Allegheny County, the League of American Pen Women, the Women's Press Club of Pittsburgh, the Pittsburgh Athletic Association and the First Evangelical Church of Pittsburgh.

Services will be held Saturda at the H. Samson Funeral Home 537 Neville Street.

—V—

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8.

NO KOUSSEVITZKY, CROWD MOLLIFIED

Boston Orchestra Is Able Under Burgin's Baton

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The capacity audience which came to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Public Music Hall last night experienced disappointment when told that the famous conductor of the organization, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, was ill and could not appear. The crowd appeared to be mollified by the news that the concertmoster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, would substitute.

Mrs. Emil Brudno, manager of the Cleveland Civic Concert Course, under whose auspices the orchestra performed, came to the stage with G. E. Judd, manager of the Boston Orchestra, and asked Judd to make the announcement. Judd read the following telegram, which he said he received from Koussevitsky late yesterday afternoon.

"Am most unhappy to miss Cleveland. My heart and thoughts are at Cleveland Auditorium tonight. Have heard Cleveland has recently shown great satisfaction with new and young leadership, so warmly recommend my associate, Mr. Burgin."

Program Is Altered

The telegram was from Ho Springs, Va., where Koussevitsky suffering from a case of intestin flu. Judd recalled that this w the first time in 20 years the co ductor had missed a scheduled c cert on tour.

The program, which began at instead of at 8:45 on account of th black-out, was altered. It began with the Brahms Symphony No. 1. Schoenberg's Verklaerte Nacht" followed, and the closing item was Moussorsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which replaced Debussy's "La Mer."

It cannot be said, of course, that the evening offered the kind of thrills which Koussevitzky undoubtedly would have brought. This was an interesting test, however, of what the famous Boston Orchestra could do without the personal dynamism of its celebrated conductor, and one must admit that either with or without the distinguished leader it is still a great orchestra, trained to the last degree for beauty of tone quality, intonation and balance.

Burgin, too, came off with no small amount of honor, earning hearty applause for himself and his colleagues by a sturdy interpretation of Brahm's C minor Symphony and a brilliant exposition of the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures," not to forget his sensitive reading of the Shoenberg Opus 4, the early work for strings in which this archatonalist seems to be taking a fond, frenzied and lingering farewell of the sweet-scented chromaticism bequethed to him by Wagner.

Simply, and without ostentatious posturing, Burgin displayed sincerity and understanding born of long association with this varied and engrossing symphonic fare. If the orchestra did not have quite the virtuosic luster and alacrity it has shown here on previous visits, it was none the less satisfying in its orthodox conservation of fine and lasting musical values.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

DEC 10

Assistant Conductor Directs Symphony

Boston Orchestra Impressive in Concert At Toledo Art Museum

By DONNA PAYDEN

Another laurel was added to the crown of the Boston Symphony chestra last night when it appeared in the Toledo Museum of Art, nder the direction of Dr. Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor.

Dr. Burgin, who replaced Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, ill with a severe cold, did an excellent and forceful job of conducting. His interpretations of the selections presented, were not, as might easily have been, carbon copies of Dr. Koussevitsky.

Especially noticeable was the work with the string section of the orchestra, outstanding in tone and sonority.

Because of the size of the string section many passages in the first selection "Symphony No. 1 in C Minor," by Brahms, ordinarily undistinquishable, were brought out.

Dr. Burgin seemed to have a long and detailed view of the First Symphony. Especially enjoyable were the two final movements of the selection.

In his interpretation of Schoenberg's "Kerklaerte Nacht, Op. 4," he was truly rhapsodic, again showing his intimate knowledge of string instruments.

For those who can not bring themselves to care for Brahms, the final number of the program was a welcome antidote. The "Capriccio Espagnol, Opus 34," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was one of the most delightful numbers on the program.

Written in the usual style of the great Russian composer. the music was pleasantly light and enjoyable. Movements included "Alborado," "Variations," "Alborado," "Scene and Gypsy Dance," and "Fandango of the Asturias."

May Beegle, Opera, Concert Manager, Dead

Pittsburgh Sun Telegraph
Dec 9 1943

May Beegle, Pittsburgh's outstanding concert manager died in her home in the Schenley Apartments at 11:45 a. m today after an illness of more than a year.

A native of Bedford, she entered the concert field as secretary to W. T. Mossman, manager of the Pittsburgh Orchestra under Conductor Emil Paur. When that orchestra was disbanded, she began booking many of the orchestras and stars she had met through her secretarial work.

Sun-Telegraph Photo
MAY BEEGLE

The first big name artist she brought to Pittsburgh was Mischa Elman.

At that time she was her own secretary and "general office girl." But in 1923, she formed the May Beegle Concerts, a name chosen after consultation with her friend, John Philip Sousa, famous bandmaster.

FIRM WITH ARTISTS

Usually she managed temperamental artists with a firm hand, but once she almost met defeat. That was with Feodor Chaliapin.

At one of his concerts during World War I there was such a demand for tickets that Miss Beegle sold them for the seats on stage.

Chaliapin refused to go on with the concert. He said the stage was for him alone.

He finally agreed to sing only if all the proceeds from the stage seats would go to the Red Cross.

AIDED BY BROTHER

During Miss Beegle's illness, her brother, Thomas Beegle, has carried on much of the work of the agency, assisted by a sister, Helena.

Besides her concerts, Miss Beegle had the Children's Theater Series, the Summer Pop Concerts on the Schenley Hotel lawn and the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Koussevitzky Wins Acclaim At Concerts

Boston Symphony Conductor Returns Following Illness

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Saturday and yesterday at Syria Mosque, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

SATURDAY'S PROGRAM
Symphony No. 2 in D major....Brahms
Two Noctures....................Debussy
Pictures at an Exhibition. .Moussorgsky
(Arranged by Maurice Ravel)

SUNDAY'S PROGRAM
"Classical" Symphony..........Prokofieff
Symphony No. 1............Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.Tchaikovsky

By Donald Steinfirst

That incomparable orchestral body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its annual Pittsburgh appearances over the weekend under dramatic circumstances. Dr. Koussevitzky was rejoining his orchestra for the first time on this tour after an illness and the concerts were the first staged since the death of May Beegle, founder and manager of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, under whose auspices the Boston Symphony Orchestra has appeared in Pittsburgh for 20-odd years.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in one of his rare speeches, told Saturday's audience of his personal loss and that of the music community and dedicated the playing of the Debussy Nocturnes to Miss Beegle's memory.

Results Displayed

One would not have known that this was the beginning of Dr. Koussevitzky's twentieth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so personal and so attentive was his leadership. One would not have known, that is, if one had failed to consider the result of 20 years as revealed in this pair of concerts. Such sounds are not created in less time.

There is a definite golden patina about the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is not heard elsewhere. It is warm; it is absorbing; it is glowing. Every player is a virtuoso, or would appear so judging from these two concerts. In the "Pictures," which represented the high spot of Saturday's performance to at least one listener, there was the continuous line from Hartmann, the painter, to Moussorgsky, the composer, who caught the very essence of these assorted paintings, to Ravel, the master orchestrator and colorist, to Koussevitzky, the understanding interpreter and to his men, and finally to the audience who revelled in these miniature tone descriptions.

Players Recognized

There were "Gnomes" bursting with malevolence, the constant clatter of the "Tuileries," the lumbering cart of "Bydlo," the amusing "Ballet of the Chicks" and the massive "Gate at Kiev." To point out some of the players is to deny all their just due, yet one must acclaim the precision of the percussion, the magnificent oboe, the perfect horn and the beautiful trumpet. These were masters.

The Debussy Nocturnes are very particular jewels in the crown of this orchestra. The orchestra and its conductor never fail to capture the elusive and subtle feeling of "Nuages" or the faint, even restrained, gaiety of "Fetes." Such was the case on Saturday, the brass and winds again shining.

The Brahms Symphony was again a fine performance, but in interpretation, Brahms is hardly ever a Koussevitzky tour-de-force.

Ovation Given

We liked especially the dialogue between the strings and the winds in the Allegretto section, so delicate and precise, and the majestic intensity in the final movement, at the close of which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received a tremendous ovation.

Yesterday's all-Russian program drew one of the largest audiences of the season, one that was moved from one climax to another as the music unfolded. Prokofieff's delightful Symphony in miniature still retains its fresh non-academic appearance. The opening Allegro was in the daintiest of concep-

---

RSDAY, DEC. 9, 1943 PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH PAGE 1

Editorial

MAY BEEGLE

By MRS. CHARLES M. BREGG

THEY say May Beegle is dead! But it can't be true. As long as memory remains to Pittsburgh, May Beegle will be alive—alive in the remembrance of her friends and of what she has meant in the city's cultural life.

Bringing to Pittsburgh the best in the concert world and lecture field may have seemed, to a casual person, merely the profession of an impresario. But to May Beegle it was more than that, as anyone realized who knew her well.

There was pride of achievement in what she was able to do; pride in giving her city everything that was fine and great. And May Beegle shared the good things she brought here.

Each year she invited the entire membership of the Women's Press Club, the Business and Professional Women's Club and others to which she belonged (as well as many persons who otherwise would never have had the opportunity to hear such splendid things), to be her guests at some outstanding concert—a generous and thoughtful gesture that was altogether typical of a woman who was by nature kind and thoughtful.

Truly, "They are not dead who live in hearts they leave behind."

Buffalo Courier
Dec. 14 '43

Music Review

By Isabelle Workman Evans

Excitement is always at a peak when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its annual Buffalo appearance on the Zorah Berry series. Sold out months in advance with hundreds clamoring for tickets, there was this same aura of expectancy in Kleinhans Music Hall as the throngs waited for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to take his place on the podium.

The announcement that because of the veteran conductor's illness, the Boston's regular concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin, would direct, brought only a momentary murmur of disappointment. There was obvious pleasure in the accompanying announcement that the only program change would be during the first portion of the evening, to be devoted to Brahms' First Symphony rather than to William Schumann and Shostokovitch.

Despite Buffalo's esteem for the beloved Dr. Koussevitzky, the audience last evening demonstrated that its response to this Boston organization is not inspired only by reverence for the "big name" conductor. It was quick to recognize the superlative qualities of the orchestra under Burgin's baton by according the musicians an ovation.

Of course, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra is no novelty for Burgin. Associated with the organization for 23 years, the unassuming and proficient violinist-conductor has been Koussevitzky's right hand assistant. Success with a symphonic organization is in its molding and disciplining and Burgin has played a major role in developing the Boston unit to its present state of perfection.

As fully aware of the resources and sensitivities of the orchestra as a solo violinist is of his Stradivarious or Guarnerius' capabilities, Burgin provided a magnificent interpretation of the Brahms. The Scherzo and Finale were superb. There was grace and eloquence of phrasing as well as beautiful proportion of tone and tempi.

Other offerings were Nuages and Fetes by Debussy, Prelude to Khovanstchina by Moussorgsky, and Capriccio Espagnole by Rimsky-Korsakov. This colorful and brilliant music was presented with technical finesse and excellent styling. My only regret was in the occasional lack of quality during the numerous incidental solos of the concertmaster, substituting for Burgin. There was a prolonged ovation for orchestra an conductor.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Given Rousing Ovations at Two Performances

Illness and Travel Trouble Overcome by Musicians, Sponsored by Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn.

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

Sponsored by the 28-year-old Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., two programs by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon and Saturday night at Syria Mosque were unparalleled performances that evoked tumultuous ovations.

Mr. Lewando

The eloquent playing uncovered by this marvelously integrated orchestra and the conducting of its imaginative and dynamic director is the more remarkable, for they have been on a week-long tour subjected to discomforts of wartime travel. Several players became ill and Mr. Koussevitzky contracted a cold. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, wielded the baton until Saturday night when his chief, none the worse for the experience, returned to conduct with renewed ardor, vigor and inspiration to unfold the beauties of Brahms' 2nd symphony, Debussy's Clouds and Festivals, and the Moussorgsky—Ravel Pictures At An Exhibition.

Brahms At Its Best

The Brahms' imposing grandeur was revealed impellingly, each part tions, the Largo was stated with broad string strokes, and most astounding of all was the virile Finale, with Dr. Koussevitzky adopting a headlong, pulsating tempo that few conductors would dare attempt with any orchestra.

Undoubtedly Shostakovitch has never since reached the heights of his First Symphony. In it, he is completely new and unfettered. It is the music of a composer with something new to say and new media in which to express himself.

Conducting Excellent

Yesterday's performance was electric in its split-second timing, devastating in its over-all tonal effects. The marvelous muted trumpets and French horn were again heard to advantage and the conductor who so evidently relishes this music of his native Russia was always the complete master of the music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the thrice familiar Tschaikowsky Symphony is highly personalised. There will be those pedants who cannot agree with his tempo, since he does not hesitate to add retards and diminuendos that classicists avoid and his time for the concluding movement is again daringly fast. But the sum total of the Symphony is one of tonal opulence welling out over the lights in overwhelming quantity. The orchestral ensemble is so convincingly right, the individual sections so completely virtuoso, the details of structure so clearly set forth, one could easily forego any captious criticism of tempos. At the end, Dr. Koussevitzky and his men received another tremendous ovation.

recreated with unforgettable tonal luster and flexibility. Here was Brahms at its best.

Recalls were the order of the evening, the leader sharing the tribute with his musicians. Amid the ecstacy of the occasion, an important figure was missed — Miss May Beegle, nationally known concert manager, who passed away last Wednesday and was laid to rest Saturday. She managed the POA since its inception and founded her own series 21 years ago. Mr. Koussevitsky lauded her contribution to music activity and dedicated to her memory the playing of the Debussy pieces.

The enthusiasm of Saturday's concert was duplicated yesterday. In the playing of Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, the Shostakovitch First and Tschaikowsky's Fifth another phenomenal success was scored with stunning interpretative force; brilliant virtuosity, incandescent emotion and dazzling effects. Mozartean treatment of the Prokofieff work added infinite pleasure to listening.

Shastakovitch Score

With passing time the Shostakovitch First has become more palatable. It is replete with the promise of genius that is being fulfilled in the composer's later works. But nortions of the First have always been gripping.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth was played superbly, and imbued with mood intensity that enraptured the audience. Again Mr. Koussevitzky was the transcendent interpreter and the orchestra voicing the feeling and depth with vibrant power, excitement and sympathetic response. Here was playing of previously unheard quality in reflective calm and tragic intensity.

In the audience were Frank Sinatra and Jan Savitt. At intermission Frank was besieged by autograph hunters. Earlier when his presence was noticed there was a general craning of necks in his direction by people in every part of the hall, including the musicians on stage. But there was no swooning!

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH

DEC 13 1943

Boston Orchestra Acclaimed

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky directing again brought large audiences to Syria Mosque for Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Saturday night Kossevitsky paid tribute to May Beegle, under whose sponsorship the orchestra has so often played, and dedicated the Debussy nocturnes to her memory.

All that comes from these players is gold, but why these last minute changes in program? We expect authoritative readings and prepare ourselves for a perfect performance of Schoenberg, who may become the Beethoven of a future generation and whose music we have a right to hear and judge, and then we get the Moussorgsky "Pictures" which have had frequent readings here.

DYNAMIC CONTRASTS

In these "Pictures from an Exhibition" both director and orchestra are so much at home that its performance sparkles with humor and grace. Vast dynamic contrasts are at the root of this interpretation which led the Saturday concert to such a triumphant close.

Of the Brahms Second Symphony, I like to remember the colloquy between the various woodwinds in the second movement, the startling clarity of thematic fragments throughout as well as a tone and ease of expression which meant supreme well being.

Debussy is, of course, the forte of the Boston players where structure is never obscured in the infinitesimal play of nuance and color which Koussevitsky always achieves in French music.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONIES

Three symphonies for the matinee was an achievement for Pittsburgh, all Russian works—two contemporary, the Prokofieff Classic Symphony, the Shostakovitch First and the Tchaikowsky Fifth, a tour de force with this orchestra.

What nice distinctions the director made in these three works: the first, the excursion which every composer makes into classic patterns when his own invention gives out or proves too scant; the second stressing the dramatic and measuring the realistic history o today; the third, purely spiritua interpretation of the great Sla spirit which Tchaikowsky ex pressed through his art if not his life. Whirlwind tempi th other orchestras would not da lent force and excited unco trolled response in the audi

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY RECEIVES OVATION IN CONCERT HERE

Buffalo News
Dec. 14

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

Although minus its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Richard Burgin, who substituted for Dr. Koussevitzky, received an overwhelmingly-fervent ovation Monday evening. A standing-room-only audience crowded Kleinhans Music Hall to hear the annual Buffalo concert of this virtuoso among orchestras.

Disappointment and delight by turn swept over the audience at the announcement that Dr. Koussevitzky felt insufficiently recovered from a recent indisposition to conduct, and that Brahms' First Symphony was to be substituted for the programmed Symphony for Strings by William Schuman and the First Symphony by Shostakovich.

* * *

Mr. Burgin, who is concertmaster of the orchestra and assistant conductor to Dr. Koussevitzky, conducted in a manner to reaffirm what those of us who have observed him at the concertmaster's desk over a period of years have known—his sound musicianship and self-effacing approach. His beat is intelligible and he conducts with the utmost sympathy for contour of line and molding of phrase.

It is no easy task for a man whose approach has the self-effacement of Mr. Burgin's to substitute for Dr. Koussevitzky, a man whose personality has such positive and hypnotic qualities. And I mean no slight to Mr. Burgin when I say that the Boston Orchestra, one of the most highly-trained and best-rehearsed such bodies in the world, probably could have played the Brahms very correctly with its collective eyes closed.

But it is greatly to his credit that he and his players should have given a reading that had the aura and spirit, the power and poetry of this great symphony. If the listener was conscious of disappointment that the apocalyptic glory of the fourth movement was not fully realized, certainly he could rejoice over the eloquence of the first three movements.

* * *

After intermission we could revel in works that were particularly exciting and brilliant — Debussy's two Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes; Moussorgsky's beautiful Prelude to Khovantschina and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnole. We could revel in the transparency of sound and balance, the aristocratic cool tonal body . . . as characteristic of the Boston Orchestra as baked beans and the cod are of Boston. Furthermore, we could marvel at how the magnificent dynamic range possible to 110 top-notch players never swelled beyond the bounds of aural beauty or musical proportion.

Unlucky the city indeed that is not inspired by what the civic-spirited Bostonians have built up in 62 years and that does not aspire to provide for its children a similar heritage of beauty.

The concert was under the sponsorship of Zorah B. Berry.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

DEC 14 1943

BOSTON SYMPHONY—Sergei Koussevitzky's notable band, probably the best symphony orchestra in America, was heard from Pittsburgh and fifteen minutes later than the accustomed hour. All we had time for was Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D Major, music in which the orchestra and conductor usually excel. The pickup on this touring date was far from satisfactory and the performance had none of the firm organic quality expected. It was good to hear, of course, but it lacked points of perfection. (KGKO, 7:30 to 8:15 p.m., Saturday)—J. R.

ing the Boschestra is no
Associated
n for 23 years, proficient viobeen Kousse-
assistant. Suc-
c organization
d disciplining a major role oston unit to erfection.
the resources the orchestra of his Stradi-ius' capabilia magnifi-the Brahms. ale were su-nce and elo-as well as of tone and are Nuages

Prelude to Moussorgsky, ole by Rim-colorful and esented with d excellent gret was in quality durdental solos substituting vas a pro-chestra ar-

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

DEC 15 1943

Boston Symphony Gives Concert of Great Beauty

By A. J. WARNER

It is a sheer feast to the ear when the matchless Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town, for playing of the highest order is sure to be the rule. Last night, in the Eastman Theater, Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians gave us what may described without hyperbole as a glorious concert. Public recognition of the importance of the event, and the privilege it offered, was shown by an audience that packed the house to the point where even standing room was at a premium.

Once again this incomparable band, which has been brought to its present pre-eminent position under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, sounded nobly, like the Stradivarius of all orchestras, as it has eloquently been called, and produced a quality of tone so fraught with beauty as to be almost unbearable, in the sense that loveliness can possess a poignancy which is ineffable. Perhaps it was the contrast between the black tragedy of the world today and the inspiring magnificence of that to which one listened that made the audience more acutely conscious than ever of the place music—great music—has in the spiritual and aesthetic side of life.

All-Russian Program

What long since has become a trueism came repeatedly to my mind and heart during last evening's proceedings—that the Boston Symphony stands today as one of the most truly splendid "collective" works of art man has created. In the pure joy of hearing such a concert the factors of virtuosity and precision, and indeed, of all the mechanics of orchestral performance, were fused in the perfection of the whole. And that was as it should be in the creation, or rather the recreation of music. Throughout the evening Dr. Koussevitzky, and the organization over which he so superbly rules, provided, in the way of clarity of balance, style and distinction, a model of what skill, musicianship, and ample rehearsals are able to accomplish.

The Boston orchestra's conductor can, when he chooses, demonstrate an uncanny flair for program-making. Such was the case last night. The concert began with the Prokofieff "Classic" Symphony, instead of the scheduled "Commando March" by Samuel Barber, and thus turned out to be all-Russian. Prokofieff's work is an old, yet always amusing story—a score that is charmingly diverting and one that, dating back to 1916 and in form reviving Haydn-Mozart elegance, is by no means an imitation. The wine is Prokofieff's, though the bottle may be Mozart's. The performance was glittering in its polish and grace, every detail being outlined with silk-glove punctilio. Here was the ultimate in musical interpretive finesse.

Carries Audience

Next on the program came the First Symphony, Opus 10, by Shostakovitch, of which it has been said that, when the smoke of battle has cleared away over the merits of the young Russian composer's sixth and seventh symphonies, his initial work in large orchestral form, written when he was 19, will survive as the most consistently unified of his instrumental scores, although probably his epic Fifth Symphony stands today as his strongest, best achievement. The First, which was given with great sweep and power, seems to owe its central inspiration to the revolutionary Russia Shostakovitch knew as a boy. It is grim and sardonic music, pitiless, melancholy, tragic. Its brilliant colors are hard, like "iron twilights," and most of the work is stark, with metallic fashes.

Following the intermission there was given the famous Fifth Symphony of a composer whose works Dr. Koussevitzky delights to interpret—Tschaikovsky. This was a performance that emphasized the richness of the symphony's finest passages and that proclaimed the frenetic power and passionate romanticism of the music with overwhelming euphony and force. It carried the audience on its wings of beautiful sound to an ovational pitch of enthusiasm, as Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled again and again to acknowledge the demonstration of the house.

Verily must it be recorded that the Boston Symphony's whole program was, as Sir James M. Barrie's Policeman would have recognized, "infalliable." If ever there was such a thing, last night's concert was just that—"infalliable!"

Baton Rouge, La.
Advocate

SATURDAY

New Time for Symphony

The premiere concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing company will be heard over the Blue network and WJBO at a new hour, from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., on Christmas day, and at that time each Saturday thereafter.

The last concert of the orchestra to be heard at the old time was broadcast on Saturday, December 18, from 7:15 to 8:15 p. m., CWT. Under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra will be heard in a performance of Haydn's "Symphony in G Major, No. 88," and Mozart's "Symphony in E Flat Major."

URDAY, DECEMBER 18,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the ninth program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Haydn......Symphony in G minor No. 68
Mozart......Symphony in E flat (K. 543)
Beethoven...Symphony No. 7 in A, Op. 92

It is not until Dr. Koussevitzky frightens us most to death by being ill for a week or two that we—and that means all of us—realize just how profoundly his presence on the conductor's stand adds to any program he chooses to make.

Yesterday's program, a sort of classic breather or interlude, consisted wholly of symphonies which the orchestra doubtless could have played almost as well without him for, after all, it plays them practically once a season. Yet the "almost" in this case marks the difference between a splendid performance and a wonderful one, and it can be accounted for only by laying it to the elusive anatomy of personality.

So it was yesterday with the Haydn, which is a joy under any circumstances but indescribably more so when given the lift, the nuance and the polish Dr. Koussevitzky endows it with. Much the same is true of the Mozart, which remains a monument to its composer even when clumsily done, but here the conductor seeks out its fateful implications as well as its effervescences, and makes it a composition of matchless beauty. And, to carry through the deepening motif of the program, he gives Beethoven's Seventh a jagged momentum without which the violent thumpings and full closes verge often on the ridiculous. It may be possible to arch a brow at a tempo here, or raise a finger at an extravagance there, but it is not possible to resist succumbing to the underlying warmth, vitality and compulsion of Dr. Koussevitzky's conception.

The orchestra was in fine temper yesterday, and if it's permissible to single out any one member of it for especial mention, then such mention belongs to Mr. Polatschek for his beautiful performance of the clarinet part in the Mozart symphony. The audience was in fine temper, too, for this music was clearly its dish. Let us hope, though, it doesn't mean that the orchestra is going to settle down to the old routine of Sibelius Fifths, Mendelssohn's "Italians" and all the other pieces which have become as much a yearly tradition with Dr. Koussevitzky as carolling on Beacon Hill on Christmas Eve has to a Bostonian.

Next week the program offers Handel's B minor Concerto Grosso, Sibelius' Fifth (heavens, so soon!), Schumann's A minor Violoncello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust."

Dec 15 43
Roch
Democrat

8

Ovation Greets Koussevitzky At Eastman

By NORMAN NAIRN

HOW wonderfully the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays! What matchless tonal resources Serge Koussevitzky revealed again last night at the Eastman before a capacity audience whose applause for the redoubtable conductor and his musicians reached ovation proportions!

It turned out to be an all-Russian program after all, for instead of the scheduled curtain raiser, Samuel Barber's "Commando March," Dr. Koussevitzky substituted Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and not knowing the march, nobody was disappointed.

Prokofieff had his tongue in his cheek when he composed the "Classical," his piano pieces hav- delighted the musical radicals and sent the conservatives "nuts." So impishly he attempted to write in the style Hozart might follow if he were living today. And what came out is a work fresh and witty, melodious, with excellent themes and full of sly satire. And this reviewer never has heard the satire brought out more effectively than last night. It was good and jolly and charming.

Followed then the Shostakovitch First Symphony, a healthy work written when the composer, only 19, used it for his graduation thesis from the Leningrad Conservatory. Distinguished by strongly marked rhythms, it is brilliant writing and certainly wears well. I won't argue with those who consider it superior to his Fifth Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky made it dramatic from beginning to end. Shostakovitch, also, is a bit satirical in the march theme dominating the first movement. The second movement is a fantastic scherzo, with the piano playing an important part, while the third, warm and elegiac, ends with a snare drum crescendo leading directly into the finale, which ends in a sort of barbaric splendor. Individual ecomiums should go to the muted trumpet playing in the third movement and the incidental cello soloist in the finale.

It was in the Tschaikowsky Fifth Symphony, however, that the man who is ranked one of the greatest of today's conductors obtained those ravishing sounds, those gorgeous tonal effects, for which the Bostonians are famous. The strings were glowingly translucent, the brasses of well nigh overwhelming solidity.

Dr. Koussevitzky is renowned for his penetrating insight into Tschaikowsky's music. This is not the neurotic Tschaikowsky, but music chock full of melodies of assuaging loveliness, teemingly romantic. And what we heard last night was frankly emotional, but never saccharine.

The virtuosity of this amazing body of musicians certainly was never more apparent in any previous Rochester appearance. Such eloquence, such fervor of response to the leader's wishes, such unanimity! Dr. Koussevitzky brought out subtly the pathos, the depth of Tschaikowsky's joys and sorrows.

One of the best known and loved melodies in all Tschaikowsky is the Andante Cantabile movement (another encomium to the horn player), and here was one of the perfect spots of the evening. (For that matter, it was all perfect). And this reviewer found new beauties in the finale, with its inspiring brass choir, which he had never heard before.

Surely this was a memorable concert. The great conductor and the great orchestra richly deserved the exuberant applause.

Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN

DEC 19 1943

The premiere concert of the Boston Symphony under the sponsorship of Allis-Chalmers will be heard over the Blue Network on Christmas night for a full hour. The program to be played under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will come from the famous Boston Symphony Hall. (WSIX, 7:30 p. m.)

---

ns — Stage News —

Christian Monitor Dec 17, 43

Gregor Piatigorsky

Soloist in the Schumann Violoncello Concerto at the Boston Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday of next week, and Monday and Tuesday, Dec. 27 and 28.

Dr. Koussevitzky Returns With a Classic Program

Monitor Dec. 18

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky returned to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, evidently quite recovered from his recent indisposition, to direct the first concert of the ninth pair of the season. The program was made up of three symphonies from the classical repertory: Haydn's in G major, No. 88; Mozart's in E flat (K. 543), and Beethoven's No. 7.

Not much there to call for examination, except in matters of execution and "interpretation." Ordinarily, we could dismiss the proceedings with the comment that the orchestra and the conductor were both in their usual form.

Yesterday that was not quite true. The conductor, to be sure, seemed to be in fine fettle, to judge from the energy he put into his gestures. The orchestra, alas, was by no means at its best. It was accurate, yes; but it was lacking in that superb clarity and definition that are among its chief characteristics. Its playing yesterday would have been rated excellent, no doubt, from most other orchestras; but we have been spoiled, and we are not satisfied with anything less than the Boston standard.

We can only speculate on how far the shortcomings were due to the absence of Mr. Burgin, who presumably is enjoying a little vacation as a reward for his exertions during Dr. Koussevitzky's several weeks of inactivity. Or perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky has not yet got things quite back into shape. Certainly he seemed yesterday to be working very hard.

Possibly he was working too hard. Anyhow, here he had three symphonic finales in one afternoon, and he drove through all of them as if they were labeled Prestissimo. The men tried hard, but they're only human, and the best they could do was a scramble.

The best playing of the afternoon was done in the first Allegros of the Mozart and the Beethoven, where Dr. Koussevitzky' was at his most eloquent and dramatic. The slow movements tended to drag, and the Menuettos and the Beethoven Scherzo to be a little obscure in outline.

Back To Classics Symphony Program

By BETSY WARREN

The gladstone return of Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor for this Friday's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall was also the occasion for a back-to-the classics-program in which one heard the Symphony in G major, No. 88 by Haydn, Symphony in E-flat major by Mozart, and the Symphony No. 7 in A major by Beethoven.

Although such a program is undoubtedly box-office (surely not all the increase in audience was due to Serge Koussevitzky's conducting), although masterpieces ever bear repetition, although proper evaluation of the present cannot be attained without reference to past accomplishments, yet such evident enjoyment of the past with a corresponding apathy or antagonism toward the present which we see everywhere warrants the comment that our ears are a hundred years out of date. This does not mean that such music should be as rare in our experience as two-pronged forks, but for the sake of progress and the future of music, we should tune up our ears to contemporary idioms.

The performance of the three works reached an unusually high level on the part of orchestra and conductor, with the exception of the "allegrissimo" tempo of the final movements of Mozart's and Haydn's Symphonies. This nineteenth century rushing around just doesn't permit everything to sound in eighteenth century music and also hurries phrasing.

The program for the next pair of concerts will be: Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12; Sibelius, Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major; Schumann, Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor (soloist, Gregor Piatigorsky); Berlioz, Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." Op. 24.

Clipping From TORONTO, CANADA
STAR

DEC 24 1943

MAESTRO PUTS O.K. ON HOME-MADE CELLO

Boston, Dec. 24—(AP)—A home-made violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by Enrico Fabrizio, member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in his tiny cellar workshop. Fabrizio showed Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading cello players, the instrument in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall.

Piatigorsky borrowed a bow, stooped over—he couldn't wait to find a chair to sit in—and began playing. The expressive face broke into a smile as rich, vibrant tones poured from the instrument.

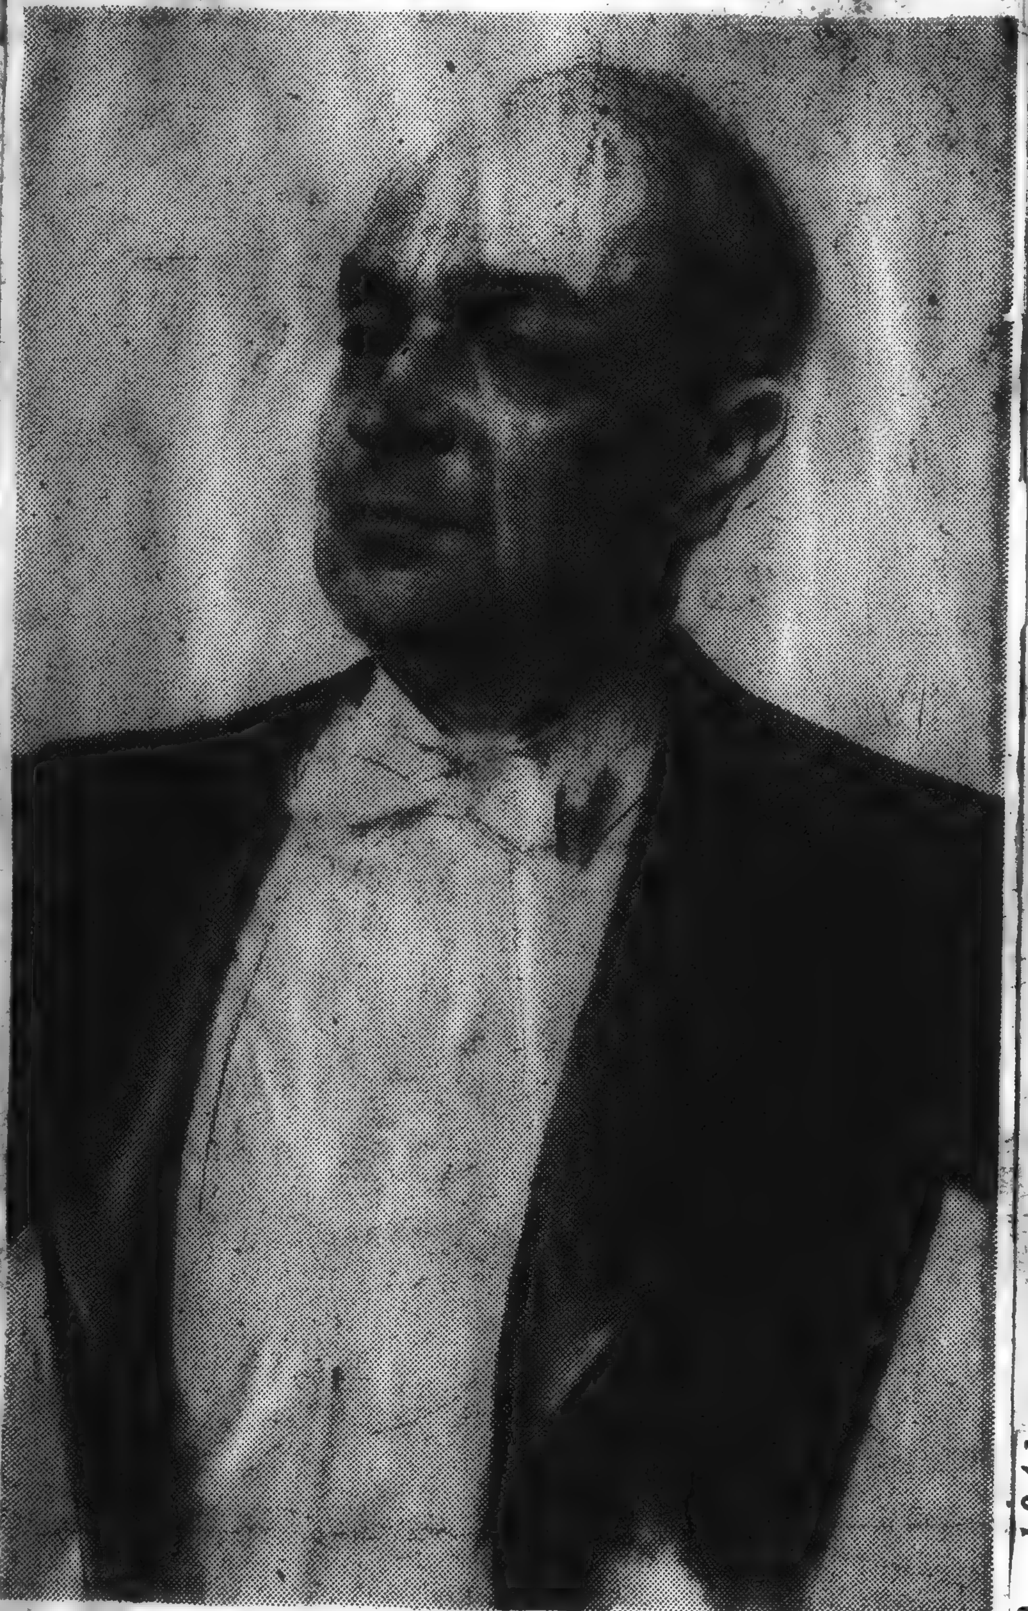
"Grave!" exclaimed Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

[34]

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

DEC 19 1943

Boston Symphony Concerts To Be Sponsored on WNBH



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after one year as a "sustaining" feature of the coast-to-coast Blue Network, is to come under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, one of the largest industrial organizations in the United States.

The first sponsored broadcast will be the performance next Saturday, on Christmas Day. It will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. over Station WNBH and the Blue Network.

Enjoyment of the orchestra, pioneer symphony group of the United States, is no longer limited to residents of Greater Boston. Under the inspired leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of America's three top conductors now in his 20th consecutive season as its director, it can be heard by radio from coast to coast.

Founded in 1881

The Boston Symphony was founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson. From the beginning, under its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, it became the exemplar in this country of great symphonic performances. Musical authorities have rated it the finest symphony in the United States.

In 1924, Dr. Koussevitzky arrived in the United States to become conductor. He has molded the orchestra into a superlative single instrument, performing with insight, brilliance and power. Olin Downes of the New York Times wrote of it: "It is a necessity because no other single agency can do more for the bruised spirit of man in such a time as this."

One phase of the Boston Symphony's service in wartime is the series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, specially for men and women in the service. In addition, it has given many performances in camps, having traveled to Camp Edwards, Camp Myles Standish, Fort Devens and the Naval Training Station in Newport, with other concerts for the benefit of the United War Fund, Russian War Relief and like causes.

Tune in at 8:30 Christmas night for a real Christmas gift, the first sponsored broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, WNBH-Blue.

Many Yule Programs

The Blue Network, including WNBH, is planning to make this Christmas an outstanding one with a comprehensive series of Yuletide programs through Christmas Day. Speaking from the study of his home in Canterbury, England, the Archbishop, official head of the Church of England, will deliver his annual message to the English-speaking people of the world, reaching the United States by shortwave, from 8:15 to 8:30 in the morning. King George's Christmas Message will be carried by the Blue-WNBH at 10 a. m. From 11 to 11:30 a. m., WNBH will bring listeners in this vicinity the Blue Network's holiday highlight: "Christmas with the Armed Forces," including a broadcas from the battlegrounds of Italy by George Hicks, a two-way hook up between fighting men in London and their families in this country and pickups from Army post and hospitals in the United State

At 1 p. m. there will be a broadcast of the Christmas classi "Dickens' Christmas Carol." Other Christmas programs are to b presented throughout this week.

Dunninger, Blue-WNBH, wh has written new chapters in th science of mental telepathy, wi demonstrate his mind readin ability in a weekly series of sponsored broadcasts to be launche over the Blue Network Wedne day night, Jan. 5, at 9. It will a half-hour show, marking t first time a mentalist has ev been presented on a commerci network program. Dunninger, on a close friend of Houdini, Sir A thur Conan Doyle and Thomas Edison, doesn't like to be call a magician. He knows their tric and duplicates many of them, b he wants it understood that he strictly a mental telepathist.

And that is all—for now.

E.D.W

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 18 1943

How Music Sounds To Cleveland Artists

BY LOUISE BRUNER

THE friendship between Composer Modeste Moussorgsky and Artist Victor Hartmann inspired the former to write 10 piano sketches, called "Pictures at an Exhibition" after a posthumous showing of the artist's work in 1884.

The music was too difficult for the amateur pianist to play, and it was rarely heard in concert halls. Not until Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky commissioned Ravel to score them for full orchestra did they become known and appreciated.

Erich Leinsdorff, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, added the final touch when he invited 13 artist-faculty members of the Cleveland School of Art to listen to the music and create their impressions of it.

The resulting pictures will be shown at the symphony concerts December 30, and January 1 and 2. On January 23, they will be on display at the Cleveland School of Art as part of the faculty show there.

• • •

THIS idea was a shot in the arm for the artists who participated. For they have produced the finest and most exciting work that has come out of this town for years.

Kenneth Francis Bates, who has been making religious objects, ash trays and candy jars, produced an enamel on metal impression of "The Market Place at Limoges" which is a gem. The luminous brilliance of the colors, worked into a closely knit design, opens a new field for Bates' work.

Paul Travis' paintings show his mastery of the use of color. Unfortunately they do not show up well in black and white.

In the sketch about "Goldenberg and Schmuyle" Willard Combes has done an exaggerated caricature, contrasting the aggressive attitude of the fur-collared man with the humble attitude of the man in shabby garments. For this same piece, Walter Sinz has made a plaster sculpture of the two figures, depending on their poses and facial expressions to convey his idea, rather than using such props as clothes. The tone of his work is serious.

Charles Francis Mosgo expresses his thoughts in a series of skilfully glazed colored plates. Rolf Stoll worked in pastel; Kae Dorn Cass, Frank Wilcox, Glenn M. Shaw and William Joseph Eastman painted in water color.

• • •

EASTMAN'S designs are simple and forceful, and his moods range from the majesty of the "Polish Ox Cart," to the rollicking "Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells" in red and yellow, to the grotesque in "Baba Yaga."

It is good to see something from Gaertner's pallete other than landscapes. And he has outdone himself in gouache paintings of "Catacombs in Paris" and "Baba Yaga." This is the kind of assignment that brings the best from John Teyral, for it fires his imagination.

The use of the human skull as a background for Wray Manning's "Catacombs of Paris" adds to the atmosphere of mystery. The empty eye sockets and nose make the underground passages.

• • •

THE Cleveland Museum of Art will have its third annual Community Christmas tomorrow at 4 p. m., which is sponsored by the News and the Junior Council of the museum.

• • •

The jury for the Regional Scholastic Awards contest among junior and senior high school art students has been announced. Members are Elmer A. Stephan, director of art, Pittsburgh public schools; Henrik M. Mayer, John Herron Art Institute, Indianapolis, and Rubert Ropp, Art Institute, Chicago. The regional contest will be held in March at the Steinway Hall of Halle Bros. Co.

RADIO: SYMPHONY WEDS BIG BUSINESS—

By VIVA

Undoubtedly the most important development in music on the radio during the past year has been the wedding of big business and symphony orchestras. Three of our major orchestras have at last acquired commercial radio sponsors, the latest one to do so being the Boston Symphony under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee.

With the New York Philharmonic backed by United States Rubber, the NBC Symphony by General Motors and the Boston Symphony by Allis-Chalmers, we can say that big business has finally achieved a musical coming of age. True, there have been many excellent programs during the last fifteen years which have presented first-class artists and ensembles. But for three large corporations to admit that the American public has reached a degree of maturity whereby they can take symphony music all by itself without a sugar coating of big-name soloists is a concession that amounts to revolution.

There have been, of course, spasmodic seasons of sponsored symphony by such companies as General Electric, RCA, Atwater Kent and others. But this is the first time that three corporations have simultaneously planned symphonic broadcasts on such an elaborate scale. All three of the above-mentioned orchestras are on a round the year schedule. The NBC or General Motors Symphony, as it is now known, divides its Winter season between Toscanini and Stokowski, and its summer season among various guest conductors and Frank Black. U. S. Rubber presents the regular Winter subscription series of the New York Philharmonic under its permanent conductor, Artur Rodzinski, and splits the Summer broadcasts among numerous guest leaders. From October until May, the Boston Symphony will be heard under Koussevitzky in their regular Winter concerts, and for the rest of the time, in the Pop and Esplanade concerts under Arthur Fiedler.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, now sponsored by Allis-Chalmers on the Blue Network.

In a release by Mark Woods of the Blue Network, he expresses his satisfaction at the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony and declares that it holds the promise of a great future for the nation's listeners. He declares that "Music and the arts have always flourished most when the artists enjoyed the patronage of royalty of old." Stating that the large industrial organizations have taken royalty's place in this country—(shades of Economic Royalists!)—Mr. Woods goes on to say that their sponsorship of radio has been "among the greatest contributions to the development of a broadcasting system whose chief aim is to bring to the people programs they want and enjoy and will listen to."

These are admirable sentiments, for the most part true, but he fails to point out that for a regrettably long period of time, the big corporations insisted that the mentality of the "average" radio listener was too low to appreciate anything good. Instead of shouldering the responsibility of providing the country with the very best in music, big business regarded it with the suspicion of a dog regarding a dubious bone. It has taken a great deal of patience and persuasion on the part of both networks and public to prove to the tycoons that symphonic music could pay dividends.

Now that big business has given its royal accolade to some of our bigger orchestras, it may not be too much to hope that it will eventually discover some of the smaller ones throughout the country. Due to war and depression, many of these have had a tough fight to keep going, some of them having to dissolve for the duration. A sponsored radio program in some of these cases might have made all the difference.

If, as Mr. Woods intimates, the large corporations are truly aware of their responsibility in providing the public with the best, then they can't neglect these smaller symphonic organizations which have had such a tremendous influence on the musical life of the country. Besides, it would be nice if the rest of us could hear some of these ensembles. As a starter, how about a weekly sponsored program presenting a different orchestra each week, so that all of us may become familiar with the work of these orchestras and their conductors?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

DEC 19 1943

Boston Symphony Concerts To Be Sponsored on WNBH

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, after one year as a "sustaining" feature of the coast-to-coast Blue Network, is to come under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, one of the largest industrial organizations in the United States.

The first sponsored broadcast will be the performance next Saturday, on Christmas Day. It will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. over Station WNBH and the Blue Network.

Enjoyment of the orchestra, pioneer symphony group of the United States, is no longer limited to residents of Greater Boston. Under the inspired leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of America's three top conductors now in his 20th consecutive season as its director, it can be heard by radio from coast to coast.

Founded in 1881

The Boston Symphony was founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson. From the beginning, under its first conductor, Sir George Henschel, it became the exemplar in this country of great symphonic performances. Musical authorities have rated it the finest symphony in the United States.

In 1924, Dr. Koussevitzky arrived in the United States to become conductor. He has molded the orchestra into a superlative single instrument, performing with insight, brilliance and power. Olin Downes of the New York Times wrote of it: "It is a necessity because no other single agency can do more for the bruised spirit of man in such a time as this."

One phase of the Boston Symphony's service in wartime is the series of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, specially for men and women in the service. In addition, it has given many performances in camps, having traveled to Camp Edwards, Camp Myles Standish, Fort Devens and the Naval Training Station in Newport, with other concerts for the benefit of the United War Fund, Russian War Relief and like causes.

Tune in at 8:30 Christmas night for a real Christmas gift, the first sponsored broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, WNBH-Blue.

Many Yule Programs

The Blue Network, including WNBH, is planning to make this Christmas an outstanding one with a comprehensive series of Yuletide programs through Christmas Day. Speaking from the study of his home in Canterbury, England, the Archbishop, official head of the Church of England, will deliver his annual message to the English-speaking people of the world, reaching the United States by shortwave, from 8:15 to 8:30 in the morning. King George's Christmas Message will be carried by the Blue-WNBH at 10 a. m. From 11 to 11:30 a. m., WNBH will bring listeners in this vicinity the Blue Network's holiday highlight: "Christmas with the Armed Forces," including a broadcast from the battlegrounds of Italy by George Hicks, a two-way hookup between fighting men in London and their families in this country and pickups from Army posts and hospitals in the United States.

At 1 p. m. there will be a broadcast of the Christmas classic, "Dickens' Christmas Carol." Other Christmas programs are to be presented throughout this week.

Dunninger, Blue-WNBH, who has written new chapters in the science of mental telepathy, will demonstrate his mind reading ability in a weekly series of sponsored broadcasts to be launched over the Blue Network Wednesday night, Jan. 5, at 9. It will be a half-hour show, marking the first time a mentalist has ever been presented on a commercial network program. Dunninger, once a close friend of Houdini, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Thomas A. Edison, doesn't like to be called a magician. He knows their tricks and duplicates many of them, but he wants it understood that he is strictly a mental telepathist.

And that is all—for now.

E.D.W

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 18 1943

How Music Sounds To Cleveland Artists

BY LOUISE BRUNER

THE friendship between Composer Modeste Moussorgsky and Artist Victor Hartmann inspired the former to write 10 piano sketches, called "Pictures at an Exhibition" after a posthumous showing of the artist's work in 1884.

The music was too difficult for the amateur pianist to play, and it was rarely heard in concert halls.

Not until Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitsky commissioned Ravel to score them for full orchestra did they become known and appreciated.

Erich Leinsdorff, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, added the final touch when he invited 13 artist-faculty members of the Cleveland School of Art to listen to the music and create their impressions of it.

The resulting pictures will be shown at the symphony concerts December 30, and January 1 and 2. On January 23, they will be on display at the Cleveland School of Art as part of the faculty show there.

• • •

THIS idea was a shot in the arm for the artists who participated. For they have produced the finest and most exciting work that has come out of this town for years.

Kenneth Francis Bates, who has been making religious objects, ash trays and candy jars, produced an enamel on metal impression of "The Market Place at Limoges" which is a gem. The luminous brilliance of the colors, worked into a closely knit design, opens a new field for Bates' work.

Paul Travis' paintings show his mastery of the use of color. Unfortunately they do not show up well in black and white.

In the sketch about "Goldenberg and Schmuyle" Willard Combes has done an exaggerated caricature, contrasting the aggressive attitude of the fur-collared man with the humble attitude of the man in shabby garments. For this same piece, Walter Sinz has made a plaster sculpture of the two figures, depending on their poses and facial expressions to convey his idea, rather than using such props as clothes. The tone of his work is serious.

Charles Francis Mosgo expresses his thoughts in a series of skilfully glazed colored plates. Rolf Stoll worked in pastel; Kae Dorn Cass, Frank Wilcox, Glenn M. Shaw and William Joseph Eastman painted in water color.

• • •

EASTMAN'S designs are simple and forceful, and his moods range from the majesty of the "Polish Ox Cart," to the rollicking "Ballet of Chickens in Their Shells" in red and yellow, to the grotesque in "Baba Yaga."

It is good to see something from Gaertner's pallete other than landscapes. And he has outdone himself in gouache paintings of "Catacombs in Paris" and "Baba Yaga." This is the kind of assignment that brings the best from John Teyral, for it fires his imagination.

The use of the human skull as a background for Wray Manning's "Catacombs of Paris" adds to the atmosphere of mystery. The empty eye sockets and nose make the underground passages.

• • •

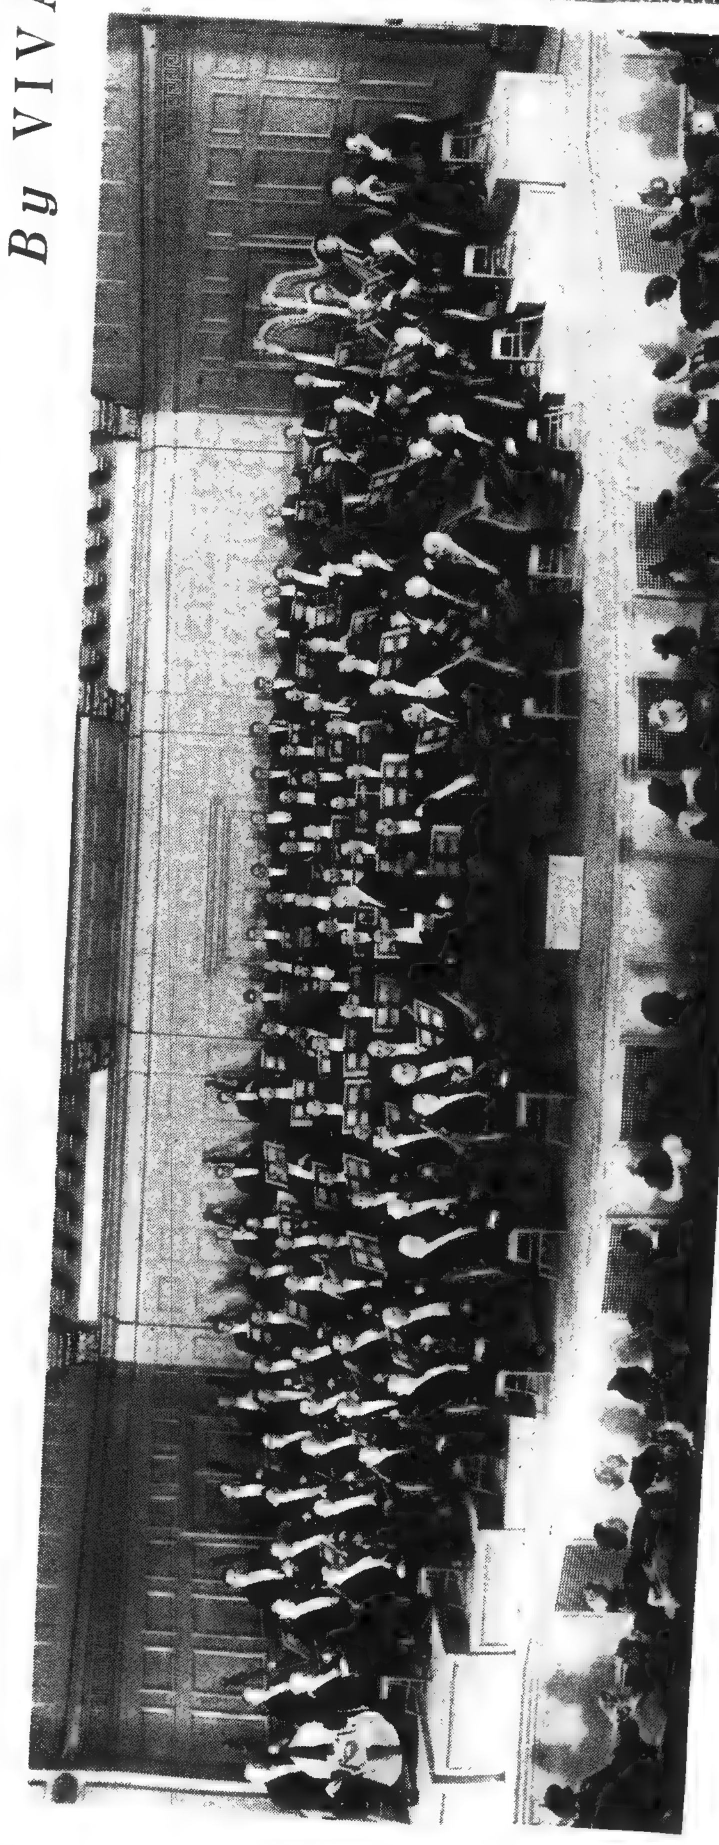
THE Cleveland Museum of Art will have its third annual Community Christmas tomorrow at 4 p. m., which is sponsored by the News and the Junior Council of the museum.

• • •

The jury for the Regional Scholastic Awards contest among junior and senior high school art students has been announced. Members are Elmer A. Stephan, director of art, Pittsburgh public schools; Henrik M. Mayer, John Herron Art Institute, Indianapolis, and Rubert Ropp, Art Institute, Chicago. The regional contest will be held in March at the Steinway Hall of Halle Bros. Co.

RADIO: SYMPHONY WEDS BIG BUSINESS—

By VIVA



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, now sponsored by Allis-Chalmers on the Blue Network.

Undoubtedly the most important development in music on the radio during the past year has been the wedding of big business and symphony orchestras. Three of our major orchestras have at last acquired commercial radio sponsors, the latest one to do so being the Boston Symphony under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company of Milwaukee.

With the New York Philharmonic backed by United States Rubber, the NBC Symphony by General Motors and the Boston Symphony by Allis-Chalmers, we can say that big business has finally achieved a musical coming of age. True, there have been many excellent programs during the last fifteen years which have presented first-class artists and ensembles. But for three large corporations to admit that the American public has reached a degree of maturity whereby they can take symphony music all by itself without a sugar coating of big-name soloists is a concession that amounts to revolution.

There have been, of course, spasmodic seasons of sponsored symphony by such companies as General Electric, RCA, Atwater Kent and others. But this is the first time that three corporations have simultaneously planned symphonic broadcasts on such an elaborate scale. All three of the above-mentioned orchestras are on a round the year schedule. The NBC or General Motors Symphony, as it is now known, divides its Winter season between Toscanini and Stokowski, and its summer season among various guest conductors and Frank Black. U. S. Rubber presents the regular Winter subscription series of the New York Philharmonic under its permanent conductor, Artur Rodzinski, and splits the Summer broadcasts among numerous guest leaders. From October until May, the Boston Symphony will be heard under Koussevitzky in their regular Winter concerts, and for the rest of the time, in the Pop and Esplanade concerts under Arthur Fiedler.

In a release by Mark Woods of the Blue Network, he expresses his satisfaction at the sponsorship of the Boston Symphony and declares that it holds the promise of a great future for the nation's listeners. He declares that "Music and the arts have always flourished most when the artists enjoyed the patronage of royalty of old." Stating that the large industrial organizations have taken royalty's place in this country—(shades of Economic Royalists!)—Mr. Woods goes on to say that their sponsorship of radio has been "among the greatest contributions to the development of a broadcasting system whose chief aim is to bring to the people programs they want and enjoy and will listen to."

These are admirable sentiments, for the most part true, but he fails to point out that for a regrettably long period of time, the big corporations insisted that the mentality of the "average" radio listener was too low to appreciate anything good. Instead of shouldering the responsibility of providing the country with the very best in music, big business regarded it with the suspicion of a dog regarding a dubious bone. It has taken a great deal of patience and persuasion on the part of both networks and public to prove to the tycoons that symphonic music could pay dividends.

Now that big business has given its royal accolade to some of our bigger orchestras, it may not be too much to hope that it will eventually discover some of the smaller ones throughout the country. Due to war and depression, many of these have had a tough fight to keep going, some of them having to dissolve for the duration. A sponsored radio program in some of these cases might have made all the difference.

If, as Mr. Woods intimates, the large corporations are truly aware of their responsibility in providing the public with the best, then they can't neglect these smaller symphonic organizations which have had such a tremendous influence on the musical life of the country. Besides, it would be nice if the rest of us could hear some of these ensembles. As a starter, how about a weekly sponsored program presenting a different orchestra each week, so that all of us may become familiar with the work of these orchestras and their conductors?

26 Dec 20

A CHRISTMAS NIGHT Message in Music TO ALL AMERICA...

...and an Announcement to the Men and Women of Allis-Chalmers in Boston, by WALTER GEIST, President

CHRISTMAS NIGHT, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky raises his baton to lead The Boston Symphony—the world's finest music, by the world's finest orchestra, will go on the air.

We of Allis-Chalmers sponsoring this great program believe that the people of America need and want the hope of peace that this inspiring music brings.

Contributing to American Good Living is the aim of every Allis-Chalmers effort—good living that represents the highest standards of any in the world—good living contributed to by every Allis-Chalmers product that you make at your work in the foundry, at your machine, at your desk.

Christmas Night's concert represents the beginning of a continued program to tell all America of the accomplishments of the men and women here at Allis-Chalmers. For the skills you are gaining under the spur of our war production schedules equip you to be an invaluable part of the reconstruction program which lies ahead.

With a measure of truth, Allis-Chalmers has been called "the unseen giant" behind American industry.

To you and me who work for Allis-Chalmers, it is hard to believe that all America does not know about our company. Thousands do, of course, but there are thousands more who only know of one or two of the over sixteen hundred types of equipment we make. And there are literally millions more who have no realization of how Allis-Chalmers equipment contributes to their good living.

We want Allis-Chalmers to take its rightful place in the minds of the American public.

The stronger our position, the greater the benefit to every Allis-Chalmers worker, for then, more than ever, industry will look to Allis-Chalmers for the industrial and farm machinery which it needs.

I know that you will enjoy this program and that you will feel, as I do, that it is a true reflection of the standard of performance which we all bring to our daily work here at Allis-Chalmers.

WGeist

President, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co.

Saturday Nights—Tune in THE BOSTON SYMPHONY—8:30 P. M. over Station WHDH

ALLIS-CHALMERS

"Engineering that Aids All Industry Furthers American Good Living"

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 22 1943

From the Production Centres

IN NEW YORK CITY . . .

Blue Network Athletic Assn. running dinner-dance at the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria for employees of the web tonight (22). Gals have right to ask anybody for a dance and may not be refused....Hanson W. Baldwin, Blue commentator doing newsreel commentary for Paramount's picturization of the two years of the war. Baldwin is also military expert for the N. Y. Times....'Pepper Young's Family' celebrates its ninth year on the air Jan. 10....Dorothy Kirsten will be soloist with the Rochester Symphony orchestra on New Year's Eve airing of the Eastman Kodak program over WHAM, Rochester....Gladys Swarthout guests on the Bell Telephone stanza via NBC on March 17....Dorothy Kirsten and Thomas L. Thomas, ditto on the Firestone program on Jan. 17....Harry Rauch, music and magazine editor for the Blue, just returned from Boston after making preliminary publicity arrangements for airing of the Boston Symphony under Allis-Chalmers' sponsorship starting Dec. 25. Gene Hamilton, announcer of the Symphony's sustainer broadcasts, will carry over as stanza's announcer when it goes commercial....Charles Roman, with the NBC press department before enlisting in the RAF shortly after Pearl Harbor, in New York arranging his transfer to the U. S. Army Air Force ....Hugh James is the announcer on the new Blue show, 'Star For a Night'....Don Gardner performs the same chore over the Harvel Watch sponsorship of John B. Kennedy.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
DEC 22 1943

Blue Exec Sees Many Public Service Shows Going Commercial After War

Chicago, Dec. 21.

An ever-increasing number of public service type of shows will gain commercial sponsorship in the months to come and particularly in the post-war era, according to James L. Stirton, central division manager of the Blue network. The sponsorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra by the Allis Chalmers Co. is the most recent illustration of a trend that has become more and more apparent in the past few months, Stirton pointed out.

'With a greater number of public service programs sponsored, there will be a reduction in the number of such programs offered on a sustaining basis,' said Stirton, 'The Blue network is now carrying a heavy schedule of war message programs; after the war many of these programs will be replaced by public service programs in other fields, but in the interest of good program balance, war service shows will be replaced in part by programs of an entertainment nature. 'In the public service field, emphasis will be placed on the development of fewer programs, but programs of higher quality and stronger listener appeal.'

In the immediate post-war period, the Blue web plans to devote considerable attention to straight 'service' programs, especially during the daytime. 'The Baby Institute' series, providing authoritative medical advice to mothers of small children, is an example of the type of shows the Blue plans to develop.

Increased development of programs in which 'educational' materials are worked into straight entertainment rather than 'educational' programs intended for use in school classrooms is another programming phase being developed by the Blue.

'The war has demonstrated the effectiveness with which war messages can be presented in entertainment programs, with the 'message' worked into and constituting a part of the entertainment. The same principle can apply in the field of education. 'In several of the Blue programs for children now on the air, an adventure story is being made the vehicle for conveying ideas and the presentation of educational information,' said Stirton.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
DEC 24 1943

By Tom Chase

BOSTON-AP-A homemade violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Creator

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello, who is appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony today.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over—he can't wait to find a chair to sit in—and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?'

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

'Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

Starts Playing

He begins playing again, interpreting some of those lovely lyric measures from the Brahms double violoncello concerto. Then Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, enters and warm greetings are exchanged between the two Russian-born artists.

Piatigorsky returns the homemade cello to its beaming creator and unpacks his own cello, made by Domenico Montagna in 1739. It was given him by the late Ernest B. Dane, one-time president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony.

"I come from Philadelphia in an upper berth," he says. "I sleep with this between my legs all night."

The picture of the tremendous man wound round his cello draws smiles from the growing audience.

"How is it today?" Jean Bedetti, first cellist in the orchestra, asks.

"She is moody," Piatigorsky explains. "You know instruments, they are like people. Sometimes they do not feel so good. In this country, when one travels great distances—in Florida on night and Maine the next—it is not always good. The sudden change in climate sometimes affects the quality of the instrument."

Other cellists from the orchestra, hippolyte droghmans, Carl Zeise, Joseph Zimbler and Mischa Nieland, crowd around Fabrizio as Piatigorsky prepares to go on stage.

Homemade Cello

Fabrizio proudly explains about his homemade cello. He has been with the orchestra since 1918 and a few years ago he began working with wood in his cellar workshop at his Arlington, Mass., home.

"This cello took about two years to make in my spare time," he says. "I was lucky to have some fine old wood to work with. The worst problem was setting the neck correctly. That took almost a month.

"When I began scraping and polishing I knew I had something. Everytime I scraped, the instrument would speak for itself. Then when it was done I couldn't believe it, the sound was so fine.

"I put on nine coats of varnish, rubbing the instrument down each time.

"While I was making it," he said, smiling reminiscently, "I hung it out on the clothes line in the sun on clear days from a half hour before noon until a half hour after noon.

"I guess the neighbors thought I was crazy."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
DEC 24 1943

Homemade Violoncello Wins Order From Master Performer

BOSTON, Dec. 24. (AP)—A homemade violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello, who is appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony today.

The usual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it un in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over—he can't wait to find a chair to sit in—and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

He begins playing again, interpreting some of those lovely lyric measures from the Brahms double violoncello concerto. Then Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, enters and warm greetings are exchanged between the two Russian-born artists.

Piatigorsky returns the homemade cello to its beaming creator and unpacks his own cello, made by Domenico Montagna in 1739. It was given him by the late Ernest B. Dane, one-time president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony.

"I come from Philadelphia in an upper berth," he says. "I sleep with this between my legs all night."

The picture of the tremendous man wound round his cello draws smiles from the growing audience.

"How is it today?" Jean Bedetti, first cellist in the orchestra, asks.

"She is moody," Piatigorsky explains. "You know instruments, they are like people. Sometimes they do not feel so good. In this Country, when one travels great distances—in Florida one night and Maine the next—it is not always good. The sudden change in climate sometimes affects the quality of the instrument."

Other cellists from the orchestra, Hippolyte Droghmans, Carl Zeise. Joseph Zimbler and Mischa Nieland, crowd around Fabrizio as Piatigorsky prepares to go on stage.

Fabrizio proudly explains about his homemade cello. He has been with the orchestra since 1918 and a few years ago he began working with wood in his cellar workshop at his Arlington, Mass., home.

"This cello took about two years to make in my spare time," he says. "I was lucky to have some fine old wood to work with. The worst problem was setting the neck correctly. That took almost a month.

"When I began scraping and polishing I knew I had something. Everytime I scraped, the instrument would speak for itself. Then when it was done I couldn't believe it, the sound was so fine.

"I put on nine coats of varnish, rubbing the instrument down each time.

"While I was making it," he said, smiling reminiscently, "I hung it but on the clothes line in the sun on clear days from a half hour before noon until a half hour after noon.

"I guess the neighbors thought I was crazy."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MORNING WALL ST. JOURNAL
DEC 23 1943

Blue Network Co., Inc.

Gross income from radio time sales of the Blue Network Co., Inc., will total approximately $26 million this year as compared with $16 million in 1942, an increase of about 60%.

Gross income for the month of December will show an increase of about 25% over December, 1942. The small proportional gain for the month is due to the fact that the company's radio time sales rose sharply during the fall months last year as compared with the 1942 spring.

Indications are that the company's present volume of business will continue into 1944. It is not only selling more station time but has increased the number of its affiliated stations from 164 to 174 during the past three months. There has been a further gain in the average number of stations on each program. Among accounts recently added is the Allis Chalmers Mfg., Co. which has taken over the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasts starting Christmas Day, and the American Meat Institute of Chicago which will start a series of broadcasts about January 16.

The company is preparing to file applications for television and frequency modulation licenses and has asked its affiliated stations to file applications as well. Edward J. Noble, owner of the Blue Network, and President Mark Woods are said to be looking over sites for a new studio and building in Hollywood Calif.

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS
DEC 24 1943

Piatigorsky Intrigued By Fabrizio's 'Cello

BOSTON (AP) — A homemade violincello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby-shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello, who is appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony today.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over—he can't wait to find a chair to sit in—and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's 10th program is a wonderfully gilt-and-glossy holiday package. At yesterday afternoon's concert Serge Koussevitzky was in fine fettle and he directed with verve and high spirits a varied and colorful program high in musical entertainment values.

There should have been a larger audience to hear it, for Mr. Koussevitzky offered something for everybody. The classic purity of Handel's Concerto Gross No. 12 in B minor was undoubtedly meant for the more highfalutin' folk, such as the music critics. For those with a romantic turn of mind, the Sibelius Fifth Symphony was the right prescription, while lovers of a good show piece found their interest in Schumann's Cello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky brilliantly striding over its valleys and peaks. And lastly, there were three slight but diverting excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust," a bit of fancy in "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" or "Dance of the Sylphs," and plenty of thundering braggadocio in the "Rakoczy" March with which Mr. Koussevitzky fairly raised the roof.

Mr. Koussevitzky made the swinging fugal style of Handel's Concerto Grosso soar in luminous grandeur. The whole work was carried out in broad strokes and never had the suppleness and depth of the famous Boston Symphony strings shown so markedly.

There are some who mumble "La Lagubre" when the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius is mentioned. But there is no denying that its tunes have remarkable staying power in the memory, the fluttering tremolos of the second movement, the snatches of bright melody over broad themes in the third, the ostinato horn calls, like some Northern God swinging a hammer, in the final section. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra produced the work right from the heart, with fervor and conviction.

Gregor Piatigorsky is a huge man who looks like a prize fighter and plays a cello like a man inspired, which he undoubtedly is. The late Emanuel Feuermann, who played the Schumann Concerto with the Boston Symphony in 1931, had a great gift as a miniaturist. He was an incomparable chamber music player and interpreter of the classic masters. Pablo Casals, of legendary fame, is noted for the purity of his style and the high intellectual plane of his attainments. But does any cellist maintain the breadth of view, embracing both a sense of the dramatic and the humorous, of Piatigorsky? And who commands the variety of his tone colors from the warm beauty of old gold to the brilliance of highly charged electricity? He made Schuman's rugged, albeit sentiment-drenched concerto, come alive. Truly a yeoman performance.

But it was a 12-year-old, tearing out of Symphony Hall, who made just the right comment on the concert. "That was super," he said. The program will be repeated tonight at 8:30.—J. W. R.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 24 1943

MUSIC

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, was soloist, in the Chopin concerto in F minor.

The weather did its best to keep people away, but they attended in the customary large numbers, and they seemed to feel that they had been well repaid. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Smeterlin, and the orchestra were applauded often and long.

The program comprised three easy pieces—the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture," the Beethoven symphony in D major, and the Chopin concerto—and one that wasn't too difficult, a symphonic picture contrived by Robert Russell Bennett from the music to Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess."

The first three, at least, could be played by the orchestra without rehearsal, and it may be that they were. The performance was not up to the last one that Mr. Burgin gave here. There was plenty of life in all his work last night, and that is a very desirable element, but there was often a want of finish. The larghetto in the symphony, for instance, did not achieve the luminous quality that so well becomes the melodies; Mr. Burgin was more in the vein of the livelier third and fourth movements. But, if his reading was notable for vigor rather than subtlety, it was still a reading that communicated something to the listener and was pleasant and satisfying.

The concerto, as has been said frequently, is no great shakes as a concerto; the orchestra is rather impolitely ignored most of the time, while the piano is provided with a set of such sweet and beguiling sounds as only Chopin has been able to invent. What could be done with the orchestral background was done capably by Mr. Burgin. Mr. Smeterlin, as master of Chopin, presided in his own department with suavity and feeling. Perfection of tone, rhythmic urge, and refined contrasts in volume contributed to a performance that transported the audience. It might have been transported even further if Mr. Smeterlin had foregone the soulful glances and distracting gestures that he added to the score from time to time.

This was superior piano-playing, the kind one could give an evening to. The audience released Mr. Smeterlin reluctantly.

In the "Porgy and Bess" picture, Mr. Burgin and the orchestra did excellent work. The idiom is quite a distance from that of Beethoven and Brahms. The scoring is a complicated example of the sort of highly able arranging that is heard on commercial jazz programs. The character of the melodies and the including of a tenor banjo and three saxophones in the orchestra give novelty. Mr. Burgin conducted with skill and enthusiasm, and the orchestra was as close to being in the groove as so large a collection of musicians is likely to get.

It was a good thought to put the Brahms overture on one end of the program and the Gershwin overture on the other; they were similar for all their differences.

ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS

'Cello Made By Musician

BOSTON (AP)—A homemade violincello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it —has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra in a cellar workship.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at his hobby-shop handiwork. Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the 'cello, who is appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony today.

The unusual meeting between the home-made 'cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over—he can't wait to find a chair to sit in—and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

[37]

DECEMBER 25, 1943

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 10th concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Handel—Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12
Sibelius—Symphony No. 5 in E flat; Op. 82
Schumann—Concerto in A minor for Violoncello and orchestra; Op. 129.
Berlioz—Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs, Rakoczy March from "Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

As solace for a harassed Christmas audience, most of which was doubtless in a state over one thing or another, yesterday's concert was ideal. The music was comfortably familiar and lively enough to keep everyone awake; the performance of the soloist was spectacular from a visual and an auditory standpoint the conductor was in good form and the orchestra played at its usual high level of excellence throughout.

Of the four compositions on the program, the Handel B minor Concerto Grosso was most rewarding. Exquisitely (although generally too slowly) played by the string orchestra, it established a matchless atmosphere of relaxation and of good spirits. With its charming pastoral flavor and its noble cadences it was, at least, the one piece which seemed to reflect somehow the season and this year more than any other, such reassurance is necessary.

With every performance, Sibelius' Fifth shows its seams more clearly. It still speaks to the majority of the audience, true, and it has many effective moments, but for the most part it is pretty hollow stuff. The musical devices employed to keep it going are really pretty obvious, and once the impact of its catchy tunes and its bleak sonorities wears off (about a half dozen performances usually suffice), you become conscious of its over-padded shoulders. Another ten years will probably be required to remove it from the repertoire to make room for Sibelius' vastly superior fourth and seventh, but there can be no question of its ultimate fate in the dust bin.

It is unfortunate such superb cellists as Gregor Piatigorsky must be chained to the Schumann and the Haydn Violoncello concertos. Both are attractive of course, although the Schumann is least so, but neither serves to demonstrate the musicianship of such a cellist as Mr. Piatigorsky. It calls his technical virtuosity into play (and it's not found wanting, either), and while he tries to infuse the music with the spark of life, it is only too evident to everyone, including the soloist, that the work was still-born. In any case, it must be said he made it look much more interesting than it sounded, and that is something.

After a delightful performance of Berlioz' "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," the conductor and orchestra threw caution to the wind with the "Rakoczy March," and the Beethoven plaque on the proscenium arch was severely jarred. As a good-natured recessional into the wintry blasts, however, it served its purpose admirably, and practically all filed out humming. Or at least their ears did. Next week the orchestra will play C. P. E. Bach's D major orchestral Concerto, Martinu's Violin Concerto (Mischa Elman, soloist) and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

While Dr. Koussevitzky has made a few bows in that direction, what are known as seasonal programmes are not exactly in his line. There is nothing suggestive of Christmas in the list that was heard yesterday afternoon and that will be offered again this evening. A certain festive note is sounded, however, in the last number, the three excerpts from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy" March.

Possibly it was because Jean Sibelius reached his 78th birthday on the eighth of this month that Dr. Koussevitzky saw fit to perform the Finnish composer's Fifth Symphony, although that work was played here no longer ago than last March. Before it comes Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, and the piece that follows the intermission is the Cello Concerto of Schumann, with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist.

There are not many 'cello concertos and still fewer effective ones. The most rewarding composition in which the solo 'cello is prominent is the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, and you cannot have that every time there is a 'cello soloist. The slow movement of Schumann's Concerto has, of course, the intimate, songful beauty peculiar to that romantic composer, and Mr. Piatigorsky made the most of it. The first and third sections are on the doleful side, and the 'cello "whine," that even Mr. Piatigorsky cannot always get away from, accentuates that quality. Even though the buoyant Third Symphony, which, by the way, we have not heard in years, came immediately after it, the 'cello Concerto, for the most part, suggests all too forcibly the cloud that was already hovering over Schumann's mind.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible] 1943

OVATION FOR CELLIST

Enthusiastic Boston Audience Acclaims Gregor Piatigorsky.

Boston, Dec. 24—(AP)—Huge Russian-born Gregor Piatigorsky, appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today and received an ovation for his brilliant interpretation of Schumann's A Minor Concerto for violoncello and orchestra.

In holiday mood, the enthusiastic audience called the famous cellist back to the stage half a dozen times. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra joined in the general applause.

Piatigorsky's performance made the most of a concerto that seemed slightly attenuated and unduly sentimental The score lacked the fire of Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," for example, and only in one superb cadenza was the cello displayed to best advantage.

But Piatigorsky's tone was as beautiful as ever, rich, vibrant and admirably rounded. As always, too, he handled the cumbersome instrument the way an average-sized person would a violin, fingering and bowing with deft ease.

Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed with accustomed brilliance Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, the Sibelius Fifth Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust."

RAVENA, N.Y.
NEWS
11/26/43

RADIO HIGHLIGHTS

WTRY, TROY, NEW YORK

Last week we considered the pleasure of better music as brought to us over WTRY by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is a follow up and an invitaton to open your mind and ears to music you may, up to now, have said "you do not understand—was too high hat" and similar discouraging phrases. How did any of us who anticipate the next concert of classical music acquire the taste? Certainly we did not bite our musical-noses off by twisting the dial away from a symphony concert and an opera. First we experimented. We said: "Let's give this a chance," and on frequent doses, found it not a bitter pill but a sweet treat.

SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 25 1943

Homemade Violoncello Amazes Piatigorsky, He Wants One For Himself

BOSTON -(AP)- A homemade violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby-shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello, who appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony yesterday.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurred in the guest artist's room at Symphony hall. Fabrizio showed him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picked it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admired the craftsmanship.

He borrowed a bow, stooped over—he couldn't wait to find a chair to sit in—and began playing. The expressive face broke into a smile as rich, vibrant tones poured from the instrument.

"Good," he murmured, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra spoke as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Piatigorsky "I like it very much. Make me one."

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

DEC 25 1943

COINCIDENT with Boston Symphony's transfer to a new sponsor tonight, Clifton Fadiman becomes the intermissions speaker for a limited period. A Handel concerto and Sibelius symphony are included in the program under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at 8:30 through Blue-WKAT.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS-SCIMITAR

DEC 25 1943

FAMED BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO LAUNCH SERIES

Concerts via WREC to Begin Tonight With Fadiman As Commentator

By THE LISTENER

The famed Boston Symphony begins a weekly series over WMPS at 7:30 tonight with an hour-long concert under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. The first program includes Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12," and Sibelius' "Symphony in E Flat Major, No. 5, Opus 82."

Clifton Fadiman, acid-tongued quizmaster of Information Please and former literary critic of The New Yorker, will be commentator and intermission speaker.

FOOTBALL FANS get a big break tomorrow when the world's professional championship football game between the Chicago Bears and the Washington Redskins is broadcast direct from Chicago over WHBQ at 2 p.m. The play-by-play comes over a special network arranged by a large sporting goods manufacturer.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI has chosen a program of especial interest for the NBC Symphony broadcast over WMC at 4 p.m. tomorrow. In the first half of the program the orchestra will perform Beethoven's monumental Fifth Symphony, which typifies more than any other of his works the dynamic character and extreme contrasts in the nature of the great composer. The performance comes on the 173rd anniversary of Beethoven's birth. Paul Creston's "Chant of 1943" is the second selection and Deems Taylor's too-seldom-heard "Ramuntcho," completes the program.

BRITISH EVACUEE CHILDREN in this country and Canada, who haven't seen their folks since before Pearl Harbor, and American and Canadian kiddies whose fathers are service men overseas will exchange greetings with their parnts during People to People, over WREC at 11:30 a.m. tomorrow A three-way hookup will link New York, London and the Canadian cities of Montreal, Toronto and Quebec.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 27 1943

Blue Net's Strides Noted In Report

Gross sales of the Blue Network during 1943 will show an approximate increase of 60 per cent over 1942 and the total gross income will reach $26,000,000, it was revealed in the network's annual year end review.

"The Year 1943 marked the coming of age of the Blue Network highlighted by its purchase by Edward J. Noble, an outstanding figure in American industry," Mark Woods, president, declared in a statement.

"Acceptance of the network by the industry, as well as by advertisers, is reflected in the increase in Blue affiliated stations from 143 to 174 during the year, and a 60 per cent increase in the network's gross revenue.

(Continued on Page 5)

"A radio trail blazer since it began operation as an independent broadcasting entity, the Blue in the past year continued and amplified its 'pioneering' tendencies, in the fields of programs, sales and operating policies" the statement continues. "New programs were consistently developed and sold, notably in the field of children's and public service programs. Under a policy of "creative selling" the Blue during the year sold more time and more package shows than any other network. Network policies were under constant modification to enable us to offer the radio audience the finest in entertainment, music, education and discussion.

Leading Program Sales

"Notable among the programs the network sold during the year were the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the "Radio Hall of Fame," the "Revlon Theater," "What's New," "The Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street," "Keepsakes," "Dunninger" and "Star For a Night." In the sustaining field, the Blue carried more classical music than any other network and gave more time to the country's three major religious groups than any other net.

"The problems imposed upon us by war—of personnel, equipment, and operation—were scarcely easier than in our first year of independent operation. But the Blue met them and strode forward."

Station Relation Strides

Intensifying the drive begun last year for more stations, more power and better facilities, the Blue Network's stations department winds up 1943 with a record of singular achievement.

Under the vigorous leadership of Keith Kiggins, vice-president in charge, the department added 33 new outlets during the past 12 months, raising the total of stations to 174. Located in strategic market areas throughout the industrial east, midwest, south and the Pacific Coast, the station additions brought a corresponding increase in auditors. More than 843,000 new listeners were added to the Blue's night-time audience.

The Blue Network sales staff has set up a creative service to make network time more valauable to advertisers. Under this new philosophy, as explained by C. P. Jaeger, network sales manager, Blue salesmen have not only sold time but have planned programs which will result in the most sales from the particular time period bought by the advertiser.

Plan Attention Overseas

With internal political explosions accompanying Nazi defeats in Europe the Blue Network's news programs and round table discussion during 1944 will be focused more fully on the axis-dominated continent, according to Phillips Carlin, vice-president in charge of programs.

In the field of music the Blue has been fortunate in the appointment of the Dean of Modern American Music, Paul Whiteman, as its musical director. Under Whiteman's guidance many bold musical steps have been planned for 1944, among which are five and six minute rhapsodies, a new form especially suitable for broadcasting. The house staff of musicians, under the direction of Frank Vagnoni, has been increased to 65 in New York and the number in Chicago and on the Coast total at least that. Each man is a recognized artist on his own instrument.

West Coast Emphasized

1944 will see more emphasis placed on broadcasts originating on the West Coast; program, production and engineering staffs are being supplemented for this purpose.

There will be a decided liberalization of policy toward new talent, Carlin reports, making entree to radio easier than in the past for professional performers with ability but no established reputation. New Year's Day itself, appropriately enough, will see the premiere of "On Stage, Everybody," a show for which any actor, singer or writer who applies will be given an audition. Each performer selected by the Board of Judges will be given a five minute spot on this new half-hour show.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

DEC 2

In 20th Year as Conductor

With the current season Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the top three conductors in the United States, is in his 20th consecutive year as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard each Saturday evening at 7:30 over station KFEQ and the Blue network.

Koussevitzky, the 11th in the line of conductors who have headed the Boston symphony and perhaps the greatest of them all, was born in 1874 in the Province of Tver in Russia. As a boy he traveled to Moscow and was admitted to the Philharmonic School and there became a student of the double bass. In a short time he had made himself a remarkable virtuoso of this unwieldy instrument and became recognized not only as Russia's but Europe's leading player of the double bass.

The artist Koussevitzky could not long have been satisfied with such a limited medium of expression. He inevitably sought that most expressive of instruments—the full symphony orchestra. With his own orchestra he gave memorable concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. Chartering a steamer, he took his musicians the length of the Volga through his vast country, bringing to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their first symphony concert.

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, again assembled an orchestra of his own in Paris and gave his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky." Here, and by guest performances in London and in other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

It was in 1924 that Koussevitzky came to America and took his place at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the years which have followed, he has

---

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 29 1943

Blue Sales Up 60% Over '42; $26,000,000 B.O.

The Blue Network, in its first year as an independent chain since its purchase by Edward J. Noble, has increased its gross sales by 60% over 1942, upped its revenue to $26,000,000 and expanded its listening audience by 843,000 listeners to 23,558,000, according to the Blue's inventory of the year.

The chain for the first time secured outlets in Worcester, Huntington, W. Va.; Columbus, Waterbury, New Bedford, Mass.; Duluth-Superior, Wis., and Atlantic City. In addition coverage in Southern states was expanded by additions of outlets in Macon and Columbus, Ga.; Amarillo and Temple, Tex.; Jackson, Tenn.; Gulfport, Miss.; Fredericksburg and Covington, Ky.; Florence, S. C., and the Texas A. & M. Station at College Station. The net strengthened its position in the Great Lakes area with outlets in Grand Rapids, Sault Ste. Marie; Muskegon, Escanaba and Marquette, all part of the Michigan State Network. Pacific Coast coverage was increased with affiliation with KPRO which embraces the Riverside-San Bernardino area. WJW, Cleveland, became a full-time Blue affiliate.

The web also upped the number of sponsored hours from 2,887 in January to 5,178 in December as compared to 2,794 a year ago December.

New shows included the Philco-'Variety' 'Radio Hall of Fame,' the Allis-Chalmers sponsorship of the Boston Symph concerts and RCA's 'What's New' program.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

DEC 27 1943

Prison for Theft Of Concert Tickets

BOSTON, Dec. 26.—Stealing tickets to Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts brought woe to Lincoln Paul Thompson, 32, who pleaded guilty to two counts of breaking and entering in connection wtih thefts and was sentenced to State's prison for seven to ten years.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1943

Mischa Elman

To be heard at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night, when he will play the violin part in the Martinu concerto which he himself commissioned.

DECEMBER 25, 1943

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 10th concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Handel—Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12
Sibelius—Symphony No. 5 in E flat; Op. 82
Schumann—Concerto in A minor for Violoncello and orchestra; Op. 129.
Berlioz—Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps, Dance of the Sylphs, Rakoczy March from "Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

As solace for a harassed Christmas audience, most of which was doubtless in a state over one thing or another, yesterday's concert was ideal. The music was comfortably familiar and lively enough to keep everyone awake; the performance of the soloist was spectacular from a visual and an auditory standpoint the conductor was in good form and the orchestra played at its usual high level of excellence throughout.

Of the four compositions on the program, the Handel B minor Concerto Grosso was most rewarding. Exquisitely (although generally too slowly) played by the string orchestra, it established a matchless atmosphere of relaxation and of good spirits. With its charming pastoral flavor and its noble cadences it was, at least, the one piece which seemed to reflect somehow the season and this year more than any other, such reassurance is necessary.

With every performance, Sibelius' Fifth shows its seams more clearly. It still speaks to the majority of the audience, true, and it has many effective moments, but for the most part it is pretty hollow stuff. The musical devices employed to keep it going are really pretty obvious, and once the impact of its catchy tunes and its bleak sonorities wears off (about a half dozen performances usually suffice), you become conscious of its over-padded shoulders. Another ten years will probably be required to remove it from the repertoire to make room for Sibelius' vastly superior fourth and seventh, but there can be no question of its ultimate fate in the dust bin.

It is unfortunate such superb cellists as Gregor Piatigorsky must be chained to the Schumann and the Haydn Violoncello concertos. Both are attractive of course, although the Schumann is least so, but neither serves to demonstrate the musicianship of such a cellist as Mr. Piatigorsky. It calls his technical virtuosity into play (and it's not found wanting, either), and while he tries to infuse the music with the spark of life, it is only too evident to everyone, including the soloist, that the work was still-born.

In any case, it must be said he made it look much more interesting than it sounded, and that is something. After a delightful performance of Berlioz' "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," the conductor and orchestra threw caution to the wind with the "Rakoczy March," and the Beethoven plaque on the proscenium arch was severely jarred. As a good-natured recessional into the wintry blasts, however, it served its purpose admirably, and practically all filed out humming. Or at least their ears did. Next week the orchestra will play C. P. E. Bach's D major orchestral Concerto, Martinu's Violin Concerto (Mischa Elman, soloist) and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Dec 25

While Dr. Koussevitzky has made a few bows in that direction, what are known as seasonal programmes are not exactly in his line. There is nothing suggestive of Christmas in the list that was heard yesterday afternoon and that will be offered again this evening. A certain festive note is sounded, however, in the last number, the three excerpts from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust," the "Minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Dance of the Sylphs" and "Rakoczy" March.

Possibly it was because Jean Sibelius reached his 78th birthday on the eighth of this month that Dr. Koussevitzky saw fit to perform the Finnish composer's Fifth Symphony, although that work was played here no longer ago than last March. Before it comes Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings in B minor, and the piece that follows the intermission is the Cello Concerto of Schumann, with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist.

There are not many 'cello concertos and still fewer effective ones. The most rewarding composition in which the solo 'cello is prominent is the "Don Quixote" of Strauss, and you cannot have that every time there is a 'cello soloist. The slow movement of Schumann's Concerto has, of course, the intimate, songful beauty peculiar to that romantic composer, and Mr. Piatigorsky made the most of it. The first and third sections are on the doleful side, and the 'cello "whine," that even Mr. Piatigorsky cannot always get away from, accentuates that quality. Even though the buoyant Third Symphony, which, by the way, we have not heard in years, came immediately after it, the 'cello Concerto, for the most part, suggests all too forcibly the cloud that was already hovering over Schumann's mind.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC 25 1943

OVATION FOR CELLIST

Enthusiastic Boston Audience Acclaims Gregor Piatigorsky.

Boston, Dec. 24—(AP)—Huge Russian-born Gregor Piatigorsky, appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra today and received an ovation for his brilliant interpretation of Schumann's A Minor Concerto for violoncello and orchestra.

In holiday mood, the enthusiastic audience called the famous cellist back to the stage half a dozen times. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra joined in the general applause.

Piatigorsky's performance made the most of a concerto that seemed slightly attenuated and unduly sentimental The score lacked the fire of Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," for example, and only in one superb cadenza was the cello displayed to best advantage.

But Piatigorsky's tone was as beautiful as ever, rich, vibrant and admirably rounded. As always, too, he handled the cumbersome instrument the way an average-sized person would a violin, fingering and bowing with deft ease.

Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed with accustomed brilliance Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B Minor, the Sibelius Fifth Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz' "The Damnation of Faust."

RAVENA, N.Y.
NEWS
11/26/43

RADIO HIGHLIGHTS

WTRY, TROY, NEW YORK

Last week we considered the pleasure of better music as brought to us over WTRY by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is a follow up and an invitaton to open your mind and ears to music you may, up to now, have said "you do not understand—was too high hat" and similar discouraging phrases. How did any of us who anticipate the next concert of classical music acquire the taste? Certainly we did not bite our musical-noses off by twisting the dial away from a symphony concert and an opera. First we experimented. We said: "Let's give this a chance," and on frequent doses, found it not a bitter pill but a sweet treat.

This Clipping From SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

DEC 25 1943

Homemade Violoncello Amazes Piatigorsky, He Wants One For Himself

BOSTON —(AP)— A homemade violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby-shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello, who appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony yesterday.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurred in the guest artist's room at Symphony hall. Fabrizio showed him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picked it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admired the craftsmanship.

He borrowed a bow, stooped over—he couldn't wait to find a chair to sit in—and began playing. The expressive face broke into a smile as rich, vibrant tones poured from the instrument.

"Good," he murmured, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra spoke as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Piatigorsky "I like it very much. Make me one."

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

DEC 25 1943

COINCIDENT with Boston Symphony's transfer to a new sponsor tonight, Clifton Fadiman becomes the intermissions speaker for a limited period. A Handel concerto and Sibelius symphony are included in the program under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at 8:30 through Blue-WKAT.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
PRESS-SCIMITAR

DEC 25 1943

FAMED BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO LAUNCH SERIES

Concerts via WREC to Begin Tonight With Fadiman As Commentator

By THE LISTENER

The famed Boston Symphony begins a weekly series over WMPS at 7:30 tonight with an hour-long concert under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The first program includes Handel's "Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12," and Sibelius' "Symphony in E Flat Major, No. 5, Opus 82."

Clifton Fadiman, acid-tongued quizmaster of Information Please and former literary critic of The New Yorker, will be commentator and intermission speaker.

FOOTBALL FANS get a big break tomorrow when the world's professional championship football game between the Chicago Bears and the Washington Redskins is broadcast direct from Chicago over WHBQ at 2 p.m. The play-by-play comes over a special network arranged by a large sporting goods manufacturer.

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI has chosen a program of especial interest for the NBC Symphony broadcast over WMC at 4 p.m. tomorrow. In the first half of the program the orchestra will perform Beethoven's monumental Fifth Symphony, which typifies more than any other of his works the dynamic character and extreme contrasts in the nature of the great composer. The performance comes on the 173rd anniversary of Beethoven's birth. Paul Creston's "Chant of 1943" is the second selection and Deems Taylor's too-seldom-heard "Ramuntcho," completes the program.

BRITISH EVACUEE CHILDREN in this country and Canada, who haven't seen their folks since before Pearl Harbor, and American and Canadian kiddies whose fathers are service men overseas will exchange greetings with their parnts during People to People, over WREC at 11:30 a.m. tomorrow A three-way hookup will link New York, London and the Canadian cities of Montreal, Toronto and Quebec.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 27 1943

Blue Net's Strides Noted In Report

Gross sales of the Blue Network during 1943 will show an approximate increase of 60 per cent over 1942 and the total gross income will reach $26,000,000, it was revealed in the network's annual year end review.

"The Year 1943 marked the coming of age of the Blue Network highlighted by its purchase by Edward J. Noble, an outstanding figure in American industry," Mark Woods, president, declared in a statement.

"Acceptance of the network by the industry, as well as by advertisers, is reflected in the increase in Blue affiliated stations from 143 to 174 during the year, and a 60 per cent increase in the network's gross revenue.

(Continued on Page 5)

"A radio trail blazer since it began operation as an independent broadcasting entity, the Blue in the past year continued and amplified its 'pioneering' tendencies, in the fields of programs, sales and operating policies" the statement continues. "New programs were consistently developed and sold, notably in the field of children's and public service programs. Under a policy of "creative selling" the Blue during the year sold more time and more package shows than any other network. Network policies were under constant modification to enable us to offer the radio audience the finest in entertainment, music, education and discussion.

Leading Program Sales

"Notable among the programs the network sold during the year were the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the "Radio Hall of Fame," the "Revlon Theater," "What's New," "The Chamber Music Society of Lower Basin Street," "Keepsakes," "Dunninger" and "Star For a Night." In the sustaining field, the Blue carried more classical music than any other network and gave more time to the country's three major religious groups than any other net.

"The problems imposed upon us by war—of personnel, equipment, and operation—were scarcely easier than in our first year of independent operation. But the Blue met them and strode forward."

Station Relation Strides

Intensifying the drive begun last year for more stations, more power and better facilities, the Blue Network's stations department winds up 1943 with a record of singular achievement.

Under the vigorous leadership of Keith Kiggins, vice-president in charge, the department added 33 new outlets during the past 12 months, raising the total of stations to 174. Located in strategic market areas throughout the industrial east, midwest, south and the Pacific Coast, the station additions brought a corresponding increase in auditors. More than 843,000 new listeners were added to the Blue's night-time audience.

The Blue Network sales staff has set up a creative service to make network time more valauable to advertisers. Under this new philosophy, as explained by C. P. Jaeger, network sales manager, Blue salesmen have not only sold time but have planned programs which will result in the most sales from the particular time period bought by the advertiser.

Plan Attention Overseas

With internal political explosions accompanying Nazi defeats in Europe the Blue Network's news programs and round table discussion during 1944 will be focused more fully on the axis-dominated continent, according to Phillips Carlin, vice-president in charge of programs.

In the field of music the Blue has been fortunate in the appointment of the Dean of Modern American Music, Paul Whiteman, as its musical director. Under Whiteman's guidance many bold musical steps have been planned for 1944, among which are five and six minute rhapsodies, a new form especially suitable for broadcasting. The house staff of musicians, under the direction of Frank Vagnoni, has been increased to 65 in New York and the number in Chicago and on the Coast total at least that. Each man is a recognized artist on his own instrument.

West Coast Emphasized

1944 will see more emphasis placed on broadcasts originating on the West Coast; program, production and engineering staffs are being supplemented for this purpose.

There will be a decided liberalization of policy toward new talent, Carlin reports, making entree to radio easier than in the past for professional performers with ability but no established reputation. New Year's Day itself, appropriately enough, will see the premiere of "On Stage, Everybody," a show for which any actor, singer or writer who applies will be given an audition. Each performer selected by the Board of Judges will be given a five minute spot on this new half-hour show.

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS PRESS

DEC 26

In 20th Year as Conductor

With the current season Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of the top three conductors in the United States, is in his 20th consecutive year as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard each Saturday evening at 7:30 over station KFEQ and the Blue network.

Koussevitzky, the 11th in the line of conductors who have headed the Boston symphony and perhaps the greatest of them all, was born in 1874 in the Province of Tver in Russia. As a boy he traveled to Moscow and was admitted to the Philharmonic School and there became a student of the double bass. In a short time he had made himself a remarkable virtuoso of this unwieldy instrument and became recognized not only as Russia's but Europe's leading player of the double bass.

The artist Koussevitzky could not long have been satisfied with such a limited medium of expression. He inevitably sought that most expressive of instruments—the full symphony orchestra. With his own orchestra he gave memorable concerts in Moscow and St. Petersburg. Chartering a steamer, he took his musicians the length of the Volga through his vast country, bringing to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their first symphony concert.

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, again assembled an orchestra of his own in Paris and gave his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky." Here, and by guest performances in London and in other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

It was in 1924 that Koussevitzky came to America and took his place at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the years which have followed, he has

---

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

DEC 27 1943

Prison for Theft Of Concert Tickets

BOSTON, Dec. 26.—Stealing tickets to Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts brought woe to Lincoln Paul Thompson, 32, who pleaded guilty to two counts of breaking and entering in connection wtih thefts and was sentenced to State's prison for seven to ten years.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 29 1943

Blue Sales Up 60% Over '42; $26,000,000 B.O.

The Blue Network, in its first year as an independent chain since its purchase by Edward J. Noble, has increased its gross sales by 60% over 1942, upped its revenue to $26,000,000 and expanded its listening audience by 843,000 listeners to 23,556,000, according to the Blue's inventory of the year.

The chain for the first time secured outlets in Worcester, Huntington, W. Va.; Columbus, Waterbury, New Bedford, Mass.; Duluth-Superior, Wis., and Atlantic City. In addition coverage in Southern states was expanded by additions of outlets in Macon and Columbus, Ga.; Amarillo and Temple, Tex.; Jackson, Tenn.; Gulfport, Miss.; Frederickshurg and Covington, Ky.; Florence, S. C., and the Texas A. & M. Station at College Station. The net strengthened its position in the Great Lakes area with outlets in Grand Rapids, Sault Ste. Marie; Muskegon, Escanaba and Marquette, all part of the Michigan State Network. Pacific Coast coverage was increased with affiliation with KPRO which embraces the Riverside-San Bernardino area. WJW, Cleveland, became a full-time Blue affiliate.

The web also upped the number of sponsored hours from 2,887 in January to 5,178 in December as compared to 2,794 a year ago December.

New shows included the Philco-'Variety' 'Radio Hall of Fame,' the Allis-Chalmers sponsorship of the Boston Symph concerts and RCA's 'What's New' program.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

DEC 31 1943

Mischa Elman

To be heard at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night, when he will play the violin part in the Martinu concerto which he himself commissioned.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

DEC 28 1943

BUILDER OF VIOLONCELLO—Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio here works in his hobby shop in Boston where he constructed a violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading cello players, wants one like it (A. P. Wirephoto).

MEMBER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY CONSTRUCTS VIOLINCELLO IN TINY CELLAR WORKSHOP

BOSTON (AP) — A homemade violincello with remarkable tonal qualities — an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it — has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizo is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigfiorsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello who has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand — he's well over six feet in height —and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over — he can't wait to find a chair to sit in — and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Made It Himself

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

He begins playing again, interpreting some of those lovely lyric measures from the Brahms Double Violoncello Concerto. Then Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, enters and warm greetings are exchanged between the two Russian-born artists.

Piatigorsky returns the homemade cello to its beaming creator and unpacks his own cello, made by Domenico Montagna in 1739. It was given him by the late Ernest B. Dane, one-time president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony.

"I come from Philadelphia in an upper berth," he says. "I sleep with this between by legs all night."

Audience Smiles

The picture of the tremendous man wound around his cello draws smiles from the growing audience.

"How is it today?" Jean Bedetti, first cellist in the orchestra, asks.

"She is moody," Piatigorsky explains. "You know, instruments, they are like people. Sometimes they do not feel so good. In this country, when one travels great distances — in Florida one night and Maine the next — it is not always good. The sudden change in climate sometimes affects the quality of the instrument."

Other cellists from the orchestra, Hippolyte Droghmans, Carl Zeise, Joseph Zimbler and Mischa Nieland, crowd around Fabrizio as Piatigorsky prepares to go on stage.

Proudly Explains

Fabrizio proudly explains about his homemade cello. He has been with the orchestra since 1918 and a few years ago he began working with wood in his cellar workshop at his Arlington, Mass., home.

"This cello took about two years to make in my spare time," he says. "I was lucky to have some fine old wood to work with. The worst problem was setting the neck correctly That took almost a month.

"When I began scraping and polishing I knew I had something. Everytime I scraped, the instrument would speak for itself. Then when it was done I couldn't believe it, the sound was so fine.

"I put on nine coats of varnish, rubbing the instrument down each time.

"While I was making it," he said, smiling reminiscently, "I hung it out on the clothes line in the sun on clear days from a half hour before noon until a half hour after noon.

"I guess the neighbors thought was crazy."

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 24 1943

Fadiman As Commentator

Clifton Fadiman will act as intermission speaker when the premiere concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented over the Blue Network on Christmas Day. The show, under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, will be heard from 8:30 to 10 p.m., EWT, and at that time each Saturday thereafter. Fadiman will act as commentator on these broadcasts for a limited time only.

IW

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

DEC 28 1943

Behind the Mike

WITH WILLIAM MOYES

The holiday program score stands even—200 newscasts all saying the same things and 200 all-star shows featuring Benny, Hope, McGee et als. After the 195th all-star clambake the Old Man succumbs to pellagra. Too much nothing but corn in the diet.

KEX takes the bull by the horns and stops muttering warmed-up news from 11 to midnight. Instead, there's now an hour of classical recordings every night except Sat. which the boys at the poolroom have been begging for. A high-class disc jockey has been hired to interpret the music titles to such few listeners as speak only English. He is Mark Daniels, the nearest thing to Deems Taylor in Portland.

Writhing Time

One of the nicest things on the air this Xmas was those cozy, personal speeches by the chairmen of the boards of the various big sponsoring outfits. Mister Sigafoos is here to say Merry Xmas in behalf of General Glue, Inc. The high-priced talent on the show will please shut up and stand on one leg at $1500 a minute while Mr. Sigafoos slurs some syllables in an unpleasant voice through his schnoz.

Little Time (Tim) Wald, the newsmonger, emerges as an unregistered and non-union saint to say Bless You Every One. (Apparently didn't feel any need for a blessing himself.) Mr. Winchell also feels slightly above the American people as he advised all U. S. dopes who were tuned in that "men are about to die to save YOU YOUR freedom." You take your pick to the inference (1) some of MY men are about to die for YOU (scum) or (2) The Lt. Commander will do his own dying himself. (By strangulation from screaming into a mike before which he roosts on the seat of his civvies?)

That Pained Howl

The agency that supplies Sinatra his swooners must have rented J. Benny that stooge in the audience Sun. who kept laughing in the high-pitched howl, sort of painful-like as if his sides ached. The trouble was he usually started howling before the sound of Benny's voice reached his ears. When he waited to really get an earful, he went into paroxysms.

NBC's announcer, Jiacomo McCarthy came on the Xmas Eve air to say the seriousness of something or other could not be godged (guaged). The reason Dunninger wasn't on last week was his father died. Mutual has discontinued its one-minute news bulletin service on the hour and half hour. CBS should make a rule now never to have more than six 15-min. news pgms. in a row. There's no need for it now the FCC has made it possible to swipe and use all poor NBC's comics.

Wot Ees Dees Talkink?

Sat. afternoon before the Boston Symphony concert Geeno Hamilton of Basin St fame interviewed Serge Koussevitzky over the air. Geeno spoke English, but Mr. K. used a lingo of his own manufacture which (leaving out the meanings) sounded something like this:

> Tventy faw, tventy fife yees ago I vas in Angle-ant and odder counterries and vun of my breencipal aims vas to help ah-mair-ican pairformink and singink artists attain kollchural pairfection on a nay-shunal and inter-nay-shunal scupp (scope) befaw de volld shoot come to an ent.
>
> I am heppeh about owah raddio brodecastink weech eendoostry hass made poseeble and weech is such a sushul (social) benefit. It ees of yewnee-vairsal seegneeficance in an aitch of mattreyalism and shows a figgerous apsving in kollchure. Vun cannut be a kondoctor onless vun sees de nuts in de scaw and sees vut is behinte de warts, etc.

Geeno said a mouthful as he signed off. He said Mr. K has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 20 years. (Tventeh yees! and iss not talkink English any bedder!)

The Kneassless News

If there's no Kneass, there's no news. That's the way it seems since Don has answered those greetings. Somebody started that far-fetched Santy Claustrophobia gag and it made all the radio rounds. The Stooge on the Marx show who called him Sanity Claus may not have been original, but sounded much better. Aside to Gordon Bambrick who is talking: Whaddye mean the AlbinO district?

Why do all musicians, Serge K. and J. Benny included, call a violin a VILE-in? Some immigrants can talk better the day they get off the boat than some musicians can a generation after they landed. And why do the guys who say VILE-in always also say fittle? We will cluz wit a commaircial: Buy Mike's ponkin pice. Puk your finker chently insite uf vun. Soft, isn't it? Don't forget to lick off de finker.

MUSICAL DIARY

3

Thursday, Dec. 30—Saw preview of the latest March of Time, which summarizes activities of musicians in the war effort and is called Up-Beat on Music. No particular point is made except that music is certainly a part of this war. There are shots of the V-Record work, of jazz and boogie-woogie musicians, of Glenn Miller's Air Forces band, of Camp Monmouth's Symphony Orchetra conducted by Warrant Officer Johnson with Sgt. List as soloist, of performers Elman and Anderson, of composers Copland, Thomson, Schuman, of conductors Koussevitzky and Rodzinski, of old war songs and new ones being made, and an excellent little take of George Gershwin at the piano dragged in for I've forgotten what reason. Notable omissions are composers like Marc Blitzstein and Gail Kubik, who are composing necessary music for the armed forces while in uniform, and of the activities of the Armed Forces Master Records.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 44

Kisses End Concerto

BOSTON, Jan. 1 (AP)—An extraordinary display of emotion between Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and Mischa Elman, the noted violinist, today climaxed the first performance of Bohuslav Martino's concerto for violin and orchestra by the Boston Symphony.

The two men kissed each other on the cheek after the difficult modern work came to an end—a continental gesture of mutual appreciation which astonished and pleased staid Bostonians. Nothing like it had been seen at a Symphony concert in many years and the huge audience roared approval for several minutes.

There was reason for the demonstration. It was Elman's first appearance with the orchestra here in 32 years. What's more, the Martin Concerto was written at the violinist's request after he heard Koussevitzky conduct the composer's First Symphony last season.

The new concerto was somewhat overshadowed by sentiment. Nevertheless it proved a rewarding display piece for the Russian-born violinist's great talents. Involved double-stopping passages and an intricate cadenza at the close of the first movement were played with technical brilliance and the requisite slightly brittle tone demanded by some modern composers.

The score itself made much use of subdued dissonance, with a lyric second movement for contrast. Clever orchestration and odd combinations of accompanying instruments overshadowed an occasional lack of originality. At one point in the second movement the solo violin and a triangle in the percussion section engaged in a weird duet, sounding more like an unanswered telephone call than anything else.

The program opened with Maximilian Steinberg's pleasing orchestral arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's D Major Concerto for stringed instruments, and closed with an emotionally exciting performance of the Brahms Second Symphony.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

[illegible]

Gross Revenue Up 60% for Blue Net; Affiliates Increase

25 New Commercial Shows Began in 1943, Says Report

ACCEPTANCE by Radio, as well as by advertisers, of the Blue Network "as an independent broadcasting entity" is reflected in the increase of BLUE affiliates from 143 to 174 stations during 1943, and a 60% increase in gross revenue, according to Mark Woods, network president, in a yearend statement on the progress of the BLUE. Highlight of the year, Mr. Woods pointed out, was the purchase of the network by Edward J. Noble, "an outstanding figure in American industry".

"The problems imposed upon us by war," Mr. Woods said, enumerating them as personnel, equipment and operation, "were scarcely easier than in our first year of independent operation. But the BLUE met them and strode forward. We are confident that progress will be repeated in the year dawning upon us."

25 New Commercials

Under a policy of "creative selling," the BLUE during the year chalked up a steady rise in sales, with an increase in the average number of stations per commercial program from 91 for evening and 66 for daytime in December last year, to 110 for evening and 123 for daytime in December 1943. Thus the average number of stations per commercial evening program has risen by 21% and per commercial daytime program by 86%.

An increase of 85% in the number of sponsored station hours also is noted for this December over last. There are 48 sponsored programs now on the BLUE, according to the network's yearend roundup, and six scheduled to begin in the near future. Of 25 commercials started in 1943, advertisers new to the BLUE sponsored 18. Of the six future shows, four will be sponsored by advertisers new to the network.

Notable among the programs sold during 1943 are the Boston Symphony to Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co.; Radio Hall of Fame to Philco Corp.; What's New to RCA; Keepsakes to Carter Products and Joseph Dunninger to [illegible].

Stress on juvenile entertainment programs carrying an educational message as opposed to [illegible] direct educational broadcasts, and the new policy of programming for every age group were the two outstanding contributions in the field of education by the BLUE during 1943, according to Harrison B. Summers, director of the BLUE public service department.

In the program field, Phillips Carlin, BLUE vice-president in charge of programs, stated that emphasis will be put in 1944 on post-war problems, foreign and domestic trends, including war news and the political conventions. He also said that the BLUE will stress broadcasts originating from the West Coast next year. With an eye to this it has already supplemented its program, production and engineering staffs in its Pacific headquarters.

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

DEC 28 1943

BUILDER OF VIOLONCELLO—Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio here works in his hobby shop in Boston where he constructed a violoncello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading cello players, wants one like it (A. P. Wirephoto).

MEMBER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY CONSTRUCTS VIOLINCELLO IN TINY CELLAR WORKSHOP

BOSTON (AP) — A homemade violincello with remarkable tonal qualities — an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it — has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizo is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby shop handiwork.

Amazed too is Piatigforsky, one of the world's leading players of the cello who has appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

The unusual meeting between the homemade cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand — he's well over six feet in height —and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over — he can't wait to find a chair to sit in — and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he murmurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Made It Himself

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

He begins playing again, interpreting some of those lovely lyric measures from the Brahms Double Violencello Concerto. Then Serge Koussevitsky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, enters and warm greetings are exchanged between the two Russian-born artists.

Piatigorsky returns the homemade cello to its beaming creator and unpacks his own cello, made by Domenico Montagna in 1733. It was given him by the late Ernest B. Dane, one-time president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony.

"I come from Philadelphia in an upper berth," he says. "I sleep with this between by legs all night."

Audience Smiles

The picture of the tremendous man wound around his cello draws smiles from the growing audience.

"How is it today?" Jean Bedetti, first cellist in the orchestra, asks.

"She is moody," Piatigorsky explains. "You know, instruments, they are like people. Sometimes they do not feel so good. In this country, when one travels great distances — in Florida one night and Maine the next — it is not always good. The sudden change in climate sometimes affects the quality of the instrument."

Other cellists from the orchestra, Hippolyte Droghmans, Carl Zeise, Joseph Zimbler and Mischa Nieland, crowd around Fabrizio as Piatigorsky prepares to go on stage.

Proudly Explains

Fabrizio proudly explains about his homemade cello. He has been with the orchestra since 1918 and a few years ago he began working with wood in his cellar workshop at his Arlington, Mass., home.

"This cello took about two years to make in my spare time," he says. "I was lucky to have some fine old wood to work with. The worst problem was setting the neck correctly. That took almost a month.

"When I began scraping and polishing I knew I had something. Every time I scraped, the instrument would speak for itself. Then when it was done I couldn't believe it, the sound was so fine.

"I put on nine coats of varnish, rubbing the instrument down each time.

"While I was making it," he said, smiling reminiscently, "I hung it out on the clothes line in the sun on clear days from a half hour before noon until a half hour after noon.

"I guess the neighbors thought I was crazy."

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 24 1943

Fadiman As Commentator

Clifton Fadiman will act as intermission speaker when the premiere concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented over the Blue Network on Christmas Day. The show, under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, will be heard from 8:30 to 10 p.m., EWT, and at that time each Saturday thereafter. Fadiman will act as commentator on these broadcasts for a limited time only.

JW

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

DEC 1943

Behind the Mike

WITH WILLIAM MOYES

The holiday program score stands even—200 newscasts all saying the same things and 200 all-star shows featuring Benny, Hope, McGee et als. After the 195th all-star clambake the Old Man succumbs to pellagra. Too much nothing but corn in the diet.

KEX takes the bull by the horns and stops muttering warmed-up news from 11 to midnight. Instead, there's now an hour of classical recordings every night except Sat. which the boys at the poolroom have been begging for. A high-class disc jockey has been hired to interpret the music titles to such few listeners as speak only English. He is Mark Daniels, the nearest thing to Deems Taylor in Portland.

Writhing Time

One of the nicest things on the air this Xmas was those cozy, personal speeches by the chairmen of the boards of the various big sponsoring outfits. Mister Sigafoos is here to say Merry Xmas in behalf of General Glue, Inc. The high-priced talent on the show will please shut up and stand on one leg at $1500 a minute while Mr. Sigafoos slurs some syllables in an unpleasant voice through his schnoz.

Little Time (Tim) Wald, the newsmonger, emerges as an unregistered and non-union saint to say Bless You Every One. (Apparently didn't feel any need for a blessing himself.) Mr. Winchell also feels slightly above the American people as he advised all U. S. dopes who were tuned in that "men are about to die to save YOU YOUR freedom." You take your pick to the inference (1) some of MY men are about to die for YOU (scum) or (2) The Lt. Commander will do his own dying himself. (By strangulation from screaming into a mike before which he roosts on the seat of his civvies?)

That Pained Howl

The agency that supplies Sinatra his swooners must have rented J. Benny that stooge in the audience Sun. who kept laughing in the high-pitched howl, sort of painful-like as if his sides ached. The trouble was he usually started howling before the sound of Benny's voice reached his ears. When he waited to really get an earful, he went into paroxysms.

NBC's announcer, Jiacomo McCarthy came on the Xmas Eve air to say the seriousness of something or other could not be godged (guaged). The reason Dunninger wasn't on last week was his father died. Mutual has discontinued its one-minute news bulletin service on the hour and half hour. CBS should make a rule now never to have more than six 15-min. news pgms. in a row. There's no need for it now the FCC has made it possible to swipe and use all poor NBC's comics.

Wot Ees Dees Talkink?

Sat. afternoon before the Boston Symphony concert Geeno Hamilton of Basin St. fame interviewed Serge Koussevitzky over the air. Geeno spoke English, but Mr. K. used a lingo of his own manufacture which (leaving out the meanings) sounded something like this:

> Tventy faw, tventy fife yees ago I vas in Angle-ant and odder counterries and vun of my breencipal aims vas to help ah-mair-ican pairformink and singink artists attain kollchural pairfection on a nay-shunal and inter-nay-shunal scupp (scope) befaw de vollid shoot come to an ent.
>
> I am heppeh about owah raddio brodecastink weech eendoostry hass made poseeble and weech is such a sushul (social) benefit. It ees of yewnee-vairsal seegneeficance in an aitch of mattreyalism and shows a figgerous apsving in kollchure. Vun cannut be a kondoctor onless vun sees de nuts in de scaw and sees vut is behinte de warts, etc.

Geeno said a mouthful as he signed off. He said Mr. K has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 20 years. (Tventeh yees! and iss not talkink English any bedder!)

The Kneassless News

If there's no Kneass, there's no news. That's the way it seems since Don has answered those greetings. Somebody started that far-fetched Santy Claustrophobia gag and it made all the radio rounds. The Stooge on the Marx show who called him Sanity Claus may not have been original, but sounded much better. Aside to Gordon Bambrick who is talking: Whaddye mean the AlbinO district?

Why do all musicians, Serge K. and J. Benny included, call a violin a VILE-in? Some immigrants can talk better the day they get off the boat than some musicians can a generation after they landed. And why do the guys who say VILE-in always also say fittle? We will cluz wit a commaircial: Buy Mike's ponkin pice. Puk your finker chently insite uf vun. Soft, isn't it? Don't forget to lick off de finker.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEC 27 1943

Gross Revenue Up 60% for Blue Net; Affiliates Increase

25 New Commercial Shows Began in 1943, Says Report

ACCEPTANCE by Radio, as well as by advertisers, of the Blue Network "as an independent broadcasting entity" is reflected in the increase of BLUE affiliates from 143 to 174 stations during 1943, and a 60% increase in gross revenue, according to Mark Woods, network president, in a yearend statement on the progress of the BLUE. Highlight of the year, Mr. Woods pointed out, was the purchase of the network by Edward J. Noble, "an outstanding figure in American industry".

"The problems imposed upon us by war," Mr. Woods said, enumerating them as personnel, equipment and operation, "were scarcely easier than in our first year of independent operation. But the BLUE met them and strode forward. We are confident that progress will be repeated in the year dawning upon us."

25 New Commercials

Under a policy of "creative selling," the BLUE during the year chalked up a steady rise in sales, with an increase in the average number of stations per commercial program from 91 for evening and 66 for daytime in December last year, to 110 for evening and 123 for daytime in December 1943. Thus the average number of stations per commercial evening program has risen by 21% and per commercial daytime program by 86%.

An increase of 85% in the number of sponsored station hours also is noted for this December over last. There are 48 sponsored programs now on the BLUE, according to the network's yearend roundup, and six scheduled to begin in the near future. Of 25 commercials started in 1943, advertisers new to the BLUE sponsored 18. Of the six future shows, four will be sponsored by advertisers new to the network.

Notable among the programs sold during 1943 are the Boston Symphony to Allis-Chalmers Mfg. Co.; Radio Hall of Fame to Philco Corp.; What's New to RCA; Keepsakes to Carter Products, and Joseph Dunninger to Kemtone.

Stress on juvenile entertainment programs carrying an educational message as opposed to past direct educational broadcasts, and the new policy of programming for every age group were the two outstanding contributions in the field of education by the BLUE during 1943, according to Harrison B. Summers, director of the BLUE public service department.

In the program field, Phillips Carlin, BLUE vice-president in charge of programs, stated that emphasis will be put in 1944 on post-war problems, foreign and domestic trends, including war news and the political conventions. He also said that the BLUE will stress broadcasts originating from the West Coast next year. With an eye to this it has already supplemented its program, production and engineering staffs in its Pacific headquarters.

MUSICAL DIARY

Jan 3

Thursday, Dec. 30—Saw preview of the latest March of Time, which summarizes activities of musicians in the war effort and is called Up-Beat on Music. No particular point is made except that music is certainly a part of this war. There are shots of the V-Record work, of jazz and boogie-woogie musicians, of Glenn Miller's Air Forces band, of Camp Monmouth's Symphony Orchetra conducted by Warrant Officer Johnson with Sgt. List as soloist, of performers Elman and Anderson, of composers Copland, Thomson, Schuman, of conductors Koussevitzky and Rodzinski, of old war songs and new ones being made, and an excellent little take of George Gershwin at the piano dragged in for I've forgotten what reason. Notable omissions are composers like Marc Blitzstein and Gail Kubik, who are composing necessary music for the armed forces while in uniform, and of the activities of the Armed Forces Master Records.

* * *

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 1 - 1944

Kisses End Concerto

BOSTON, Jan. 1 (AP)—An extraordinary display of emotion between Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and Mischa Elman, the noted violinist, today climaxed the first performance of Bohuslav Martino's concerto for violin and orchestra by the Boston Symphony.

The two men kissed each other on the cheek after the difficult modern work came to an end—a continental gesture of mutual appreciation which astonished and pleased staid Bostonians. Nothing like it had been seen at a Symphony concert in many years and the huge audience roared approval for several minutes.

There was reason for the demonstration. It was Elman's first appearance with the orchestra here in 32 years. What's more, the Martin Concerto was written at the violinist's request after he heard Koussevitzky conduct the composer's First Symphony last season.

The new concerto was somewhat overshadowed by sentiment. Nevertheless it proved a rewarding display piece for the Russian-born violinist's great talents. Involved double-stopping passages and an intricate cadenza at the close of the first movement were played with technical brilliance and the requisite slightly brittle tone demanded by some modern composers.

The score itself made much use of subdued dissonance, with a lyric second movement for contrast. Clever orchestration and odd combinations of accompanying instruments overshadowed an occasional lack of originality. At one point in the second movement the solo violin and a triangle in the percussion section engaged in a weird duet, sounding more like an unanswered telephone call than anything else.

The program opened with Maximilian Steinberg's pleasing orchestral arrangement of C. P. E. Bach's D Major Concerto for stringed instruments, and closed with an emotionally exciting performance of the Brahms Second Symphony.

[39]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 1944

Koussevitzky Greets Elman With Kiss After Concert

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Dec. 31 (AP)—An extraordinary display of emotion between Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and Mischa Elman, the noted violinist, today climaxed the first performance of Bohuslav Martinu's concerto for violin and orchestra by the Boston Symphony.

The two men kissed each other on the cheek after the difficult modern work came to an end—a continental gesture of mutual appreciation which astonished and pleased staid Bostonians. Nothing like it had been seen at a symphony concert in many years and the huge audience roared approval for several minutes.

There was reason for the demonstration. It was Elman's first appearance with the orchestra here in 32 years. What's more, the Martinu concert was written at the violinist's request after he heard Koussevitzky conduct the composer's first symphony last season.

The new concerto was somewhat overshadowed by sentiment. Nevertheless it proved a rewarding display piece for the Russian-born violinist's great talents. Involved double-stopping passages and an intricate cadenza at the close of the first movement were played with technical brilliance and the requisite slightly brittle tone demanded by some modern composers.

dont give biographies.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Vladimir Golschmann is a very elegant conductor, with a fine ear for transparent orchestral sounds. This was evident 30 seconds after the leader of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra had begun the first of his guest appearances with the Boston Symphony at Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Golschmann is, further, a slim, well-tailored man, just over 50, with dark hair turning gray. On the stage in his cutaway and gray trousers he looked cosmopolitan and handsome. His right hand wields a long stick gracefully, and his left—upon the little finger of which glitters a large gold ring—has an appearance which all in the Friday audience must have pronounced artistic.

For his Boston debut Mr. Golschmann chose a program divided between Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and French music: Roussel's F major Suite, two "Gymnopedies" by Satie in Debussy's orchestration, and the Spanish Symphony of Ravel. In general he was most successful with the Gallic share of the afternoon.

The "Eroica," as Mr. Golschmann conducted it, was remarkable for its transparency of sound. But his interpretation was cool and impersonal, shying away from Beethoven's dramatic grandeurs. In all music there is no greater test of a conductor's profundity than the Funeral March. The first eight measures, in fact, will tell the story. If the orchestral detail is not perfectly clean and if the noble melody is not made to sound tragic, the march will seem superficial. Yesterday it did seem superficial, and so did the finale, because the pace was too fast and the various episodes were not sufficiently contrasted.

When it came to Roussel, Satie and Ravel, Mr. Golschmann was more in his element. The muscular, almost witty Suite of Roussel, excellent and decidedly individual music, requires a modern, sophisticated approach and an ear that will serve to keep Roussel's consistent melody above the astringent dissonance of his orchestra. One has seldom encountered a more sharply etched performance of the Suite than Mr. Golschmann's.

The colorful mood music of Satie and Ravel were treated just as well. If "Gymnopedies" do not amount to very much, they are a musical embodiment of Gallic refinement and proportion. They need to be played with a light, exacting hand, with conviction, and that was the Golschmann way. The Ravellian orchestral tints, imposed upon the borrowed Spanish rhythms, were recreated with dash and skill, if not with virtuosity.

For the most part the Boston orchestra played well for Mr. Golschmann, and he was cordially received by the audience. He will be with us again next week.—C. W. D.

Gl Jan 1

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It is often said that artists are demonstrative and warm hearted people. In that case Mischa Elman fills the requirements.

The circumstances attending his first performance of Bohuslav Martinu's new Violin Concerto in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, so moved Mr. Elman that he planted a resounding kiss on the cheek of Serge Koussevitzky.

At the close of a brilliant performance of this new work Mr. Elman was greeted by hearty applause from both orchestra and audience.

As a violinist Mr. Elman is best known for his predilection for music of the Romantic era. His lush singing tone and precise technic are eminently suited to the difficult, showy, often musically shallow works of the 19th Century. It is strange, therefore, that Mr. Elman should commission a concerto from a modern composer, as he has in this case from Mr. Martinu. The choice is a fortunate one.

Martinu must be a fiddler himself, for his concerto is most intimately wedded to violin style. It is a show piece, pure and simple, manufactured for that express purpose. It lacks the human warmth and inspiration of his symphony, performed here last season. But at the same time, it has its rewarding moments, musically, which is more than can be said of a lot of show pieces. It is set apart from other display pieces by a number of unusual features. It has no rapid-fire runs which call for a withering race up and down the finger board.

The concerto is cast in the customary three movements. In the first Martinu has written some incredibly long-breathed tunes of fiery and intense beauty. And Mr. Elman knows just how to breathe life into them. The middle movement sets the violin in the upper register over quiet counterpoint in the brass, a most effective treatment. In the final section there are some curious double-stop passages of fourths, fifths and seconds punctuated by heavy chords in the orchestra. It should be noted that Martinu has woven a skilled orchestra part which takes its role in the development of the work, but which never covers the violin tone. Herein, the romantic temperament of Elman and the modernism of Martinu are very adroitly combined.

The program began with a bustling, purling performance of the Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments of C. P. E. Bach as arranged for orchestra by Steinberg, and concluded with Brahms' bright and tuneful Second Symphony. The orchestra performed, under Mr. Koussevitzky's inspiring direction, with its usual slickness.—J. W. R.

Jan 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

They say there is nothing new under e sun, so probably other soloists have ssed the conductor following a suc- essful performance. But everyone, in- luding Dr. Koussevitzky, seemed sur- rised when Mischa Elman gave him an sculatory salute while the audience was stormily applauding the world pre- miere of Bohuslav Marinu's Violin Con- certo at yesterday's Symphony Concert.

That manly kiss implanted upon the conductor's cheek was the most striking thing about the whole business. Next came Mr. Elman's very superior fiddling, something that we have come to take for granted, and, lastly, the piece itself. Upon hearing Mr. Martinu's ingratiating First Symphony (which also had its first performance at Symphony Hall, when Dr. Koussevitzky took that work to New York, Mr. Elman asked the Czech composer to write a concerto for him.

In a long communication to the editor of the programme notes, Mr. Martinu states what he considered to be the problems confronting him and how he has tried to solve them. Perhaps it would have been better if he had kept these thoughts to himself, for their disclosure emphasizes the air of contrivance which the concerto exhibits. There are succulent spots and brilliant spots, there are opportunities for virtuoso performance by the soloist, there are sonorous proclamations by the orchestra. But on a first hearing, anyway, the piece does not appear to be sufficiently organic, and the role assigned to the solo instrument seems at variance with its essentially lyric nature. Nor, on the other hand, is this exactly a rewarding show-piece. Mr. Elman will probably play it widely, but it may be doubted whether many other violinists will be anxious to try their hand at it.

The first and last numbers on the programme were, respectively, the C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg Concerto, to which Dr. Koussevitzky is so devoted, and the Brahms Second Symphony, which he gives us every year. The concerto's two allegros are a bit on the mechanical side, but the slow movement has a timely beauty, and yesterday it was beautifully played.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
JAN 2 - 1944

New Violin Concerto Performed Privately For Music Reviewer

Work to Receive Its New York Presentation by Elman, Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

This is a study of the birth of an excellent violin concerto which was premiered in Boston last Friday and last night by Mischa Elman and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. The composer—Bohuslav Martinu, eminent Czech musician who has given so many fine works to the world.

It all started while Elman was on a southern tour last winter. As is his wont when arriving in a strange town, the violinist took a walk. On the way he passed a hall where an orchestral concert was in progress. Entering, he listened intently to the playing of an unfamiliar work that impressed him.

Mr. Lewando

What is being played," whispered Elman to his neighbor. "A concerto grosso of Martinu," came the reply. The memory of this imposing piece lingered in Elman's thoughts as he traveled north. He decided to commission Martinu to write a concerto for him.

In New York Elman sought out the composer and arrangements were concluded to that end, much to the violinist's satisfaction.

"But I must have the work no later than May, 1943," insisted Elman. Martinu acquiesced.

A few days later Elman accidently met Koussevitzky. "Tell me," asked the violinist, "who, in your opinion, are the foremost composers of today?"

"Well," responded the conductor, "three of them are Stravinsky, Hindemith and—Martinu. But why do you ask?" pressed Koussevitzky.

"Because," Elman gleefully informed, "I have commissioned Martinu to write a concerto for me."

Promises Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky beamed. "In that case," said he, pointing to himself, "first performance." "Agreed," replied the violinist.

Came January and February, but no sign of the concerto. Elman began to fidget, for the premiere dates were set. Elman called Martinu and asked about the concerto.

"Don't worry," casually remarked the composer, "I have not begun it yet, but you'll have the concerto in plenty time."

About the end of February, 1943, Martinu began work on the concerto. Within six weeks it was completed and sent to Elman. The latter immediately forwarded the score to Koussevitzky.

Elman was overjoyed after looking through the concerto and zestfully set to work to commit it to memory.

About this time the violinist wrote to this reviewer and stated with enthusiasm his fondness for the new concerto, adding, "and as soon as you come to New York I want to play this lovely work for you." We accepted the invitation. So on a balmy July day we went to Elman's luxurious apartment on Central Park West. A perfect host, Elman ushered us into the music room.

Elman

The entire apartment was in process of being redecorated, so every article of furniture was covered up. Elman had the decorators cease work, telephoned for his accompanist to come over post haste and launched into discussion of the concerto with characteristic heartiness of expression.

The writer examined the score and the piano arrangement and found the work to be well-knit, harmonically rich and of delightful melodic content. Yet it was highly individual, modern to an intelligent degree and thoroughly violinistic. This was borne out a little later when Elman and his expert accompanist began playing the concerto.

Unforgettable Beauty

Under his artistic command, display of vitality, musical and virtuosic powers plus enthusiasm of approach, the work received a brilliant rhapsodic performance of unforgettable beauty.

To the audience of one the occasion was an inspiring experience. It was a satisfaction to hear great music of our day being played by a great violin master at the peak of his powers in a manner worthy of the finest traditions of his art.

This is the story of the advent of a new violin concerto—one likely to take its place among other important examples of its type. The concerto will receive its New York presentations next week by Messrs. Elman, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Music of Mozart and modern composers will feature the Tuesday Musical Club program on Tuesday at 2 p. m. Adolph Anderson, baritone, is guest recitalist with Ruth Perry Topping at the piano. He will sing songs of Clokey, Barber, Hageman, Gurney and Moore.

Elizabeth Storer Bothwell will play Mozart's C-minor fantasy, and the closing portion of the program will feature Mozart's one-act opera, Bastien and Bastienne with Alice Lee Gardner, Ruth Matthews and Mr. Anderson.

Marian Deuel McDade will be at the piano. Mrs. Robert D. Ayars is the director.

Mr. Elman's part in the success of the work is beyond compute. He performed the formidable solo part with enormous technical bravura, achieving a tone of great warmth and color. Considering the reserve of the Friday afternoon audiences, his success was sensational. Indeed, there is no doubt that most of the applause was directed at him rather than the concerto, for it is plain that it did not give up its secret quite that readily and it is safe to say many years will elapse before it does

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 11th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mischa Elman, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

C. P. E. Bach ....Concerto in D major for strings (Arr. Steinberg)
Martinu..Concerto for Violin and Orchestra
Brahms Symphony No 2 in D major, Op. 73

It is clear that Martinu has composed a magnificent violin concerto in that which was yesterday given its first performance by Mischa Elman (who commissioned the work) and the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. There were other attractions on the program, notably the wondrous C. P. E. Bach orchestral concerto, but there is no doubt that the Martinu Concerto is to recent efforts in the field what the Martinu Symphony is to recent efforts in the field what the Martinu symphonies. That is to say, the best.

Of all the forms a composer may work in, the violin concerto is certainly the most difficult. Virtually all first-line composers have had a hand at it with varying results, but few—to judge by his remarks in the program—have approached it with so clear a conception of the problems involved as Mr. Martinu. It was his intention to write a work which, while at once an orchestral work with violin solo and a violin solo with orchestral accompaniment, was a perfectly integrated combination of both and was, to boot, expressive yet absolute music. Quite an order!

Of the three movements, the first, while containing a sustained and beautiful melodic line in the andante section (and one which is exceedingly gratefully conceived for the solo instrument), is hardest to catch on first hearing. The orchestration seems turgid and thick at times, and wanting in clarity. The second movement makes its way immediately with charming and typically "Czechoslovakian" melodies, while the finale, filled with verve and rhythmic intricacy, is exciting, heady stuff.

Koussevitzky Event Superb At Bushnell

Boston Orchestra And Conductor Heard In Works by Handel, Shostakovitch, Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orches-ra, conducted by Dr. Serge Kous-sevitzky, was heard in the Bush-nell Symphonic Series at the Me-norial auditorium Wednesday evening, in the following program:

Concerto Grosso in B Minor, No. 12	Handel
Symphony No. 1, Opus 10	Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 2 in D Major	Brahms

It was a great night at the Bush-nell Memorial last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Sym-phony—were in their rarest form. The urge to make music was vehemently upon them. The conductor's face was wreathed with inspiration, shone with beatitude in the Handel, with imperiousness in the Shostakovitch and with triumph in the Brahms. All night long he sang his songs, the composers' songs to his men, ministered to them player by player, beamed at their responses, moulded the music bar by bar with his hands. And when at the end of the concert, following a soaring and burning performance of the Second Symphony, he turned to the audience, he faced them like a Caesar and received an imperial tribute.

It had been a superlative program in the first place, for Dr. Koussevitzky is the master exponent of the three composers whom he had selected. His Handel is unmatched, being made of living music and not empty architecture, elegant without pomposity and impressive without the "East Lynne" touches which feature the readings or transscriptions so many conductors are whipping up these days for both Handel and Bach, until all the early writers are made to sound like the Stokowski score for "Fantasia."

The ecstatic panorama which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston disclosed in the Larghetto section of the Handel last night was like little on this earth. Giving his exclusive attention to the first strings for bars at a time, he shaped every measure on the air, placed every note, marked the level of every voice. The spell which was upon Dr. Koussevitzky in those moments, and which he in turn put upon his men, was little short of remarkable. Yet although it riveted the attention, curiously enough it heightened rather than obtruded upon the effect of the music. It was an experience of being doubly in two superb presences, that of the composer and that of a superlative re-creator. It was impossible not to feel the seizing and uplifting genius of Dr. Koussevitzky in those moments

No. 1—Or Out On First.

Of the oft-played, and I mean oft-played, symphonies of Comrade Shostakovitch, the First, variously known as "Til Eulenspiegel From Minsk To Pinsk" or "Moments With Fifty Famous Composers", is the easiest to take. Its chief concern is musical craftsmanship, and despite black-market borrowings in every contemporary direction, it is contrived with ingenuity and a beguiling spirit of experiment.

It was when Shostakovitch began to get ideas about the 18 republics of the Soviet Union and tried to stretch a talent for strictly incidental music around them that the trouble began and the music ended. After that Shostakovitch was like a doll's dressmaker trying to tailor a pair of pants to an elephant. For despite some outbursts which indicate an explosion in a vodka factory, Shostakovitch's music is essentially little music, salon music, and you must not be fooled when he calls it symphony and asks you to look at it through a telescope.

In any event, as the great apostle of Shostakovitch, Dr. Koussevitzky never fails to give any work of the composer a magnificent send-off. This he achieved again last night. If there is anything more than can be done to make Shostakovitch seem brilliant, inspired and full of bortsch, than the Boston conductor does, we haven't found out about it yet. Or than the Boston Symphony does. They bend their backs to every last note of it, play it with hypnotic virtuosity, pour themselves right into it. It only seems too bad that such rousing playing is not spent on something a little meatier.

Music's Monument.

There is nothing to be said at this ate date of Dr. Koussevitzky's in-erpretation and the Boston's play-ng of Brahms, which has not been aid with waving of flags and toss-ng of hats a hundred times before. Brahms is the specialty-of-the-ouse with them, their finest stuff, heir great monument to music. So was again last night, full, rich, eady, ablaze, Olympian. Dr. Kous-sevitzky scarcely has to lead his layers through the Second now, ut only because he has marched hem through it so triumphantly so any times before. Last night it as one of their noblest efforts, in n entirely noble concert. —T. H. P.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1944

OVERTONES

Role of Industry in Sponsoring Music Calls for Appreciation of It as an Art

By MILES KASTENDIECK

As the New Year begins, one notable change in the musical world should go on record. It is simply the fact that in the year 1943 industry has suddenly taken up the sponsorship of music in a big way. The last year has found the United States Rubber Company sponsoring the Philharmonic-Symphony, General Motors the NBC Symphony and Allis-Chalmers the Boston Symphony. In passing, it might be worth mentioning that the Texas Company has "fathered" the Metropolitan Opera for some time, to say nothing of Sherwin-Williams' promotion of the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air. Private sponsorship is apparently on the wane though the patronage of the few is still necessary to keep many musical organizations from folding up. But the move on the part of industry means a definite shift from old ways to new.

Radio, of course, is responsible for all this but need not necessarily be the only reason for industry's taking such a cultural step. There is no reason whatsoever why the major industries of any community should not recognize a certain obligation to that community, bettering it by an out-and-out campaign for improving or for furthering its cultural life. The time has come when industrial America should recognize that it is called upon for that kind of voluntary co-operation in the name of true democracy.

Now the great companies behind the radio sponsorship of the three great orchestras already mentioned have avowedly a commercial purpose. That they should recognize symphonic music to have grown to the importance of warranting their commercial backing is not at all surprising. Any person aware of the pulse of the times knows that music has become more and more a part of Amercan life in recent years. But whether they have taken into consideration the reaction of the public to their handling of the broadcasts of these respective orchestras is open to question. Their present procedure somewhat indicates their acting more commercially than intelligently. Those people who will tune in to an hour's concert by a symphony orchestra and those who will be encouraged to come into that fold will look upon that musical hour as something sufficient unto itself. They will feel no need for intermission commentaries in so short an interval of time. Sufficient objection has already been registered against the inappropriate "bedtime stories" that interrupt the Symphony of the Air hour, but nothing has been done about it. Whether it was necessary to engage Clifton Fadiman for a slight interval during the Boston Symphony Hour, just as if the Boston Symphony itself was not enough, illustrates thinking along this same line. It is doubtful that Carl Van Doren's "American Scriptures" series adds anything to the broadcasts of the Philharmonic-Symphony. The fact is that even to casual music lovers all these extra-curricula activities seem out of place. That they are is obvious to any true music lover.

So right at the start we are confronted with a neat question of what the attitude of industry will really turn out to be. At the same moment that it is helping symphony orchestras to survive, it may be choking off the complete enjoyment of their listeners. The problem is not new, because the incessant barrage of advertising has alienated many people from listening regularly to the radio. How unfortunate it would be, at the very moment that industry has undertaken to do so much for the greatest of all the arts, that it should bungle the whole matter by not understanding at the start with what kind medium it is dealing and the potential quality of its audience.

ART AND MUSIC RELATION OF ONE TO THE OTHER

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Jan 2, '44

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

SO great is the spread between the vague and the incorporal nature of music and the very definite impression that it so often makes upon the receptive listener that writers, artists and dancers are forever trying to interpret it in terms of things that really have little to do with it. Possibly the painters, and we must here include Walt Disney and his ilk, have been less given to this sort of thing than the critics, the essayists and the votaries of terpsichore, although the exhibition of paintings on view at Symphony Hall for the past two weeks probably, in itself, puts the pictures inspired by music abreast of the compositions inspired by paintings. What can you name, besides Liszt's "Dance of Death" and "Battle of the Huns," Hans Huber's "Boecklin" Symphony, Reger's four tone poems after that same Swiss painter, Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" (Boecklin again) and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler?"

In the case of the aforementioned compositions, the uniformed listener would probably never suspect what the music was trying to express. And in some of the Symphony Hall paintings you would hardly guess what piece the artist had in mind.

These 15 pictures, forming the Capehart collection, and widely reproduced in color for advertising purposes, are the work of 10 prominent artists, hailing from Russia, France, Sweden and the U. S. When the compositions they are interpreting come under the general head of representative music, it is generally easy to get the painter's drift. The tough nuts to crack are Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' First Symphonies, the symphony of Franck and Bach's D minor Toccata and Fugue. These might stand for a number of things. The Shostakovitch Seventh is fairly plain, since everyone knows of its connection with the siege of Leningrad. There was something definite to work on in the case of "The Magic Flute," the "New World" Symphony, the "Swan Lake," the "Firebrand," the "Raindrop" Prelude (a name for which Chopin was not responsible), "The Engulfed Cathedral" (the real point of which seems to have been missed by Raymond Breinin), "Scheherazade" (in which Sergei Soudeikine had the easiest assignment of the lot), the "Hallelujah" Chorus, the "Wedding Day at Troldhaugen" and "Finlandia."

"Finlandia," of course, was meant as a sort of instrumental national anthem. It hymns not the Finnish landscape but the Finnish spirit, the spirit of a people oppressed and yearning for freedom. Paris-born Bernard Lamotte, who also contributed five other paintings, took refuge in a landscape, that is part seascape, as the simplest way out of it.

Anyway, Mr. Lamotte has depicted for us a frozen marsh. In the foreground stands the forked trunk of a tree and in the background is a red sun, half of which has already sunk below the horizon.

Besides being intrinsically one of the most striking of all, this particular painting made an especially vivid impression a week ago, since Sibelius' Fifth Symphony figured as the second number of the programme.

When the symphonies of Sibelius began to be heard here they had, indeed, a novel sound. Confronted with a strange and interesting idiom, the reviewers, like Mr. Lamotte, fell back upon the Finnish scenery in their efforts to describe and interpret it. In this music they saw bleak expanses, rock-girt shores and silvery lakes. They heard the roar or the whistle of wintry winds. They felt the oppressiveness of the bitter cold, the long winter nights. Only a man who had experienced such things, they figured, could have written this music. And they were right, nearer right, perhaps, than the subsequent commentators, who would have us believe that the Sibelius symphonies are absolute music, that Sibelius was the heir to Beethoven (save the mark!) and, in fact, the only true symphonist of modern times.

Berlioz once expressed the wish that Felicien David, composer of "Le Desert," would get off his camel. The aged Sibelius, he has just turned 78, has never got very far, musically speaking, from the physical environment into he which he was born.

It so happened that last Sunday evening there was a broadcast of Sibelius recordings, in which "Lemminkainen's Homecoming" followed the Fourth Symphony, the finest of the lot, and the two, despite their different purport, sounded strangely of a piece. There was little change in idiom. To say that Sibelius' symphonies are programme music without titles would be to go too far, although Georg Schneevoigt did make such a claim for No. 2. But they are full of the musical devices that the composer has used in his many tone poems based on Finnish legend. There are those whirring figures, those buzzing or bustling strings, that can suggest a spinning wheel or a speeding sledge. There are the wails, the outcries and ejaculations of woodwinds and brass. In symphony, as in symphonic poem, we can imagine frozen wastes, or perhaps the fair northern summer. And the style, in the accepted sense of the term, is really anything but symphonic.

* * * *

Three eminent recitalists are about to descend upon us. Marguerite Namara, coloratura soprano, makes her Boston recital debut at Jordan Hall on Friday evening. Saturday afternoon brings Andres Segovia, unparalleled guitarist, to that auditorium, and the following afternoon Marion Anderson, famed colored contralto, returns to Symphony Hall.

The San Carlo Company concludes its stay at the Opera House today with "Tosca" in the afternoon and "Il Trovatore" in the evening.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 5 - 1944

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA APPEAR AT BEST

Boston Symphony Concert Is All Audience Can Ask for at Auditorium

By Willard M. Clark

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their annual visit to the Auditorium last night, sponsored by the Community Concerts Association, to which Springfield music lovers are everlastingly indebted.

Still Has Flair

There is little new to write of the performance of this, the finest of orchestras. Each number played had been played here before and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings do not change. He still has the flair for showmanship and the wherewithall to indulge it. We learned, however, that the orchestra is not infallible.

Something went wrong in the opening movement of the Prokofieff "Classical Concerto" and it almost fell apart. The trouble appeared to be in the strings. However, this wholly delightful work, which Prokofieff wrote as he believed Mozart would have written it today, was given a reading as witty and astringent as its composer's personality, as we know it through his music.

Then followed three works which have long been identified with Koussevitzky, namely Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Capriccio Espagnol" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. "Nuages" was particularly notable for its delicate colorings, the beauty of the windwoods and strings. It is doubtful if any other orchestra in the world could equal the brilliance of the playing of the "Capriccio Espagnol." It was a truly virtuoso performance, more Spanish in its colors and rhythms than Spain itself. "Fetes" received the same resplendant treatment.

Peculiar Affinity

Twice we have heard definitive performances of Beethoven's seventh symphony and both were by the Boston players with Dr. Koussevitzky. The first was heard several summers ago at Tanglewood, the second was last night. Not always at his happiest in interpreting the works of Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky appears to have a peculiar affinity for the seventh symphony. He emphasizes its spaciousness, the effectiveness of its contrasts, and its earthy humor, so predominant in the finale. The impact of the Allegretto, played more deliberately than might be expected, was terrific.

Koussevitzky, the showman, was ever evident. Although in recent years, he seems to be saving himself and conducts much more quietly, he still glares hither and yon and seemingly drags the music out of the strings.

Only a few empty seats testified to the presence of the San Carlo Opera Company across the Square, a most unsatisfactory booking on the part of the Playgoers, but one which could not be avoided.

Enzio Pinza, basso of the Metropolitan Opera Association, will present the next Community concert on Feb. 15.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1944

Concerned With the Old and the New in the Week's Programs

Larry Gordon

Left, members of the Bach Circle, who will play Dittersdorf and Bach; right, Mischa Elman, violinist, who will play new concerto by Bohuslav Martinu with Boston Symphony.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 2 - 1944

OVERTONES

Role of Industry in Sponsoring Music Calls for Appreciation of It as an Art

By MILES KASTENDIECK

As the New Year begins, one notable change in the musical world should go on record. It is simply the fact that in the year 1943 industry has suddenly taken up the sponsorship of music in a big way. The last year has found the United States Rubber Company sponsoring the Philharmonic-Symphony, General Motors the NBC Symphony and Allis-Chalmers the Boston Symphony. In passing, it might be worth mentioning that the Texas Company has "fathered" the Metropolitan Opera for some time, to say nothing of Sherwin-Williams' promotion of the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air. Private sponsorship is apparently on the wane though the patronage of the few is still necessary to keep many musical organizations from folding up. But the move on the part of industry means a definite shift from old ways to new.

Radio, of course, is responsible for all this but need not necessarily be the only reason for industry's taking such a cultural step. There is no reason whatsoever why the major industries of any community should not recognize a certain obligation to that community, bettering it by an out-and-out campaign for improving or for furthering its cultural life. The time has come when industrial America should recognize that it is called upon for that kind of voluntary co-operation in the name of true democracy.

Now the great companies behind the radio sponsorship of the three great orchestras already mentioned have avowedly a commercial purpose. That they should recognize symphonic music to have grown to the importance of warranting their commercial backing is not at all surprising. Any person aware of the pulse of the times knows that music has become more and more a part of American life in recent years. But whether they have taken into consideration the reaction of the public to their handling of the broadcasts of these respective orchestras is open to question. Their present procedure somewhat indicates their acting more commercially than intelligently. Those people who will tune in to an hour's concert by a symphony orchestra and those who will be encouraged to come into that fold will look upon that musical hour as something sufficient unto itself. They will feel no need for intermission commentaries in so short an interval of time. Sufficient objection has already been registered against the inappropriate "bedtime stories" that interrupt the Symphony of the Air hour, but nothing has been done about it. Whether it was necessary to engage Clifton Fadiman for a slight interval during the Boston Symphony Hour, just as if the Boston Symphony itself was not enough, illustrates thinking along this same line. It is doubtful that Carl Van Doren's "American Scriptures" series adds anything to the broadcasts of the Philharmonic-Symphony. The fact is that even to casual music lovers all these extra-curricula activities seem out of place. That they are is obvious to any true music lover.

So right at the start we are confronted with a neat question of what the attitude of industry will really turn out to be. At the same moment that it is helping symphony orchestras to survive, it may be choking off the complete enjoyment of their listeners. The problem is not new, because the incessant barrage of advertising has alienated many people from listening regularly to the radio. How unfortunate it would be, at the very moment that industry has undertaken to do so much for the greatest of all the arts, that it should bungle the whole matter by not understanding at the start with what kind medium it is dealing and the potential quality of its audience.

Ro -44

ART AND MUSIC RELATION OF ONE TO THE OTHER

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Jan 2, '44

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

SO great is the spread between the vague and the incorporal nature of music and the very definite impression that it so often makes upon the receptive listener that writers, artists and dancers are forever trying to interpret it in terms of things that really have little to do with it. Possibly the painters, and we must here include Walt Disney and his ilk, have been less given to this sort of thing than the critics, the essayists and the votaries of terpsichore, although the exhibition of paintings on view at Symphony Hall for the past two weeks probably, in itself, puts the pictures inspired by music abreast of the compositions inspired by paintings. What can you name, besides Liszt's "Dance of Death" and "Battle of the Huns," Hans Huber's "Boecklin" Symphony, Reger's four tone poems after that same Swiss painter, Rachmaninoff's "Island of the Dead" (Boecklin again) and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler?"

In the case of the aforementioned compositions, the uniformed listener would probably never suspect what the music was trying to express. And in some of the Symphony Hall paintings you would hardly guess what piece the artist had in mind.

These 15 pictures, forming the Capehart collection, and widely reproduced in color for advertising purposes, are the work of 10 prominent artists, hailing from Russia, France, Sweden and the U. S. When the compositions they are interpreting come under the general head of representative music, it is generally easy to get the painter's drift. The tough nuts to crack are Beethoven's Fifth and Brahms' First Symphonies, the symphony of Franck and Bach's D minor Toccata and Fugue. These might stand for a number of things. The Shostakovitch Seventh is fairly plain, since everyone knows of its connection with the siege of Leningrad. There was something definite to work on in the case of "The Magic Flute," the "New World" Symphony, the "Swan Lake," the "Firebrand," the "Raindrop" Prelude (a name for which Chopin was not responsible), "The Engulfed Cathedral" (the real point of which seems to have been missed by Raymond Breinin), "Scheherazade" (in which Sergei Soudeikine had the easiest assignment of the lot), the "Hallelujah" Chorus, the "Wedding Day at Troldhaugen" and "Finlandia."

"Finlandia," of course, was meant as a sort of instrumental national anthem. It hymns not the Finnish landscape but the Finnish spirit, the spirit of a people oppressed and yearning for freedom. Paris-born Bernard Lamotte, who also contributed five other paintings, took refuge in a landscape, that is part seascape, as the simplest way out of it.

Anyway, Mr. Lamotte has depicted for us a frozen marsh. In the foreground stands the forked trunk of a tree and in the background is a red sun, half of which has already sunk below the horizon.

Besides being intrinsically one of the most striking of all, this particular painting made an especially vivid impression a week ago, since Sibelius' Fifth Symphony figured as the second number of the programme.

When the symphonies of Sibelius began to be heard here they had, indeed, a novel sound. Confronted with a strange and interesting idiom, the reviewers, like Mr. Lamotte, fell back upon the Finnish scenery in their efforts to describe and interpret it. In this music they saw bleak expanses, rock-girt shores and silvery lakes. They heard the roar or the whistle of wintry winds. They felt the oppressiveness of the bitter cold, the long winter nights. Only a man who had experienced such things, they figured, could have written this music. And they were right, nearer right, perhaps, than the subsequent commentators, who would have us believe that the Sibelius symphonies are absolute music, that Sibelius was the heir to Beethoven (save the mark!) and, in fact, the only true symphonist of modern times.

Berlioz once expressed the wish that Felicien David, composer of "Le Desert," would get off his camel. The aged Sibelius, he has just turned 78, has never got very far, musically speaking, from the physical environment into he which he was born.

It so happened that last Sunday evening there was a broadcast of Sibelius recordings, in which "Lemminkainen's Homecoming" followed the Fourth Symphony, the finest of the lot, and the two, despite their different purport, sounded strangely of a piece. There was little change in idiom. To say that Sibelius' symphonies are programme music without titles would be to go too far, although Georg Schneevoigt did make such a claim for No. 2. But they are full of the musical devices that the composer has used in his many tone poems based on Finnish legend. There are those whirring figures, those buzzing or bustling strings, that can suggest a spinning wheel or a speeding sledge. There are the wails, the outcries and ejaculations of woodwinds and brass. In symphony, as in symphonic poem, we can imagine frozen wastes, or perhaps the fair northern summer. And the style, in the accepted sense of the term, is really anything but symphonic.

* * * *

Three eminent recitalists are about to descend upon us. Marguerite Namara, coloratura soprano, makes her Boston recital debut at Jordan Hall on Friday evening. Saturday afternoon brings Andres Segovia, unparalleled guitarist, to that auditorium, and the following afternoon Marion Anderson, famed colored contralto, returns to Symphony Hall.

The San Carlo Company concludes its stay at the Opera House today with "Tosca" in the afternoon and "Il Trovatore" in the evening.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 5 - 1944

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA APPEAR AT BEST

Boston Symphony Concert Is All Audience Can Ask for at Auditorium

By Willard M. Clark

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their annual visit to the Auditorium last night, sponsored by the Community Concerts Association, to which Springfield music lovers are everlastingly indebted.

Still Has Flair

There is little new to write of the performance of this, the finest of orchestras. Each number played had been played here before and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings do not change. He still has the flair for showmanship and the wherewithall to indulge it. We learned, however, that the orchestra is not infallible.

Something went wrong in the opening movement of the Prokofieff "Classical Concerto" and it almost fell apart. The trouble appeared to be in the strings. However, this wholly delightful work, which Prokofieff wrote as he believed Mozart would have written it today, was given a reading as witty and astringent as its composer's personality, as we know it through his music.

Then followed three works which have long been identified with Koussevitzky, namely Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Capriccio Espagnol" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. "Nuages" was particularly notable for its delicate colorings, the beauty of the windwoods and strings. It is doubtful if any other orchestra in the world could equal the brilliance of the playing of the "Capriccio Espagnol." It was a truly virtuoso performance, more Spanish in its colors and rhythms than Spain itself. "Fetes" received the same resplendant treatment.

Peculiar Affinity

Twice we have heard definitive performances of Beethoven's seventh symphony and both were by the Boston players with Dr. Koussevitzky. The first was heard several summers ago at Tanglewood, the second was last night. Not always at his happiest in interpreting the works of Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky appears to have a peculiar affinity for the seventh symphony. He emphasizes its spaciousness, the effectiveness of its contrasts, and its earthy humor, so predominant in the finale. The impact of the Allegretto, played more deliberately than might be expected, was terrific.

Koussevitzky, the showman, was ever evident. Although in recent years, he seems to be saving himself and conducts much more quietly, he still glares hither and yon and seemingly drags the music out of the strings.

Only a few empty seats testified to the presence of the San Carlo Opera Company across the Square, a most unsatisfactory booking on the part of the Playgoers, but one which could not be avoided.

Enzio Pinza, basso of the Metropolitan Opera Association, will present the next Community concert on Feb. 15.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 2 - 1944

Concerned With the Old and the New in the Week's Programs

Larry Gordon

Left, members of the Bach Circle, who will play Dittersdorf and Bach; right, Mischa Elman, violinist, who will play new concerto by Bohuslav Martinu with Boston Symphony.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

JAN 5 - 1944

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT NEWARK FEB. 10

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will play at the Mosque Theater, Newark, Thursday night, February 10, it was announced today by the Griffith Music Foundation, in releasing its 1944 schedule of events. This will be the first of two special programs by the Foundation marking the new season.

Second event will be appearance of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo which will give afternoon and evening performances Saturday, March 25. A series of three Sunday afternoon piano recitals will begin February 20 with the First Piano Quartet, composed of Adam Garner, Henry Holt, Vladimir Padwa, and George Roberts. The quartet has as its aim the widening of its scope by blending original features with four piano resources, thus combining familiarity with novelty.

Ania Dorfmann, pianist, will appear March 26, and Rudolf Serkin, April 16.

* * *

Emery Darcy, Metropolitan Opera tenor, will be presented in a joint concert on Tuesday night, January 11, in Eastside High School, Paterson, under the auspices of the Y. M.-Y. W. H. A. This concert is presented to series holders without extra fee. Their tickets to the Ballet will be their admission ticket to this concert.

Mr. Darcy joined the Metropolitan Opera in 1940, following his appearances on the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air. Since that time he has made many appearances in Wagnerian roles, and among the most recent of his portrayals was that of Phoebus in the Metropolitan's premiere of Bach's opera "Phoebus and Pan."

Iris Brussels will appear as pianist on this concert.

* * *

The first United States performance of Aaron Copland's "Short Symphony" will be played by the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski Sunday at 5 P. M. Selections from Debussy, Albeniz, Fernandez and Guarnieri also will be heard.

Copland wrote the "Short Symphony" between 1931 and 1933. He says: "If I expended so much time and effort on the Short Symphony it was because I wished to write as perfect a piece as I possibly could." The work is orchestrated for symphony without trombones, tuba or percussion. But it includes the infrequently used hecklephone (bass oboe). "Short Symphony" has been performed twice by the Mexican Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Carlos Chavez, to whom Copland dedicated the music.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JAN 4 - 1944

Turnabout: Composer Bohuslav Martinu takes a turn at the fiddle to show Mischa Elman (at the piano) how a certain passage in his new Violin Concerto should go. Elman, playing a modern work for the first time in his long career, will be soloist in the Martinu work with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky Thursday night and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

Post Jan

accent. Anyway, no matter what either of them say, jazz will go right on.

The Stravinsky Incident

An army officer, who wishes to have his name withheld, has written in to express his disapproval of the Stravinsky incident: "The attack upon his clear, wholesome arrangement of our National Anthem was probably one of the most horrible insults that the Boston public and officials could have bestowed upon a famous international figure. . . . Since he is an American citizen I believe that he should be given an apology . . . rightly due him by whoever instigated the supercilious attack. Personally, I can think of no better form of apology than of adopting his arrangement . . . composed with a pure faith in America and as a tribute to the great people of America. . . . I am not what might be considered an ardent devotee of the great Russian (now American) master . . . but I am an American and believe in certain basic rights and simple courtesy." Another soldier, writing in similar vein, says: "Boston is a paradox—culture and ignorance—and many times our side is the underdog."

* * * *

The Symphony Concerts

Returning to the Symphony Concerts this week, Dr. Koussevitzky will offer Beethoven's Third "Leonora" Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler." At Wednesday afternoon's Youth Concert Wheeler Beckett will present Beethoven's "Eroica," "The Dance of the Hours" from "La Gioconda" and Sibelius' "Finlandia."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

JAN 7 - 1944

Elman Plays With Bostonians

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

"Martinu must like cross accents as well as the swing addicts," said a young army lieutenant of the violin concerto played by Mischa Elman last night at the Boston Symphony's concert in Carnegie Hall. The lieutenant, a musician in civilian life, was spending his first night in a city after months of maneuvers far from normal habitations. He headed straight for the visiting orchestra's concert, and was considerably impressed by the exemplary musicianship of Mr. Elman and Conductor Koussevitsky.

The difficult rhythmic patterns which make up a considerable part of the concerto performed for the first time in New York at this concert required consummate skill to execute with the authority achieved by maestro and violinist. Mr. Elman seemed to feel the work with keen emotion, and yet he played with admirable restraint suitable to its frequent reflective portions. He also had broad sweep and fire when the pyrotechnics demanded it. The concerto, while not peppered unduly with dissonance is most difficult to comprehend thoroughly on first hearing. It gave the impression of rambling and the theme did not seem compelling. A somewhat disjointed character left me vaguely unsatisfied, but I'm willing to grant I might change my mind next time.

Mr. Koussevitsky began the program with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B Minor, No. 12, and ended with a superb performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It was a stroke of genius to choose this dynamic, alive and familiar piece to follow the Martinu.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 5 - 1944

Capacity Houses Here For Symphony, Opera

Boston Orchestra Makes Community Concert at Auditorium Memorable Occasion

The Boston symphony is one of those rare orchestras that could keep a capacity audience entranced with Mother Goose songs. The members give the impression of being accomplished musicians who enjoy nothing more than playing and who are having a perfectly wonderful time on the concert stage. Koussevitsky um-pum-pums silently to the delight of his musicians who answer his every beam and scowl.

Last night at the Municipal auditorium they were in their usual top form, making it an impossible task to pick out any particular selection as the best.

The Prokofieff "Classical" symphony was played with a sense of humor, each movement more entertaining than the one before it. The work with a modernized Mozartean flavor, gives the orchestra ample opportunity to show off its virtuosity, and it responded admirably to the chance.

From Prokofieff, Koussevitsky turned to Debussy by way of contrast and presented a perfect interpretation of "Nuages" and "Fetes." Delicate and dreamy, "Nuages" served to accent the vigor and precision of the second nocturne, which gave full play to the orchestra's color.

The "Cappriccio Espagnol" was by far the most brilliant work on the program, leading to a strong climax in the fandango. It lacked only the Ballet Russe to make it complete, but the imagination involved in Koussevitsky's interpretation made up for the absence of Dolin and company.

The major work of the evening, Beethoven's Seventh symphony, again left nothing to be desired. Koussevitsky's way of conducting is so sure that there is never any doubt but that his is the definitive interpretation. The playing was completely spontaneous, as befits a "dance" symphony, every theme being brought out carefully but with certainty.

So once again Springfield has had its annual treat and must wait another year for the Community Concert association, God bless it, to bring back the finest orchestra in the country.

M. T. S.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1944

First Modern Work Played By Elman

NEW YORK, Jan. 7.—Just 35 years ago Mischa Elman, the violinist, made his American debut in Carnegie hall. Thursday night he played the first extended modern work he ever performed in public. Hitherto the distinguished Russian has confined himself to Tchaikowsky, Mendelssohn, et al.

To make the break complete, he played a concerto by Bohuslav Martinu, which he had personally commissioned, and played it with the Boston symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, an orchestra which has consistently championed modern music since its present director took over.

The new concerto was commissioned entirely by chance, and does not represent the conversion of Elman to the modern idiom.

One day he went to Carnegie hall to hear the Seventh Shostakovich symphony, which all conductors were giving a whirl. He thought he should hear it twice and went back for the purpose. But the symphony that time was Martinu's first, not Shostakovich's seventh.

Elman was so impressed he called Martinu to congratulate him. The violinist and the composer had lunch together next day, much talk about music, and before they parted the concerto was commissioned. Although it demands a good deal of the performer, Elman, it is said, demanded nothing of the composer beyond making one suggestion about the cadenza of the first movement.

CITY NEWS

Springfield

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY AND ORCHESTRA APPEAR AT BEST

Jan 6 '44

Boston Symphony Concert Is All Audience Can Ask for at Auditorium

By Willard M. Clark

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made their annual visit to the Auditorium last night, sponsored by the Community Concerts Association, to which Springfield music lovers are everlastingly indebted.

Still Has Flair

There is little new to write of the performance of this, the finest of orchestras. Each number played had been played here before and Dr. Koussevitzky's readings do not change. He still has the flair for showmanship and the wherewithall to indulge it. We learned, however, that the orchestra is not infallible.

Something went wrong in the opening movement of the Prokofieff "Classical Concerto" and it almost fell apart. The trouble appeared to be in the strings. However, this wholly delightful work, which Prokofieff wrote as he believed Mozart would have written it today, was given a reading as witty and astringent as its composer's personality, as we know it through his music.

Then followed three works which have long been identified with Koussevitzky, namely Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," and the Capriccio Espagnol" by Rimsky-Korsakoff. "Nuages" was particularly notable for its delicate colorings, the beauty of the windwoods and strings. It is doubtful if any other orchestra in the world could equal the brilliance of the playing of the "Capriccio Espagnol." It was a truly virtuoso performance, more Spanish in its colors and rhythms than Spain itself. "Fetes" received the same resplendant treatment.

Peculiar Affinity

Twice we have heard definitive performances of Beethoven's seventh symphony and both were by the Boston players with Dr. Koussevitzky. The first was heard several summers ago at Tanglewood, the second was last night. Not always at his happiest in interpreting the works of Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky appears to have a peculiar affinity for the seventh symphony. He emphasizes its spaciousness, the effectiveness of its contrasts, and its earthy humor, so predominant in the finale. The impact of the Allegretto, played more deliberately than might be expected, was terrific.

Koussevitzky, the showman, was ever evident. Although in recent years, he seems to be saving himself and conducts much more quietly, he still glares hither and yon and seemingly drags the music out of the strings.

Only a few empty seats testified to the presence of the San Carlo Opera Company across the Square, a most unsatisfactory booking on the part of the Playgoers, but one which could not be avoided.

Enzio Pinza, basso of the Metropolitan Opera Association, will present the next Community concert on Feb. 15.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 6 - 1944

Koussevitzky Event Superb At Bushnell

Boston Orchestra And Conductor Heard In Works by Handel, Shostakovitch, Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was heard in the Bushnell Symphonic Series at the Memorial auditorium Wednesday evening, in the following program:

Concerto Grosso in B Minor, No. 12	Handel
Symphony No. 1, Opus 10	Shostakovitch
Symphony No. 2 in D Major	Brahms

It was a great night at the Bushnell Memorial last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony were in their rarest form. The urge to make music was vehemently upon them. The conductor's face was wreathed with inspiration, shone with beatitude in the Handel, with imperiousness in the Shostakovitch and with triumph in the Brahms. All night long he sang his songs, the composers' songs to his men, ministered to them player by player, beamed at their responses, moulded the music bar by bar with his hands. And when at the end of the concert, following a soaring and burning performance of the Second Symphony, he turned to the audience, he faced them like a Caesar and received an imperial tribute.

It had been a superlative program in the first place, for Dr. Koussevitzky is the master exponent of the three composers whom he had selected. His Handel is unmatched, being made of living music and not empty architecture, elegant without pomposity and impressive without the "East Lynne" touches which feature the readings or transscriptions so many conductors are whipping up these days for both Handel and Bach, until all the early writers are made to sound like the Stokowski score for "Fantasia."

The ecstatic panorama which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston disclosed in the Larghetto section of the Handel last night was like little on this earth. Giving his exclusive attention to the first strings for bars at a time, he shaped every measure on the air, placed every note, marked the level of every voice. The spell which was upon Dr. Koussevitzky in those moments, and which he in turn put upon his men, was little short of remarkable. Yet although it riveted the attention, curiously enough it heightened rather than obtruded upon the effect of the music. It was an experience of being doubly in two superb presences, that of the composer and that of a superlative re-creator. It was impossible not to feel the seizing and uplifting genius of Dr. Koussevitzky in those moments.

No. 1—Or Out On First.

Of the oft-played, and I mean oft-played, symphonies of Comrade Shostakovitch, the First, variously known as "Til Eulenspiegel From Minsk To Pinsk" or "Moments With Fifty Famous Composers", is the easiest to take. Its chief concern is musical craftsmanship, and despite black-market borrowings in every contemporary direction, it is contrived with ingenuity and a beguiling spirit of experiment.

It was when Shostakovitch began to get ideas about the 18 republics of the Soviet Union and tried to stretch a talent for strictly incidental music around them that the trouble began and the music ended. After that Shostakovitch was like a doll's dressmaker trying to tailor a pair of pants to an elephant. For despite some outbursts which indicate an explosion in a vodka factory, Shostakovitch's music is essentially little music, salon music, and you must not be fooled when he calls it symphony and asks you to look at it through a telescope.

In any event, as the great apostle of Shostakovitch, Dr. Koussevitzky never fails to give any work of the composer a magnificent send-off. This he achieved again last night. If there is anything more than can be done to make Shostakovitch seem brilliant, inspired and full of bortsch, than the Boston conductor does, we haven't found out about it yet. Or than the Boston Symphony does. They bend their backs to every last note of it, play it with hypnotic virtuosity, pour themselves right into it. It only seems too bad that such rousing playing is not spent on something a little meatier.

Music's Monument.

There is nothing to be said at this late date of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the Boston's playing of Brahms, which has not been said with waving of flags and tossing of hats a hundred times before. Brahms is the specialty-of-the-house with them, their finest stuff, their great monument to music. So it was again last night, full, rich, heady, ablaze, Olympian. Dr. Koussevitzky scarcely has to lead his players through the Second now, but only because he has marched them through it so triumphantly so many times before. Last night it was one of their noblest efforts, in an entirely noble concert.—T. H. P.

[41]

[42]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

JAN 7 - 1944

Mischa Elman Plays First Modern Work After 35-Year Span

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK—(AP)—Just 35 years ago Mischa Elman, the violinist, made his American debut in Carnegie Hall. Last night he played the first extended modern work he ever performed in public. Hitherto the distinguished Russian has confined himself to Tchaikowsky, Mendelsshon, et al.

To make the break complete, he played a concerto by Bohuslav Martinu which he had personally commissioned, and played it with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, an orchestra which has consistently championed modern music since its present director took over.

The new concerto was commissioned entirely by chance, and does not represent the conversion of Elman to the modern idiom.

One day he went to Carnegie Hall to hear the Seventh Shostakovich Symphony, which all conductors were giving a whirl. He thought he should hear it twice and went back for the purpose. But the symphony that time was Martinu's first, not Shostakovich's Seventh.

Elman was so impressed he called Martinu to congratulate him. The violinist and the composer had lunch together next day, much talk about music, and before they parted the concerto was commissioned.

The work is traditional in that it divides, somewhat unevenly, into the usual three movements and is respectful enough to the musical forms. But not slavishly respectful. It contains a minimum of new ideas, however, and its "modernism" seemed a little forced. The composer came on from Cleveland, where he now lives, to make his bow with Elman and Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 7 - 1944

Martinu Work Is Played Here By Bostonians

Mischa Elman Is Soloist in New Violin Concerto; Beethoven 7th Is Heard

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist, last night at Carnegie Hall. The program follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra . Martinu
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92, Beethoven.

Again last night at Carnegie Hall that admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, manifested to New Yorkers the power of perfect discipline. The finest performances of the evening belonged to the beginning and the end of the concert—to Handel and Beethoven. In the Concerto Grosso one heard the familiar massive, pure tone quality which comes only from the true precision of these players' string attack. The music which emerged was completely heartfelt and beautiful.

The new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, which was given its first New York performance last night by Dr. Koussevitzky, is not the best that the distinguished Czech composer has done for us. It gives, on first hearing, the impression of being a hastily conceived and dispatched opus; moreover, the solo writing is rather less brilliant than the orchestral work, and this is true to such an extent that at times one thinks of the violin as an annoying insect whose sound the orchestra sometimes manages to chase away. Then things happen, for the composer has a way with the orchestra and likes to keep it occupied. Indeed, if one makes a quick inventory of the concerto, one discovers the piece relying almost wholly upon orchestral sonority for its effect. The rhythmical complications seem to be more visual than to exist in the audible fabric of the music; there is very little which is remarkable in the way of melody; and the harmony seems to be carrying out a continuous escape from its own natural consequences. Chordal sequences head straight for sentimental involvement, and then cleverly sneak out through an unexpected exit, leaving the music thwarted for an instant in its sense of destination. It is this harmonic unreliability as much as anything which gives the work its generally fragmentary feeling. And it is the variety of effective instrumentation which by keeping up listening interest gives it whatever illusion of continuity it has.

Throughout the concerto there are passages where the shifting quality of the woodwind accompaniments to the solo instrument make an effect which is quite personal and of considerable interest. At times, Mr. Elman, whose performance lacked the sureness which might possibly have lent direction to the piece, suffered in his intonation in these passages, as if their melting borderline consonances were too much to fight against successfully.

The piece is not a trip to any particular place, but rather a tour through a landscape which does not seem to change basically as one moves about in it. Along the way, in the pastoral-like second movement, there is the spectacle of a cadenza assisted by a triangle ringing like a telephone, and on the homeward stretch Mr. Martinu, in the manner of his countryman Dvorak, offers a bit of American folk-music. The sudden ending is like the unexpected arrival back at the starting-point of the outing; one is a little dazed, but not in a bad humor.

After you and every one in your family have finished with it, SAVE this copy of the New York Herald

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 7 - 1944

Martinu Concerto Is Premiered Here

Boston Symphony with Mischa Elman Plays Czech-American's New Work

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Few symphonic concerts go by these days without some brand new opus from the busy pen of Bohuslav Martinu, Czech-American composer. Last night it was a violin concerto, and a pretty good one, despite faults.

The concerto bowed into the local repertory at Carnegie Hall under fine auspices, Mischa Elman concentrating on the solo line and Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra doing the rest. Mr. Elman was in top trim. It's no news that the same goes for the Boston delegation.

Mr. Martinu's concerto is the work of an honest craftsman, intent on sound technic and working in an idiom mainly his own. While failing to shape up to his symphonic best, the concerto will probably hang on in the fiddling repertory for quite a while. Artists like Elman and bands like the Boston Symphony should alone make rehearings worth the effort.

Violin Overshadowed.

Mr. Martinu has theorized at some length on the risks involved in concerto-writing, stressing the violin's single voice pitted against a symphonic wall. Of course theories make good reading, but in music the finished product is always the best argument. No amount of explaining can make it good.

My feeling about the concerto is that if you like Martinu's music you, ipso facto, like the concerto. Mastery of style and content throbs through all four movements. The orchestration is always fascinating and the solo line often so. Sincerity of aim and feeling beats in every bar.

Still, as a violin concerto it shows certain weaknesses, the major one being that Mr. Martinu's orchestration, while packed tight with power, overweighs the solo voice. Maybe it couldn't be helped—maybe Mr. Martinu wanted it that way—but the violin just doesn't get the break it deserves; anyway the break it usually gets in standard concertos.

Elman a Master.

Not that the solo writing is thin and lackluster. Far from it. Mr. Martinu turned out plenty of glittering copy for virtuoso handling, and Mr. Elman seemed just the man to read it last night. Soothing tone and glib ease marked his rendering. Mr. Elman can still make a fiddle say uncle.

But the fiddle often got lost in the orchestral shuffle. At times Mr. Martinu seemed to be writing a giant symphony instead of a violin concerto. A titantic tussle among brasses and battery would be going on with the sweet-toned solo violin trying bravely to keep up appearances. It was all fine stuff, only a bit one-sided, at least much of the way.

Earlier cadenzas and the finale both showed better balance and contrasts. Mr. Elman's warm-spun line glowing against neat-sized parcels of orchestral tone. Of course there the going got slightly conventional and as a rule Mr. Martinu's genius stays out of conventional grooves. The gripping individuality more than makes up for the lopsided form. Geniuses often have a way of making you see and hear things their way in the long run.

Besides the Martinu reading, the orchestra turned in brilliant assignments with Handel's B minor concerto grosso for strings and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The Handel music surged up like great singing, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting it as if his heart and head were full of song.

HARTFORD, CONN.
~~COURANT~~ Times

JAN 6 - 1944

Music That Lifts the Heart

Koussevitzky in One of His Best Moods, in Boston Symphony Concert Here

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial Wednesday night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program:

Concerto Grosso in B minor Handel
Symphony No. 1 Shostakovich
Symphony No. 2 Brahms

Koussevitzky was in one of his best moods last night when with a minimum of manual direction, somtimes none at all, he elicited from the Boston Orchestra that patrician dialect which to music is as Bostonese as the broad A is to the spoken word.

That it is a matter of phraseology was demonstrated by the larghetto of the Handel concerto. While each player shaped his utterance as though independently inspired the accents coincided sweetly and mysteriously in that illusion common to all great art that there is just one right way to the ultimate expression.

Unforgettable Music

Time and again but for the briefest space Koussevitzky allowed a complete hiatus between phrases but the mood was so delicately poised that there was not the slightest loss of buoyancy. Here was the master poet fondling syllables. But in spite of this preciousness the music itself transpired in such a way as to lift the heart and bow the head.

It is the genius of Koussevitzky that he can re-address himself to the most accustomed scores with as much zest and appetite as with the most piquant novelty. The D major Symphony of Brahms must be a second nature to him but his evocation of its pastoral beauties had all the rapture fetched by the unexpected vista.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

JAN 7 - 1944

ELMAN IS SOLOIST IN MARTINU SCORE

By ARTHUR V. BERGER.

The appearance of Mischa Elman as soloist in Bohuslav Martinu's new Violin Concerto at the Boston Symphony concert last night was a victory for present-day composers in their struggle to establish a more normal connection with performing musicians. Mr. Elman had been heard many times in this same Carnegie Hall, but never before as the executant of a similarly proportioned large-scale work fresh from the pen of a composer writing in a relatively up-to-date idiom. The fact that it was Martinu who brought about this wonder, is, of course, indicative of the essential nature of his achievement. It works admirably for the interpreter, it fits the instruments, it moves with a natural and unforced suavity, it has a warm and earnest outer coating. Without being trivial or flagrantly showy, however, it lacks depth, genuine harmonic direction and, most of all, long melodic lines.

The concerto, as one of the least fertile of Martinu's recent efforts, reveals these serious inadequacies in his music much more than some of his previous works which held the attention with odd moments of textural ingenuity. The new work began with a strikingly dissonant chord projecting us into a melodramatic atmosphere, proceeded to an eloquent entrance for the solo violin, and stated a workable four-note motive, nicely syncopated at the opening of the allegro. From there on this reviewer recalls mainly repetitions and obvious development of the motive, sometimes unconvincingly patched up with other motives to form a longer line. The dark, promising opening seemed to have little connection with the leisurely and sometimes playful sequel. Mr. Elman performed with great firmness and his customary breadth of tone.

Serge Koussevitzky opened the concert with a memorable reading of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12. The string sonority was of such beauty that we kept wishing for the delay of the arrival of the last chord. In the performance of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, there was particular brilliance in the finale which was, in fact, quite breathtaking.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1944

MARTINU CONCERTO PLAYED BY ELMAN

Carnegie Hall Audience Also Hears Beethoven 7th by the Boston Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES

A violinist, who in certain qualities is without a rival today, played a new and brilliantly composed concerto at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, on which occasion a performance of one of the most familiar of all symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh, made as much of a sensation as the new concerto, and rightly. Such an arresting symphonic concert is rare, and it is unlikely that any one in the audience which packed the auditorium will forget.

The violinist was Mischa Elman, the concerto the new work which he commissioned last season of Boleslav Martinu. Beethoven's Seventh was given an unforgettable reading by Dr. Koussevitzky.

For good measure the concert began with the Handel Concerto grosso for strings, which Dr. Koussevitzky is fond of playing and has often performed here. He might afford his New York audiences greater variety of repertory if he would expend his peerless orchestra upon fewer repetitions of this kind. The justification of the procedure lies in the performance, in which the strings play with such a warm cantilena and noble sonority. The treat to the ear is such that lesser music would be welcome for this sensuous delight alone. But we pass to more instructive matters.

Concerto a Perfect Fit

Mr. Martinu's concerto is more than a work that a famous virtuoso has ordered from a prominent composer to adorn his repertory. It is as if the composer—to whom as a matter of fact, Mr. Elman before asking him if he would be interested to write him a concerto—had used the violinist's unique qualities in the expounding of a special kind of music for which their presence is indispensable. The result is a concerto which is a perfect fit, and which Mr. Elman plays with a delight as obvious as his mastery.

The first movement is broad and rhapsodic, centering about a single very simple melodic phrase, immediately announced, like a wild call, by the full orchestra. It is music, one would say, for the violin only, and the violin of Elman, and we remember no occasion when more glorious tone flooded from his bow, or he played with greater breadth, fire and mastery.

The slow movement is more directly in the way of folk-song, with a contrasting part which suggests the telescoping together of the slow movement and the scherzo idea. It includes an oddly accompanied cadenza toward the end, the triangle supplying the pulsatile background for the monologue of the solo instrument. The final is gypsy, and rondo-like, with fascinating rhythmical complications and crossings of rhythms with the orchestra. To a violinist of lesser powers it would be forbiddingly difficult, but it is always practicable and, despite quite elaborate orchestration, the tonal balance is maintained and the conclusion is very exciting.

Short-Breathed Ideas

True, the ideas are short-breathed, remarkably as they are treated, and their development highly sophisticated. But there was Mr. Elman's song to supply melodic line, and he had the old inimitable sonority. When he is in such form there is no violinist like him. Right warmly was he welcomed into his own. At the end the audience was repeatedly calling back to the stage the violinist, the composer, and the conductor, whose remarkable accompaniment had been part of this triumph.

Of Beethoven's symphony, so well known, there is not so much to say as far as description of the score is concerned. Nor is it easy to dilate in detail upon an interpretation in no respect more wonderful than in its absolute directness, virility, selflessness, elevation. No one thought of a virtuoso conductor and orchestra, save as these conveyed endless beauty, and communicated the endless life of the music, and the prodigal richness of the developments and grandeur of the thought. One was aware only of the gigantic Beethoven, of music as clean and glorious as nature, and as greatly ordered, with as much fecundity.

The symphony was played with all the repeats in the scherzo and the uproarious, earth-shaking laughter of the conclusion. There were no fancy touches, no superfluous effects, and this mighty simplicity, this hymn to the sun and the skies, stirred the audience to its depths. Who would have said in these days of sensations that an experienced modern audience would make last night's demonstration over the 100,000th performance of Beethoven's Seventh symphony? Who? Only those to whom it may have been vouchsafed to realize the marvel of this timeless work of art, or who had its secret revealed as last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

[43]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Orchestra Is Heard Here in Martinu Concerto

Mischa Elman Is Soloist in New Work for Violin; Beethoven 7th Is Played

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist, Thursday night at Carnegie Hall. The program follows:

Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12 .... Handel
Concerto for Violin and Orchestra . Martinu
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92, Beethoven.

Again Thursday night at Carnegie Hall that admirable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, manifested to New Yorkers the power of perfect discipline. The finest performances of the evening belonged to the beginning and the end of the concert—to Handel and Beethoven. In the Concerto Grosso one heard the familiar massive, pure tone quality which comes only from the true precision of these players' string attack. The music which emerged was completely heartfelt and beautiful.

The new Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Bohuslav Martinu, which had its first New York performance Thursday night by Dr. Koussevitzky, is not the best that the distinguished Czech composer has done for us. It gives, on first hearing, the impression of being a hastily conceived and dispatched opus; moreover, the solo writing is rather less brilliant than the orchestral work, and this is true to such an extent that at times one thinks of the violin as an annoying insect whose sound the orchestra sometimes manages to chase away. Then things happen, for the composer has a way with the orchestra and likes to keep it occupied. Indeed, if one makes a quick inventory of the concerto, one discovers the piece relying almost wholly upon orchestral sonority for its effect. The rhythmical complications seem to be more visual than to exist in the audible fabric of the music; there is very little which is remarkable in the way of melody; and the harmony seems to be carrying out a continuous escape from its own natural consequences. Chordal sequences head straight for sentimental involvement, and then cleverly sneak out through an unexpected exit, leaving the music thwarted for an instant in its sense of destination. It is this harmonic unreliability as much as anything which gives the work its generally fragmentary feeling. And it is the variety of effective instrumentation which by keeping up listening interest gives it whatever illusion of continuity it has.

Throughout the concerto there are passages where the shifting quality of the woodwind accompaniments to the solo instrument make an effect which is quite personal and of considerable interest. At times, Mr. Elman, whose performance lacked the sureness which might possibly have lent direction to the piece, suffered in his intonation in these passages, as if their melting, borderline consonances were too much to fight against successfully.

The piece is not a trip to any particular place, but rather a tour through a landscape which does not seem to change basically as one moves about in it. Along the way, in the pastoral-like second movement, there is the spectacle of a cadenza assisted by a triangle ringing like a telephone, and on the homeward stretch Mr. Martinu, in the manner of his countryman Dvorak, offers a bit of American folk-music. The sudden ending is like the unexpected arrival back at the starting-point of the outing; one is a little dazed, but not in a bad humor.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

JAN 8 - 1944

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

~~Koussevitzky~~ Leads Boston Symphony In Shostakovich First at Academy

Orchestral splendor such as that created by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night is undoubtedly the height of musical performance in our time. While it need not take the Boston Symphony to remind us of that fact, still the orchestra wears its mantle of royal purple so well that each of its concerts inspires comment upon its sumptuous tonal texture so scrupulously tailored for each number on the program. Perhaps attention was again drawn to this aspect of the concert because the works performed ran in the Koussevitzky groove; that is, with the exception of the Shostakovich First Symphony, the program consisted of music of which the conductor is very fond, otherwise he would not turn to it so often.

The Vivaldi Concerto in D Minor, long attributed to members of the Bach family, brought the pleasure of its eighteenth century clarity and the sensuous, rich tone of the Boston strings at the outset of the evening. One of the interesting things about listening to this music was the tendency of the listener familiar with its style to anticipate the composer in following out his ideas to their inevitable conclusion. Such practices are not so readily available in contemporary music. Perhaps that is why newer music may appear less entrancing to the ear.

That Shostakovich has written an outstanding first symphony is the more evident today, almost 19 years after its completion. As the work of a young man of 20, it remains not only a remarkable achievement but a revelation of talent and of promise that we can now appreciate in some of his later work as bearing fruit. With its newness worn off, the score comes through surprisingly strong, an oasis in the desert of musical creation during the 1920s.

This music speaks of so many things: of youth and wonder, of groping and of joyfulness, of longing and of questioning. It has appeal as well as assertiveness, it has mildness as well as boldness, it speaks the language of today with full regard for the training of yesterday, giving utterance to the orchestra in a style expressive of the orchestra's ascendency at the present time. At no place does interest in this music waver. It is sustained throughout. In the unfolding something, too, is felt; perhaps it is the voice of a "brave new world."

Koussevitzky conducted as though he believed that all this and more were true. The orchestra responded with that virtuosity of which it is noted. Performances like this do much for contemporary music.

Of Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," of Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantschina" and of Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol, it is hardly necessary to speak. One noted, however, that the conductor frequently tried for too fine a pianissimo, for too much refinement and for too deliberate pace. There is even more magic in the Debussy and Moussorgsky and more life in the Rimsky-Korsakov than was experienced last night, notable though these performances were.

List of Boxholders At Academy Concert

Box holders at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second Brooklyn concert last night included:

Seated in Box 1 were Mrs. Edward C. Blum and members of the family.

Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, hostess in Box 2, entertained Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Justice L. L. Fawcett, Mrs. Theodore Frohme, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, and Mrs. James Fawcett.

Box 3 was occupied by Mrs. Benjamin Prince and her guests, Dr. and Mrs. John Howland Lathrop, Mr. and Mrs. Miles Kastendieck, Walter Golde, Mrs. Karp P. Mikhalenkoff and Leslie Hodgson.

Members of the Brooklyn Woman's Club were seated in Box 4; Mrs. H. S. Rasi, president, Mrs. Oliver Goldsmith Carter, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. William E. Howes, Mrs. James S. Graham, Mrs. George Hills Iler and Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock.

Seated in Box 5 were Miss Emma Jessie Ogg and her guest, Mrs. John F. Moult, Miss Jessie Lockitt and her guest, Miss Jane Lockitt and Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests.

Tickets for Box 7 were distributed to service men and non-commissioned officers by Lt. L. Wambough, U. S. N. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman.

Tickets for Box 8 were distributed to officers of Fort Hamilton and their guests. This box was also a gift of the Committee.

The third concert of the 1943-1944 series will take place on Feb. 11.

OTTAWA, CANADA
CITIZEN

JAN 8 - 1944

New March of Time Film Music Treat

One of the greatest treats for music lovers in many months is March of Time's latest issue: "Upbeat In Music." Depicting the collective wartime activities of America's best-loved musical personalities, it touches a new high in story-entertainment.

Emphasis is about evenly divided between the various types of music — classical, popular and hot jazz—with outstanding representatives of each school seen and heard in generous samples of their talent. For classicists, there's Serge Koussevitzky, leading the Boston Symphony in some of the finest candid sequences music-lovers could ask for. Marian Anderson's lovely voice, Mischa Elman's violin, Sergeant Eugene List's playing of the Rachmaninoff Concerto in C Minor, add to the mounting total of musical gifts to morale.

On the popular side there's singer Perry Como, heard in an original song. Bea Wain sings a hit parade favorite for the boys overseas. Benny Goodman's band, playing for service men furnishes some of their best all-out rhythm .

MARTINU CONCERTO PLAYED BY ELMAN

Carnegie Hall Audience Also Hears Beethoven 7th by the Boston Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES

A violinist, who in certain qualities is without a rival today, played a new and brilliantly composed concerto at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, on which occasion a performance of one of the most familiar of all symphonies, Beethoven's Seventh, made as much of a sensation as the new concerto, and rightly. Such an arresting symphonic concert is rare, and it is unlikely that any one in the audience which packed the auditorium will forget.

The violinist was Mischa Elman, the concerto the new work which he commissioned last season of Boleslav Martinu. Beethoven's Seventh was given an unforgettable reading by Dr. Koussevitzky.

For good measure the concert began with the Handel Concerto grosso for strings, which Dr. Koussevitzky is fond of playing and has often performed here. He might afford his New York audiences greater variety of repertory if he would expend his peerless orchestra upon fewer repetitions of this kind. The justification of the procedure lies in the performance, in which the strings play with such a warm cantilena and noble sonority. The treat to the ear is such that lesser music would be welcome for this sensuous delight alone. But we pass to more instructive matters.

Concerto a Perfect Fit

Mr. Martinu's concerto is more than a work that a famous virtuoso has ordered from a prominent composer to adorn his repertory. It is as if the composer—to whom as a matter of fact, Mr. Elman before asking him if he would be interested to write him a concerto—had used the violinist's unique qualities in the expounding of a special kind of music for which their presence is indispensable. The result is a concerto which is a perfect fit, and which Mr. Elman plays with a delight as obvious as his mastery.

The first movement is broad and rhapsodic, centering about a single very simple melodic phrase, immediately announced, like a wild call, by the full orchestra. It is music, one would say, for the violin only, and the violin of Elman, and we remember no occasion when more glorious tone flooded from his bow, or he played with greater breadth, fire and mastery.

The slow movement is more directly in the way of folk-song, with a contrasting part which suggests the telescoping together of the slow movement and the scherzo idea. It includes an oddly accompanied cadenza toward the end, the triangle supplying the pulsatile background for the monologue of the solo instrument. The final is gypsy, and rondo-like, with fascinating rhythmical complications and crossings of rhythms with the orchestra. To a violinist of lesser powers it would be forbiddingly difficult, but it is always practicable and, despite quite elaborate orchestration, the tonal balance is maintained and the conclusion is very exciting.

Short-Breathed Ideas

True, the ideas are short-breathed, remarkably as they are treated, and their development highly sophisticated. But there was Mr. Elman's song to supply melodic line, and he had the old inimitable sonority. When he is in such form there is no violinist like him. Right warmly was he welcomed into his own. At the end the audience was repeatedly calling back to the stage the violinist, the composer, and the conductor, whose remarkable accompaniment had been part of this triumph.

Of Beethoven's symphony, so well known, there is not so much to say as far as description of the score is concerned. Nor is it easy to dilate in detail upon an interpretation in no respect more wonderful than in its absolute directness, virility, selflessness, elevation. No one thought of a virtuoso conductor and orchestra, save as these conveyed endless beauty, and communicated the endless life of the music, and the prodigal richness of the developments and grandeur of the thought. One was aware only of the gigantic Beethoven, of music as clean and glorious as nature, and as greatly ordered, with as much fecundity.

The symphony was played with all the repeats in the scherzo and the uproarious, earth-shaking laughter of the conclusion. There were no fancy touches, no superfluous effects, and this mighty simplicity, this hymn to the sun and the skies, stirred the audience to its depths. Who would have said in these days of sensations that an experienced modern audience would make last night's demonstration over the 100,000th performance of Beethoven's Seventh symphony? Who? Only those to whom it may have been vouchsafed to realize the marvel of this timeless work of art, or who had its secret revealed as last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

JAN 9 - 1944

Not Money But Pride Repays Composer for 6 Years of Toil

By HARRY VANDERNOOT
United Press Staff Correspondent

BOSTON—Six years of sweat, toil and tears are compensated by 25 minutes of a sense of tremendous achievement.

At least,, that's the way composer Gardner Read of Kansas City, Mo., felt about the premier performance of his Second Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 30-year-old Read, who directed the playing of the piece on invitation of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, received not one penny for his composition. But the thrill and pride of creation was as great for him as for the Russian Shostakovich who will receive $10,000 shortly when the Columbia Broadcasting System broadcasts his new symphony.

"The average layman see a composer struck with an idea, rush to his piano and write a symhpony in a few hours," said Read. "It isn't that way at all."

After the composition has been sweated into form—and this sometimes takes years—the poor composer must transcribe it with pen and ink, Read said. He said it took him two hours to transcribe each page for just the conductor's score. His symphony runs 110 pages in manuscript.

Read said there are more than 50,000 separate notes in his latest work and these must be transcribed by painstaking handwork on the 110-page conductors score. Then, each of the 100-odd instruments of the Boston orchestra must have its own part from which to play.

"If I were wealthy," said Read, "I could hire copyists for this work. But it would stand me about $400 and then I get nothing, or very little, for a performance. As it is, materials for the various scores cost the composer about $100."

Speaking of money for symphonic composers, Read said that not a single American makes enough to live on from his own performed works. He named Roy Harris, Aaron Copland, William Schuman, Howard Hanson, Samuel Barber and Walton Piston, all of whom have to teach and cultivate other activities to earn a living. Read teaches at the Kansas City Conservatory of Music.

Shostakovich, he said, is the only contemporary composer who "hit the jackpot" and makes real money from his pieces. "And it took the siege of Leningrad to do that for him," Readed added.

Read started his Second Symphony six years ago and earlier this year it was awarded the Paderewski fund prize of $1,000 for the best unperformed American work presented this year.

A native of Evanston, Ill., Read has had his pieces performed by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis and Rochester symphony orchestras.

~~Fadiman's Busy~~ As War Worker

Clifton Fadiman, whose intimate and eloquent style of delivery has made him one of the most popular commentators on the air, is also one of the busiest war workers in the industry.

Between his chores as commentator for the Boston Symphony Orchestra over ~~the Blue~~ Network (every Saturday from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m.) and his "Information Please" broadcasts, Fadiman devotes much of his time to the Writers' War Board, and makes cross-country hops to officiate at various government drives.

On February 1, 2 and 3 he will make a mid-western tour for the United States Treasury Department. Fadiman was literary critic of the New Yorker Magazine for 11 years, and has several books to his credit.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

9 1944

Fadiman and Symphony

The principal added feature the Boston Symphony is offering ~~this season~~ is a chorus of coughs. The chorus is apparently made up of the players themselves and all during the program they cough, sneeze and hawk as they please. No suppressing coughs until some percussion explosion occurs in the music. Comfort's the keyword. The boys just cough as they go.

Another feature of the broadcasts is the practice of having Clifton Fadiman deliver a nice moral lecture during an intermission. Last week in a voice like Eddie Cantor uses when he talks about mother, Mr. F. discoursed on nazis. He sounded as if he was addressing a bunch of backward children.

Plenty of Free Advice

Just what the nazis have done to Mr. F. that he should be fuming against them more than anybody else isn't quite clear, but he seems to be copying the saloon editors on Broadway. Winchell, of course, is always shouting against the nazis as if nobody in this country hated them but him.

[44]

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

JAN 9 - 1944

Intense Competition Awaits London Symphony in America

By JOHN SELBY

New York —(AP)— The London Philharmonic Orchestra, scheduled to tour Canada and America next fall, will meet the stiffest competition in the world.

This country is generally conceded to have the three finest symphonic bodies in existence—the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston group has been said to produce "the most beautiful sound in the world," and up to the present the war has harmed none of the three.

But the London Philharmonic, which Sir Godfrey Thomas Beecham is to direct on a tour including Canada and the most important American cities as far west as Kansas City, has had a difficult time since 1939. It has been bombed, individually and collectively, and its ranks have been decimated by war.

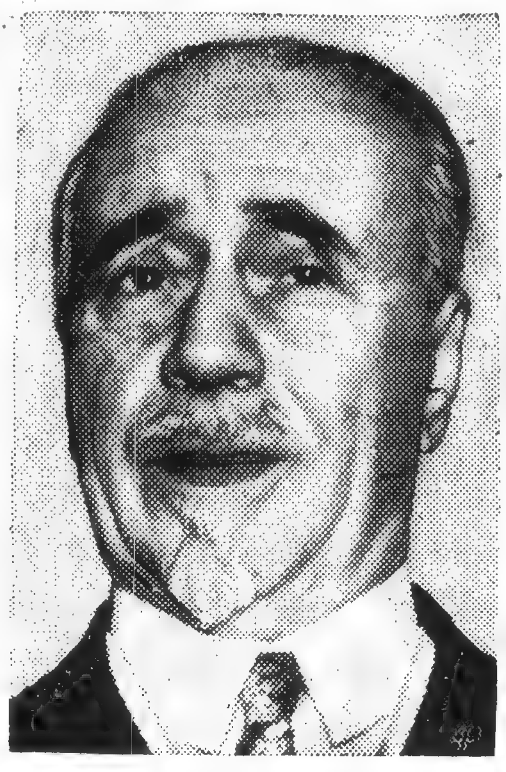
In 1940 it was taken over by its members, after its founder (Sir Thomas) transferred his conducting activities to America. It was not the first London orchestra to go co-operative—the London Symphony has been in the hands of its members for nearly 40 years. But if the Philharmonic it still operating under the plan, it will be the first ranking symphony of its kind America ever has heard.

The British government will provide passage to America, according to Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, who is president of the National Association for American Composers and Conductors.

Once in America, Sir Thomas' 92 men will be booked, for the most part, through organizations sponsoring American symphonies. Sir Thomas plans to keep the tour spare — the Philharmonic will make all its jumps in day coaches and will interfere as little as possible with the war effort.

"America has not heard a British orchestra in more than 30 years," Dr. Spaeth remarks, "and the tour will become a demonstration of how well England has been able to carry on muscially in spite of the most drastic conditions.

"In addition Sir Thomas plans to play a good deal of American music on the tour, which will naturally please the National Association for American Composers and Conductors."



SIR THOMAS BEECHAM

HARTFORD, CONN.
~~COURANT~~
Times

JAN 13 1944

For some time I have observed that Mr. Lindstrom tends to lean toward the safe side. No one can dispute the superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or the adequacy of Mr. Koussevitzky as its conductor. A perfectly safe bet for the critic to let his cascade of black velvet and gold adjectives flow delightfully. The newer school of the National Symphony proved an even more interesting target for the fine flow of his rhetorical ridicule.

The critic's comment was that to Conductor Kindler Prokofieff's symphony was just "notes." Mr. Lindstrom didn't even concede that they were memorized notes blown upon by the spirit of a man who had taken upon himself the task of interpretation.

My bone of contention with the music critic of The Times is that having an opportunity to look forward and recognize the potentialities of future giants of music, he is unable to do anything but look backward and base his opinions on old, established and safe forms.

MUSIC LOVER.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA REPEATS CONCERTO

Elman Again Soloist in Violin Work of Martinu—Brahms' Second Also on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave its second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the impression deepened of the entirely unique quality of the orchestra and the continually growing art of the conductor.

Of the Martinu violin concerto as such, which Mr. Elman, as soloist, repeated on this occasion much was said in these columns, following the New York première of two nights previous. The writer believes this work to be a valuable addition to the very small number of violin concertos which are significant to modern audiences.

This impression was emphasized by Mr. Elman's repeated performance, so masterly in point not only of performance but of musicianship and insight that one wonders how such a difficult and individual score will fare with lesser interpreters of the future. But this question has another aspect which brings us back to the principal matter of the present report —back to the orchestra and the conductor.

Performance of Work

The concerto requires for adequate presentation an orchestral performance that follows if it does not equal the one provided by Dr. Koussevitzky. This element of the interpretations was in itself a monument to the musician's art. At the same time it so unified all participating agencies that the soloist, the conductor and every member of the orchestra in thought and deed were one.

And this was only congruous with the prevailing character of both the memorable concerts Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has molded have given within a week in this city. One had thought that the orchestra had not very much room for improvement. Well, either the fresh impression of its sonority has unduly altered the perspective, or it is in fact an orchestra yet finer this season than last. And not only this, for the orchestra's style, and above all the ideal characters of its tone, make the luminous garment of the conductor's thinking.

Brahms Symphony Heard

One thinks of this especially in association with the final performance yesterday of the Brahms Second symphony — an achievement only possible to a man born with genius in the culminating years of a most industrious and artistically intense lifetime.

The entire conception, indeed, transported the listener into another sphere. It would be an indulgence to discuss it movement by movement, but for a reader who was not there this would be excessive and for those who heard it in some degree superfluous. But there was the sense, for those present, of the summation of long centuries of human experience and dauntless effort which at last had produced that symphony, the selfless evocation of a beauty so evolved and alembicated, the whole revealed by a high priest who reverently and

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 9 - 1944

Works of Beethoven, Satie, Roussel and Ravel on Program.—Grace Moore to Be Heard Here in "La Tosca"

VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN
Paris-born and trained

VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra since 1931, will make the first of three appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at its next concert in the Metropolitan Theatre here Tuesday evening, Jan. 18. In this he follows other eminent musicians, among them Mitropoulos, DeFauw and Stravinsky, who made their bows with the Bostonians in this city.

Golschmann has long been noted as a champion of modern composers, as well as a classicist of the first order. The program he has selected for the concert here is characteristic, as it includes works by Beethoven, Satie, Roussel and Ravel. He first came to this country in 1924 as guest conductor of the New York Symphony, then led by Walter Damrosch.

Studied Piano and Violin

Born in Paris of Russian parents in 1893, Golschmann's musical education and early fame were wholly French. He first studied piano with Paul de Saunieres and then violin with Henri Berthelier. One of his first jobs was as violinist in a small Paris orchestra that included Iturbi and Thibaud.

Through a patron he was able to establish an orchestra of his own, founding the "Concerts Golschmann" in 1919. He was a prime mover in introducing the works of the famous "Six" and other modern composers, his programs usually being balanced with something from the classics. Among his orchestral achievements in Paris were Ravel and Stravinsky festivals,

He was also guest conductor of orchestras in Brussels, Oslo, Madrid and Edinburgh. As guest of the Scotch orchestra he followed, a generation later, Sir George Henschel, the Boston Symphony's first conductor. The Diaghileff and Pavlowa ballets are other organizations he has led. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Suite in F-major, Op. 33, by Roussel; Two "Gymnopedies" by Satie, orchestrated by Debussy, and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody are the works announced for his Providence concert.

Moore as "La Tosca"

Heard here in a Providence Community Concert Association recital in 1939, Grace Moore will return to make her local bow in grand opera in the title role of Puccini's "La Tosca," which the Connecticut Opera Association will stage at the Metropolitan Theatre Thursday evening, Jan. 20.

Radio fans have heard her often. She was one of the first grand opera songbirds to invade Hollywood successfully. She starred in "One Night of Love" and several other pictures, including "Love Me Forever," "The King Steps Out," "When You're in Love" and "I'll take Romance." Miss Moore is said to have left Hollywood rather disgusted at being treated like a vocal machine and having to milk a cow in one of her pictures.

For her performance in "One Night of Love," in 1935, Miss Moore received the distinguished service award of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences along with such regulars as Clark Gable, Norma Shearer, William Powell and Frank Morgan. "One Night of Love" came a few years after a couple of less successful cinematic attempts via "A Lady's Morals," a story of Jenny Lind, and "New Moon," with Lawrence Tibbett.

Metropolitan Opera Was Goal

Miss Moore was born in Tennessee and is said to have aimed early for the life of a missionary. However, a Mary Garden recital changed all that and Miss Moore resolved to be a singer. Later on Miss Garden was to coach her in the roles of "Louise" and "Manon."

But before that happy collaboration the future Met soprano left home to pursue a career that landed her first in a Greenwich Village cafe. She later got a job as understudy to Julia Sanderson and then blossomed as prima donna in an Irving Berlin "Music Box" Revue. All the time the Metropolitan Opera was her goal and she worked for it both in this country and abroad.

Her initial auditions were fruitful of nothing more than advice to keep on studying and come back later. Hearing something like that from Chairman Otto Kahn she bet him a hundred dollars that she would be at the Met within two years and she barely got in under the ropes with her debut as Mimi, in "Boheme," Feb. 8, 1928. The debut was a triumph.

Her favorite role is said to be Louise in the Charpentier opera of that title, which she studied with the composer himself and sang in Paris. The opera has been revived for her at the Met. She also studied with Montemezzi for his "Love of Three Kings" and has appeared in that opera under his conductorship in New York. For her appearances abroad she has been decorated by Kings Christian of Denmark, Gustav of Sweden and Haakon of Norway. She won further royal notice by curtseying once to the Duchess of Windsor.

◆ ◆ ◆

Hour of Music

As a tribute to the women in the armed services of the United States, the Monday Morning Musical Club will present an hour of music, free to the public, in the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design, this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock.

Appearing on the program is a quartet composed of Gertrude Joseffy Chase, piano; Ruth Moulton, violin; Martha McNay, viola; Louise Waterman, 'cello; A. Virginia Shepard, soprano, accompanied by Dorothy Holmes Sperry; Constance Perry, harpist, and Dorothy Horan, contralto, accompanied by Beatrice Warden Roberts. The program:

Quartet:
Quartet, Op. 26 (first and second movements)	Brahms
Soprano:
"Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre"	Handel
"Serenade"	Schubert
"Sylvelin"	Sinding
"Homing"	De Riego
"The Little Damozel"	Novello
Harp:
Prelude	Handel
Giga	Corelli
"The First Waltz"	Durand
"Cradle Song"	Brahms
Contralto:
"Albatross"	Kricka
"Quelle Souffrance"	Lenormand
Gavotte	Thomas
"Sweet Chance That Led My Steps Abroad"	Head
"It Is Morning Again	Cadman

◆ ◆ ◆

Albion Metcalf will give an analysis of Sonata, Op. 12, No. 2, by Beethoven, at a meeting of the Schubert Club tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, in the Mary C. Wheeler School, 216 Hope street.

◆ ◆ ◆

The East Providence Music Lovers' Club will hold its monthly meeting this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock in the Weaver Memorial Library. The program will be given by Elsie Holmberg, contralto, accompanied by Elizabeth Budlong Albers; Isabel Madden, pianist, and Doris Miriam Skipp, soprano, accompanied by Irene Mason Peckham.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1944

Stravinsky to Be Guest Conductor

Igor Stravinsky is journeying from his home in Hollywood to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest this week. He will conduct three concerts, presenting the same program for each, at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Thursday, and in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

The program will include two numbers which are to have their first performances, a suite entitled "Four Norwegian Moods" and the "Circus Polka," which he has reorchestrated from the dance which he wrote for Ringling Brothers and Barnum and Bailey. Both of these scores were composed in 1942. The "Norwegian Moods" consists of a suite in four movements entitled "Intrada," "Song," "Wedding Dance" and "Cortege."

Mr. Stravinsky will open his program with a Suite from his Ballet "Pulcinella," based on music of Pergolesi, early 18 Century composer. It will also include "Card Game, a Ballet in Three Deals," and the Symphony in C.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1944

Mischa Elman Is Heard In the Martinu Concerto

By GRENA BENNETT

When a famous violinist and an esteemed composer are partnered in publicizing a new score, it is news in the world of music. And that is what happened at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall when Mischa Elman played the solo part in Martinu's Concerto, which was recently written at the request of the violinist.

Mr. Elman's great qualities as a musician and an interpreter were evidently considered by Mr. Martinu in fabricating his latest score, and in adjusting his melodic and idiomatic invention to the magnificent talent of the soloist, he succeeded in creating a work in which are blended contemplation and majesty, with music at times haunting and, at others, capricious.

In his long service before the public, Mr. Elman has not given a more artistic exhibition of his gifts than in the Martinu Concerto. That his tonal quality was of ravishing richness and color, goes without saying, for those attractive details have ever been among the notable facets of Elman's art.

INSPIRED PERFORMANCE.

But more than that there is, and was yesterday, a disclosure of the intelligent imparting of the significance of the music in his reading; the symmetrical contour of each phrase and measure; the imaginative and alluring rhythms in pages where the elemental charm of folktunes lent influence. Mr. Elman's performance was that of an inspired and magnificently equipped virtuoso, a master musician whose rewarding interpretation was accorded a deserved ovation. The orchestral support was ably and effectively conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program began with Bach's D major Concerto for stringed orchestra and was concluded with Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

"Lucia," with Lily Pons as the bright particular singing star, was yesterday afternoon's bill at the Metropolitan. The audience completely filled the opera house, and the applause that interrupted the soprano's brilliant singing of the Mad Scene stopped the action of the opera for a considerable period.

UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

JAN 9 - 1944

Intense Competition Awaits London Symphony in America

By JOHN SELBY

New York —(AP)— The London Philharmonic Orchestra, scheduled to tour Canada and America next fall, will meet the stiffest competition in the world.

This country is generally conceded to have the three finest symphonic bodies in existence—the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society. Serge Koussevitzky's Boston group has been said to produce "the most beautiful sound in the world," and up to the present the war has harmed none of the three.

But the London Philharmonic, which Sir Godfrey Thomas Beecham is to direct on a tour including Canada and the most important American cities as far west as Kansas City, has had a difficult time since 1939. It has been bombed, individually and collectively, and its ranks have been decimated by war.

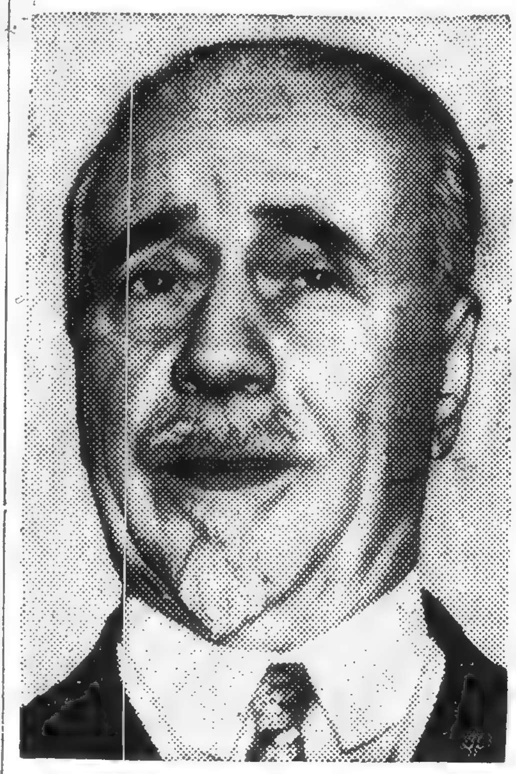
In 1940 it was taken over by its members, after its founder (Sir Thomas) transferred his conducting activities to America. It was not the first London orchestra to go co-operative—the London Symphony has been in the hands of its members for nearly 40 years. But if the Philharmonic it still operating under the plan, it will be the first ranking symphony of its kind America ever has heard.

The British government will provide passage to America, according to Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, who is president of the National Association for American Composers and Conductors.

Once in America, Sir Thomas' 92 men will be booked, for the most part, through organizations sponsoring American symphonies. Sir Thomas plans to keep the tour spare — the Philharmonic will make all its jumps in day coaches and will interfere as little as possible with the war effort.

"America has not heard a British orchestra in more than 30 years," Dr. Spaeth remarks, "and the tour will become a demonstration of how well England has been able to carry on muscially in spite of the most drastic conditions.

"In addition Sir Thomas plans to play a good deal of American music on the tour, which will naturally please the National Association for American Composers and Conductors."



SIR THOMAS BEECHAM

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA REPEATS CONCERTO

Elman Again Soloist in Violin Work of Martinu—Brahms' Second Also on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, gave its second concert of the week yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, the impression deepened of the entirely unique quality of the orchestra and the continually growing art of the conductor.

Of the Martinu violin concerto as such, which Mr. Elman, as soloist, repeated on this occasion much was said in these columns, following the New York première of two nights previous. The writer believes this work to be a valuable addition to the very small number of violin concertos which are significant to modern audiences.

This impression was emphasized by Mr. Elman's repeated performance, so masterly in point not only of performance but of musicianship and insight that one wonders how such a difficult and individual score will fare with lesser interpreters of the future. But this question has another aspect which brings us back to the principal matter of the present report —back to the orchestra and the conductor.

Performance of Work

The concerto requires for adequate presentation an orchestral performance that follows if it does not equal the one provided by Dr. Koussevitzky. This element of the interpretations was in itself a monument to the musician's art. At the same time it so unified all participating agencies that the soloist, the conductor and every member of the orchestra in thought and deed were one.

And this was only congruous with the prevailing character of both the memorable concerts Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has molded have given within a week in this city. One had thought that the orchestra had not very much room for improvement. Well, either the fresh impression of its sonority has unduly altered the perspective, or it is in fact an orchestra yet finer this season than last. And not only this, for the orchestra's style, and above all the ideal characters of its tone, make the luminous garment of the conductor's thinking.

Brahms Symphony Heard

One thinks of this especially in association with the final performance yesterday of the Brahms Second symphony — an achievement only possible to a man born with genius in the culminating years of a most industrious and artistically intense lifetime.

The entire conception, indeed, transported the listener into another sphere. It would be an indulgence to discuss it movement by movement, but for a reader who was not there this would be excessive and for those who heard it in some degree superfluous. But there was the sense, for those present, of the summation of long centuries of human experience and dauntless effort which at last had produced that symphony, the selfless evocation of a beauty so evolved and alembicated, the whole revealed by a high priest who reverently and

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
~~COURANT~~
Times

JAN 13 1944

For some time I have observed that Mr. Lindstrom tends to lean toward the safe side. No one can dispute the superiority of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or the adequacy of Mr. Koussevitzky as its conductor. A perfectly safe bet for the critic to let his cascade of black velvet and gold adjectives flow delightfully. The newer school of the National Symphony proved an even more interesting target for the fine flow of his rhetorical ridicule.

The critic's comment was that to Conductor Kindler Prokofieff's symphony was just "notes." Mr. Lindstrom didn't even concede that they were memorized notes blown upon by the spirit of a man who had taken upon himself the task of interpretation.

My bone of contention with the music critic of The Times is that having an opportunity to look forward and recognize the potentialities of future giants of music, he is unable to do anything but look backward and base his opinions on old, established and safe forms.

MUSIC LOVER.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 9 - 1944

Works of Beethoven, Satie, Roussel and Ravel on Program.—Grace Moore to Be Heard Here in "La Tosca"

VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra since 1931, will make the first of three appearances as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony at its next concert in the Metropolitan Theatre here Tuesday evening, Jan. 18. In this he follows other eminent musicians, among them Mitropoulos, DeFauw and Stravinsky, who made their bows with the Bostonians in this city.

Golschmann has long been noted as a champion of modern composers, as well as a classicist of the first order. The program he has selected for the concert here is characteristic, as it includes works by Beethoven, Satie, Roussel and Ravel. He first came to this country in 1924 as guest conductor of the New York Symphony, then led by Walter Damrosch.

Studied Piano and Violin

Born in Paris of Russian parents in 1893, Golschmann's musical education and early fame were wholly French. He first studied piano with Paul de Saunieres and then violin with Henri Berthelier. One of his first jobs was as violinist in a small Paris orchestra that included Iturbi and Thibaud.

Through a patron he was able to establish an orchestra of his own, founding the "Concerts Golschmann" in 1919. He was a prime mover in introducing the works of the famous "Six" and other modern composers, his programs usually being balanced with something from the classics. Among his orchestral achievements in Paris were Ravel and Stravinsky festivals.

He was also guest conductor of orchestras in Brussels, Oslo, Madrid and Edinburgh. As guest of the Scotch orchestra he followed, a generation later, Sir George Henschel, the Boston Symphony's first conductor. The Diaghileff and Pavlowa ballets are other organizations he has led. Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Suite in F-major, Op. 33, by Roussel; Two "Gymnopedies" by Satie, orchestrated by Debussy, and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody are the works announced for his Providence concert.

Moore as "La Tosca"

Heard here in a Providence Community Concert Association recital in 1939, Grace Moore will return to make her local bow in grand opera in the title role of Puccini's "La Tosca," which the Connecticut Opera Association will stage at the Metropolitan Theatre Thursday evening, Jan. 20.

Radio fans have heard her often. She was one of the first grand opera songbirds to invade Hollywood successfully. She starred in "One Night of Love" and several other pictures, including "Love Me Forever," "The King Steps Out," "When You're in Love" and "I'll take Romance." Miss Moore is said to have left Hollywood rather disgusted at being treated like a vocal machine and having to milk a cow in one of her pictures.

For her performance in "One Night of Love," in 1935, Miss Moore received the distinguished service award of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences along with such regulars as Clark Gable, Norma Shearer, William Powell and Frank Morgan. "One Night of Love" came a few years after a couple of less successful cinematic attempts via "A Lady's Morals," a story of Jenny Lind, and "New Moon," with Lawrence Tibbett.

Metropolitan Opera Was Goal

Miss Moore was born in Tennessee and is said to have aimed early for the life of a missionary. However, a Mary Garden recital changed all that and Miss Moore resolved to be a singer. Later on Miss Garden was to coach her in the roles of "Louise" and "Manon."

But before that happy collaboration the future Met soprano left home to pursue a career that landed her first in a Greenwich Village cafe. She later got a job as understudy to Julia Sanderson and then blossomed as prima donna in an Irving Berlin "Music Box" Revue. All the time the Metropolitan Opera was her goal and she worked for it both in this country and abroad.

Her initial auditions were fruitful of nothing more than advice to keep on studying and come back later. Hearing something like that from Chairman Otto Kahn she bet him a hundred dollars that she would be at the Met within two years and she barely got in under the ropes with her debut as Mimi, in "Boheme," Feb. 8, 1928. The debut was a triumph.

Her favorite role is said to be Louise in the Charpentier opera of that title, which she studied with the composer himself and sang in Paris. The opera has been revived for her at the Met. She also studied with Montemezzi for his "Love of Three Kings" and has appeared in that opera under his conductorship in New York. For her appearances abroad she has been decorated by Kings Christian of Denmark, Gustav of Sweden and Haakon of Norway. She won further royal notice by curtseying once to the Duchess of Windsor.

◆ ◆ ◆

Hour of Music

As a tribute to the women in the armed services of the United States, the Monday Morning Musical Club will present an hour of music, free to the public, in the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design, this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock.

Appearing on the program is a quartet composed of Gertrude Joseffy Chase, piano; Ruth Moulton, violin; Martha McNay, viola; Louise Waterman, 'cello; A. Virginia Sheppard, soprano, accompanied by Dorothy Holmes Sperry; Constance Perry, harpist, and Dorothy Horan, contralto, accompanied by Beatrice Warden Roberts. The program:

Quartet:
Quartet, Op. 26 (first and second movements)	Brahms
Soprano:
"Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre"	Handel
"Serenade"	Schubert
"Sylvelin"	Sinding
"Homing"	De Riego
"The Little Damozel"	Novello
Harp:
Prelude	Handel
Giga	Corelli
"The First Waltz"	Durand
"Cradle Song"	Brahms
Contralto:
"Albatross"	Kricka
"Quelle Souffrance"	Lenormand
Gavotte	Thomas
"Sweet Chance That Led My Steps Abroad"	Head
"It Is Morning Again	Cadman

◆ ◆ ◆

Albion Metcalf will give an analysis of Sonata, Op. 12, No. 2, by Beethoven, at a meeting of the Schubert Club tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock, in the Mary C. Wheeler School, 216 Hope street.

◆ ◆ ◆

The East Providence Music Lovers' Club will hold its monthly meeting this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock in the Weaver Memorial Library. The program will be given by Elsie Holmberg, contralto, accompanied by Elizabeth Budlong Albers; Isabel Madden, pianist, and Doris Miriam Skipp, soprano, accompanied by Irene Mason Peckham.

VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN
Paris-born and trained

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 9 - 1944

Stravinsky to Be Guest Conductor

Igor Stravinsky is journeying from his home in Hollywood to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest this week. He will conduct three concerts, presenting the same program for each, at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Thursday, and in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

The program will include two numbers which are to have their first performances, a suite entitled "Four Norwegian Moods" and the "Circus Polka," which he has reorchestrated from the dance which he wrote for Ringling Brothers and Barnum and Bailey. Both of these scores were composed in 1942. The "Norwegian Moods" consists of a suite in four movements entitled "Intrada," "Song," "Wedding Dance" and "Cortege."

Mr. Stravinsky will open his program with a Suite from his Ballet "Pulcinella," based on music of Pergolesi, early 18 Century composer. It will also include "Card Game, a Ballet in Three Deals," and the Symphony in C.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 9 - 1944

Mischa Elman Is Heard In the Martinu Concerto

By GRENA BENNETT

When a famous violinist and an esteemed composer are partnered in publicizing a new score, it is news in the world of music. And that is what happened at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall when Mischa Elman played the solo part in Martinu's Concerto, which was recently written at the request of the violinist.

Mr. Elman's great qualities as a musician and an interpreter were evidently considered by Mr. Martinu in fabricating his latest score, and in adjusting his melodic and idiomatic invention to the magnificent talent of the soloist, he succeeded in creating a work in which are blended contemplation and majesty, with music at times haunting and, at others, capricious.

In his long service before the public, Mr. Elman has not given a more artistic exhibition of his gifts than in the Martinu Concerto. That his tonal quality was of ravishing richness and color, goes without saying, for those attractive details have ever been among the notable facets of Elman's art.

INSPIRED PERFORMANCE.

But more than that there is, and was yesterday, a disclosure of the intelligent imparting of the significance of the music in his reading; the symmetrical contour of each phrase and measure; the imaginative and alluring rhythms in pages where the elemental charm of folktunes lent influence. Mr. Elman's performance was that of an inspired and magnificently equipped virtuoso, a master musician whose rewarding interpretation was accorded a deserved ovation. The orchestral support was ably and effectively conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program began with Bach's D major Concerto for stringed orchestra and was concluded with Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

"Lucia," with Lily Pons as the bright particular singing star, was yesterday afternoon's bill at the Metropolitan. The audience completely filled the opera house, and the applause that interrupted the soprano's brilliant singing of the Mad Scene stopped the action of the opera for a considerable period.

Hold That Tongue, or, Silence Is Still Golden

Jan 9 Her

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is evident, from the letters on the subject, that Martinu's Violin Concerto unleashed, with its performance, more really heated controversy among its first hearers than any other new work the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played this year.

The reason is not too obscure at that, for it was—and is— a difficult composition to understand and thus to like at first hearing, and the chancse are it will remain difficult for some time to come. Aside from the musical pros and contras of the matter, however, most of the letters contained a very curious reaction. Nearly all of them condemned—and violently—the composer's own printed remarks about his composition.

In view of the fact that composers throughout history have been notable for their volubility about their own and everyone'else's music, in view of the further fact that contemporary composers practically inundate program annotators with remarkably effusive discussions of their own works, and in view of the final fact that up to now nobody has really taken issue with the practice, it seems odd that Martinu's remarks, wihch were about as moderate as any, should infuriate so many people and actually stand in the way of their enjoyment of the concerto.

A closer study of Martinu's program notes, however, does indeed reveal an indiscretion that all other contemporary composers would be well advised to avoid in the future. For Martinu made the very grave error of implying that he had built his violin concerto brick by brick as though he were constructing a garage; of implying that a violin concerto was nothing more or less than a problem in trigonometry, to be solved step by step with the assistance of a slide rule, 11 reams of good white paper and a very strong pot of coffee at hand. This, to the average music lover, his head in the clouds of over-romanticized creative methods, is a negation of the artistic principle of pure, triple-distilled inspiration, and he will have none of it, even if the composer's music really sounds both good and important.

Unwittingly, Martinu, in an effort to state his case to the best of his ability, trompled on one of the public's tenderest toes. It has long felt—and frequently with considerable justification—that the composer of today is basically a mechanic who has a prodigious stock of musical nuts and bolts but with nothing, really, to screw them onto. Once in a while a composition seemingly brimming over with "inspiration" comes along and much is made of it. In general, though (according to the public), modern music is turned out like a battleship from Henry Kaiser's shipyard. And when Martinu, who commands as much respect as any composer living, comes out and implies that he approached the writing of his violin concerto for Mr. Elman as Mr. Kaiser would approach his plans for a battleship, the public is likely to—and in this case did—add, "and that's just what it sounded like."

This is most unfortunate, for actually Mr. Martinu never really came to grips in his article with any "problem" whatever. The reader is no better informed on Martinu's intentions after he reads the article than he was before. Martinu starts out by saying that there are several types of violin concerto. There is the one which exploits beauty of tone against an orchestral background, as in Mozart. There is another which exploits the professional aspect of the instrument without much musical originality, as in Wieinawski. There is another which exploits the orchestra while supplying a violin solo, as in Walton. And finally, there is another which exploits both orchestra and soloist as an artistic unity, as in Beethoven. Well and good.

He then talks about the difference between a piano and a violin as concerto instruments, about the difference between one violin and several violins in the projection of a given melody, and about the difference between absolute and expressive music. And there he drops the whole matter like a hot oil burner, saying that "misunderstanding so often arises from the confusion of words." Thus he never does state the "question" which filled his thoughts as he wrote the concerto. The implication, however, is clearly that the whole thing was a problem in musical composition, a fact which plainly disturbed a great many people in the first place, and all his modesty in saying that he didn't presume to have solved the problem could not save him from another section of the public agreeing with him that he hadn't, even if they were as vague about the exact nature of his problem as he was.

The lesson in all this is for composers to let their music speak for them. If they want to write about their problems after performance, all right, but not before. Words only add to the confusion by offering a challenge to the public.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

JAN 10 1944

CRITICAL and

—Simon—

MUSICA

Saturday, Jan. 8—At Carnegie Hall in the afternoon Mischa Elman played the new Martinu Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, a portion of which I had heard broadcast from Boston during its premiere a week ago. Like the composer's Second Symphony—also new this year—it uses folk-like melodies more than his other recent works, and it experiments entertainingly if not always quite successfully with rhythms and orchestral colorings. The melodies were particularly effective in the slow second movement, but a cadenza played with the accompaniment of an insistent triangle sounded like a stunt with no particular reason. In the brilliant finale, the orchestra became so full of different sounds, that the solo part was almost lost despite the big Elman tone. Yet there is a great deal of good writing for the solo instrument, particularly in the meditative parts of the first movement, and the whole hangs clearly together. I haven't heard Elman play so well in years. He has only recently begun to play anything later than 19th century music. For a man who has concertized conservatively for I don't know how many decades to begin now to discover his contemporaries is a fine indication of musical vitality. Certainly that vitality was in evidence today.

[46]

By and With Stravinsky—

Monitor Jan 13 '44'

Composer to Lead Symphony In Program of His Own Works

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Distinguished composers have to wait a spell, in some instances, for their music to be performed; and Igor Stravinsky, who takes the place of Serge Koussevitzky in the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week stands as an example. A couple of exircises of his, "Norwegian Moods" and "Circus Polka," bearing date on the manuscripts of the year 1942 are just coming into performance, and then under his own rehearsing and conducting.

That is a happy chance all round, too; for it allows Dr. Koussevitzky a holiday, it lets Mr. Stravinsky set the general lines of presentation—speed, balance, shading, and what not—and it gives the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening audiences the pleasure of influencing interpretation and of helping to found tradition.

Whatever may have turned Mr. Stravinsky's thought to Norway a couple of years ago, whether the consequences of invasion, or some casual folklore interest, here we are with an orchestral title—a "program," as reviewers used to like to call it—and listeners must make the music explain. To take a look at the written score before listening, here we have a small, thin clump of pages set into covers, very unpretending and carrying slight mark indeed of being advanced and modern.

* * *

The "Moods" count up to four. They comprise Intrada (what does that stage term of southern origin have to do with the case?), Song (very acknowledgeably, they sing in Norway), Wedding Dance (they dance also), and Cortège (theatrical implications again).

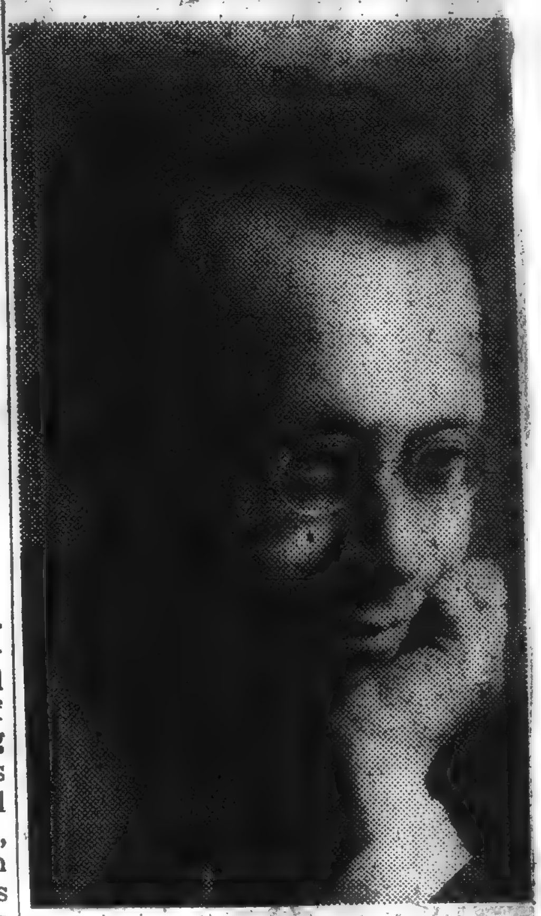
The whole matter wears a semblance of the ballet, Mr. Stravinsky returning, perhaps, to his early line of composing. Classicist though he has become by mature choice, he cannot but glance back occasionally on the days of his association with Diaghileff and the Imperial Russian choregraphers. He will once more express the grace and the volatility of pantomime, all in symphonic freedom, with short tune, large tune, one instrument imitating the melody of another, clarinets and bassoons striking up a variation on this theme or that; and with woods, horns, and drums going into various dynamic, one group light of voice and another loud.

Writing the Intrada, the composer displays some of the devices he has learned in his experience with small chamber orchestra. He shows respect, at the same time, for tonality. In the second movement, Song, he fetches forth the English horn, of course. Since Sibelius and the "Swan of Tuonela," the strident tone of that solo element of symphonic sonority has represented the North, as the liquid tone of the flute, ever since Debussy and the "Faun," has represented the South.

* * *

In the Wedding Dance, Mr. Stravinsky calls on the full orchestra for some bright and sparkling effects. For purposes of jollity, he wants the high piping of the piccolo here. He makes shifts of tonality, but they are real shifts and not jumbles. Finally, in Cortège, he slows down with a smooth and solemn air for oboes and bassoons; and here his music gets into a mood, certainly, whether or not recognizably Norwegian.

Mr. Stravinsky's second novelty, "Circus Polka," has the appearance in the score of a piece of popular music. To describe this appearance is not easy, possibly because it is imaginary. But a dull work almost always proclaims its dullness in the show of the page, and a bright one its brightness. No gloom on the countenance of the "Polka," musicians who make acquaintance will in all likelihood wish to stay on terms of familiarity. Eager listening seems to be in store for the main part of the piece, Grazioso, and applause promises for the marche-militaire-like finale.



Rudolf Serkin

Who will give a piano recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD

JAN 14 1944

Symphony to Play "Pachyderm Polka"

Boston, Jan. 14 (UP) — A Boston symphony orchestra ~~audience will hear~~ the "Pachyderm Polka" today for the first time.

Two years ago, at the request of the circus management, Igor Stravinsky composed the polka for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet.

Conducting the Boston orchestra today in an all-Stravinsky program, the composer will include the elephant music. Without violins, the orchestra will render the composition which Stravinsky describes as "a brilliant piece whose beauty has been lost amid a chorus of peanut vendors."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

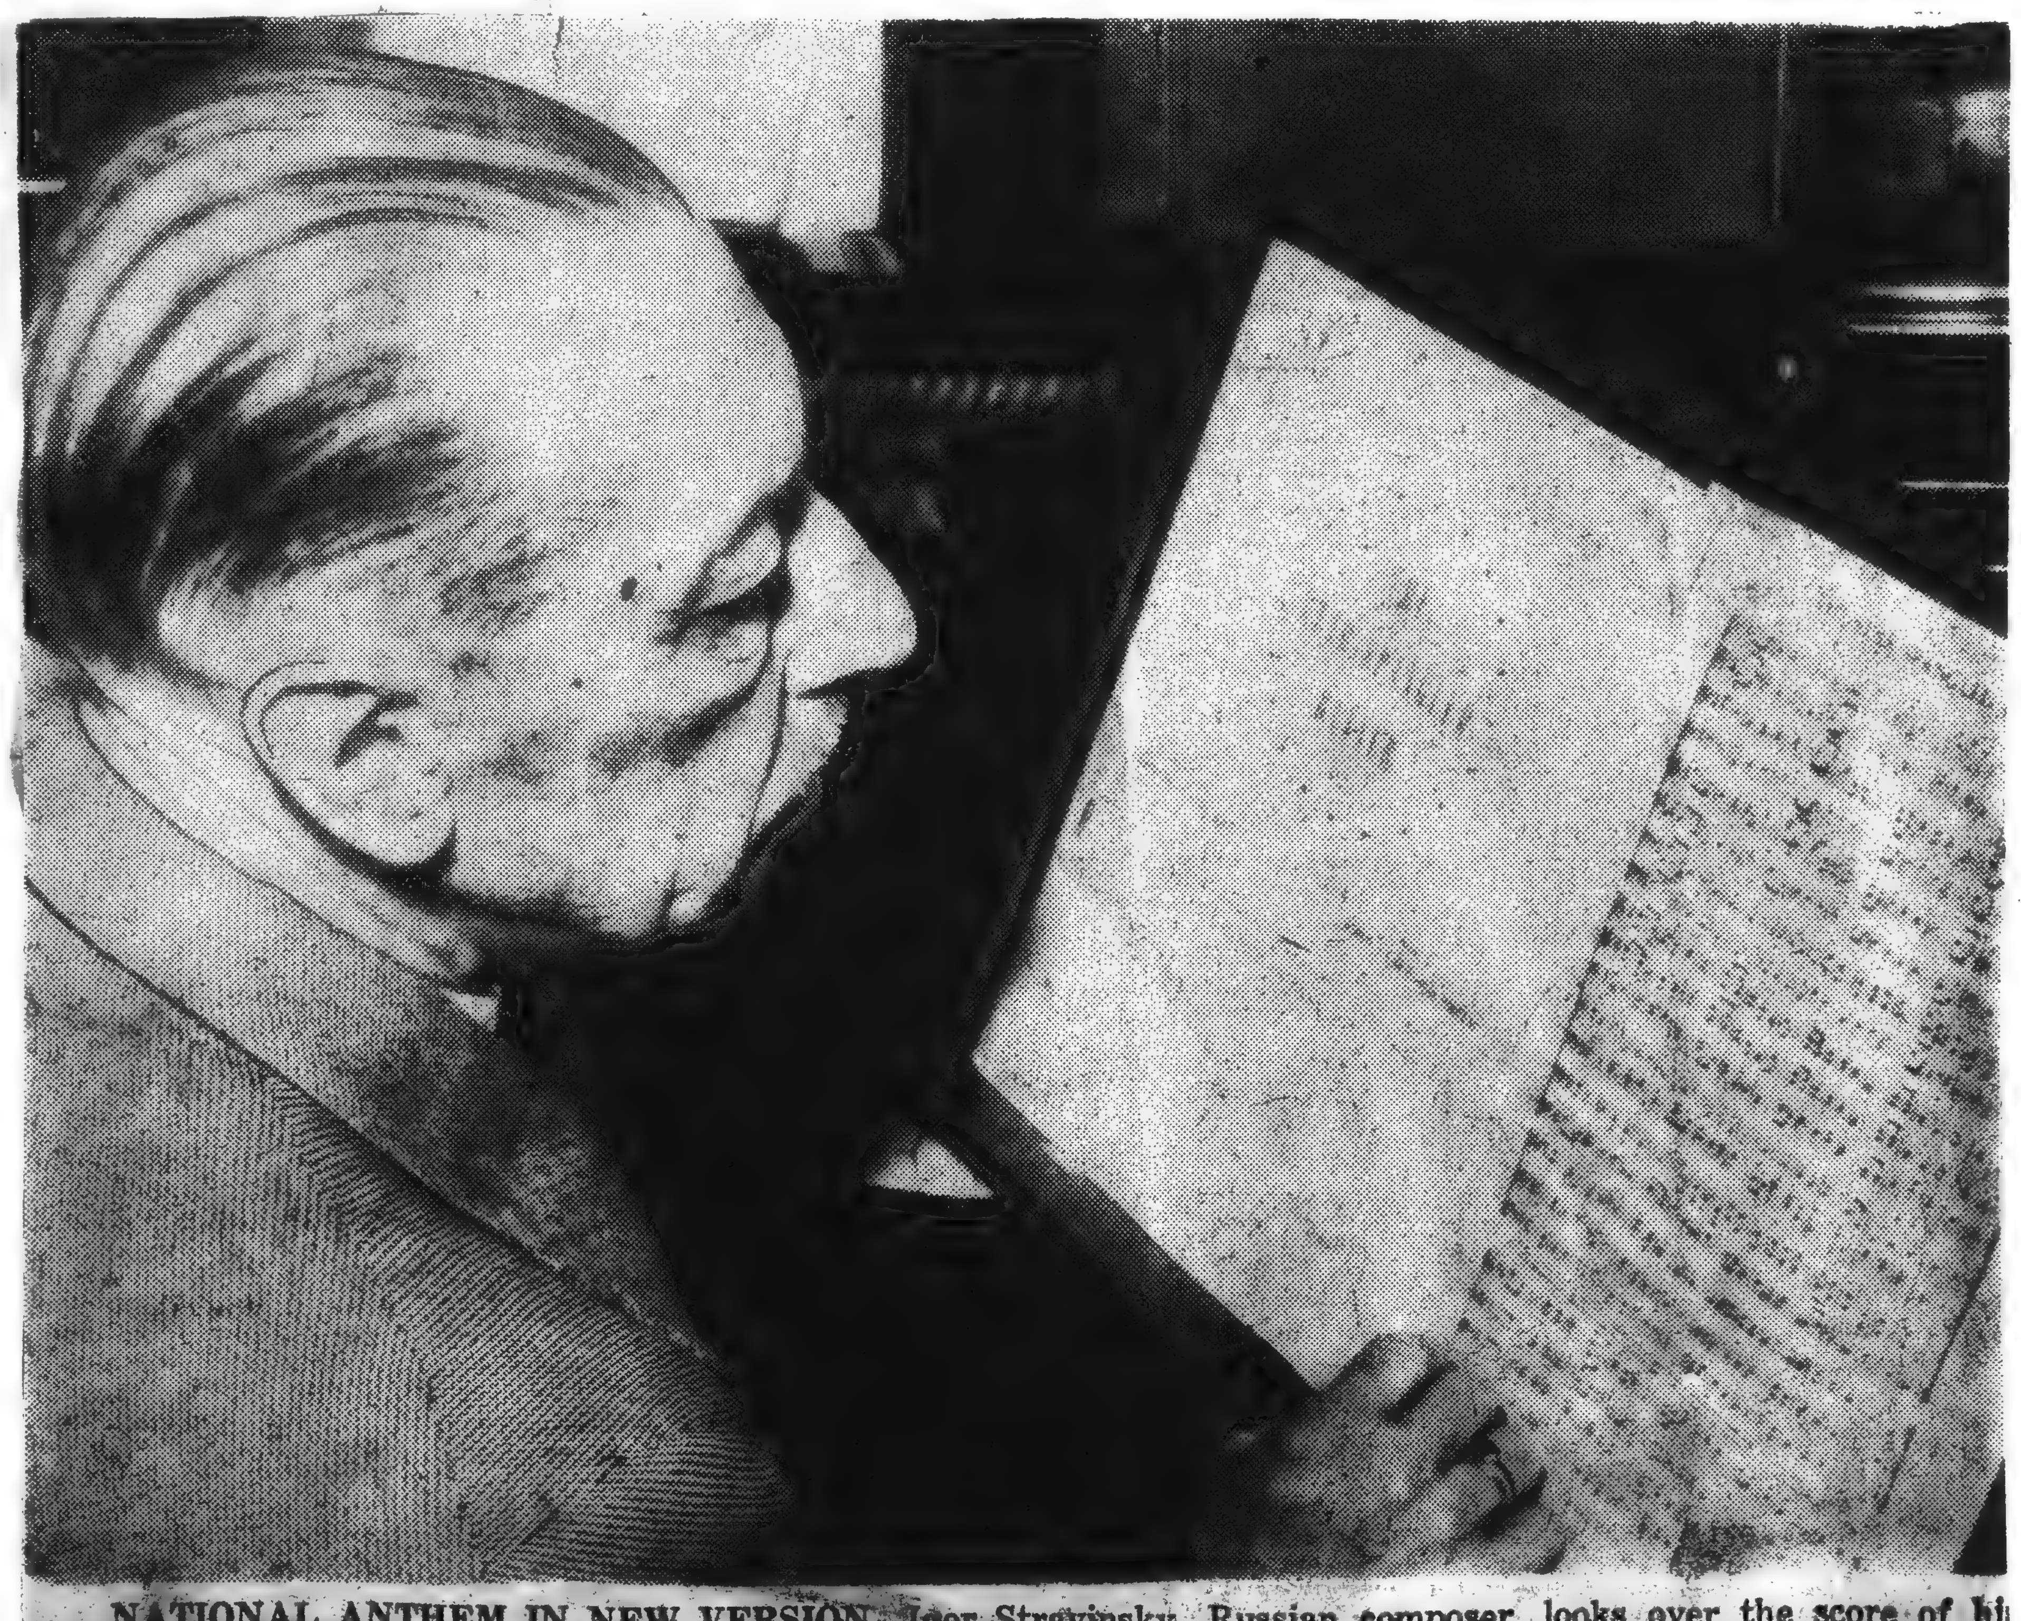
JAN 13 1944

Report Festival To Be Resumed Fails Confirmation

LENOX — Reports that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival may be resumed this year after a lapse of one summer because of war conditions and gasoline restrictions were without confirmation today. George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, said ~~that there was nothing the~~ orchestra would like better but added no definite announcement could be made at this time. It is known that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, is hopeful that the concerts can be held this summer. It is pointed out that with the members of the orchestra belonging to the union and broadcasting, the rights to broadcast will be of great aid in paying the expenses.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT

JAN 13 1944



NATIONAL ANTHEM IN NEW VERSION—Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer, looks over the score of hi own harmonization of the Star Spangled Banner. Stravinsky says he retained familiar melody of National Anthe but changed the harmony and went back to music of Puritan times for a choral-like treatment. He will lead Bosto Symphony orchestra in new version Friday and Saturday. (Associated Press Wirephoto.)

monitor Jan 15

Stravinsky as Symphony Guest Conductor

By L. A. Sloper

Igor Stravinsky is the distinguished guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week. Yesterday, at the twelfth Friday concert of the season, he offered a program made up of his own works: Symphony in C major; Four Norwegian Moods; Circus Polka; Suite from the ballet, "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), and the "Jeu de Cartes" ballet suite.

He opened the concert with his own arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner." This and the Circus Polka caused more excitement than anything else on the program. The Stravinsky arrangement of the National Anthem sounds rather like a performance of the customary version by an orchestra which either cannot read or cannot play music. The harmonies have been acidulated, the note values altered, and even the melodic line reshaped. The popular success of this version is doubtful.

There can be no doubt whatever of the popularity of the Circus Polka, which is having its first performances in orchestral dress this week. The first essay by Stravinsky in Gebrauchsmusik, it was performed by the Ringling Bros.-Barnum and Bailey Circus, with the elephants as dancers, in 1942. By report, the elephants did not care for the music. But to the human ear, it is amusing, and the Friday afternoon audience applauded it with enthusiasm. It probably will wind up at the Pops.

* * *

The program as a whole was designed to reveal the master in his neo-classical vein, with only a hint of the fearsome aspects of his earlier days. It is doubtful whether an entire program in this manner is advisable, even though there is a good deal of variety in the sources of his inspiration. Stravinsky had already been back to Bach, to Handel, to Mozart, to Tchaikovsky. In the present program you may hear echoes of Pergolesi, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Verdi, Sibelius, Stravinsky, and George M. Cohan.

Yet in spite of the determination of the composer to be classical, the creator of "Pétrouchka" will not be downed. And this is fortunate. Most of us would rather hear one "Pétrouchka" than 20 works which pay tribute to other masters. They have said their say, and the attempt to write in their style is bound to be cerebral, so long as the composer is able to keep his own manner under. Stravinsky can write a song in common time, or a waltz tune, or a little march; but always his own voice interrupts quickly. It would be better if that voice were allowed to tell the principal story.

The most successful of these attempts to establish contact with the past, from the viewpoint of workmanship, is the Symphony in C major. But even in this, the composer of ballet music keeps peeping through, and it is these intrusions that give the music its character.

* * *

It is instructive to compare this Symphony of Stravinsky's with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. Prokofieff succeeded in getting back mentally into the eighteenth century and writing in the style of the period. He had his tongue in his cheek, and he is not so naïve as he sounds (neither was Mozart) but you will hear nothing of "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" in the "Classical" Symphony.

"Pétrouchka" and the "Sacre" and the "Noces" are all audible in this symphony of Stravinsky's. Stravinsky has the technique for anything, but he lacks the capacity of imaginative transference. He imposes his own style on the classic form. The result is aridity.

The Four Norwegian Moods had their first performance. They are interesting as illustrating the unsuccessful battle Stravinsky has waged for the last 30 years to free himself from romanticism. He always calls for elimination of emotion and homage to pure form. But that is contrary to his genius. In connection with this work he has been at pains to insist that the title must not be interpreted as "impression" or "frame of mind." But that is exactly what the music is talking about. If it is not an impression it is nothing.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

JAN 15 1944

Boston Symphony Group Breaks Encore Tradition

BOSTON, Jan. 14, (UP)—For the third time in 63 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra encored a number today. The piece was Igor Stravinsky's "Pachyderm Polka", originally composed at the request of the circus management for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet. Stravinsky conducted a concert of his own compositions today in the absence of Serge Koussevitsky.

The only other two exceptions to the Boston Symphony's no-encore rule were Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of a Bumblebee" in 1924 and a repetiton of Saint-Saen's "Danse Macabre" directed by Wilhelm Gericke in 1885.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

JAN 16 1944

Koussevitsky Praises Symphony's Practice

Rochester, N.Y., Jan. 15.—(U.P.)—During a recent reheasal of the 115-piece Eastman School of Music Senior Symphony Orchestra, a visitor slipped into the auditorium and listened—for two full hours. When the last strains of the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony died away, the visitor approached Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the school and its orchestra, kissed him on both cheeks in true continental fashion and exclaimed: "Without hesitation, I say this is the greatest student symphony orchestra in the world." And, coming as it did from Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that was no small feather for Rochester's musical cap. Koussevitsky was in Rochester as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which appeared in a concert.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES

JAN 13 1944

Composer Stravinsky Lives In Hollywood, Ignores Movies

Boston, Jan. 13 (AP)—Igor Stravinsky, stormy-petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared during an interview between rehearsals for the all-Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston symphony orchestra tom[illegible]

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work."

The 61-year-old Russian born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite "Le Sacre du Printemps," shrugged expressive shoulders.

Wants to Be Happy

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added, "almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No. Not if you want to be responsible for your own work."

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in 'Flesh and Fantasy' and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand, I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I cannot write for the films."

Stravinski moved about the room with short, swift strides and then picked up a score, thereby changing the subject.

"With the Boston symphony this weekend," he said, "I am conducting the world premiere of 'Four Norwegian Moods.' It is intended as a compliment to Norway.

"I wrote it after studying Norwegian folklore and used a style similar to that employed by Joseph Haydn in his treatment of folk material."

To Use Harmonization

The noted Russian composer then revealed that he was going to use his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming concerts.

"I completed it two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough," he said. "I kept the same melody but the harmony is different. It has a very full choral sound and is in 17th century style."

He explained that he had gone back to music of Puritan times in his treatment of the harmony.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

Stravinsky said that one of his most "astonishing commissions" was composing a circus polka intended as a ballet for elephants for the Ringling Brothers Barnum and Bailey circus in 1942.

"George Balanchine, the choreographer, chased me all across the country to get me to do it. I'm playing it, too, as well as my Card Game Ballet in Three Deals.

"The Elephant Polka is wonderful—but of course elephants don't dance."

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
TIMES

JAN 16 1944

Golschmann to Be Guest Conductor

The celebrated conductor Vladimir Golschmann will make his New England debut when he conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest at its concert in the Metropolitan Theatre in Providence Tuesday night (he is to make his Boston Symphony debut in the same program later in the week). This program will begin with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat, the "Eroica." The second part will consist of French music. It will include a Suite in F major by Albert Roussel, Erik Satie's Two "Gymnopedies" as orchestrated by Debussy, and Maurice Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody (including Prelude a la Nuit, Malaguena, Habanera, and Feria).

Vladimir Golschmann has had a distinguished career as conductor both in Europe and America. Born in 1893 in Paris, of Russian parents, he received his musical education there and conducted the principal orchestras. He appeared as guest in other parts of Europe and conducted four ballet companies, including that of Diaghileff. He came to this country in 1931 to become the regular conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, a post which he still holds. He has appeared as guest with the orchestras of our East and West.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

JAN 14 1944

Symphony Will Play "Pachyderm Polka"

Boston, Jan. 14.—(UP)—A Boston Symphony orchestra audience will hear the "Pachyderm Polka" today for the first time.

Two years ago, at the request of the circus management, Igor Stravinsky composed the Polka for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet.

Conducting the Boston Orchestra today in an all-Stravinsky program, the composer will include the elephant music. Without violins, the orchestra will render the composition which Stravinsky describes as "a brilliant piece whose beauty has been lost amid a chorus of peanut vendors."

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

JAN 14 1944

Three youthful artists will appear in broadcast

Marianne Chapel, bass viol soloist, and pianists Judy Ross and David Keene Leavitt will be costarred tomorrow in the 16th broadcast of the Los Angeles Young Artists Competition, which is sponsored jointly by the Southern California Symphony association, the Daily News and station KFI.

The three young artists will be heard with the KFI orchestra, conducted by Claude Sweeten, from 9 to 9:45 p. m. tomorrow.

Judy Ross, 11, has been studying piano for three years and has appeared in public in recital at the Wilshire Ebell theater. Leavitt, 13, makes his debut on the concert stage tomorrow in the competition broadcast. Nineteen-year-old Marianne Chapel has appeared as soloist on many programs and has been heard as bass viol soloist and as pianist with the Women's Symphony orchestra of Long Beach.

The program to be broadcast over KFI includes Beethoven's "Concerto No. 1 in C-major for Piano and Orchestra," played by David Leavitt; Koussevitsky's "Concerto for Contrebasse," played by Marianne Chapel, and Mendelssohn's "Concerto No. 2 in D-minor," played by Judy Ross.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 19 1944

Stravinsky Won't Compose Film Scores

By Tom Chase.

BOSTON, Mass., Jan. 18 (AP).—Igor Stravinsky, stormy petrel of modern music, is doing the unusual again—living in Hollywood and ignoring the motion picture industry.

In his home on the dividing line between Hollywood and Beverly Hills he listens to his flock of chickens of a morning—"I like their rhythmic clucking," he says with gestures—and writes music. But not for the films.

"I'm a symphonist and I do not like to write background music," he declared Saturday during an interview between rehearsals for the all-Stravinsky program he is conducting with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"When the movie people ask you to compose for films you know it will be cut," he explained. "I've tried it. The score is cut once and then the film is edited and some more taken out. After that the local operator goes to work."

The 61-year-old Russian-born composer who startled the world with his orchestral suite, Le Scare du Printemps, shrugged expressive shoulders.

"I want to be happy when I compose," he added almost plaintively. "I love the beautiful sun and the air in Hollywood. But write for the motion pictures? No. Not if you want to be responsible for your own work."

◆

Stravinsky adjusted his glasses and his lean face grew animated. "Recently," he said, "I heard some very interesting film music. It was in Flesh and Fantasy and was composed by Alexander Tansman.

"He is a good composer, especially in the portions he wrote for the French fair scene. You understand, I do not mean Hollywood music is bad. Just that I—I cannot write for the films."

The composer then revealed that he was going to use his own harmonization of the national anthem at the coming Boston concerts.

"I completed it two years ago on the Fourth of July, curiously enough," he said. "I kept the same melody, but the harmony is different. It has a very full choral sound and is in Seventeenth Century style."

◆

He explained that he had gone back to music of Puritan times in his treatment of the harmony.

"I gave it the character of a real church hymn," he added, "not that of a soldier's marching song or a club song, as it was originally. I tried to express the religious feelings of the people of America."

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

JAN 15

Boston Orchestra Plays Third Encore Of 63-Year Career

Boston, Jan. 14 (UP).—For the third time in 63 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra encored a number today. The piece was Igor Stravinsky's "Pachyderm Polka," originally composed at the request of the circus management for the Ringling Brothers elephant ballet. Stravinsky conducted a concert of his own compositions in the absence of Serge Koussevitsky.

The other two exceptions were Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of a Bumblebee" in 1924 and a repetition of Saint-Saen's "Danse Macabre" directed by Wilhelm Gericke in 1885.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
Bulletin

JAN 19 1944

MUSIC

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night. The orchestra co-operated handsomely and the audience, large and demonstrative, indorsed Mr. Golschmann's work without reservation.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky usually puts the heavy fare last on the program; Mr. Golschmann put it (the "Eroica" symphony) first. The net gains seem to be about equal. In the first case the listener is warmed up, but perhaps fatigued, by lighter things. In the second case he plunges cold into the heavy work, but with his powers of concentration fresh.

Mr. Golschmann selected an interesting program. It comprised Roussel's suite in F major, Op. 33; two "Gymnopedies," by Satie, orchestrated by Debussy; and the "Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel, besides the Beethoven symphony. One thing that would have increased the value of the program is Stravinsky's arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner." We might just as well have had a chance to hear it; but Mr. Golschmann voted for the customary version.

In the "Eroica" the conductor displayed notable and characteristic achievements. The tone of the orchestra was clear and compact, details were distinct, everything was well controlled, and there was a general sense of just proportion and thorough understanding. These virtues were equally abundant and possibly even more admirable in the reading of the other pieces. What the "Eroica" lacked was emotional intensity; the other pieces did not particularly require it or give scope for it. Once or twice in the exposition of the first movement of the symphony the fire seemed about to break forth, but it was transformed into the sort of polished and refined brilliance that fascinates but does not move.

Neither the Roussel suite nor the dance by Satie is music familiar in this parish. The suite is obviously skillful, original and ingenious, but it is hard to believe that one could become fond of it. The Satie dances, however, exert a strong and rather weird enchantment, due about equally to Satie and to Debussy. This music one could hear with delight many times.

The "Rapsodie Espagnole" ended with more noise than necessary, but it was delivered in the main with the delicate adjustment of the orchestra's muscles that gratified throughout.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There is a new conductor at Symphony Hall this week and next, Vladimir Golschmann of the St. Louis Orchestra, and he is worth hearing. Just entering upon his 51st year Mr. Golschmann might easily pass for younger. Tall, slender and erect, he is a vital, dynamic figure, though by no means a member of what might be called the "whoop-'er-up" school of conductors. He uses a long baton and uses it both continuously and vigorously. Otherwise his conducting is outwardly on the stable side. In short, he is no acrobat.

For his first programme Mr. Golschmann had chosen Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and three French works, Roussel's Suite in F major, Satie's "Gymnopedies," as orchestrated by Debussy, and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody. Of Parisian birth, though partly of Russian blood, Mr. Golschmann is considered something of a specialist in French music. Nevertheless, the centre of interest yesterday was the Beethoven Symphony.

In these days of fancy readings of the classics Mr. Golschmann's "Eroica" was notable for its fidelity to what may well have been the composer's intentions. There were no romantic extravagances, there was no recourse to the sort of transcendental musical speech that was unknown in Beethoven's day. We are so used to hearing the "Eroica" set forth majestically, imposingly, that Mr. Golschmann's tempi in the first movement and the finale seemed on the fast side; yet the one is marked Allegro con brio and the other Allegro molto. The result was a new sense of excitement; and, happily, the Funeral March was not made too funereal. Though the scherzo was by no means rushed, the horns went awry in their always risky passage in the trio.

It was a pleasure to hear again the Suite of Roussel, one of the most satisfying creations of a composer who just now seems to be losing ground. Dr. Koussevitzky had himself announced it for revival this season. We are quite familiar with the fragile "Gymnopedies," about the only music by the singular Satie that one hears nowadays, but the Rapsodie Espagnole was of relatively fresh interest. Not one of Ravel's more ponderable works, it is by no means hard to listen to, and yesterday the brilliant fourth division, "The Fair," provided a fitting close to a generally stimulating concert. That the audience liked Mr. Golschmann was plain to be seen.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JAN 22 1944

MONDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Entering upon his second week as guest-conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann presented last evening a programme that was partly reminiscent, partly anticipatory, and that contained one number, Paul Creston's Pastorale and Tarantella, that is to be confined to this particular pair of concerts. By way of repetition came the conductor's exhilarating version of Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Satie-Debussy "Gymnopedies," distinctive, though tiresomely tenuous, but beautifully set forth.

As foretaste of the week-end concerts, Mr. Golschmann revived Tchaikovsky's fantasia after Dante, "Francesca da Rimini." Its specious excitements and pleasant middle section made their accustomed appeal last evening. Nevertheless the work has faded sadly. The music of the lovers lacks true sensuous quality, and the rest has as little to do with the torrid blasts of hell as the circusy storm in Rossini's "William Tell" overture, which it occasionally suggests, has to do with the Alpine reality.

Mr. Creston's name appeared last night for the first time on a Boston Symphony programme. His piece is not particularly up to date, something which many people would not hold against it. The Pastorale recalls the French impressionists, the Tarantella is reasonably exciting, yet hardly vertiginous, it doesn't really succeed in getting its feet off the ground. There are incidental suggestions of "Zarathustra" and "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The programme will be repeated this afternoon.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 19 1944

MUSIC

Golschmann Is Conductor Of Boston Symphony At Metropolitan

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Vladimir Golschmann, conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night. The orchestra co-operated handsomely and the audience, large and demonstrative, indorsed Mr. Golschmann's work without reservation.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky usually puts the heavy fare last on the program; Mr. Golschmann put it (the "Eroica" symphony) first. The net gains seem to be about equal. In the first case the listener is warmed up, but perhaps fatigued, by lighter things. In the second case he plunges cold into the heavy work, but with his powers of concentration fresh.

Mr. Golschmann selected an interesting program. It comprised Roussel's suite in F major, Op. 33; two "Gymnopedies," by Satie, orchestrated by Debussy; and the "Rapsodie Espagnole," by Ravel, besides the Beethoven symphony. One thing that would have increased the value of the program is Stravinsky's arrangement of "The Star Spangled Banner." We might just as well have had a chance to hear it; but Mr. Golschmann voted for the customary version.

In the "Eroica" the conductor displayed notable and characteristic achievements. The tone of the orchestra was clear and compact, details were distinct, everything was well controlled, and there was a general sense of just proportion and thorough understanding. These virtues were equally abundant and possibly even more admirable in the reading of the other pieces. What the "Eroica" lacked was emotional intensity; the other pieces did not particularly require it or give scope for it. Once or twice in the exposition of the first movement of the symphony the fire seemed about to break forth, but it was transformed into the sort of polished and refined brilliance that fascinates but does not move.

Neither the Roussel suite nor the dance by Satie is music familiar in this parish. The suite is obviously skillful, original and ingenious, but it is hard to believe that one could become fond of it. The Satie dances, however, exert a strong and rather weird enchantment, due about equally to Satie and to Debussy. This music one could hear with delight many times.

The "Rapsodie Espagnole" ended with more noise than necessary, but it was delivered in the main with the delicate adjustment of the orchestra's muscles that gratified throughout.

St. Louis Conductor Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Jan. 21 (AP) — Parisian-born Vladimir Golschmann, St. Louis Symphony conductor for the past 12 years, made his first appearance in Boston today as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receiving a warm reception from the enthusiastic Symphony Hall audience.

The polished 50-year-old musician led the orchestra through a program nearly designed as partial illustration of his twin interests in the past and the present — pairing the Beethoven Third or "Eroica" symphony with a trio of modern French works by Roussel, Satie and Ravel.

Golschmann conducted with the confidence and ability expected from one who has spent many years on the podium, and the great Boston Symphony responded admirably to his every sweeping gesture. The interpretations were intelligent and in good taste, despite occasional variations in tempo, and these variations themselves were evidence of the leader's individuality.

The Beethoven "Eroica" proved the most impressive work on the program. Perhaps the opening allegro seemed a shade too fast and the funeral march correspondingly slow, but these were minor matters. Not so minor was a bad break in the horn section during the difficult trio in the scherzo. However, this was not the conductor's fault and he well deserved the prolonged applause he received at the end.

Golschmann spanned the years between the Beethoven of 1802 to 1804 to Roussel's F Major Suite, composed in 1926, seemingly as much at home with the moderns as he was with the master composer.

St. Louis Symphony Conductor Making New England Debut

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Jan. 20.

To show the style of a composer, whether Bach, Beethoven, or who, is a purpose a conductor should hold to through everything, according to Vladimir Golschman, who is on a two-weeks visit in Boston to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts while Serge Koussevitzky is away. Securing technical perfection of performance is all right enough in his view of the matter, but most necessary duty of all is to be humble before the score and to see that presentation of the music is a true expression of the man who wrote it. If the work under interpretation is Spanish, then the playing ought to have a Spanish quality. If it is classic, then its classicism must be made to appear; and if it is romantic, its romanticism.

Mr. Golschmann, whose regular post is that of conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, has been a considerable musical traveler in the United States since his coming here 20 years ago from France with an organization known as the Swedish Ballet. He has held his baton, which is a longer stick than most conductors use, over all the principal symphonic ensembles in the country at one time or another, as a visitor, or "guest," in the jargon of managers' announcements; and the last one for him to preside over is the Boston Symphony.

He effected his New England début with that organization in Providence, Tuesday evening, achieving, by authentic report, a marked success in the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony, E flat major, op. 55 He submits his ideas on that same work at the Boston concerts of the orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, and on pieces in smaller form by the French composers, Roussel, Satie, and Ravel.

His Boston engagement calls on him for two pairs of concerts in the main series, and for the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon pair of Jan. 24 and Jan. 25. for Friday and Saturday of next week, he is preparing the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart the "Ibéria" of Debussy and another smaller item or two.

When Mr. Golschmann came to America as a young and aspiring conductor, he was strong for mechanical excellence of execution. He had been trained in French ways as a violinist, and he had worked under Parisian conductors who made a point of doing things in elegant fashion, whatever else.

A rare thing, he said at the time, is a pianissimo effect in the orchestra, the chief difficulty being with the strings. Perhaps his experience with the American concert public has brought about a change of attitude in the particular matter of pianissimo; but at any rate mere finish for its own sake seems not his ideal after a couple of decades of dealing with the American listener.

It must be quite a school, too, leading the principal orchestras of the land on occasion—those of New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Minneapolis, Rochester, besides St. Louis for 13 years. Then his notions must have been influenced by audiences which he appeared as conductor in Spain and in Britain in the years from 1925 to 1931.

At any rate, Mr. Golschmann's word now is "style." Just what he means by it could not be found out in a few minutes' talk at the close of a day of Symphony Hall rehearsing. Nor would words in any degree suffice. The conducting must indicate it—the handling of the Boston Symphony men, should their response be right, in the "Eroica" of Beethoven and in the "Jupiter" of Mozart. A single novelty, final remark to make, comes into the scheme, an American work, "Pastorale and Tarentelle," by Paul Creston, on the program of Monday and Tuesday.

[48]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 23 1944

THE ARMY'S TASTES IN MUSIC

By Cpl. FRANCIS D. PERKINS

ONE recent evening, in a comfortable U. S. O. lounge, a young sailor was listening to the Cleveland Orchestra's recording of "Scheherazade." A former music editor disguised as a soldier was lending him moral and acoustic support. Two other sailors, who suspected Rimsky-Korsakov's music of highbrowism, were presenting a sort of pianistic jam session based on popular melodies. The conflict of sounds continued with shifting advantage until the middle of the second movement, when the Rimskyites stepped up some brazen fanfares and the pianists yielded the field. The same room had harbored another unplanned musical competition the day before, when the radio was presenting "Eine kleine Nacht-musik" at the wish of two soldiers and against the wish of a third, who was experimenting with a little tentative boogie-woogie. In both cases the ex-music editor thought of a meal (not a typical one) offered to his company some months before, when a cook from another outfit, on a one-day engagement as guest artist, had insisted upon serving the stew and the sweet dessert on the same plate, to the mutual gustatory disadvantage of both.

◆

Much has been done toward providing musical performances for and by service men, but there are many places where circumstances make it impossible to provide events catering to the entire service population of the area, and where a soldier or sailor of musical inclinations must depend largely upon processed music. In this moderate-sized coastal city processed music is generously provided in the four U. S. O. clubs, with radios, records and phonographs, and pianos are at the disposal of those who wish to make their own music. One clubroom offers, in addition to all these facilities, an imposing jukebox. Most of the barracks house one or two radio owners; some also have philanthropically presented pianos and phonographs.

But the kind of music heard by these means is most often of the type which is loosely labeled as popular. A day's program in a recreation center is more likely to be a Hit Parade than an example of what the Philharmonic or the Metropolitan is offering. Not that we do not have several radio programs and generously donated records of these latter types, but the former cater to the preferences of the majority. Thus a man who comes to the U. S. O. in the hope of catching the Boston Symphony, for instance, on a Saturday night may find an enthusiastic group already listening to "Pistol Packin' Mamma," or hearing what Mr. Crosby or Mr. Sinatra intends to do on Sunday, Monday or always.

If this hypothetical service symphonic fan whose tastes do not include popular music is lucky and hard-boiled, he may get hold of the radio or the phonograph before the others, and enjoy himself without concern as to whether the others (if they let him) may or may not like it. But, if he has a conscience, he may realize that his symphonies and operas bother at least some of the popular devotees as much as, or more than, their jazz and popular minstrelsy bother him, and have scruples about asking them to listen to a half-hour symphonic record of a three-hour popular broadcast—or to ask that all other musical media in a recreation room be silent while he is indulging his preferences. Even if he has no scruples of the kind, it is possible that some of his colleagues may force them upon him.

In any particular group in a service recreation room, or in any single barrack, there may be only one or two who had rather hear an orchestral concert, opera or quarter than a popular singer or name band. But their number in the armed services as a whole, even if we set the proportion at a low figure, may well run into six figures, or into several hundreds in a large camp or area with a large service population. For these, much has been done in the supply of sources of processed music, but there is also the question of supplying places to hear it without interference from, or interference with, other forms of music and recreational activities.

(Continued from page six)

One who writes about music, or, indeed, anything else, in the Army must take care not to generalize from his individual impressions, which may be anything but typical, and, in this case, not to imply that the question has not been answered in many cases. In one camp where my outfit sojourned during the last twelve months, relatively little was done; in another, a notable attempt was handicapped by limited equipment and little publicizing. In a third, admirable facilities were about to be opened when we moved out. For an area such as that of the scene of this writing, an Eastern coastal city of moderate size with organizations of several services distributed about the neighborhood, the following suggestion might prove practicable. That is, that the invaluable U. S. O. set aside a relatively small room in one of its clubhouses and let it be widely known that symphonic, opera and chamber music broadcasts and records could be enjoyed there without interference or scruple, and without bothering those who had much rather hear about the gentleman who is threatened by a lady addicted to the use of pistols.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

JAN 22 1944

Golschmann Makes Hit With Boston Symphony

By TOM CHASE,
Associated Press Staff Writer.

BOSTON, MASS., January 21.—Parisian-born Vladimir Golschmann, St. Louis Symphony conductor for the past 12 years, made his first appearance in Boston today as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receiving a warm reception from the enthusiastic Symphony Hall audience.

The polished 50-year-old musician led the orchestra through a program neatly designed as partial illustration of his twin interests in the past and the present—pairing the Beethoven Third (or "Eroica") Symphony with a trio of modern French works by Roussel, Satie and Ravel.

Golschmann conducted with the confidence and ability expected from one who has spent many years on the podium, and the great Boston Symphony responded admirably to his every sweeping gesture. The interpretations were intelligent and in good taste, despite occasional variations in tempo, and these variations themselves were evidence of the leader's individuality.

The Beethoven "Eroica" proved the most impressive work on the program, as well it should. Perhaps the opening allegro seemed a shade too fast and the funeral march correspondingly slow, but these were minor matters. Not so minor was a bad break in the horn section during the difficult trio in the scherzo. However, this was not the conductor's fault and he well deserved the prolonged applause he received at the end.

Golschmann spanned the years between the Beethoven of 1802 to 1804 to Roussel's F Major Suite, composed in 1926, seemingly as much at home with the moderns as he was with the master composer.

Satie's two "Gymnopedies," as orchestrated by his friend Debussy, and Ravel's exotic Rapsodie Espagnole brought the concert to a close. The program will be repeated tomorrow night. The St. Louis conductor also will lead the Boston Symphony in four programs next week, on Monday night, Tuesday afternoon, Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

Golschmann Guest in Boston

Jan 22 Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

Vladimir Golschmann, distin-uished conductor of the St. Louis ymphony Orchestra, began this reek a fortnight's tour of duty as uest leader of the Boston Symhony Orchestra. This is his first rofessional visit to New England.

Mr. Golschmann, a native of aris, has a considerable reputaion as an interpreter of French nusic. It was natural, then, that ie should place on his program, he thirteenth of the Boston seaon, Roussel's Suite in F; Satie's 'Gymnopédies" Nos. 1 and 3, as rchestrated by Debussy, and Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole.

But every conductor, making his bow in new surroundings, must offer a classic symphony in order to prove his musical mettle. So Mr. Golschmann opened his first Boston program with Beethoven's "Eroica."

⁂

Mr. Golschmann made an excellent first impression. He knows his way about on the concert platform, he has a good baton technique, he is free of obtrusive mannerisms. Directing with a long stick, and with the score open on the stand, he clearly knows his music and what he wants to do with it. Moreover, he is able to command the allegiance of the orchestra.

He was received cordially by the audience, and applauded warmly after they had heard him in performance. This applause he tactfully shared with the instrumentalists.

His reading of the Beethoven symphony revealed an understanding of its style, and a disposition to give the composer an opportunity to sing his song without too much interference. Mr. Golschmann has lyrical feeling, a strong sense of rhythm, and a lucid structural perception.

These qualities were much in evidence in the great first movement, in which there was no distortion and the voices were beautifully balanced. The record is not quite so clean in the other three movements, in which there was an occasional tendency to toy with the tempi, to overstress an accompanying figure at the expense of the main melody, or to exaggerate a little the dynamic contrasts.

⁂

The orchestra co-operated well with him except that in the Trio of the Scherzo the horns behaved very badly indeed on Friday; but this did not seem to affect the conductor's poise.

Mr. Golschmann showed the expected flair for the music of France. The least French of these three composers is Roussel, who has been subject to many influences outside his native land. He has the Gallic clarity, but not so much Apollonian restraint as his French contemporaries.

The last time this Suite was played here I spoke in praise of it, making a reservation about the banality of the Gigue. Yesterday I made more reservations. The Sarabande was still pleasant, but the Prelude seemed both contrived and noisy.

Satie and Ravel, of course, are the last word in Parisian musical sophistication. These works of theirs have been heard here several times before, but never, perhaps, with a more subtle appreciation of their color, rhythmic schemes, and fête-champêtre atmosphere.

PASSAIC, N. J.
HERALD-NEWS

JAN 1 7 1944

Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" in Boston Symphony's Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard at the Mosque Theatre on Thursday evening, February 10, in the first of the Griffith Music Foundation series of 1944 concerts.

The orchestra will present the following program: Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor by Handel; "A Lincoln Portrait" by Copland, with Will Geer, narrator; and Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73 by Brahms.

The Copland work is an interesting bit of musical Americanna, which was suggested to the composer by Andrew Kostelanetz. It received its world premier in Cincinnati on May 14, 1942, with Kostelanetz conducting and Will Geer, well known actor, speaking the lines. Such folk music as "Springfield Mountain" and "Camptown Races" are used throughout the work to point up the Lincoln humor.

The Foundation, in cooperation with radio Station WAAT will present a series of four Sunday afternoon lecture-recitals preliminary to the concert, in order to familiarize concert goers with the various numbers on the program. The first of these music appreciation broadcasts was given yesterday at which time the world famous pianist and lecturer, Madam Olga Samaroff Stokowski illustrated the Handel work. On January 23, she will tell something of the less familiar Copland opus, and the remaining two broadcasts, January 30 and February 6, respectively, will be devoted to the Brahms Symphony. Madam Stokowski uses recordings by way of illustration.

Herald

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The fourth concert of its subsidiary series was given last night in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Vladimir Golschmann as guest conductor. The program was as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 in E flat major Creston..........Pastorale and Tarantella
(First performance in Boston)
Satie..............Two "Gymnopedies"
(Orchestrated by Debussy)
Tchaikovsky
"Francesca da Rimini," Orchestral Fantasia.

Paul Creston's "Pastorale and Tarantella" received its first Boston hearing at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Vladimir Golschmann—and we must confess that the orchestra shone more than the music. The Pastorale is pleasantly lyrical in a not too original manner, being more than a little reminiscent of Delius. The Tarantella is lively and rhythmic, as a tarantella should be, working up to a nice noisy climax. Its noise, however, is based on a succession of dynamics that are never quite resolved.

Mr. Goldschmann heightened the excellent impression he made at his initial appearance on Friday. He repeated his beautiful reading of Beethoven's third symphony, emphasizing the lyric qualities rather than the heroic. Also repeated were the two unusual "Gymnopedies" of Erik Satie.

The program closed with a rousing performance of Tchaikovsky's lushly romantic "Francesca da Rimini" overture. Here Mr. Golschmann proved that he is quite as much at home with the Romantics as he is with the Classicists. The necessary fervor is there without any overdose of rubato, as is so often the case when conductors encounter Tchaikovsky.

The program will be repeated this afternoon.

D. W. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 26 1944

Symphony Features Stravinsky, Hindemith

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Moderns and classics mingled freely on last night's Philadelphia Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall, with Hindemith and Stravinsky ringing in the new and Haydn and Mendelssohn the old. Eugene Ormandy conducted.

Paul Hindemith may not be your favorite composer for retelling the old Greek myth of Cupid and Psyche in symphonic terms. But the brash atonalist has done it in a pert and jittery ballet overture. It makes good fun, and even better music.

Nobody expected Mr. Hindemith to go pre-Raphaelite in spinning out the quaint old legend. The idiom is typically tart and the harmonies or nonharmonies all Mr. Hindemith's own. The piece breezes along airily, with one or two short pauses for bland pathos. I think it will outstay several other Hindemith items in the repertory.

Stravinsky Masterpiece.

On a loftier plane was the Stravinsky entry, the Symphony of Psalms written in 1930 for the semi-centenary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Beautifully planned, written in fresh, compelling style, marvel of weird balance, the work is easily worth any four or five Stravinsky compositions brought out since.

Though drawing on certain old formal patterns, the Psalm Symphony was an innovation in the grouping of choral and symphonic sections. The melodic line is strictly Stravinsky's, too. Then, the omission of violins and violas was no stunt, but needed in the achievement of fresh color.

Good Choral Support.

Mr. Ormandy led a brilliant reading of the score. What there remained of the orchestra, plus two pianos, seemed steadily intent on clearly expounding every detail, no matter how small, as if the success of the whole scheme hinged on it.

The Westminster College Choir poured out some smoothly assembled tone, always in full keeping with the adopted pace and dynamics. The 150 mixed voices seemed as maneuverable as five in the crisp line and grouping followed.

The evening's soloist, Zino Francescatti, was in fine lyric form for the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. The bright-toned violin sang through it like a great voice. Phrasing was so natural you never heard the bar-lines slip past.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

JAN 2 19

Program Note

Many St. Louis music-lovers sat close to their radio sets Saturday night to hear Vladimir Golschmann's performance with the Boston Symphony. For the conductor, it was at once a signal honor and a severe test to be called upon to prove his artistry with this greatest of symphonic instruments. It was a strain on his listeners, too, in their eagerness that he should show himself equal to Serge Kousevitzky's baton.

What they heard, then, was a fine performance of the Beethoven Third, perhaps the most exalted compposition in orchestral literature. At times, there was a feeling that the first movement was being played a bit too fast, the great second movement—the funeral march—a bit too slowly. The line sometimes seemed to be stretched close to the snapping-point. With the superb recorded performance of Bruno Walter and the old Vienna Philharmonic in mind, the performance did not seem to reach the absolute pinnacle. Yet some of these impressions must have stemmed more from the listeners' eagerness than directly from the music which was enthusiastically acclaimed by the Boston audience.

Mr. Golschmann read the Eroica score with competence and restraint. And Beethoven is not his specialty. He is at his very best when playing the contemporary French music of his friends and associates. Therefore, we predict a glorious triumph for him this week when he brings all the resources of the Boston orchestra into the playing of Darius Milhaud's Suite Provencale. That will be something to hear!

Fortunately, it will be possible for most of us to do so and still hear Mr. Farbman's St. Louis performance. Yes, KXOK and the Auditorium will offer a brilliant Saturday night of music.

RDAY, JANUARY 22, 1944 Herald

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann conducting, gave the 13th concert of its 63d season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 "Eroica" Beethoven
Suite in F major, Op. 33..........Roussel
Two "Gymnopedies" (Orch. Debussy) Satie
Rapsodie Espagnol..................Ravel

There are many striking things about Vladimir Golschmann, who yesterday appeared for the first time in Boston as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, but the chiefest of these are first, he knows precisely what he wants and second, he knows exactly how to get it.

Naturally, the result yesterday was an exceptionally rewarding concert, and one which certainly established the conductor from St. Louis—so far as Boston is concerned—as one of the ranking conductor-virtuosos. While his part in the considerable success of yesterday's concert cannot be minimized, however, it must be established from the outset that the orchestra itself contributed incalculably to that success through its disposition to cooperate in every way to give the visitor (and so us) what he wanted. Mr. Golschmann was impressively good, yes, but his orchestra is impressively wonderful.

The first thing that strikes Mr. Golschmann's audience is the decision, the clarity and the force of his beat. With an orchestra incredibly responsive to the subtleties of its own conductor's beat, this decisiveness galvanizes it. The consequence is an attack so incisive, yet so delicate, that it is beyond comprehension how 110 men can perform with such utter unanimity. Thus Mr. Golschmann yesterday reaped the reward of 20 years of preparation—but this is by no means to diminish his own accomplishment. On the contrary, he is the first guest conductor in some years whose means of communicating his wishes to the orchestra have been so acutely the proper ones.

There is little if any excessive motion in Mr. Golschmann's conducting, yet he uses his hands and arms beautifully. His left hand is vastly expressive and with it he achieves a wide range of nuance. He conducts solely with his arms and head, too, and there is no distracting bobbing about. Occasionally, to make a point, he steps forward, but usually he stands quietly—as a conductor should—and never calls un due attention to himself. His sens of tempo is unerring, and once h establishes his tempo it remain firm within, of course, the natur bounds of retard or acceleratior He is never excessive in his ritardandos, either, and never juices a lyric passage with sentiment—as witness his splendid, cumulative conception of the first movemen of the Beethoven. (Indeed, his reading of the entire symphony was without a trace of sentimentality, a fact which restored to it the drive and the passion which gave it its reputation). Moreover, his sense of orchestral balance and color is keen, and he brings out the textures of the scores with a fine perception as to the difference, say, between Debussy's scoring of the Satie pieces and Ravel's scoring of "Rapsodie Espagnol." In short, Mr. Golschmann is a conductor of singular attainment and one who, to boot, has a fine, unassuming and very pleasant way with an audience.

Again, this leaves little room to discuss the music. Well, most of it is pretty familiar hereabouts anyhow. The exception is the Roussel Suite, a composition of great individuality with an abundance of good humor and fine French logic. The concert will be repeated tonight, and next week Mr. Golschmann conducts the Monday-Tuesday series and the regular Friday-Saturday series, performing, on the latter occasion, works of Mozart, Milhaud, Debussy and Tchaikovskv.

RDAY, FEBRUARY 26,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 17th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The soloists were Maria Kurenko, soprano; Dorothy Cornish, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor; Robert Hall Collins, baritone, and the assisting artists were the Cecilia Society, the Apollo Club (Arthur Fiedler, director), and E. Power Biggs, organist. The program was as follows:

Missa Oecumenica, Op. 142. Gretchaninoff
"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24 Strauss

The discussion of Alexander Gretchaninoff's "Missa Oecumenica," given its first performance yesterday afternoon by the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky with soloists, chorus and organ, must be separated into three distinct categories: the sentimental, the religious and the musical.

As an occasion of sentiment the Mass was undoubtedly a great success. In the first place, Mr. Gretchaninoff is 79 years old, the venerable composer of quantities of fine music of both a liturgical and secular nature. In the second, his Mass was inspired by the happy idea of the "universal meaning of the churches." And in the third, the first performance of the Mass coincided with the beginning of a particularly significant Lenten season. It was therefore little wonder that the elderly composer was given an ovation when he appeared on the stage.

Considered as a contribution to the musical liturgy, however, the Mass is hardly acceptable to any orthodox faith. This is not to say that churches of all faiths in the present day offer better music, because many do not. On the contrary, sections of Mr. Gretchaninoff's Mass will doubtless appear as anthems in many churches from now on.

Yet the fact must be faced that the Mass is basically a melange of second-rate turn-of-the-century operatic reminiscence, and although it often quotes modes of the eastern and the western church, one against the other, the supporting texture violates the basic spirit of liturgical music by introducing tunes and rhythms of a popular character. In short, it is church music of the genre of Rossini, Cherubini and [illegible] and will doubtless achieve a place on some future Motu Proprio.

In the third category, as pure musical line (forgetting its unquestioned sincerity of purpose and the religious association of its text), it is merely tedious. The composer speaks honestly and prettily in the idiom he knows best, a sort of dated romanticism. This, of course, cannot be held against him; it is simply uninteresting to modern ears. And despite the fact that all but one of the six conventional sections end with a loud chord, only the Sanctus contains the spark of real vitality.

The Mass is well written for the voice, though, and the soloists and chorus had little difficulty travers ing the score, sounding generally good meanwhile. The orchestra engaged chiefly in supporting the vocal line or adding figuration also sounded well, and Dr. Koussevitzky who commissioned the work through his Music Foundation in memory of his wife, conducted with warmth and conviction. The concert came to an end with a terrific performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." Next week the orchestra plays a Mozart Symphony, Samuel Barber's new "Air Force Symphony, and presents Vladimir Horowitz as soloist in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Vladimir Golschmann is again guest conductor of the "regular" Boston Symphony concerts this week. Yesterday afternoon he renewed the impression he had made a week before, of technical skill, precision, a fondness for quick tempos and an extraordinary grasp of orchestral balance. His program was wide-ranging and assembled two Mozart items, the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and the "Jupiter" Symphony; Milhaud's Suite Provencale, "Iberia" by Debussy and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The sizzling pace Mr. Golschmann took for Mozart's Overture underscored the champagne qualities of the music and made a topic for lobby conversation. At the same time, though not so much talked about, it showed the mettle of the Boston Symphony virtuosi, who came through with an incredibly deft and cleanly articulated performance. Much of the "Jupiter" Symphony went rather fast, too, but not to the point of hurry. One would like to hear Mr. Golschmann do other works of Mozart, such as the "Great" G minor Symphony, more poignant and personal than the "Jupiter" and just as much a masterpiece. The slow movement of the "Jupiter," with a prophecy of Beethoven in its opening melody, was nicely phrased, and the Symphony as a whole showed good style.

If memory may be trusted, Darius Milhaud did not secure nearly so fine a performance of his Suite on 18th century Provence tunes three years ago as Mr. Golschmann brought about yesterday. The orchestration is second-rate and much of it sounds curiously muffled, but the St. Louis conductor gave the enjoyable pieces a tonal "bite" and a rhythmic liveliness that enhanced their good qualities.

With "Iberia" Mr. Golschmann was entirely in his element. Debussy's orchestra sounded magnificently colorful; the subtleties of rhythm and phrase were impeccably set forth. Others have made Debussy's Spanish night more sensuous and the festival morning more intensely expectant of celebration to come. Yet for sheer sound and style, Mr. Golschmann is to be acclaimed.

"Francesca da Rimini" requires the most intense Slavic brand of emotion in its telling of the embarrassing situation that developed between Francesca and Paolo. Otherwise Tchaikovsky's turbulent score is bound to reveal how old-fashioned it is around the edges, how literal and faded. Mr. Golschmann—who made some cuts in the score—did not quite reach the temperature of conviction.—C. W. D.

[49]

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

JAN 30 1944

Music and Music Makers

Mr. Golschmann in Boston

By Moses Smith

Moses Smith, author of the following account of Vladimir Golschmann's two weeks engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a critic and writer on musical subjects for national publications—T. B. S.

VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN who has been conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest for the first time through the past two weeks, has been well received almost uniformly by the press, the musicians in the orchestra and the general public.

Golschmann has had a fairly heavy schedule of seven concerts in two weeks. Four of them were two pairs of the orchestra's long subscription season of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. Two more were a pair of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts in a shorter series given by the orchestra. Golschmann's first appearance with the orchestra, as it happens, was made in Providence on Tuesday evening, Jan. 18. His program, the same which he presented later in the week to the Bostonian Friday afternoon and Saturday night subscribers, was a well-rounded affair, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Roussel's Suite in F major, Two "Gymnopedies" by Satie, orchestrated by Debussy, and Ravel's "Spanish" Rhapsody.

* * *

THE PROGRAM OF the Monday-Tuesday series contained the Beethoven and Satie works again, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and, in a first Boston performance, Paul Creston's Pastorale and Tarantelle. For the concluding Friday-Saturday program Mr. Goldschmann assembled a list traversing Mozart's "Figaro" Overture and "Jupiter" Symphony, Milhaud's Suite Provencale, Debussy's "Iberia" and the afore-mentioned work of Tschaikowsky.

As well as can reasonably be expected in a brief period, these programs indicated Golschmann as a conductor and musician of catholic tastes.

* * *

MR. GOLSCHMANN made a most favorable impression to start with in Providence after only two rehearsals with the orchestra. The audience liked him, those musicians of the orchestra with whom I have spoken reported most favorably about the proceedings and the conductor himself was happy. Things also went well, for the most part, at the Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall, which I was able to attend. There was, it is true, a little mishap at the second entrance of the horns in the Trio of the Scherzo of the Symphony. But it was the sort of thing that might happen under the most favorable conditions.

* * *

THE PERFORMANCE of the Symphony, which was even better at the Saturday evening broadcast concert, had clarity, drive and over-all perspective without sacrifice of sensitiveness. The conductor remembered that the first movement is fast (allegro) as well as brilliant (con brio); and that the second movement is a march (marcia) as well as funereal (funebre). In other words, he kept things moving. He also had a better balance among the instruments than is customary.

The Scherzo was pretty fast, but not too fast, despite the mishap I referred to. The last movement did seem to me a little too fast; not because the playing was not clean or well-proportioned but because now and then the music sounds a little cheap at such a tempo.

* * *

THE PERFORMANCES of the French works, constituting the second half of the program, seemed to me unexceptionable. The Roussel Suite emerged with gusto, the Satie-Debussy music with atmosphere and perfume and the Rhapsody was played very finely, so that it was not somewhat on the boring side, as I have ometimes found it. The Boston ritics, for the most part, reported he same opinions ventured here, hough in differing language and or different reasons.

Only one of them had a serious eservation: he found the presenation of the "Eroica" "dry" and haracterized by "French eleance." This, indeed, was what I ad anticipated, because of Golschnann's French training; but the ctual performance did not give ne such an impression.

* * *

GOLSCHMANN WAS GOOD to vatch on the stand, as all the reiewers reported and as the audince noted with pleasure. He is usiness-like, has the marks of a rofessional musician, without sacificing the dignity and sincerity f the artist. He himself was obiously quite happy about the reults he got from Boston's superative orchestra, and he did not esitate to say so to me in conersation. After his many ears at the head of the St. ouis Orchestra and years before at in charge of his own conerts, as well as numerous guest ppearances with leading orchesas in this country, Golschmann ight have been forgiven for preending to take his first Boston ngagement in stride.

Instead, he made no secret of is delight in the sheer beautiful ound he was able to evoke here nd in the admirably co-operative pirit of the musicians. As a reult he will leave behind him here nany friends, not only among the nusicians but also—since such an ttitude is somehow conveyed cross the footlights—the general ublic

---

Herald

URDAY, JANUARY 29, 1944

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann conducting, gave the 14th concert of its 63d season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro";
Symphony in C major ("Jupiter") K. 551 .... Mozart
Suite Provencale .... Milhaud
"Iberia" ("Images" No. 2) ..... Debussy
"Francesca da Rimini" (Op. 32) Tchaikovsky

After the excellent impression he made at his debut as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week it was good to observe yesterday that Mr. Golschmann is indeed a conductor to be reckoned with. This is not to say yesterday's concert equalled the first in all-around satisfaction because it did not, but Mr. Golschmann's conducting was all that anyone could ask.

The fact of the matter is, the orchestra saw fit to reflect a certain nonchalance in its response to him yesterday. On the face of things it wasn't too evident. Surely, no ensemble ever played the notes of the Mozart more wonderfully, and certainly no orchestra ever whooped up Hades' high winds in the Tchaikovsky with more relish. Yet it is impossible to deny the feeling of a certain routineness about the whole thing; the concert smacked, in short, of the trained seal department.

Now why should the orchestra play so brilliantly for Mr. Golschmann last week and so dully this? Well, the answer to that question is so deeply rooted in the curious psychological structure of an orchestra (as we have all seen in connection with the New York Philharmonic) that its discussion has no place here. It's very regrettable, however, that it had to happen to Mr. Golschmann, for few guest conductors have made so favorable an impression as he.

As indicated, the notes in all the pieces played were all there. Indeed, for pure technical dexterity, the orchestra slighted nothing on the program. At times, it is true, the Mozart Symphony (a composition which grows more wonderful with every performance) came to life as the orchestra infused it with some of its marvelous warmth of tone color. The Debussy, on the other hand, was waxen and dead and iffe cold moreover, like one of the pink bonbons which used to remind Debussy of Grieg. Was this the conductor's fault? It doesn't seem possible that it could be and I, for one, don't think it was.

Of all the pieces on the program, the Milhaud Suite had the most real orchestral verve. The orchestra seemed to be interested in it, and played it with a good deal of color. The Suite itself is delightful. It reveals its secret a little too obviously in the first section, but its surprise cadences and its brevity help support the freshness and vigor of the composition. The Tchaikovsky Fantasia, thrashing hysterically about and ending, as Saint-Saens observed, leaving nothing to be desired (but, may I add, a breath of fresh air), brought the program to a very loud close.

Mr. Golschmann was given a very cordial reception by the audience which seems to have taken a fancy to him from the start. The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr Koussevitzky returns from his mid-winter vacation and will conduct a program of Beethoven, Brahms and Hindemith.

NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS

FEB 29 1944

Finds Taxidermist Is His Colleague

Boston, Feb. 29—(UP)—George Mager of the Boston Symphony orchestra has g~~ood reason to be~~lieve that old saw about it being a small world.

Mager and his wife were heartbroken when their pet canary died and decided to have it stuffer and kept in its cage.

Consulting the telephoning directory, they found that the nearest taxidermist was "S. W. Gerhardt."

Arriving at the address, Mager was astonished to discover the taxidermist was his colleague, Siegfried Gerhardt. Playing the viola in the Boston Symphony orchestra is Gerhardt's vocation, but he spends his free time at his hobby—stuffying such things as canaries,

---

Herald Feb 5 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky is back at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after his mid-season vacation. His first entrance at the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was that of a conquering hero. Players and audience rose to greet him and there was a cordial demonstration by all hands. When, facing the audience and urging them to sing, Mr. Koussevitzky launched into "The Star Spangled Banner" at his slow, majestic pace, one realized instinctively the Symphony concerts were back to normal.

The program brought, in the first part, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and the Third Symphony of Brahms; in the second, the three orchestral excerpts taken by Paul Hindemith from his opera "Matthias the Painter." All the music was, accordingly, familiar, both in itself and in Mr. Koussevitzky's way of performance.

That the conductor was in high spirits, interpretively, was apparent with the first chords of the Overture. But one soon felt disappointment—in view of how thrilling the Overture can be with Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony—at the untidy orchestral detail, at the hurried tempi and the general dramatic dislocation which resulted in a flashy but mediocre setting forth of the superlative "Leonore" No. 3.

How different went the Brahms Third! This, too, began on the robust side, louder than the "f" Brahms marked in the score, yet it presently settled down into a reading in which the Brahms style was advantageously coupled with Mr. Koussekitzky's intense and general interpretation. Here the orchestral detail was exact, as it is when the Boston Symphony men are at their best, and the balance of tone was clear as tropical waters. There might be a fumbled note here and there, but such failed to detract from the high excellence that prevailed.

Considering the amount of Brahms to be heard in concert halls and over the air, it is understandable that some people may tire of these symphonies. But a superb performance has a restorative effect upon jaded tastes. That happened yesterday.

Of the astringent Hindemith excerpts (certainly not overplayed) one does not tire. Heard originally as pure, symphonic music in the absence of knowledge of their place in the opera, they impressed by their solid and expert writing, their engaging material and the air of spirituality and emotion. One can think of them in a quite different light with some notion of their operatic intent; still they retain their inner qualities. The chorale ending "Temptation of St. Anthony" is a magnificent affirmation of faith. Throughout the "Matthias" excerpts the Boston orchestra, too, was magnificent.

As it happened, the Beethoven and Brahms took the place of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, announced more than a week ago for radio broadcast. Well, changes are made in Mr. Koussevitzky's programs, and it is his prerogative to do so. But, please, may we not have some Bruckner?—C. W. D.

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA

Boris Goldovsky

Boris Goldovsky gave one of the most informative of all his lectures at the Symphony luncheon in the Oval Room of Hotel Copley-Plaza yesterday noon. He devoted himself to Hindemith's opera "Matthias the Painter," the three orchestral excerpts from which are on the current Boston Symphony program.

By exception, since the excerpts are not in any way pianistic, Mr Goldovsky wisely gave no musical illustrations. But he delivered a comprehensive account of the opera which has had but one production in Zurich, Switzerland, in 1938.—C. W. D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, Vladimir Golschmann, guest conductor from St. Louis, materially strengthened the excellent impression that he made a week ago.

From Mozart's sparkling Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" he passed to the masterly "Jupiter" Symphony and then to Milhaud's "Suite Provencale," a highly diverting if not exactly important work, introduced to us by its composer three years ago. After the intermission came Debussey's "Iberia" and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which the visiting conductor had revived, after nearly six years' silence, at recent concerts.

To judge from his "Eroica" and his ht, Uptown Ballroom; and Bobby , Raymor-Playmor.

Post Jan 29

"Jupiter," Mr. Golschmann's way with classical symphonies is an eminently satisfactory one. His approach is primarily musical. Although far from perfunctory it is still one that permits the piece to speak for itself. If the "Eroica" was set forth without false heroics the "Jupiter" was not turned into a costume piece. The Mozartian grace was there, but it never became effeminate. In fact, one was immediately convinced that this, Mozart's last symphonic effort, was the greatest thing of its kind until this same "Eroica" appeared on the scene. And if Mozart could not possibly have composed the latter, no more could Beethoven have written the "Jupiter's" contrapuntal finale in which, as in no other music since Bach, beauty was wedded to science.

How much more satisfying is Milhaud's robust treatment of his folk tunes than are Stravinsky's dallyings with folk material in his "Four Norwegian Moods," that recently had their world premiere at Symphony Hall. And while on the matter of comparisons, "Iberia," with its poetic second movement, perhaps the finest flower of impressionism, is a more persuasive treatment of the Spanish idiom than Ravel's in the "Rapsodie Espagnole" of last week's concerts. "Francesca" was presented more convincingly than on Monday evening, but all Mr. Golschmann's adroitness and eloquence still could not banish the impression that the bad in the score outweighs the good. A strange blending, this fantasia, of genius and claptrap.

Globe Feb

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Ecumenical Mass by Alexander Gretchaninoff was performed for the first time at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The soloists were Maria Kurenko, soprano; Dorothy Cornish, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. Arthur Fiedler had prepared the choruses of the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club. E. Power Biggs was organist. Richard Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" completed the program.

Gretchaninoff wanted to write a Mass which would combine "the musical character of the Eastern and Western churches." The text of the Mass, in Latin, is the one used in the Catholic churches. Inasmuch as the content of the text is identical in all Christian churches, the Mass could be translated into any other language. The word ecumenical is derived from Latin and Greek, and its primary meanings are universal, world-wide. As Mr. Burk observes in his program notes, parts of the Mass are of Hebrew ancestry.

Thus the Ecumenical Mass may be taken as faith and hope voiced by all peoples. It is music warm and strongly felt, sometimes dramatic with sounding brass and tinkling (crashing is more exact) cymbals, sometimes of the purest melodic serenity. To find a comparable expression of feeling, without drawing an absurdly close comparison, I think one would have to go back to the Requiem by Faure. At the bottom of each is gentle compassion.

The Ecumenical Mass is not, in a literal sense, "churchly," although as Boris Goldovsky has said, it uses chants from the Russian liturgy. The Credo in particular suggests to me sunny radiance and open air.

The agreeable if "old-fashioned" style of Gretchaninoff—direct, simple, almost folkish melodies, rich harmonies and rhythmic buoyancy—is on every page. Such moments as the opening phrase for chorus in the Credo and the soprano solo near the start of the Benedictus (beautifully sung by Miss Kurenko) are of high distinction.

It seemed that things went wrong at several points in a dramatic performance. No matter, they did not interfere with one's enjoyment. The soloists, whose parts are woven into the choral and orchestral fabric were uneven, but collectively more than adequate. The choruses were admirable. When Mr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Gretchaninoff upon the stage there was what is commonly if incorrectly, called an ovation.

"Death and Transfiguration" was rather lost in the shuffle, even though the conductor played it more slowly than ever. Gracious! What an unconscionable time a-dying!—C. W. D.

Gl. Jan 26

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paul Creston, American composer who is a musical director of the Blue Network, made his first appearance on the program of the Boston Symphony at the concerts of Monday evening and yesterday afternoon. Vladimir Golschmann, continuing as guest conductor, offered Mr. Creston's "Pastorale and Tarantella," an agreeable if derivative work of not a little attractiveness.

Mr. Golschmann's program began with his restrained and considered reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and after the interval continued with Mr. Creston's pieces, two "Gymnopedies" of Satie, and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

The coloristic effects of Mr. Creston's "Pastorale" depend a good deal on chords of the ninth, consecutive inner fifths and other harmonic materials which are largely associated with the French school of impressionists. Though the "Tarantella" stems in part from Ravel, it is lithe music of considerable freshness. Its figurations are particularly interesting. In form, both pieces are eminently logical and concise in form, and hints of their ancestry in no way impair their pleasantness.

Mr. Golschmann did not force the rhythmic pulsations of the Tarantella into iron-bound patterns, but produced them with a resiliency that enhanced their regularity. On the other hand he conducted the two Satie pieces with that classic French style of rhythm based on phrase-to-phrase, rather than bar-to-bar rhythm. Thus he made the tenuous and slight piece come alive. Mr. Golschmann made the Tchaikovsky Fantasia alternately sensuous and bombastic, which is about all anyone can do for this faded music.—J. W. R.

URDAY, FEBRUARY 5,

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 15th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Beethoven..Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72
Brahms..Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90
Hindemith..Symphony, "Mathis der Maler"

This was a fine concert from any point of view. Looking at it first from the news angle, it was notable for the return (well tanned and in rare form) of Dr. Koussevitzky from his mid-winter vacation. Next there was the performance to consider, and surely the orchestra has never spoken more eloquently than it did in the Beethoven Overture or the Brahms Symphony (the Hindemith wasn't so polished), nor sounded better. And finally there was the program; conventional, but good and solid.

It seems odd to be able to say that a program containing Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" was "conventional," but such is the case. In its 10 years on the standard repertoire, this composition has become an old and trusted friend to prove once again that the severest obstacle to friendship in the case of any difficult new work is acquaintance and the understanding that follows acquaintance.

Today its cerebral, often dissonant counterpoint is hardly noticed, and one hears only its severe beauty. As Alexander Williams so acutely pointed out 10 years ago following Mathis' first performance here (and he was almost alone in his enthusiasm), the composer kept the emotional purpose of his conception clearly in front of him. Thus the emotional means, prodigious although they are—and they have influenced virtually all who have come after—have receded from the forefront now and no longer alarm or distract us. Freed of such considerations we can hear the great melodic beauty and the emotional impact of the work. This was the composer's intention, and the fact that it has come about in 10 short years should encourage other contemporary composers who are maligned as arid, incapable of melodic inspiration and so forth—and dismay their maligners.

"Mathis der Maler" was not always marked, in its performance, by the perfection of ensemble which is, with its incredibly beautiful sonority, the hall-mark of the orchestra. Yet it is impossible to deny that the performance was exceedingly effective, almost unbearably so in the "Temptation of St. Anthony" section which brings it to a close. The Brahms was beautifully done from beginning to end, but the real miracle was the performance of the third Leonore Overture. Here Dr. Koussevitzky's really fabulous physical powers electrified both orchestra and audience, inducing the former (as someone once put it) to play better than it can play, and the latter to respond more than it could respond.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra is off on tour again, but the following

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

FEB 6 1944

Realm of Music

Koussevitzky Announces Revised Program for Thursday Night

By MARGUERITE KRAHENBUHL

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revised the program the Boston Symphony will play in the Mosque Thursday under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. The selections will now be the Brahms Second Symphony; Aaron Copland's new work, "A Lincoln Portrait," and "Francesca da Rimini," an orchestral fantasie by Tchaikovsky. Will Geer will serve as speaker during the Copland work. The Brahms is regarded as one of the most important interpretations boasted by Koussevitzky and his orchestra, and, of course, their Tchaikovsky has long drawn listeners to their concerts.

The foundation, by the way, is again sponsoring its auditions for music students of the piano, violin and voice. Trials are scheduled for March, April and May, with professional examiners doing the judging. Application blanks may be obtained by writing the foundation at 605 Broad street.

Choral Festival

New Jersey Federation of Music Clubs will sponsor a choral festival April 28 in the Mutual Benefit Auditorium and a similar event for choir groups April 30. These events will be part of the program for the 16th convention of the federation at the Hotel Sheraton, opening April 28. Berenice Scher, Atlantic City pianist, winner of the Edgar Stillman Kelley scholarship of the national federation, and Helen Janov, Collingswood violinist, another contest winner, will play during the conference.

CLIFTON, N.J.
TIMES
2/10/44

Music Called Vital Need by Koussevitzky

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear in Newark, at the Mosque Theatre, at 8:40 tonight under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. His eyes flashed as he went on to say:

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 29 1944

Viola to Stuff Trumpet's Bird

BOSTON, Feb. 29 (UP) — Georges Mager, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and his wife were heartbroken when their pet canary died.

So they decided to have it stuffed, and keep it in its cage.

Consulting the classified section of the telephone directory, they found that the nearest taxidermist was "S. W. Gerhardt, Jamaica Plain."

Arriving at the address, Mager was astonished to discover that the taxidermist was none other than his colleague, Siegfried Gerhardt, whose vocation is playing the viola in the Symphony Orchestra but whose avocation is stuffing such things as canaries.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1944

SYMPHONY PLAYS HINDEMITH'S WORK

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—(AP) In fine fettle after his customary mid-season vacation, Serge Koussevitzky today led the Boston Symphony orchestra through an exciting and definitive performance of Paul Hindemith's great "Mathis der Maler" symphony—highlight of an otherwise classically conservative program.

The Hindemith work, comprising three orchestral excerpts from the opera of the same name, first was played by the Berlin Philharmonic in March, 1934. It had not been heard in Symphony hall in nearly three years.

With expert tonal symbolism the German-born composer describes Matthias Grunewald's three Sixteenth-century Isenheim altar pieces "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony." The score had exceptional vitality and plasticity, the imaginative polyphonic development of musical thoughts making it descriptive music of the highest order.

The Boston Symphony played "Mathis der Maler" ("Matthias the Painter") superbly. Strings and woodwinds were brilliant throughout—but especially so in the astonishing third movement portrait of the Saint being tortured by fantastic beasts.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3, and the Brahms Third symphony in F major. Both were interpreted satisfactorily, but somehow they lacked the brilliance, force and complete conviction which characterized the Koussevitzky performance of Hindemith.

Post
Feb 7

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three rousing cheers were in order at the end of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, though an unaccountably apathetic audience was in no mood to provide them: one for Dr. Koussevitzky, one for his unapproachable orchestra (especially when he conducts it) and one for Paul Hindemith, whose "Mathis der Maler" set the capstone on a logically planned and singularly satisfying programme, having for its other items Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and the Third Symphony of Brahms.

From the standpoint of logic all this programme lacked was something by Bach at the very beginning. The circle then would have been complete, for Hindemith, while not ignoring any of his predecessors—even Wagner and Strauss, find their way into the last movement of "Mathis," "The Temptation of St. Anthony"—nevertheless bases his style and his musical thinking on that of the Leipzig Cantor.

More than one work that has come from Hindemith's pen since this "Mathias the Painter" has brought that work to mind. Perhaps we can already say that it contains the essence of his style, as "Tristan" contains the essence of Wagner, and that if all his other music were to disappear this masterpiece, for masterpiece it certainly is, would show us what he stood for, what he represented. Incidentally, "back to Bach" in the case of Hindemith does not imply arid neo-classicism, the mere application of a modern twist to formulas already exhausted. In "Mathis," particularly, we are a long, long way from that sort of thing.

It would be hard for the present generation to see where the late Philip Hale got his pet notion that the music of Brahms was granitic. In most contemporary performances, those of Dr. Koussevitzky are a conspicuous case in point, it is anything but. The word lush would fit a whole lot better. But in Hale's day conductors tried to make Brahms' music sound the way the composer himself looked and acted. The portly figure was there, as were the whiskers and the brusque, gruff exterior. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky went too far the other way yesterday, though the Symphony sounded awfully well. One might easily urge that the end was over-poetized. Nor is the doctor's rather feverish conception of "Leonore" No. 3 the one that is held by everybody.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

FEB 9 - 1944

Boston Symphony in Fourth College Concert Series

By Pfc. FRANCIS D. PERKINS

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, made its fourth annual appearance in the Connecticut college concert series last night in the Palmer auditorium, before an audience which represented the utmost capacity of the hall. The noted conductor devoted his program to two symphonies of contrasting character: Mozart's symphony in E flat, which is No. 543 in Koechel's catalogue of that genius's works, and Hector Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A.

Since a concert by the Boston Symphony has become an annual event in New London's musical calendar, it is unnecessary to dwell extensively upon the paramount merits of this orchestra and its conductor, which were again made manifest in the two works heard by yesterday's enthusiastic listeners. Many regard this organization as the foremost of its kind in this country or, indeed, anywhere. Its high standing can be credited both to the skill and artistry of its musicians and to the interpretative insight, imagination and inspiring leadership of its director, who is now rounding out his 20th Boston season. It is hard for an orchestra to be at its best under a succession of short-term conductors; the Boston Symphony copes with no such handicap, and both the technical finish and expressive persuasiveness of yesterday's concert set forth the orchestra and its conductor as a single musical and expressive entity.

Mozart's E flat symphony, one of the memorable three symphonies composed in 1788, has long held its place as a charter member of the standard symphonic repertoire. The Fantastic Symphony, composed 42 years later, can also be considered as of the standard repertoire, but its popularity is of more recent standing. Most works written over a century ago have been assigned a place by the consensus of musical opinion, but there are quite a few who claim that a due appreciation of Berlioz's music has not yet been achieved. Especially if it is considered in respect to the time of its composition; it is an extraordinary work; its peculiarly per- onal romanticism is of a type hich was represented in con- emporary literature, but which ad to wait for several decades to nd widespread representation in mphonic music.

Both works, but particularly the rlioz symphony, gave ample and nvincing illustration of the chnical and interpretative owess of Dr. Koussevitzky and s musicians, who seemed to alize the presence of a sympathe- and appreciative audience. The asurably singing quality of the e of the Boston string choirs s one of the features which im- ssed themselves upon the lis- ers' ears, but this orchestra is ed not for the superiority of of its sections over another, for the prevalently high and n standard which marks all of component elements, and for r instant responsiveness to r conductor's wishes. The Mo- symphony received an appeal- straightforward performance ked by tonal delectability and irable taste, in which, if any ction is to be made, the an- te stood out for the singing mth of tone which marked the lation of its haunting melot at least one listener's mem- dwelt more tenaciously upon performance of the Berlioz phony; its combination of un- tionable balance and clarity nesse of detail with vividness of instrumental color and emotional expression. While one does not have to take every word of Berlioz's written program with complete seriousness, the emotional outspokeness and intensity of the work would be hard to deny, and, under Dr. Koussevitzky, who thoroughly understands it, its emotional force as well as rich-hued and deftly wrought scoring were set forth with irresistible conviction. Much more space than wartime conditions permit would be needed to describe the interpretation, ranging from the pastoral calm of the Scene in the Meadows to the macabre pomp of the March to the Scaffold. The fervor of the applause corresponded to the merits of the performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented the National Anthem with the broad, dignified tempo which he prefers for it. The audience was asked to sing the closing stanza, whose words have an appropriately contemporary application.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 10 1944

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Symphonie Fantastique..........Berlioz
Mathis der Maler..........Hindemith

Diminishing Artistic Returns

THERE is a point in the perfection of artistic skills beyond which further progress is without artistic value. The surface becomes so shiny that nothing else can be perceived. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dangerously close to that point for several years now; and if last night's concert in Carnegie Hall is typical of the orchestra's present work, one may well judge that the point of optimum precision has now been passed.

* * *

Matters of musical understanding, of stylistic penetration and of interpretative warmth all aside—for these constitute the inner substance of music—its outer substance, sound, is wholly a matter of precision. Precisions of attack, of pitch, of color, of phrasing, of force, of blending constitute the musical amenities. Ultimate perfection in any of them is unattainable, but a reasonable degree of accuracy makes it possible for the meaning of music to be transmitted. Overmeticulousness about any of them will more often than not defeat this end.

* * *

One has heard string quartets play so carefully for beauty of tone that all the attacks became tenuous and the rhythm got lost. One has observed them so preoccupied about simultaneity of attack that the repeated split second in which the players look at another before beginning each phrase ends by destroying the music's line. One has heard all the amenities sacrificed for a relentless rhythm or a climactic effect; and on the whole, this procedure is probably less injurious to musical communication than the more delicate violences.

* * *

Some of the precisions observed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night were good for the music and some were not. In both the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" and the Hindemith "Mathis der Maler," the instrumental colors, the mixtures and shades of sound, were more delicately differentiated and more expressively exact than this listener has ever heard them before. But their exactitude was achieved at the price of such watchfulness that both pieces seemed lacking in coherence and in continuity. In both of them, for example, Mr. Koussevitzky took such long breaths between phrases that one forgot there was supposed to be any sequence among these.

* * *

This wide spacing of phrases, plus the use of tempos rather slower than the standard French ones, dragged the Berlioz work out a good ten minutes longer than it is accustomed to last. (Forty-six minutes is the average timing of it; fifty minutes is a long version. Koussevitzky took an hour.) The first three movements seemed interminable. I did not time the Hindemith work, but it seemed slow, gasping and overemphatic. All this was the result of too much care about phrase attacks and instrumental blending. The attacks and the blending were incredibly precise. But the beautiful and spicy sounds we heard were less a performance of music by Berlioz and Hindemith than they were a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK N.Y.
SUN

FEB 10 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS VIRTUOSITY

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Boston Symphony subscribers enjoyed an evening of topflight virtuosity in Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky's ensemble was at its technical best, which means that the evening was given over to playing of the most brilliant order.

Two compositions, one of 1830-31, the other of 1934, composed the program. Both are designated as symphonies, and there can be no more reason to quibble about the right of Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" to be so classified, though it is really a triptych of excerpts from an opera, than that of Berlioz's "Fantastique," which includes music originally composed for "Le Francs-Juges," also intended as an opera.

As Mr. Koussevitzky presented them, both were showpieces. Old disagreements about the music of Berlioz will go on, and so will performances of the "Fantastique." This one was very expert, very bright, and more theatrical than emotional.

"Mathis der Maler" remains the showiest and yet the most orthodox of Hindemith's orchestral works, which are not many. It establishes the readiest contact with audiences that cling to symphonies of a traditional order. By and large, it can be regarded as the man of Hanau's most convincing work. Whether, after repeated hearings, it yields more of the familiar linear counterpoint than it does of juice, is opinion. Certainly it remains outstanding among orchestral compositions of the period between the wars.

Mr. Koussevitzky's scintillant performance uncovered no new spiritual values, but awakened fresh admiration for the fine integration of structure and the boldly individual scoring that give this work its aura of mastery among symphonic productions of its time. Whether it may hope to outlive that time is just as debatable as it was when the work was altogether new. For the moment, it is enough to salute the technical legerdemain of the performance and let prophecy go hang.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

FEB 10 1944

—Simon—

Once Berlioz Was A Modern, Too

The Boston Symphony's Wednesday night program at Carnegie Hall listed just two numbers—Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony and Paul Hindemith's Mathis der Mahler, a striking piece of program-making. For different as the works are in idiom and subject matter, there is a musical parallel that might never have struck one if they had not been heard together.

Berlioz' work is 114 years old and Hindemith's barely 10, and in its time, the former must have sounded quite as strange and disturbing as the latter does today. By this time, the Symphony's boldness of design and orchestral color are no longer startling, though its skill may still be a source of wonder. Much of the 19th century romantic posing and breast-beating can sound convincing only to Berlioz cultists, but the Waltz and the March to the Scaffold are still quite fresh and the final movement puts the Dies Irae into a telling setting.

Mathis der Mahler remains one of the most powerful and moving works of the present century. Without being a political tract, its reflection of a devout, revolutionary figure of the 16th century bears a poignant message to our own terrible times couched in tense, quiet and finally terrifying musical accents. Some time its 20th century humanity may seem as old as Berlioz' 19th century romanticism does today, but it is hard to believe it now.

Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra were cheered for their performances.—HENRY SIMON.

[51]

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

FEB 6 1944

Realm of Music

Koussevitzky Announces Revised Program for Thursday Night

By MARGUERITE KRAHENBUHL

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has revised the program the Boston Symphony will play ~~in the~~ Mosque Thursday under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. The selections will now be the Brahms Second Symphony; Aaron Copland's new work, "A Lincoln Portrait," and "Francesca da Rimini," an orchestral fantasie by Tchaikovsky. Will Geer will serve as speaker during the Copland work. The Brahms is regarded as one of the most important interpretations boasted by Koussevitzky and his orchestra, and, of course, their Tchaikovsky has long drawn listeners to their concerts.

The foundation, by the way, is again sponsoring its auditions for music students of the piano, violin and voice. Trials are scheduled for March, April and May, with professional examiners doing the judging. Application blanks may be obtained by writing the foundation at 605 Broad street.

Choral Festival

New Jersey Federation of Music Clubs will sponsor a choral festival April 28 in the Mutual Benefit Auditorium and a similar event for choir groups April 30. These events will be part of the program for the 16th convention of the federation at the Hotel Sheraton, opening April 28. Berenice Scher, Atlantic City pianist, winner of the Edgar Stillman Kelley scholarship of the national federation, and Helen Janov, Collingswood violinist, another contest winner, will play during the conference.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

FEB 5 - 1944

SYMPHONY PLAYS HINDEMITH'S WORK

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, Feb. 4.—(AP) In fine fettle after his customary mid-season vacation, Serge Koussevitzky today led the Boston Symphony orchestra through an exciting and definitive performance of Paul Hindemith's great "Mathis der Maler" symphony—highlight of an otherwise classically conservative program.

The Hindemith work, comprising three orchestral excerpts from the opera of the same name, first was played by the Berlin Philharmonic in March, 1934. It had not been heard in Symphony hall in nearly three years.

With expert tonal symbolism the German-born composer described Matthias Grunewald's three Sixteenth-century Isenheim altar pieces "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony." The score had exceptional vitality and plasticity, the imaginative polyphonic development of musical thoughts making it descriptive music of the highest order.

The Boston Symphony played "Mathis der Maler" ("Matthias the Painter") superbly. Strings and woodwinds were brilliant throughout—but especially so in the astonishing third movement portrait of the Saint being tortured by fantastic beasts.

The remainder of the program was devoted to Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3, and the Brahms Third symphony in F major. Both were interpreted satisfactorily, but somehow they lacked the brilliance, force and complete conviction which characterized the Koussevitzky performance of Hindemith.

CLIFTON, N.J.
TIMES
2/10/44

Music Called Vital Need by Koussevitzky

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he will appear in Newark, at the Mosque Theatre, at 8:40 tonight under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. His eyes flashed as he went on to say:

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 29 1944

Viola to Stuff Trumpet's Bird

BOSTON, Feb. 29 (UP) — Georges Mager, first trumpet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ~~his wife were~~ heartbroken when their pet canary died.

So they decided to have it stuffed, and keep it in its cage.

Consulting the classified section of the telephone directory, they found that the nearest taxidermist was "S. W. Gerhardt, Jamaica Plain."

Arriving at the address, Mager was astonished to discover that the taxidermist was none other than his colleague, Siegfried Gerhardt, whose vocation is playing the viola in the Symphony Orchestra but whose avocation is stuffing such things as canaries.

Post
Feb 7

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three rousing cheers were in order at the end of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, though an unaccountably apathetic audience was in no mood to provide them: one for Dr. Koussevitzky, one for his unapproachable orchestra (especially when he conducts it) and one for Paul Hindemith, whose "Mathis der Maler" set the capstone on a logically planned and singularly satisfying programme, having for its other items Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and the Third Symphony of Brahms.

From the standpoint of logic all this programme lacked was something by Bach at the very beginning. The circle then would have been complete, for Hindemith, while not ignoring any of his predecessors—even Wagner and Strauss, find their way into the last movement of "Mathis," "The Temptation of St. Anthony"—nevertheless bases his style and his musical thinking on that of the Leipzig Cantor.

More than one work that has come from Hindemith's pen since this "Mathias the Painter" has brought that work to mind. Perhaps we can already say that it contains the essence of his style, as "Tristan" contains the essence of Wagner, and that if all his other music were to disappear this masterpiece, for masterpiece it certainly is, would show us what he stood for, what he represented. Incidentally, "back to Bach" in the case of Hindemith does not imply arid neo-classicism, the mere application of a modern twist to formulas already exhausted. In "Mathis," particularly, we are a long, long way from that sort of thing.

It would be hard for the present generation to see where the late Philip Hale got his pet notion that the music of Brahms was granitic. In most contemporary performances, those of Dr. Koussevitzky are a conspicuous case in point, it is anything but. The word lush would fit a whole lot better. But in Hale's day conductors tried to make Brahms' music sound the way the composer himself looked and acted. The portly figure was there, as were the whiskers and the brusque, gruff exterior. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky went too far the other way yesterday, though the Symphony sounded awfully well. One might easily urge that the end was over-poetized. Nor is the doctor's rather feverish conception of "Leonore" No. 3 the one that is held by everybody.

NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY

FEB 9 - 1944

Thurs-
port to ng dis-

O ALL

OPY

a;

g

n Symphony in Fourth ge Concert Series

CIS D. PERKINS

symphony orchestra,
Serge Koussevitzky,
annual appearance
ticut college concert ight in the Palmer
efore an audience
ted the utmost ca-
all. The noted con-his program to two contrasting chars symphony in E
No. 543 in Koechel's
at genius's works,
Berlioz's Fantastic
14A. ert by the Boston become an annual London's musical nnecessary to dwell on the paramount merits of this orchestra and its conductor, which were again made manifest in the two works heard by yesterday's enthusiastic listeners. Many regard this organization as the foremost of its kind in this country or, indeed, anywhere. Its high standing can be credited both to the skill and artistry of its musicians and to the interpretative insight, imagination and inspiring leadership of its director, who is now rounding out his 20th Boston season. It is hard for an orchestra to be at its best under a succession of short-term conductors; the Boston Symphony copes with no such handicap, and both the technical finish and expressive persuasiveness of yesterday's concert set forth the orchestra and its conductor as a single musical and expressive entity.

Mozart's E flat symphony, one of the memorable three symphonies composed in 1788, has long held its place as a charter member of the standard symphonic repertoire. The Fantastic Symphony, composed 42 years later, can also be considered as of the standard repertoire, but its popularity is of more recent standing. Most works written over a century ago have been assigned a place by the consensus of musical opinion, but there are quite a few who claim that a due appreciation of Berlioz's music has not yet been achieved. Especially if it is considered in respect to the time of its composition; it is an extraordinary work; its peculiarly personal romanticism is of a type which was represented in contemporary literature, but which had to wait for several decades to find widespread representation in symphonic music.

Both works, but particularly the Berlioz symphony, gave ample and convincing illustration of the technical and interpretative prowess of Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians, who seemed to realize the presence of a sympathetic and appreciative audience. The treasurably singing quality of the tone of the Boston string choirs was one of the features which impressed themselves upon the listeners' ears, but this orchestra is noted not for the superiority of one of its sections over another, but for the prevalently high and even standard which marks all of its component elements, and for their instant responsiveness to their conductor's wishes. The Mozart symphony received an appealing, straightforward performance marked by tonal delectability and admirable taste, in which, if any selection is to be made, the andante stood out for the singing warmth of tone which marked the revelation of its haunting melodies.

But at least one listener's memory dwells more tenaciously upon the performance of the Berlioz symphony; its combination of unexceptionable balance and clarity and finesse of detail with vividness of instrumental color and emotional expression. While one does not have to take every word of Berlioz's written program with complete seriousness, the emotional outspokeness and intensity of the work would be hard to deny, and, under Dr. Koussevitzky, who thoroughly understands it, its emotional force as well as rich-hued and deftly wrought scoring were set forth with irresistible conviction. Much more space than wartime conditions permit would be needed to describe the interpretation, ranging from the pastoral calm of the Scene in the Meadows to the macabre pomp of the March to the Scaffold. The fervor of the applause corresponded to the merits of the performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented the National Anthem with the broad, dignified tempo which he prefers for it. The audience was asked to sing the closing stanza, whose words have an appropriately contemporary application.

NEW YORK N.Y.
SUN
FEB 10 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS VIRTUOSITY

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Boston Symphony subscribers enjoyed an evening of topflight virtuosity in Carnegie Hall last night. Serge Koussevitzky's ensemble was at its technical best, which means that the evening was given over to playing of the most brilliant order.

Two compositions, one of 1830-31, the other of 1934, composed the program. Both are designated as symphonies, and there can be no more reason to quibble about the right of Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" to be so classified, though it is really a triptych of excerpts from an opera, than that of Berlioz's "Fantastique," which includes music originally composed for "Le Francs-Juges," also intended as an opera.

As Mr. Koussevitzky presented them, both were showpieces. Old disagreements about the music of Berlioz will go on, and so will performances of the "Fantastique." This one was very expert, very bright, and more theatrical than emotional.

"Mathis der Maler" remains the showiest and yet the most orthodox of Hindemith's orchestral works, which are not many. It establishes the readiest contact with audiences that cling to symphonies of a traditional order. By and large, it can be regarded as the man of Hanau's most convincing work. Whether, after repeated hearings, it yields more of the familiar linear counterpoint than it does of juice, is opinion. Certainly it remains outstanding among orchestral compositions of the period between the wars.

Mr. Koussevitzky's scintillant performance uncovered no new spiritual values, but awakened fresh admiration for the fine integration of structure and the boldly individual scoring that give this work its aura of mastery among symphonic productions of its time. Whether it may hope to outlive that time is just as debatable as it was when the work was altogether new. For the moment, it is enough to salute the technical legerdemain of the performance and let prophecy go hang.

NEW YORK. N
HERALD

M U S I C

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert in Carnegie ~~Hall~~ last night. The program:
Symphonie Fantastique............Berlioz
Mathis der Maler...............Hindemith

Diminishing Artistic Returns

THERE is a point in the perfection of artistic skills beyond which further progress is without artistic value. The surface becomes so shiny that nothing else can be perceived. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dangerously close to that point for several years now; and if last night's concert in Carnegie Hall is typical of the orchestra's present work, one may well judge that the point of optimum precision has now been passed.

* * *

Matters of musical understanding, of stylistic penetration and of interpretative warmth all aside—for these constitute the inner substance of music—its outer substance, sound, is wholly a matter of precision. Precisions of attack, of pitch, of color, of phrasing, of force, of blending constitute the musical amenities. Ultimate perfection in any of them is unattainable, but a reasonable degree of accuracy makes it possible for the meaning of music to be transmitted. Overmeticulousness about any of them will more often than not defeat this end.

* * *

One has heard string quartets play so carefully for beauty of tone that all the attacks became tenuous and the rhythm got lost. One has observed them so preoccupied about simultaneity of attack that the repeated split second in which the players look at another before beginning each phrase ends by destroying the music's line. One has heard all the amenities sacrificed for a relentless rh mactic effect; and this procedure is pro jurious to musical co than the more delica

* *

Some of the precisio by the Boston Sympho tra last night were go music and some were n
the Berlioz "Symphon tique" and the Hindem der Maler," the instrum ors, the mixtures and sound, were more delica entiated and more expre act than this listener heard them before. Bu actitude was achieved a of such watchfulness pieces seemed lacking in and in continuity. In both for example, Mr. Koussev such long breaths betwee that one forgot there was to be any sequence amo

* * *

This wide spacing of plus the use of tempo slower than the standard ones, dragged the Berlioz a good ten minutes longe is accustomed to last. ( minutes is the average it; fifty minutes is a long Koussevitzky took an ho first three movements se terminable. I did not Hindemith work, but i slow, gasping and overe
All this was the result of t care about phrase attacks strumental blending. The and the blending were in precise. But the beautif spicy sounds we heard w a performance of music by and Hindemith than they a performance by the Symphony Orchestra.

fo
Ne

ST.
Walla resea ment sor e the S ingto at hi one
Dr work suffe sum ceive the soci nose vise tion
S duc mo pol gui rep cor we off
St in wa ci
th
G w
L
A ld

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

FEB 10 1944

—Simon—

Once Berlioz W A Modern,

The Boston Symphony's We day night program at Carnegi listed just two numbers—B Fantastic Symphony and Hindemith's Mathis der Ma striking piece of program-m
For different as the works idiom and subject matter, th musical parallel that migh have struck one if they been heard together.

texts good 1000

Sh
t mer
Rot
27th ly-w well

Berlioz' work is 114 years old and Hindemith's barely 10, and in its time, the former must have sounded quite as strange and disturbing as the latter does today. By this time, the Symphony's boldness of design and orchestral color are no longer startling, though its skill may still be a source of wonder. Much of the 19th century romantic posing and breast-beating can sound convincing only to Berlioz cultists, but the Waltz and the March to the Scaffold are still quite fresh and the final movement puts the Dies Irae into a telling setting.

Mathis der Mahler remains one of the most powerful and moving works of the present century. Without being a political tract, its reflection of a devout, revolutionary figure of the 16th century bears a poignant message to our own terrible times couched in tense, quiet and finally terrifying musical accents. Some time its 20th century humanity may seem as old as Berlioz' 19th century romanticism does today, but it is hard to believe it now.

Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ and his orchestra were cheered for their performances.—HENRY SIMON.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Offers Berlioz 'Fantastic' and Hindemith's 'Mathis des Maler'

By NOEL STRAUS

Two symphonies, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," formed the offerings presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall. To devote an evening to works both belonging to the programmatic category might easily have lacked sufficient variety. But not in this instance, due to the wide divergence of the compositions in subject matter, style and treatment, which resulted in each proving an effective foil to the other.

Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony was so drastically original when it was written that it confounded most of its early listeners, and in no other work of its genre did any composer depart so radically from precedent in the history of the art, not only in musical content but also in the matter of scoring. At one bound Berlioz, in this first of his important compositions, opened the way that led to the innovations which changed the course of musical creation down to the present day. And this epochal symphony was written but three years after the death of Beethoven, when Berlioz was only 26, making its revolutionary qualities all the more remarkable.

Symphony Is Discussed

The "Fantistic" incorporates elements anticipating the tone poems of Liszt, the leitmotiv of Wagner. Even the idea of the cyclical form introduced by Liszt is implicit in the work, with its employment of a predominating theme, the "idée fixe," which undergoes transformations in each of the five movements. The symphony, moreover, exploited the possibilities of the orchestra in an entirely new manner that freed it from old conventions and introduced a wealth of color combinations so effective and successful that it has exerted immense influence on composers ever since its own time to our own period.

Whether Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" will still figure on concert programs a century after its première, as the Berlioz does, none can tell. But it seems improbable. For its virtues lie more in its technical adroitness than in its ability to stir the emotions vitally, and only works boasting the latter quality have survived for any length of time.

The Hindemith symphony, derived from the composer's opera of the same name dealing with episodes in the life of Matthias Gruenewald, the sixteenth-century German painter, consists of three movements, entitled respectively, "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," which were inspired by the three panels of Gruenewald's Isenheim altar piece in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Unlike Berlioz Hindemith in these movements is not literally programmatic, but his music generalizes instead, employing old German folk and liturgical melodies to aid in recording impressions made on him by the Gruenewald paintings.

Score Has Vitality

In "Mathis" the composer is far less objective than in his earlier works, but he employs his typical unison themes in it on occasion, and all of it bears the stamp of his creative personality in its rhythmic vitality and its perfection of polyphonic writing. Simplicity is attempted in the brief "Entombment." But Hindemith finds most to impart in the two other movements, where he develops his ideas with a finesse, fluidity inexorable logic that result in the most impressive opus yet to his credit.

Especially eloquent are the episode in the "Angelic Concert" where the three themes, including the old song, "Es sungen drei Engel" are worked against each other, and the climactic peroration of "The Temptatiaon of Saint Anthony," in which the hymn "Lauda Sion Salvatorem" is heard over an ostinato figure based on the theme announced in the stirring introduction to the movement, followed by a final exuberant proclamation of a "Hallelujah" by the brasses.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the most vivid sort of readings of both of the symphonies. They were alike brilliant in orchestral virtuosity, glamorous application of color, clarity and transparency. Especially noteworthy in the Berlioz were the close of the "Scene in the Fields" with its wonderful evocation of mood, the rousing power of the "March to the Gallows" and the entire "Witches' Sabbath," given with amazing verve and filled with details of rare vividness in the depiction of its diabolical content. Throughout the work the interpretation was on a grand scale and alive with dramatic intensity. The Hindemith opus was as magisterially performed and it was no wonder that bravos resounded through the hall at the conclusion of each of the offerings.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

FEB 10 1944

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Contrives Unusual Program For Boston Symphony's Concert

Only two works graced the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its third evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Some might question the word "graced" upon learning that the numbers were Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Hindemith's Symphony, "Mathis der Maler." If the music did not exactly please them, they were undoubtedly so engrossed in the superb performances given that their feeling that the works were not altogether satisfying melted away.

Performance counted for more than interpretation at this concert. This circumstance was the more observable in the Berlioz than in the Hindemith; in fact, the Hindemith was justly interpreted. What happened in the Berlioz was simply that it was too well played. Attaining the lucidity in ensemble and the clarity in playing that he did, Koussevitzky tended to thin the fabric of this essentially romantic and dramatic symphony. The performance needed more integration to give solidity to the subject matter and to achieve an interpretation in keeping with the nature of the work.

A strange thing occurred. The work emerged threadbare because of this refinement in performance, yet it is music essentially surging with emotion and gorgeous in orchestration. The dramatic impact became theatrical effect. In polishing up the playing the conductor treated the score as though it were an 18th Century instead of a 19th Century work. Crystal clarity superseded expressiveness and too broad a tempo dampened the fervor of the music. Withal, it was marvelously played: an achievement in execution if not in interpretation.

The same phenomena applied to the Hindemith in a considerably lesser degree. Koussevitzky has given a finer, more convincing interpretation of this notable modern score at another time. That the music holds up well is tribute to its quality and substance: one of the outstanding contributions that the composer has made to contemporary music.

The juxtaposition of Berlioz and Hindemith made interesting contrasts and comparisons. Both had programmatic impulses, both were masters of orchestration. Each had his individual style, each his mood of expression. Controversies surge around the music of both men, neither of whom is considered first rate. Berlioz persists because this work, for instance, is too good ever to be discarded; Hindemith's work represents him at his best, a composer not easily cast aside in reckoning with 20th Century composers. The program was shrewdly planned.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~EVENING UNION~~

FEB 15 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY PUPIL BOSSES OLD BOSSES

Boston, Feb. 15—Turning the tables, 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein of New York city this week is leading a group of veteran musicians who not long ago were leading him through the intricacies of orchestral technic.

Bernstein, Lawrence-born and Harvard-educated composer and assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, is serving as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the summers of 1940, 1941 and 1942, Bernstein was a student conductor under training at the Berkshire Music center at Lenox, whose faculty of 30 Boston symphony members was headed by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

LINTON, IND.
CITIZEN

FEB 17 1944

NO MORE ENCORES

NEWPORT, R. I. (U.P.)—Roger Voisin of West Roxbury, Mass., who used to receive encore requests from Boston Symphony Orchestra enthusiasts, now is getting a vastly different reaction to his trumpet arpeggios. He's bugler at the Naval Training Station here.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1944

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Offers Berlioz 'Fantastic' and Hindemith's 'Mathis des Maler'

By NOEL STRAUS

Two symphonies, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," formed the offerings presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall. To devote an evening to works both belonging to the programmatic category might easily have lacked sufficient variety. But not in this instance, due to the wide divergence of the compositions in subject matter, style and treatment, which resulted in each proving an effective foil to the other.

Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony was so drastically original when it was written that it confounded most of its early listeners, and in no other work of its genre did any composer depart so radically from precedent in the history of the art, not only in musical content but also in the matter of scoring. At one bound Berlioz, in this first of his important compositions, opened the way that led to the innovations which changed the course of musical creation down to the present day. And this epochal symphony was written but three years after the death of Beethoven, when Berlioz was only 26, making its revolutionary qualities all the more remarkable.

Symphony Is Discussed

The "Fantistic" incorporates elements anticipating the tone poems of Liszt, the leitmotiv of Wagner. Even the idea of the cyclical form introduced by Liszt is implicit in the work, with its employment of a predominating theme, the "idée fixe," which undergoes transformations in each of the five movements. The symphony, moreover, exploited the possibilities of the orchestra in an entirely new manner that freed it from old conventions and introduced a wealth of color combinations so effective and successful that it has exerted immense influence on composers ever since its own time to our own period.

Whether Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" will still figure on concert programs a century after its première, as the Berlioz does, none can tell. But it seems improbable. For its virtues lie more in its technical adroitness than in its ability to stir the emotions vitally, and only works boasting the latter quality have survived for any length of time.

The Hindemith symphony, derived from the composer's opera of the same name dealing with episodes in the life of Matthias Gruenewald, the sixteenth-century German painter, consists of three movements, entitled respectively, "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," which were inspired by the three panels of Gruenewald's Isenheim altar piece in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Unlike Berlioz, Hindemith in these movements is not literally programmatic, but his music generalizes instead, employing old German folk and liturgical melodies to aid in recording impressions made on him by the Gruenewald paintings.

In "Mathis" the composer is far less objective than in his earlier works, but he employs his typical unison themes in it on occasion, and all of it bears the stamp of his creative personality in its rhythmic vitality and its perfection of polyphonic writing. Simplicity is attempted in the brief "Entombment." But Hindemith finds most to impart in the two other movements, where he develops his ideas with a finesse, fluidity and inexorable logic that result in the most impressive opus yet to his credit.

Especially eloquent are the episode in the "Angelic Concert" where the three themes, including the old song, "Es sungen drei Engel" are worked against each other, and the climactic peroration of "The Temptatiaon of Saint Anthony," in which the hymn "Lauda Sion Salvatorem" is heard over an ostinato figure based on the theme announced in the stirring introduction to the movement, followed by a final exuberant proclamation of a "Hallelujah" by the brasses.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the most vivid sort of readings of both of the symphonies. They were alike brilliant in orchestral virtuosity, glamorous application of color, clarity and transparency. Especially noteworthy in the Berlioz were the close of the "Scene in the Fields" with its wonderful evocation of mood, the rousing power of the "March to the Gallows" and the entire "Witches' Sabbath," given with amazing verve and filled with details of rare vividness in the depiction of its diabolical content. Throughout the work the interpretation was on a grand scale and alive with dramatic intensity. The Hindemith opus was as magisterially performed and it was no wonder that bravos resounded through the hall at the conclusion of each of the offerings.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 10 1944

Serge Koussevitzsky Conducts Boston Symphony on 3d Visit

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was host to several thousand paying guests at Carnegie Hall last evening, at its third New York visit this season and, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, presented a program consisting of two compositions remarkable for contrast in matter and treatment.

These were Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maier."

The Berlioz work, a revelation of his own his distressing romance, is a most graphic example of descriptive writing illustrating, according to the composer's analysis, "an obsessing idea which is almost a pathological location."

The exotic language of the symphony, the varied and numerous prismatic tints of the melodies; the unique treatment in harmonization, afford unlimited scope for the interpreting unit, and as it was read last evening, according to Koussevitzky's conception, it proved to be a thrilling and earnest unfoldment of the impassioned score, an eloquent reflection of every picturesque incident and suggestion with which the music is so generously endowed.

The Hindemith number, a glorification of a 16th century German painter, had served some seasons ago as the inspiration for a successful ballet. The music possesses much that is inspired and dramatic, tinged with the devotional. Only part of the composition was heard by this writer but that portion was definitely impressive.

* * *

"Boheme" was offered at the Metropolitan last evening with several changes from the cast that participated at the previous performances. Grace Moore sang Mimi for the first time this season. Her voice has grown in power since last she portrayed the part of the delicate, ailing heroine. Her tones, however, were of pleasing quality even well and securely produced and effectively colored. Frances Greer, as Musetta, was vivacious and was applauded for her second act aria.

Nino Martini returned to the role of Rodolfo and gave a particularly satisfying performance. He was greeted with "bravos" after "Che geleda manina" and a ringing high C. Other leading parts were presented by Francesco Valentino (Marcello); Virgilio Lazzari (Colline); Salvatore Baccaloni (Benoit and Alcindoro); George Cehanovsky (Schaunard), and Lodavico Oliviero (Farpignol), Cesare Sodero conducted.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An "Ecumenical Mass" (Missa Oecumenica) by Alexander Gretchaninoff, 79-year-old Russian composer now living in New York, had its first performance at the symphony concert of yesterday afternoon.

The orchestra was assisted by the choruses of the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club, prepared by Arthur Fiedler, and by these solo singers: Maria Kurenko, soprano; Dorothy Cornish, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. E. Power Biggs was the organist.

A prolific composer in many forms, Gretchaninoff is best known in this country by his sacred choral music and his songs, a few of which have attained considerable celebrity. It was only to be expected that his Mass would prove well written for the voices, both solo and choral. The music is no less grateful for the orchestra, though the scoring is conventional, reminiscent of an older day.

From a purely sonorous standpoint, then, the Mass may be pronounced successful. The music itself is, however, undistinguished, hardly more than the work of a competent craftsman. Only in the Sanctus did it rise for a moment above the level of agreeable commonplace. The composer's avowed intention of writing a mass in which would be combined the musical character of the eastern-western churches seemed to promise more in the matter of diversity of style than was actually forthcoming. In these days, however, suavity is at something of a premium and it was quite apparent that the audience as a whole found this mild music greatly to its liking. There was much applause for the solo singers, competent in their several ways, and the applause was increased when the composer, looking very spry for his years, appeared upon the stage.

Feb 26

After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky returned to conduct the only other number on the programme, Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Time was when he used to present "Tod un Verklaerung" magnificently, but of late his version of it has become excessively mannered, static in the first section, hectic in much of the middle part and incredibly drawn out at the end. Such treatment serves to emphasize the weakness of the music rather than its strength. Nor was the performance tonally irreproachable

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 10 1944

Magnificent Music by Boston Symphony

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Only two numbers made up the program of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last evening. They were the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the Hindemith Mathis der Maler. But what numbers! What magnificence of orchestral sound is in them and what variety of expression, and what imagination and resource!

These qualities of the works are always realistically present in performances such as were given them last night by the Bostonians under the magical direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Berlioz' Grande Passion.

There are times when the Boston Symphony is not all that it is cracked up to be, when—for some reason or other—virtuosity takes a holiday and in its place comes the listless, routine toss-off of music that should be right in that organization's hip pocket.

This, however, was not one of them, and it may not be altogether inapropos to mention previous imperfections and to forget them straightway in the presence of the orchestral beauties we heard in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Berlioz, a hot and high-handed Romeo of his time, wrote this Fantastic Symphony under the spell of a grande passion for Harriet Smithson, the Shakespearean actress who had felled him with her golden voice as Juliet and Ophelia. He saw her, heard her, loved her from a distance and wooed her madly. He wound up marrying her and lived a pitifully unhappy life with her.

Works Well Played.

Whatever else can be said of the work, it cannot be denied that Berlioz depicted his raving infatuation of her. He even attempted in his stormy jealousy, to call her names in his music. And whether contemporary listeners care or not, the mark of a fantastic love, as fantastic as this symphony, is boldly imprinted on each of its notes.

Hindemith's Mathis der Maler Symphony is the result of an entirely different love, a respectful and spiritual adoration, in fact, of the paintings that constitute the Isenheim Altar piece, which might once (prewar) have been found in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Originally an opera (which has never been performed), Mathis der Maler became a three-movement symphony of similar inspiration, though the character of Matthias Gruenewald—who is the painter—is not represented in the symphony, as it is in the opera.

Both of these works are great works, both calling for the most polished, the most subtly conceived execution, each in its way. To say that the Boston Symphony fell short of that would be falling short of the truth, for rarely has this body of musicians sounded so united, so clear-aimed as it did on this occasion. It was an inspiring concert that Mr. Koussevitzky presented his listeners with and they—a huge number of them—were enthusiastic in their gratitude.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Offers Berlioz 'Fantastic' and Hindemith's 'Mathis des Maler'

By NOEL STRAUS

Two symphonies, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz and Hindemith's "Marthis der Maler," formed the offerings presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall. To devote an evening to works both belonging to the programmatic category might easily have lacked sufficient variety. But not in this instance, due to the wide divergence of the compositions in subject matter, style and treatment, which resulted in each proving an effective foil to the other.

Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony was so drastically original when it was written that it confounded most of its early listeners, and in no other work of its genre did any composer depart so radically from precedent in the history of the art, not only in musical content but also in the matter of scoring. At one bound Berlioz, in this first of his important compositions, opened the way that led to the innovations which changed the course of musical creation down to the present day. And this epochal symphony was written but three years after the death of Beethoven, when Berlioz was only 26, making its revolutionary qualities all the more remarkable.

Symphony Is Discussed

The "Fantistic" incorporates elements anticipating the tone poems of Liszt, the leitmotiv of Wagner. Even the idea of the cyclical form introduced by Liszt is implicit in the work, with its employment of a predominating theme, the "idée fixe," which undergoes transformations in each of the five movements. The symphony, moreover, exploited the possibilities of the orchestra in an entirely new manner that freed it from old conventions and introduced a wealth of color combinations so effective and successful that it has exerted immense influence on composers ever since its own time to our own period.

Whether Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" will still figure on concert programs a century after its première, as the Berlioz does, none can tell. But it seems improbable. For its virtues lie more in its technical adroitness than in its ability to stir the emotions vitally, and only works boasting the latter quality have survived for any length of time.

The Hindemith symphony, derived from the composer's opera of the same name dealing with episodes in the life of Matthias Gruenewald, the sixteenth-century German painter, consists of three movements, entitled respectively, "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," which were inspired by the three panels of Gruenewald's Isenheim altar piece in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Unlike Berlioz, Hindemith in these movements is not literally programmatic, but his music generalizes instead, employing old German folk and liturgical melodies to aid in recording impressions made on him by the Gruenewald paintings.

Score Has Vitality

In "Mathis" the composer is far less objective than in his earlier works, but he employs his typical unison themes in it on occasion, and all of it bears the stamp of his creative personality in its rhythmic vitality and its perfection of polyphonic writing. Simplicity is attempted in the brief "Entombment." But Hindemith finds most to impart in the two other movements, where he develops his ideas with a finesse, fluidity inexorable logic that result in the most impressive opus yet to his credit.

Especially eloquent are the episode in the "Angelic Concert" where the three themes, including the old song, "Es sungen drei Engel" are worked against each other, and the climactic peroration of "The Temptatiaon of Saint Anthony," in which the hymn "Lauda Sion Salvatorem" is heard over an ostinato figure based on the theme announced in the stirring introduction to the movement, followed by a final exuberant proclamation of a "Hallelujah" by the brasses.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the most vivid sort of readings of both of the symphonies. They were alike brilliant in orchestral virtuosity, glamorous application of color, clarity and transparency. Especially noteworthy in the Berlioz were the close of the "Scene in the Fields" with its wonderful evocation of mood, the rousing power of the "March to the Gallows" and the entire "Witches' Sabbath," given with amazing verve and filled with details of rare vividness in the depiction of its diabolical content. Throughout the work the interpretation was on a grand scale and alive with dramatic intensity. The Hindemith opus was as magisterially performed and it was no wonder that bravos resounded through the hall at the conclusion of each of the offerings.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

FEB 10 1944

MUSIC OF THE DAY

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Contrives Unusual Program For Boston Symphony's Concert

Only two works graced the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its third evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Some might question the word "graced" upon learning that the numbers were Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Hindemith's Symphony, "Mathis der Maler." If the music did not exactly please them, they were undoubtedly so engrossed in the superb performances given that their feeling that the works were not altogether satisfying melted away.

Performance counted for more than interpretation at this concert. This circumstance was the more observable in the Berlioz than in the Hindemith; in fact, the Hindemith was justly interpreted. What happened in the Berlioz was simply that it was too well played. Attaining the lucidity in ensemble and the clarity in playing that he did, Koussevitzky tended to thin the fabric of this essentially romantic and dramatic symphony. The performance needed more integration to give solidity to the subject matter and to achieve an interpretation in keeping with the nature of the work.

A strange thing occurred. The work emerged threadbare because of this refinement in performance, yet it is music essentially surging with emotion and gorgeous in orchestration. The dramatic impact became theatrical effect. In polishing up the playing the conductor treated the score as though it were an 18th Century instead of a 19th Century work. Crystal clarity superseded expressiveness and too broad a tempo dampened the fervor of the music. Withal, it was marvelously played: an achievement in execution if not in interpretation.

The same phenomena applied to the Hindemith in a considerably lesser degree. Koussevitzky has given a finer, more convincing interpretation of this notable modern score at another time. That the music holds up well is tribute to its quality and substance: one of the outstanding contributions that the composer has made to contemporary music.

The juxtaposition of Berlioz and Hindemith made interesting contrasts and comparisons. Both had programmatic impulses, both were masters of orchestration. Each had his individual style, each his mood of expression. Controversies surge around the music of both men, neither of whom is considered first rate. Berlioz persists because this work, for instance, is too good ever to be discarded; Hindemith's work represents him at his best, a composer not easily cast aside in reckoning with 20th Century composers. The program was shrewdly planned.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
~~EVENING UNION~~

FEB 15 1944

KOUSSEVITZKY PUPIL BOSSES OLD BOSSES

Boston, Feb. 15—Turning the tables, 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein of New York city this week is leading a group of veteran musicians who not long ago were leading him through the intricacies of orchestral technic.

Bernstein, Lawrence-born and Harvard-educated composer and assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, is serving as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the summers of 1940, 1941 and 1942, Bernstein was a student conductor under training at the Berkshire Music center at Lenox, whose faculty of 30 Boston symphony members was headed by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

LINTON, IND.
CITIZEN

FEB 17 1944

NO MORE ENCORES

NEWPORT, R. I. (U.P.)—Roger Voisin of West Roxbury, Mass., who used to receive encore requests from Boston Symphony Orchestra enthusiasts, now is getting a vastly different reaction to his trumpet arpeggios. He's bugler at the Naval Training Station here.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 11 1944

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Offers Berlioz 'Fantastic' and Hindemith's 'Mathis des Maler'

By NOEL STRAUS

Two symphonies, the "Fantastic" of Berlioz and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," formed the offerings presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, last night in Carnegie Hall. To devote an evening to works both belonging to the programmatic category might easily have lacked sufficient variety. But not in this instance, due to the wide divergence of the compositions in subject matter, style and treatment, which resulted in each proving an effective foil to the other.

Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony was so drastically original when it was written that it confounded most of its early listeners, and in no other work of its genre did any composer depart so radically from precedent in the history of the art, not only in musical content but also in the matter of scoring. At one bound Berlioz, in this first of his important compositions, opened the way that led to the innovations which changed the course of musical creation down to the present day. And this epochal symphony was written but three years after the death of Beethoven, when Berlioz was only 26, making its revolutionary qualities all the more remarkable.

Symphony Is Discussed

The "Fantistic" incorporates elements anticipating the tone poems of Liszt, the leitmotiv of Wagner. Even the idea of the cyclical form introduced by Liszt is implicit in the work, with its employment of a predominating theme, the "idée fixe," which undergoes transformations in each of the five movements. The symphony, moreover, exploited the possibilities of the orchestra in an entirely new manner that freed it from old conventions and introduced a wealth of color combinations so effective and successful that it has exerted immense influence on composers ever since its own time to our own period.

Whether Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" will still figure on concert programs a century after its première, as the Berlioz does, none can tell. But it seems improbable. For its virtues lie more in its technical adroitness than in its ability to stir the emotions vitally, and only works boasting the latter quality have survived for any length of time.

The Hindemith symphony, derived from the composer's opera of the same name dealing with episodes in the life of Matthias Gruenewald, the sixteenth-century German painter, consists of three movements, entitled respectively, "Angelic Concert," "Entombment" and "The Temptation of Saint Anthony," which were inspired by the three panels of Gruenewald's Isenheim altar piece in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Unlike Berlioz, Hindemith in these movements is not literally programmatic, but his music generalizes instead, employing old German folk and liturgical melodies to aid in recording impressions made on him by the Gruenewald paintings.

In "Mathis" the composer is far less objective than in his earlier works, but he employs his typical unison themes in it on occasion, and all of it bears the stamp of his creative personality in its rhythmic vitality and its perfection of polyphonic writing. Simplicity is attempted in the brief "Entombment." But Hindemith finds most to impart in the two other movements, where he develops his ideas with a finesse, fluidity and inexorable logic that result in the most impressive opus yet to his credit.

Especially eloquent are the episode in the "Angelic Concert" where the three themes, including the old song, "Es sungen drei Engel" are worked against each other, and the climactic peroration of "The Temptatiaon of Saint Anthony," in which the hymn "Lauda Sion Salvatorem" is heard over an ostinato figure based on the theme announced in the stirring introduction to the movement, followed by a final exuberant proclamation of a "Hallelujah" by the brasses.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the most vivid sort of readings of both of the symphonies. They were alike brilliant in orchestral virtuosity, glamorous application of color, clarity and transparency. Especially noteworthy in the Berlioz were the close of the "Scene in the Fields" with its wonderful evocation of mood, the rousing power of the "March to the Gallows" and the entire "Witches' Sabbath," given with amazing verve and filled with details of rare vividness in the depiction of its diabolical content. Throughout the work the interpretation was on a grand scale and alive with dramatic intensity. The Hindemith opus was as magisterially performed and it was no wonder that bravos resounded through the hall at the conclusion of each of the offerings.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 10 1944

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony on 3d Visit

By GRENA BENNETT.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra was host to several thousand paying guests at Carnegie Hall last evening, at its third New York visit this season and, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, presented a program consisting of two compositions remarkable for contrast in matter and treatment.

These were Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and Hindemith's Symphony "Mathis der Maier."

The Berlioz work, a revelation of his own his distressing romance, is a most graphic example of descriptive writing illustrating, according to the composer's analysis, "an obsessing idea which is almost a pathological location."

The exotic language of the symphony, the varied and numerous prismatic tints of the melodies; the unique treatment in harmonization, afford unlimited scope for the interpreting unit, and as it was read last evening, according to Koussevitzky's conception, it proved to be a thrilling and earnest unfoldment of the impassioned score, an eloquent reflection of every picturesque incident and suggestion with which the music is so generously endowed.

The Hindemith number, a glorification of a 16th century German painter, had served some seasons ago as the inspiration for a successful ballet. The music possesses much that is inspired and dramatic, tinged with the devotional. Only part of the composition was heard by this writer but that portion was definitely impressive.

* * *

"Boheme" was offered at the Metropolitan last evening with several changes from the cast that participated at the previous performances. Grace Moore sang Mimi for the first time this season. Her voice has grown in power since last she portrayed the part of the delicate, ailing heroine. Her tones, however, were of pleasing quality even well and securely produced and effectively colored. Frances Greer, as Musetta, was vivacious and was applauded for her second act aria.

Nino Martini returned to the role of Rodolfo and gave a particularly satisfying performance. He was greeted with "bravos" after "Che geleda manina" and a ringing high C. Other leading parts were presented by Francesco Valentino (Marcello); Virgilio Lazzari (Colline); Salvatore Baccaloni (Benoit and Alcindoro); George Çehanovsky (Schaunard), and Lodavico Oliviero (Farpignol), Cesare Sodero conducted.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An "Ecumenical Mass" (Missa Oecumenica) by Alexander Gretchaninoff, 79-year-old Russian composer now living in New York, had its first performance at the symphony concert of yesterday afternoon.

The orchestra was assisted by the choruses of the Cecilia Society and Apollo Club, prepared by Arthur Fiedler, and by these solo singers: Maria Kurenko, soprano; Dorothy Cornish, contralto; Roland Hayes, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. E. Power Biggs was the organist.

A prolific composer in many forms, Gretchaninoff is best known in this country by his sacred choral music and his songs, a few of which have attained considerable celebrity. It was only to be expected that his Mass would prove well written for the voices, both solo and choral. The music is no less grateful for the orchestra, though the scoring is conventional, reminiscent of an older day.

From a purely sonorous standpoint, then, the Mass may be pronounced successful. The music itself is, however, undistinguished, hardly more than the work of a competent craftsman. Only in the Sanctus did it rise for a moment above the level of agreeable commonplace. The composer's avowed intention of writing a mass in which would be combined the musical character of the eastern-western churches seemed to premise more in the matter of diversity of style than was actually forthcoming. In these days, however, suavity is at something of a premium and it was quite apparent that the audience as a whole found this mild music greatly to its liking. There was much applause for the solo singers, competent in their several ways, and the applause was increased when the composer, looking very spry for his years, appeared upon the stage.

Feb 26

After the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky returned to conduct the only other number on the programme, Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Time was when he used to present "Tod un Verklaerung" magnificently, but of late his version of it has become excessively mannered, static in the first section, hectic in much of the middle part and incredibly drawn out at the end. Such treatment serves to emphasize the weakness of the music rather than its strength. Nor was the performance tonally irreproachable

---

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 10 1944

Magnificent Music by Boston Symphony

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Only two numbers made up the program of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last evening. They were the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony and the Hindemith Mathis der Maler. But what numbers! What magnificence of orchestral sound is in them and what variety of expression, and what imagination and resource!

These qualities of the works are always realistically present in performances such as were given them last night by the Bostonians under the magical direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Berlioz' Grande Passion.

There are times when the Boston Symphony is not all that it is cracked up to be, when—for some reason or other—virtuosity takes a holiday and in its place comes the listless, routine toss-off of music that should be right in that organization's hip pocket.

This, however, was not one of them, and it may not be altogether inapropos to mention previous imperfections and to forget them straightway in the presence of the orchestral beauties we heard in Carnegie Hall last evening.

Berlioz, a hot and high-handed Romeo of his time, wrote this Fantastic Symphony under the spell of a grande passion for Harriet Smithson, the Shakespearean actress who had felled him with her golden voice as Juliet and Ophelia. He saw her, heard her, loved her from a distance and wooed her madly. He wound up marrying her and lived a pitifully unhappy life with her.

Works Well Played.

Whatever else can be said of the work, it cannot be denied that Berlioz depicted his raving infatuation of her. He even attempted in his stormy jealousy, to call her names in his music. And whether contemporary listeners care or not, the mark of a fantastic love, as fantastic as this symphony, is boldly imprinted on each of its notes.

Hindemith's Mathis der Maler Symphony is the result of an entirely different love, a respectful and spiritual adoration, in fact, of the paintings that constitute the Isenheim Altar piece, which might once (prewar) have been found in the museum at Colmar, Alsace. Originally an opera (which has never been performed), Mathis der Maler became a three-movement symphony of similar inspiration, though the character of Matthias Gruenewald—who is the painter—is not represented in the symphony, as it is in the opera.

Both of these works are great works, both calling for the most polished, the most subtly conceived execution, each in its way. To say that the Boston Symphony fell short of that would be falling short of the truth, for rarely has this body of musicians sounded so united, so clear-aimed as it did on this occasion. It was an inspiring concert that Mr. Koussevitzky presented his listeners with and they—a huge number of them—were enthusiastic in their gratitude.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News

FEB 11 1944

First Kit Donated to Russian War Relief

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor, accepts kit from Mrs. Parker O. Griffith as he gives Stuart Young, Essex Russian War Relief chairman, a $100 contribution.

A drive for 3,000 family utility kits to be sent to Russian civilians by residents of Essex County was launched last night with the presentation of a sample kit to Serge Koussevitzky by Mrs. Parker O. Griffith at the Mosque Theater. The conductor led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation.

"Through this household emergency kit program," said Mrs. Griffith, "people of our country have an opportunity to share their surplus with the destitute families returning to Russia's war ruined and looted cities and villages."

Dr. Koussevitzky accepted the first kit with pleasure, thus starting the local phase of a nationwide campaign in more than 400 American cities and towns to collect a minimum of 3,000,000 kits.

Dr. Koussevitzky termed the kits an invaluable means of furthering goodwill among our Soviet allies. Each kit will bear a label on which is printed the American flag and a greeting to the Russian recipient.

The kit contains food, soap, first aid articles, sewing implements and other household items. Every item on the list is critically needed and has been selected by the RWR in consultation with the Soviet Red Cross, it was announced. They are called family kits because most of the items can be gathered from the things around a home of average means. Each kit, it is estimated, is worth $3.

Empty kit boxes, a list of articles to be included and shipping labels on which personal greetings to a Russian ally may be written can be obtained at RWR headquarters, 744 Broad street.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News.

FEB 11 1944

Bostonians Get Ovation

Symphony Under Koussevitzky in Inspiring Concert at Mosque

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

This community's musical season achieved its apogee last night at the Mosque Theater when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave what was probably the best orchestral program of the last decade. Dr. ~~Serge Koussev~~itzky, the Boston's maestro for the last 20 years, showed the innumerable fine qualities he possesses as a conductor and a personality and received definite ovations from an audience numbering about 3,300.

The assembled music lovers owed the Griffith Music Foundation a hearty vote of thanks for creating an opportunity to hear the group, which at present must be credited with having reached the peak of its powers. And what an evening it was!

First, foremost and indelibly engraved on the memory, the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major opened the program with a perfection of tone production which lacks a peer among present-day playing groups. Every department of the orchestra, with the possible exception of the trumpets, demonstrated utter mastery of the work and the manner in which Koussevitzky gathered each strand of melody into a scintillating, exciting fabric left the listener enchanted.

Inspired

The Brahms, essentially intimate music despite the grandiose style of some of its measures, was excellently performed throughout. Here and there, though, were bits which seemed like jewels in an exquisite setting—the viola themes in the opening allegro, the endless and breath-takingly beautiful cello cantilena in the slow movement, the way the woodwinds and first horn intertwined later in the same section, the amazingly accurate bouncing bow interludes in the scherzo and the glorious sounds that issued forth in the last measures of the finale. It was playing worthy of a great and inspired musical entity.

Aaron Copland next took the attention as the composer of "A Lincoln Portrait," a tone poem in which Will Geer appeared as speaker. The patriotic purpose of the composer, his excellent choice of a few lines from the vast library of Lincolniana and the success of the performance could not be denied. The audience admired it tremendously and Geer, attired in a crumpled tuxedo and made up to look like the young Lincoln, left quite an impression.

Yet the music itself, patterned in the febrile, high tension style Copland has made his own, could not be said to picture Lincoln, nor anything else specific. It sounds like movie mood music, but lacks a film. Except for a brisk usage of "Camptown Races" the score might as easily accompany a drama by Euripides, or a dancer of the Wigman type. Music played by an orchestra of the Boston's prestige should be of stronger stuff.

Colorful

All the resources of the band and of its eloquent, poised leader were called into service in the program's finale, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia. Here, certainly, is music that might easily be called fustian, pretentious. But it stands on its feet honestly and counters with a tremendous battery of orchestral coloration that sweeps all argument aside. The effectiveness of the virtuoso interpretation was evident in the rousing success the piece won.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1944

LINCOLN PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays the 'Eroica' and Aaron Copland's 'Portrait' at Carnegie Hall

By NOEL STRAUS

With the exception of Tchaikovsky's fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to works having a bearing on Lincoln's birthday, namely Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, celebrating the death of a hero; Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," with Will Geer as speaker, and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which was not on the printed list, but was added, to the surprise and delight of the audience, at the close of the afternoon and received with cheers.

The performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was characterized by immaculate purity of sound and most highly perfected technical bravura in each of the four movements. In the opening allegro, taken at a brisker tempo than usual, and the Funeral March, the interpretation was discreet and chaste, with an avoidance of stress on the emotional elements of the music.

Spirit of the Scherzo

The scherzo capped the reading of this offering, being completely in the Beethoven spirit and put forth with thrilling èlan and vital impact. If the finale was not remarkable for inner warmth, its series of variants proved vividly differentiated in color and the entire division was projected with a verve that gave it true climactic effect.

Mr. Koussevitzky unleashed all the fire and glow of his temperament in the phenomenal presentation of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which left nothing undone to meet the possibilities the fantasy afforded in kaleidoscopic hues and vivid, dramatic pictorial power.

This creation of Tchaikovsky's has suffered neglect, and this is easily understandable. In its structure and its choice of themes it is closely allied to the composer's "Romeo and Juliet," written six years earlier. But unlike that popular composition its thematic material is not of the composer's best and is used in too repetitive a fashion.

Deals With Dante Story

The fantasy, which deals with the celebrated story of Paolo and Francesca told by Dante in the fifth canto of the "Inferno," opens with a brooding introduction in which Mr. Koussevitzky at once established a sense of suspense that was not released until he reached the final measure of the magnificent unfoldment of the opus. In the allegro section, depicting the approach of the lovers as they are swept onward in the raging whirlwind, the conductor wisely made a considerable cut before the entrance of the central episode devoted to Francesca's narration of her tragic fate.

By means of the deletion, the work as a whole was shorn of much of its tendency to over-elaboration of the same material and given greater compactness to its advantage. That the central part also avoided a hint of overstatement was due to the wealth of expressiveness brought to it and the wonderful tinting it enjoyed. Mr. Koussevitzky could hardly be overpraised for the masterpiece of tone painting he achieved with this work, from the start of it to the terrifying pronouncements of the terminating harmonies of the brasses.

"Portrait" Is Analyzed

Mr. Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" received an inspiring interpretation that made the music's virtues as well as its weaknesses clearly patent. The first of its three sections, concerned with the fatality that accompanied the Civil War President in his career, is built largely on a theme too vague in its meaning to dominate the work as it does, and the third section, with its employment of a narrator who quotes passages written by Lincoln, fails to make the expected effect, since the score here only serves to mitigate instead of emphasize the impressiveness of the quotations.

But the central section delineating the general character of the times during Lincoln's life has far more to impart than the rest and is an excellent example of the use of folk music as a basis for symphonic treatment. Mr. Geer read the lines of Lincoln distinctly and forcefully, but most of them were obscured by the accompanying music, which is far too heavy. The work was warmly welcomed and occasioned bows from its composer from the stage. A rousing performance of the Sousa march mentioned gave just the right conclusion to the patriotic program.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

FEB 11 1944

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD UNDER GRIFFITH AUSPICES

One of the world's greatest orchestras gave a concert last night at the Mosque Theater, Newark, and, as one lady said to a group of others who cluttered my path in the exit corridor in a rush for Penn Station: "It's to bad they can't give encores."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted ~~by its regular director,~~ Serge Koussevitzky, made its first appearance in this sector of the Metropolitan area, under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. Of course the house was packed.

'Lincoln Portrait'

Tried-and-true Brahms, alert and enterprising contemporary Aaron Copland, and sure-fire Tschaikowsky were the creative patrons of the evening—Brahms with the cordial aftermath of his First Symphony, i. e., his Second; Copland with his 2-year-old "Lincoln Portrait", in which actor Will Geer appeared as speaker, and Peter Ilich with his lurid fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini".

The beloved orchestra, which by such description must include its conductor, was true to tradition, to the many memories it has made. All the tone was not projected to fullest extent, but that was a matter beyond its control.

The Brahms music was the best music, which can be said without revealing any strongly opinionated ~~taste~~ or asperity against the other two composers represented. The orchestra caressed the inimitable Brahmsian legato of the first movement, as only that orchestra can. The sonority of the cellos rose gloriously in the second, and so on. For a little while near the middle of the first movement we thought the line of unity which holds music intact was a bit weak. Further comment on this in another column.

The Copland music was impressive, all but the introduction, which for the thin orchestration seemed hard and strained. The motif running through the whole thing was at first questioned for its appropriateness, but it grew more convincing. Will Geer's ability seemed to be just the thing for his part. The work and artists received many rounds of applause.

"Francesca" received a distinguished performance. The hushed sweeps and dexterous woodwinds and grand forte finale were a treat for any ears.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

FEB 19 1944

THE orchestras last week were featuring staple goods. The two concerts by the Boston Symphony, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, included familiar works by Berlioz, Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky, along with Hindemith's "Matthias the Painter," which is a current staple, and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which is rather too recent to be listed as a staple but has already become an active item in orchestral programs. As usual, the performances were brilliant and they had a festive atmosphere. For good measure, Mr. Koussevitzky added to his Saturday matinée a composition that probably has had more hearings than all the other music on both programs combined Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 13 1944

LINCOLN PIECE BY SYMPHONY

Boston Group Observes Birthday of President

By GRENA BENNETT

Suiting the program to the day, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, observed Lincoln's Birthday by featuring Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

The tone picture of the great Emancipator was composed in 1942 at the suggestion of Andre Kostelanetz, noted orchestra leader, to whom it is dedicated. The score calls for a speaker to recite excerpts from Lincoln's immortal speeches. Will Geer filled the role. The music aims to illustrate the character of the martyred President, the first section subtly depicting the unusual fatality that followed him through life; proceeding to the primitive early days that led to later fame; and ending with the incomparable eloquence of his thoughts, sayings and actions.

Coductor Serge Koussevitzky, in paying tribute to Lincoln, conducted his musicians with sympathy in a noteworthy reading in which every detail was vividly proclaimed.

Prefacing the American composition was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony which, with its implication of heroism, was a worthy and well-chosen introduction that led to the Lincoln work. The orchestra's third visit this season terminated with a presentation of Tschaikovsky's Fantasia "Francesca di Rimini."

* * *

"Norma" was given at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon, its third performance this season and with practically the same cast of principals as appeared at the previous presentations. The large audience received the efforts of the singers with enthusiastic applause. The leading roles were portrayed by Zinka Milanov (Norma), Bruna Castagna (Adalgisa), Thelma Votipka (Clotilde), Frederick Jagel (Pollione), Virgilio Lazzari (Oroesco) and Celessio De Paolis (Flavio). Cesare Sodero conducted.

* * *

The newly-formed New York City Center Opera Company will be officially introduced the week of Feb. 21 at the City Center. Three operas will be presented. "Tosca" will be sung the opening night on Wednesday, Feb. 23, the leading roles to be sung by Dusolina Giannini, Mario Berini, George Czaplicki, Sedor Belarsky, Hubert Norville and Emile Renan. A new English translation of "Martha" is scheduled for Tuesday and Friday nights with Ethel Barrymore Colt, Mary Martha Briney, Martha Lipton, Suzanne Sten, Robert Brink, Stanley Carlson, Edward Kane, Hugh Thompson and Emile Renan as the principals. "Carmen," third in the list of productions, will be sung Thursday and Sunday evenings and Saturday afternoon.

[53]

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News
FEB 11 1944

First Kit Donated to Russian War Relief

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor, accepts kit from Mrs. Parker O. Griffith as he gives Stuart Young, Essex Russian War Relief chairman, a $100 contribution.

A drive for 3,000 family utility kits to be sent to Russian civilians by residents of Essex County was launched last night with the presentation of a sample kit to Serge Koussevitzky by Mrs. Parker O. Griffith at the Mosque Theater. The conductor led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert under auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation.

"Through this household emergency kit program," said Mrs. Griffith, "people of our country have an opportunity to share their surplus with the destitute families returning to Russia's war ruined and looted cities and villages."

Dr. Koussevitzky accepted the first kit with pleasure, thus starting the local phase of a nationwide campaign in more than 400 American cities and towns to collect a minimum of 3,000,000 kits.

Dr. Koussevitzky termed the kits an invaluable means of furthering goodwill among our Soviet allies. Each kit will bear a label on which is printed the American flag and a greeting to the Russian recipient.

The kit contains food, soap, first aid articles, sewing implements and other household items. Every item on the list is critically needed and has been selected by the RWR in consultation with the Soviet Red Cross, it was announced. They are called family kits because most of the items can be gathered from the things around a home of average means. Each kit, it is estimated, is worth $3.

Empty kit boxes, a list of articles to be included and shipping labels on which personal greetings to a Russian ally may be written can be obtained at RWR headquarters, 744 Broad street.

NEWARK, N. J.
~~CALL~~
News
FEB 11 1944

Bostonians Get Ovation

Symphony Under Koussevitzky in Inspiring Concert at Mosque

BY ALAN BRANIGAN

This community's musical season achieved its apogee last night at the Mosque Theater when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave what was probably the best orchestral program of the last decade. Dr. [illegible]sky, the Boston's maestro for the last 20 years, showed the innumerable fine qualities he possesses as a conductor and a personality and received definite ovations from an audience numbering about 3,300.

The assembled music lovers owed the Griffith Music Foundation a hearty vote of thanks for creating an opportunity to hear the group, which at present must be credited with having reached the peak of its powers. And what an evening it was!

First, foremost and indelibly engraved on the memory, the Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major opened the program with a perfection of tone production which lacks a peer among present-day playing groups. Every department of the orchestra, with the possible exception of the trumpets, demonstrated utter mastery of the work and the manner in which Koussevitzky gathered each strand of melody into a scintillating, exciting fabric left the listener enchanted.

Inspired

The Brahms, essentially intimate music despite the grandiose style of some of its measures, was excellently performed throughout. Here and there, though, were bits which seemed like jewels in an exquisite setting—the viola themes in the opening allegro, the endless and breath-takingly beautiful cello cantilena in the slow movement, the way the woodwinds and first horn intertwined later in the same section, the amazingly accurate bouncing bow interludes in the scherzo and the glorious sounds that issued forth in the last measures of the finale. It was playing worthy of a great and inspired musical entity.

Aaron Copland next took the attention as the composer of "A Lincoln Portrait," a tone poem in which Will Geer appeared as speaker. The patriotic purpose of the composer, his excellent choice of a few lines from the vast library of Lincolniana and the success of the performance could not be denied. The audience admired it tremendously and Geer, attired in a crumpled tuxedo and made up to look like the young Lincoln, left quite an impression.

Yet the music itself, patterned in the febrile, high tension style Copland has made his own, could not be said to picture Lincoln, nor anything else specific. It sounds like movie mood music, but lacks a film. Except for a brisk usage of "Camptown Races" the score might as easily accompany a drama by Euripides, or a dancer of the Wigman type. Music played by an orchestra of the Boston's prestige should be of stronger stuff.

Colorful

All the resources of the band and of its eloquent, poised leader were called into service in the program's finale, Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia. Here, certainly, is music that might easily be called fustian, pretentious. But it stands on its feet honestly and counters with a tremendous battery of orchestral coloration that sweeps all argument aside. The effectiveness of the virtuoso interpretation was evident in the rousing success the piece won.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 13 1944

LINCOLN PROGRAM BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Plays the 'Eroica' and Aaron Copland's 'Portrait' at Carnegie Hall

By NOEL STRAUS

With the exception of Tchaikovsky's fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" the program presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, was devoted to works having a bearing on Lincoln's birthday, namely Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, celebrating the death of a hero; Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," with Will Geer as speaker, and Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever," which was not on the printed list, but was added, to the surprise and delight of the audience, at the close of the afternoon and received with cheers.

The performance of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony was characterized by immaculate purity of sound and most highly perfected technical bravura in each of the four movements. In the opening allegro, taken at a brisker tempo than usual, and the Funeral March, the interpretation was discreet and chaste, with an avoidance of stress on the emotional elements of the music.

Spirit of the Scherzo

The scherzo capped the reading of this offering, being completely in the Beethoven spirit and put forth with thrilling èlan and vital impact. If the finale was not remarkable for inner warmth, its series of variants proved vividly differentiated in color and the entire division was projected with a verve that gave it true climactic effect.

Mr. Koussevitzky unleashed all the fire and glow of his temperament in the phenomenal presentation of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which left nothing undone to meet the possibilities the fantasy afforded in kaleidoscopic hues and vivid, dramatic pictorial power.

This creation of Tchaikovsky's has suffered neglect, and this is easily understandable. In its structure and its choice of themes it is closely allied to the composer's "Romeo and Juliet," written six years earlier. But unlike that popular composition its thematic material is not of the composer's best and is used in too repetitive a fashion.

Deals With Dante Story

The fantasy, which deals with the celebrated story of Paolo and Francesca told by Dante in the fifth canto of the "Inferno," opens with a brooding introduction in which Mr. Koussevitzky at once established a sense of suspense that was not released until he reached the final measure of the magnificent unfoldment of the opus. In the allegro section, depicting the approach of the lovers as they are swept onward in the raging whirlwind, the conductor wisely made a considerable cut before the entrance of the central episode devoted to Francesca's narration of her tragic fate.

By means of the deletion, the work as a whole was shorn of much of its tendency to over-elaboration of the same material and given greater compactness to its advantage. That the central part also avoided a hint of overstatement was due to the wealth of expressiveness brought to it and the wonderful tinting it enjoyed. Mr. Koussevitzky could hardly be overpraised for the masterpiece of tone painting he achieved with this work, from the start of it to the terrifying pronouncements of the terminating harmonies of the brasses.

"Portrait" Is Analyzed

Mr. Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" received an inspiring interpretation that made the music's virtues as well as its weaknesses clearly patent. The first of its three sections, concerned with the fatality that accompanied the Civil War President in his career, is built largely on a theme too vague in its meaning to dominate the work as it does, and the third section, with its employment of a narrator who quotes passages written by Lincoln, fails to make the expected effect, since the score here only serves to mitigate instead of emphasize the impressiveness of the quotations.

But the central section delineating the general character of the times during Lincoln's life has far more to impart than the rest and is an excellent example of the use of folk music as a basis for symphonic treatment. Mr. Geer read the lines of Lincoln distinctly and forcefully, but most of them were obscured by the accompanying music, which is far too heavy. The work was warmly welcomed and occasioned bows from its composer [illegible] stage. A rousing per[illegible] of the Sousa march men[illegible] the right conclu[illegible] program.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 11 1944

Music News And Views

By ROGER S. VREELAND

OSTON SYMPHONY HEARD NDER GRIFFITH AUSPICES

One of the world's greatest orchestras gave a concert ast night at the Mosque Theater, Newark, and, as one lady aid to a group of others who cluttered my path in the exit orridor in a rush for Penn Station: "It's to bad they can't ive encores."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, nducted [illegible] erge Koussevitzky, made its first ppearance in this sector of the etropolitan area, under auspices of e Griffith Music Foundation. Of ourse the house was packed.

'Lincoln Portrait'

Tried-and-true Brahms, alert and nterprising contemporary Aaron opland, and sure-fire Tschaikowky were the creative patrons of he evening—Brahms with the cordial aftermath of his First Symphony, i. e., his Second; Copland with his 2-year-old "Lincoln Portrait", in which actor Will Geer appeared as speaker, and Peter Ilich with his lurid fantasia, "Francesca a Rimini".

The beloved orchestra, which by uch description must include its onductor, was true to tradition, to he many memories it has made. All he tone was not projected to fullest xtent, but that was a matter beond its control.

The Brahms music was the best music, which can be said without revealing any strongly opinionated [illegible] or asperity against the other two composers represented. The orchestra caressed the inimitable Brahmsian legato of the first movement, as only that orchestra can. The sonority of the cellos rose gloriously in the second, and so on. For a little while near the middle of the first movement we thought the line of unity which holds music intact was a bit weak. Further comment on this in another column.

The Copland music was impressive, all but the introduction, which for the thin orchestration seemed hard and strained. The motif running through the whole thing was at first questioned for its appropriateness, but it grew more convincing. Will Geer's ability seemed to be just the thing for his part. The work and artists received many rounds of applause.

"Francesca" received a distinguished performance. The hushed sweeps and dexterous woodwinds and grand forte finale were a treat for any ears.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 13 1944

LINCOLN PIECE BY SYMPHONY

Boston Group Observes Birthday of President

By GRENA BENNETT

Suiting the program to the day, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, observed Lincoln's Birthday by featuring Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait."

The tone picture of the great Emancipator was composed in 1942 at the suggestion of Andre Kostelanetz, noted orchestra leader, to whom it is dedicated. The score calls for a speaker to recite excerpts from Lincoln's immortal speeches. Will Geer filled the role. The music aims to illustrate the character of the martyred President, the first section subtly depicting the unusual fatality that followed him through life; proceeding to the primitive early days that led to later fame; and ending with the incomparable eloquence of his thoughts, sayings and actions.

Coductor Serge Koussevitzky, in paying tribute to Lincoln, conducted his musicians with sympathy in a noteworthy reading in which many detail was vividly proclaimed.

Prefacing the American composition was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony which, with its implication of heroism, was a worthy and well-chosen introduction that led to the Lincoln work. The orchestra's third visit this season terminated with a presentation of Tschaikovsky's Fantasia "Francesca di Rimini."

* * *

"Norma" was given at the Metropolitan yesterday afternoon, its third performance this season and with practically the same cast of principals as appeared at the previous presentations. The large audience re[illegible] the effort of the singers [illegible] applause. [illegible] portrayed by Zinka Milanov (Norma), Bruna Castagna (Adalgisa), Thelma Votipka (Clotilde), Frederick Jagel (Pollione), Virgilio Lazzari (Oroesco) and Celessio De Paolis (Flavio). Cesare Sodero conducted.

* * *

The newly-formed New York City Center Opera Company will be officially introduced the week of Feb. 21 at the City Center. Three operas will be presented. "Tosca" will be sung the opening night on Wednesday, Feb. 23, the leading roles to be sung by Dusolina Giannini, Mario Berini, George Czaplicki, Sedor Belarsky, Hubert Norville and Emile Renan. A new English translation of "Martha" is scheduled for Tuesday and Friday nights with Ethel Barrymore Colt, Mary Martha Briney, Martha Lipton, Suzanne Sten, Robert Brink, Stanley Carlson, Edward Kane, Hugh Thompson and Emile Renan as the principals. "Carmen," third in the list of productions, will be sung Thursday and [illegible] evenings and Saturday [illegible]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
FEB 19 1944

THE orchestras last week were featuring staple goods. The two concerts by the Boston Symphony, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, included familiar works by Berlioz, Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky, along with Hindemith's "Matthias the Painter," which is a current staple, and Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait," which is rather too recent to be listed as a staple but has already become an active item in orchestral programs. As usual, the performances were brilliant and they had a festive atmosphere. For good measure, Mr. Koussevitzky added to his Saturday matinée a composition that probably has had more hearings than all the other music on both programs combined: Sousa's "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 19 1944

M U S I C

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA concert in Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Feb. 18. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor; soloist, Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano. The program:

"La Procession Nocturne" .... Rabaud
Symphony No. 3, "Rhenish" .... Schumann
Symphony No. 1, "Jeremiah" .... Bernstein
"El Salon Mexico" .... Copland

Bernstein in Boston

BOSTON, Feb. 18.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra at home seems always less ostentatious than on tour. In the hall where it has rehearsed (a hall of well focused, rather than diffuse acoustic properties) and in front of its own well washed, well mannered and respectful audience, it strikes one as only natural that the cultural amenities should have taken on so high a polish, as of good wood long regularly waxed and rubbed. Not the least of this orchestra's cultural amenities is its gracious hospitality to that which is novel and of good report in the world of music.

Leonard Bernstein, who conducted his own first symphony today, is nationally of good report as a conductor. He is less well known as a composer, though the present work, which has already been received well by both press and public in Pittsburgh, will no doubt go far toward correcting this situation. It is not a masterpiece by any means, but it has solid orchestral qualities and a certain charm that should give it a temporary popularity, not the least of its charms in today's concert being Mr. Bernstein's excellent directing of it and Jennie Tourel's superbly resonant intoning of its Hebrew text.

Unlike Robert Schumann (his third, or "Rhenish," symphony was played just before the new work, Mr. Koussevitzky conducting), who composed with genius but who was not a master of instrumentation, Mr. Bernstein orchestrates like a master but does not compose with either originality or much skill. His piece lacks contrapuntal coherence, melodic distinction, contrapuntal progress, harmonic logic and concentration of thought. On the other hand, it has by moments a certain lyrical intensity, and at the beginning of the middle, or scherzo, section there is a sort of dance passage that evokes most poignantly the Jewish near-East. Also, the instrumentation makes lovely sounds. The loud and soft contrasts are probably more extreme than they need be, but the placement of the instruments is at all times sonorous and soundly balanced.

There is no useless instrumental doubling anywhere. Solo passages are placed in grateful ranges for each instrument. And in the tuttis he writes his brass a little high, just as Berlioz did. The result is one of shining brilliance and vibrant juxtapositions of color. Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico," which Mr. Bernstein conducted at the end, itself a fairly brilliant piece of orchestration, sounded muddy and unsure by comparison with the Bernstein score. Neither his sure-handed scoring, however (almost too sure-handed for a young man of twenty-five who is going to be a real composer), nor the diffuse and improvisatory character of the composition inspires the confidence in Mr. Bernstein's original gifts that this reviewer entertains toward his musical genius.

Leonard Bernstein

Who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his symphony, "Jeremiah," yesterday

---

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

FEB 14 1944

Boston Symphony Pays Respects to Lincoln

Koussevitzky chose to honor the memory of Abraham Lincoln by programming the Brooklyn composer, Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait" for his concert at the Academy of Music on Friday night and in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. In thus repeating a work he introduced here almost a year ago, the noted conductor did his audiences a service in letting them hear a contemporary express a truly sincere evocation and draw an admirably conceived portrait.

This reviewer maintains more fervently than before that Mr. Copland has solved the problem of portraiture skillfully and effectively. Since he chose to use the spoken word, the question is not how wise the choice but how successful the adaptation. With Will Geer as speaker, word and note created a peculiar fitness, in which the music underlined immortal words, while language accentuated living music. Mr. Copland's originality of treatment must not be overlooked: his achievement won hearty indorsement if public reception is any criterion.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was also common to both programs, and perhaps chosen as a compliment to the great American. Neither performance revealed Beethoven fully, being less virile in statement and less heroic in interpretation. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," an unnecessary repetition of Barber's "Commando March" and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" were listed on the Brooklyn program; Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" on the one in Carnegie Hall. There was an encore on Saturday, a rousing performance of the Sousa march.

Other Musical Events

An excellent performance of Strauss' opera, "Salome," took place at the Metropolitan Opera House on Friday night. Lily Djanel outdid herself as Salome, winning exceptional praise for her Dance of the Seven Veils. Karin Branzell topped all previous personal triumphs as Herodias; Arthur Carron made an excellent impression as Herod. Julius Huehn was satisfactory as the Prophet. The whole production is one of the Met's best efforts. With George Szell conducting, it is again one of the season's hits.

Rodzinski repeated the new Creston Concerto for Saxaphone in his Sunday afternoon Philharmonic-Symphony program, allowing Vincent Abato to give another virtuoso performance on the saxaphone. A second hearing confirmed the fact that the new work is highly entertaining. Tchaikowsky's Sixth Symphony and Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride" completed the program.

Vera Franceschi gave a piano recital in Town Hall yesterday afternoon, proving herself an able technician and a performer with considerable temperament. Some hard-driven tone and a lack of differentiation in the styles of various composers left a monochramatic impression of her afternoon's performance, a critical appraisal of which may be reserved when she has more fully matured in musicianship.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 13 1944

Copland Work Is Played Here By Bostonians

'A Lincoln Portrait' Given; Beethoven's 'Eroica' Also Heard at Carnegie Hall

By Paul Bowles

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, in the following program:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat Major, "Eroica" .... Beethoven
"A Lincoln Portrait" .... Copland
(Speaker: Will Geer)
"Francesca da Rimini" ...... Tchaikovsky

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offered his second Carnegie Hall concert of the week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon, terminating it with a beautifully rousing performance of Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," complete with some fine piccolo playing. One felt that he owed his listeners a work with a little substance to it, in the way of a bonus, after forcing upon them Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." They appreciated his thoughtfulness and responded with a salvo of cheers.

As yesterday was Lincoln's Birthday. Dr. Koussevitzky paid homage to the Civil War President by giving Aaron Copland's "Lincoln Portrait," for which Will Geer was the speaker. The work has been widely discussed, and it is generally agreed that the second, or picturesque section, with its poignant evocation of a particular time and place, is the most successful. (It also sounds the most like Mr. Copland's film and ballet music, where he is always adroit in creating definite atmosphere.) The piece has some of each quality that one looks for in a work by Copland: the Mahler-like theatricality near the beginning and at the end, the touching suggestions of melody with their open, sparse but tremendously effective harmonic support, and the taut, electric rhythms, which he is fortunately able to keep going longer than most composers. The action of rhythms like Copland's is cumulative and hypnotic, and so must continue in order to have impact. There is nothing more disappointing than a seductive rhythm which stops too soon; it is like a film sequence of a landscape taken from the front end of a locomotive. One hopes it will go on and on.

The final section, judged by its musical effectiveness, is less pleasing. The performance by the orchestra was excellent in its timing and balance, with the musical punctuations actually making the spoken prosody clearer rather than confusing it. Nevertheless, no matter how great and how true Lincoln's political utterances may have been, or how apposite they appear today, the symphonic concert scarcely seems the place to restate them, either in spoken or sung form. The public obviously thought otherwise, and Mr. Copland was called several times to the stage to acknowledge its applause.

The playing yesterday, while on the deliberate side, was always perfectly integrated sonorously. In the Beethoven Third Symphony, which occupied the first half of the program, the second movement benefited particularly from Dr. Koussevitzky's loving care. The performance of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" was as lucid in its elaboration as an exercise in orchestration, which is the ideal treatment for such a work.

Bernstein Directs His First Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Leonard Bernstein, rising star of the musical world, directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in the first local performance of his new Symphony No. 1, "Jeremiah"; and also in Aaron Copland's "El Salón México." These works constituted the second half of the sixteenth program of the orchestra season. Before the intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony.

The youthful Mr. Bernstein made an excellent first impression, both as conductor and as composer. Everybody knows the story of his sudden emergence into fame as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic after completing his studies at Harvard, Curtis Institute and Tanglewood.

It was evident yesterday that the reports from New York of his prowess as leader had not been exaggerated. He follows the Koussevitzkyan style of conducting. Using no baton, he is free and energetic in his platform behavior, but his gestures are obviously meant for the players and not for the audience. There is no striving for eurythmic grace. This young man clearly knows his business and has no time for nonsense.

* * *

His Symphony, "Jeremiah," gave a similar effect of mastery of the technique of composition and sincerity of emotional expression. In these respects it recalled Bloch's "Schélomo" and "Three Jewish Poems." It is unconventional in form, consisting of three movements, entitled Prophecy, Profanation, and Lamentation. The first two are purely instrumental; the last employs a solo mezzo-soprano.

The composer lives up to the assertion in his note on the work that "as for programmatic meanings, the intention is not one of literalness, but of emotional quality." The Prophecy section succeeds in conveying the intensity of Jeremiah's pleas, the second in giving a sense of the destruction and chaos brought on by the corruption of priests and people. In the third, the solo voice intones texts from the Book of Lamentations, to a sparse instrumental accompaniment.

The musical means employed include themes based on the traditional Hebrew liturgical music, with liberal use of dissonant harmonies and involved rhythmical patterns, the latter especially in the second movement.

* * *

At a first hearing, I found the first two movements more interesting musically than the third, although there is a strong emotional appeal in the verses of this last section also. The solo part was sung by Jennie Tourel, whose voice lent itself singularly well to the dramatic demands. She was far better cast than she had been last season in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue," and she made a correspondingly better effect.

But the hero of the day, of course, was Mr. Bernstein, who had a notable popular as well as artistic success.

After "Jeremiah," the Copland piece, although played brilliantly, seemed even more superficial than on its first hearing here five years ago.

Indeed, the program as a whole was an odd mixture. Dr. Koussevitzky's apparent devotion to Rabaud's romantic picture in tone is hard to understand. The piece was pleasant to hear when its composer introduced it to us in 1918, but it has not taken on added interest with the years. Probably the conductor likes to use it as a mean of displaying the marvelous tone of his orchestra, and if that is so he was successful yesterday almost beyond complaint—except that the voice of the solo oboe, in the absence of Mr. Gillet, was thin and dry.

Probably it cannot be said that Dr. Koussevitzky is too partial to the "Rhenish" Symphony, which had not been heard at these concerts since 1931; but for some of us once in 13 years is too often to hear it, and in any case it was bound to sound out of place in the company it was keeping.

Those who have been protesting that we ought to hear the "Rhenish" more, instead of hearing the "Spring" so much, will now perhaps conclude that it will be best if we don't hear either of them too often. Why, indeed, do conductors find it necessary to repeat one or more of these inept symphonies every season?

As for the "Rhenish," it has all the faults and none of the virtues of the German style. Its themes are pale, its texture thin; and what is more depressing than the Teutonic notion of fun? Or funnier than the Teutonic notion of grandeur?

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 1944

M U S I C

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night. The program:

Symphonie Fantastique .... Berlioz
Mathis der Maler .... Hindemith

Diminishing Artistic Returns

THERE is a point in the perfection of artistic skills beyond which further progress is without artistic value. The surface becomes so shiny that nothing else can be perceived. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dangerously close to that point for several years now; and if Wednesday night's concert in Carnegie Hall is typical of the orchestra's present work, one may well judge that the point of optimum precision has now been passed.

* * *

Matters of musical understanding, of stylistic penetration and of interpretative warmth all aside—for these constitute the inner substance of music—its outer substance, sound, is wholly a matter of precision. Precisions of attack, of pitch, of color, of phrasing, of force, of blending constitute the musical amenities. Ultimate perfection in any of them is unattainable, but a reasonable degree of accuracy makes it possible for the meaning of music to be transmitted. Overmeticulousness about any of them will more often than not defeat this end.

* * *

One has heard string quartets play so carefully for beauty of tone that all the attacks became tenuous and the rhythm got lost. One has observed them so preoccupied about simultaneity of attack that the repeated split second in which the players look at another before beginning each phrase ends by destroying the music's line. One has heard all the amenities sacrificed for a relentless rhythm or a climactic effect; and on the whole, this procedure is probably less injurious to musical communication than the more delicate violences.

* * *

Some of the precisions observed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night were good for the music and some were not. In both the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" and the Hindemith "Mathis der Maler," the instrumental colors, the mixtures and shades of sound, were more delicately differentiated and more expressively exact than this listener has ever heard them before. But their exactitude was achieved at the price of such watchfulness that both pieces seemed lacking in coherence and in continuity. In both of them, for example, Mr. Koussevitzky took such long breaths between phrases that one forgot there was supposed to be any sequence among these.

* * *

This wide spacing of phrases, plus the use of tempos rather slower than the standard French ones, dragged the Berlioz work out a good ten minutes longer than it is accustomed to last. (Forty-six minutes is the average timing of it; fifty minutes is a long version. Koussevitzky took an hour.) The first three movements seemed interminable. I did not time the Hindemith work, but it seemed slow, gasping and overemphatic. All this was the result of too much care about phrase attacks and instrumental blending. The attacks and the blending were incredibly precise. But the beautiful and spicy sounds we heard were less a performance of music by Berlioz and Hindemith than they were a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[54]

Feb 19

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and his talented protege, Leonard Bernstein, shared the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Bernstein conducted the first Boston performance of his own "Jeremiah" Symphony, and wound up the afternoon brilliantly with "E Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland Mr. Koussevitzky began the concer with "The Nocturnal Procession" by Rabaud, and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony. Jennie Tourel, mezzo soprano, was soloist in the final of Mr. Bernstein's work.

That Mr. Bernstein is greatly talented, both as composer and conductor, must have been obvious to all present. He had mastered, it seemed, all the details of his own score and that of Mr. Copland (who was present as a listener). His conducting, which dispensed with a baton, was firm, vigorous and graphic. His gestures, often similar to those of Mr. Koussevitzky, were never superfluous nor contrived merely for visual effect. They meant something to the interpretation of the music.

His conducting was like his music: direct, emotional, but poised and usually clear-cut. He was meticulous in giving cues, quick to adjust dynamic shadings, and above all he gave one the impression he knew constantly what he was about. Through the rhythmical involvements of his own scherzo he steered an apparently unperturbed course. In "El Salon Mexico," which he whisked along rapidly, he was as careful with sonorities as with rhythms and accents.

Orchestras, particularly the best, can be intractable toward newcomers on the stand. From young conductors they exact a stiff test of both talent and tact. Mr. Bernstein came out with flying colors for the Boston Symphony played with that combination of willing effort, precision and beauty that showed they admired him.

It will not disparage Mr. Bernstein's creative gifts to say that the "Jeremiah" Symphony is remarkable more for what it promises in future than for the achievement it represents. It is a work of evident purpose and consistent style, even if the unusual formal plan of two slow movements and a scherzo inevitably gives an impression of motion concentrated in one place. The idiom is contemporary if derivative, as inevitably it must be in the first major orchestral work of any composer.

Mr. Bernstein handles dissonance expressively, and to the voiced lamentations of Jeremiah over ruined Jerusalem, in the finale, he brings a well-sustained and effective melodic line. He was fortunate, too, in his soloist. Miss Tourel sang admirably.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the Friday subscribers magnificent sounds and colors and the warmest sort of feeling in the immaculate score of Rabaud and the wine-iest of all the Schumann symphonies.—C. W. D.

RDAY, FEBRUARY 19,

MUSIC
Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leonard Bernstein was guest conductor and Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Rabaud........"La Procession Nocturne"
Schumann, Symphony No. 3 in E flat ("Rhenish"), Op. 97.
Bernstein....Symphony No. 1, "Jeremiah"
Copland..............."El Salon Mexico"

It was Leonard Bernstein day at the symphony yesterday, no doubt about it. The first half of the program was filled with good old music very beautifully played and it contributed much, of course, to the quality and the satisfaction of the concert. In fact, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," a lovely piece of program music, managed to stick in the mind for all that came after it, while the Schumann, long unheard, surmounted the essentially inferior inspiration of its material and orchestral technic through the affectionate reading given it by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Yet it remained for Mr. Bernstein the 25-year-old Bostonian and protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, to give the concert its memorable qualities, and to help him do it, his mentor graciously gave him the whole of the second half of the concert . . . not to mention his advice, his encouragement and his best wishes. And for its part, the orchestra played its collective head off to make good his debut here both as conductor and composer.

To consider Mr. Bernstein first as a composer, it must be said that his first symphony is a striking and significant composition It is not an original one in the sense that it departs violently from tradition or strives for brash, startling effects, and that is good. For frantic search for a new musical expression is as much of an attempt to escape the present as, for instance, the attempt to speak further in the romantic or classical idioms of the past. Thus Bernstein has spoken in a present-day idiom which employs, almost at random, influences of the past, present and future, and anyone looking fussily for "influences" could find a surprising number. But why bother with all that?

The fact is, Mr. Bernstein has taken his musical language where he has found it, but he has spoken his own mind without obtrusive effort to be American (in the sense of the League of Composers tribe), Jewish (in the sense of Bloch), neo-classical, neo-romantic, impressionist or anyone else. And for his lack of pretense, his ability to resist the smart suasions of the sleek mechanics currently manufacturing music, and above all for his honesty, he deserves enormous credit.

His "Jeremiah" is a work of immediate appeal to the ear and the emotions. The first movement, rather weaker than the other two, is one of unfulfilled tension, so to speak. Its material is broad and strong—and often beautiful, but it doesn't quite make its point. The second, an exciting orchestral scherzo, is one of conflicting rhythms and bitter sonorities, very evocative and effective. The third movement, sub-titled "Lamentation," is one of the remarkable movements of contemporary music, no question about it. It reminds one strongly of Mahler, and there is the same hesitancy, at the end, of the "Lied von der Erde," to touch the final chord. Its melodic material is profoundly moving, almost incredibly so to have been the inspiration of a youthful composer in these times. The vocal part, sung in Hebrew by Jennie Tourel was very beautiful, and Mme. Tourel sang it excellently.

Well, here we are again at the end of another column, and still nothing said of Mr. Bernstein's conducting. Imagine Serge Koussevitzky at the beginning of his career, perhaps, and you will be able to catch the essential quality of it. The same intensity the same orchestral technic, the same ability to make an orchestra sound (as witness the performance of Copland's priceless "El Salon Mexico"); even some of the same gestures.

---

at Roseland-State.

He Feb 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Leonard Bernstein, the Boston b who was appointed assistant co ductor of New York's Philharmoni Symphony last fall, scored an un quivocal success both as composer an conductor at yesterday afternoon Symphony Concert. (In the second ha of the programme he introduced to u his First, or "Jeremiah" Symphony with Jennie Tourel singing the mezzo soprano solo required by the fina movement, "Lamentation," and h conducted a brilliant and truly reveal ing performance of Aaron Copland' "El Salon Mexico," never before hear here to such good advantage.)

In commenting upon what seemed t him a really significant occasion, thi reviewer finds himself in the predica ment of the Symphony man who said to have remarked that he didn' dare say how good he thought Mr Bernstein was for fear of appearin ridiculous. However, he is willing t go all overboard and quote Schumann' famous salutation to Chopin: "Hats of gentlemen, a genius!" To be sure, w do not yet know how many kinds o music this 25-year-old maestro ca conduct. We do not know whether h will ever surpass or even equal hi first symphonic effort. But no matter The real point is that one cannot thin off-hand of any other American com position that has the drive, the poig nancy, the dramatic strength, the emo tional force of this "Jeremiah." And Mr. Bernstein is far from being what we refer to as a composer-conductor. He directs an orchestra as one to the manner born.

The titles of the three movements tell the story. The first two are called, respectively, "Prophecy" and "Profanation." The text from the Book of Lamentations, so superbly sung by Miss Tourel, is, quite appropriately, in the original Hebrew. Much of the applause in which the orchestra joined was, of course, directed at her.

In the first part of the season's most memorable concert Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a surpassingly beautiful performance of Rabaud's tone poem, "La Procession Nocturne" and he restored to us Schumann's Third, or "Rhenish" Symphony, last heard at the regular concerts in 1931. After Rabaud's exquisitely contrived sonorities, poor Schumann's orchestration sounded clumsier than ever, but his music is still refreshingly hearty, and also heart-warming in its mellowness and geniality. Dr. Koussevitzky led it con amore.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Familiar music made the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert, conducted by Richard Burgin. The major item, Brahms' Third Symphony, was heard not long ago at the longer series from Dr. Koussevitzky. It might be said that Mr. Burgin's interpretation laid more stress on the classical aspects of the music and less on its romantic side. In any event, the performance was a singularly satisfying one and greatly relished by the audience.

No less successful was Mr. Burgin's treatment of the final item, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Ravel. The final picture, "The Great Gate of Kiev," was properly resplendent. Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchnia" made the rest of a thoroughly enjoyable concert, a repetition of which will be heard this afternoon.

Feb 29 Post

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony's shorter series is a first class example of how standard symphonic works can be made readily acceptable for repeated hearings. The secret lies, in this case, in the refreshing process of Richard Burgin's intense and personal recreation of those works.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for instance, was not the tired old piece, familiar through countless slipshod radio performances, but young and fresh and luminous music. The strings were a trifle shrill in the high sections of the Menuetto, but for the remainder of the work comported themselves with their customary brilliance. Mr. Burgin played it unhurriedly, yet it had sparkle and bounce.

Mr. Burgin marked Brahms' Third Symphony with imagination and expressiveness. Certain transitions—particularly from the first to second themes of the third, and again at the same point in the final movement—were not always cleanly brought about. But in the main it was a sound and sturdy reading.

With two Moussorgsky works—the Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and "Pictures at an Exhibition"—Mr. Burgin led the orchestra through its paces, splashing orchestral colors prodigally and fully indulging what must be a delightful sense of humor. The orchestra players must have had a field day with the latter work since it gives a solo to nearly every first desk.

It is something of a tour de force to carry off familiar Mozart and Brahms with better than fair success. The audience gave Mr. Burgin a good solid round of applause for an evening of fine music. The program will be repeated today at 3.—J. W. R.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1944

A New Mass
Gretchaninoff Work Receives Premiere in Boston

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Feb. 25.—There are several viewpoints to consider in appraising Alexander Gretchaninoff's "Missa Oecumenica," given its first performance here this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, ~~with four~~ solo voices, chorus and organ. And it is hardly possible to accept the composition without reserve from any of them.

The first is the sentiment of the occasion and is associated with the fact that the mass is the largest work of its seventy-nine-year-old composer (who was present at the performance), and also that the premiere of the work, inspired by the "idea of the universal meaning of the churches," coincided with the beginning of a particularly significant Lenten season.

From the second (or church) viewpoint, the mass is chiefly sensual and hardly acceptable to any faith. This is not to say that churches of all faiths in the present day offer better stuff, because they do not. The mass, however, is a melange of second-rate, turn-of-the-century operatic reminiscence, and although it often quotes modes of the Eastern and the Western church, one against the other, the supporting fabric violates the basic spirit of liturgical music by introducing subordinate tunes of a popular character.

In short, it is liturgical music of the genre of Rossini, Cherubini and Gounod, and will doubtless achieve a place on some future moto proprio.

The third approach is from its purely musical character, forgetting its unquestioned sincerity of purpose and its religious connotation. In this respect it is merely tedious. The composer speaks honestly enough in the idiom he knows best, a sort of lukewarm romanticism notable chiefly for the number of opportunities it provides the listener to police the work as a sort of tune detective. It is well written for the voice however, and the soloists (Maria Kurenko, Dorothy Cornish, Roland Hayes, Robert Hall Collins and chorus (St. Cecilia Society and Apollo Club), had little difficulty negotiating the six conventional sections of the mass. The orchestra, when not supporting the vocal line, played elegant figurations, and the whole was warmly conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky who commissioned the wor through his music foundation in memory of his wife. R. E. Jr.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

Feb. 23, 1944

DOWN THE LINE

A PROPOSED plan to dispose of the 1943 bumper potato crop by distributing five to ten pounds free in exchange for a designated ration stamp encountered the opposition yesterday of Gov. C. A. Bottolfsen of Idaho. The plan, proposed by Tom Dyalfi New York produce broker, was submitted also to governors of Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota.—(AP)

* * *

A SYNTHETIC radio beam is the newest noise-maker to invade the field of highbrow music. It's an electrical instrument especially constructed by the Bell Telephone Co. laboratory to simulate the sound of the radio beam used by aviators in night or blind flying. The gadget will be heard March 3 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents Samuel Barber's new air force symphony for the first time. On March 11 the orchestra will present the symphony in New York.—(U.P.)

* * *

BOSTON south end residents have been asked to search among ash barrels and open lots for the handbag of Mrs. Mary L. Hanson, 49, whose nude an ravished body was found in cellar excavation Saturday. P lice hoped last night that discov ery of the handbag might pr vide a clue in the baffling sla ing. They believed the purs contained about $20 in sma bills. Meanwhile, authoriti still held for questioning tw suspects who were arrested ea lier this week. Thus far, how ever, no trace has been foun of the tall, thin man who alle edly accompanied Mrs. Hanso from a south end cafe where sh last was seen alive.—(U.P.)

* * *

COLLEGE girls from Massa chusetts Institutions agai will furnish a sizeable share o the labor needed to produce foo on Massachusetts farms thi year, according to state supervi sor Beatrice Billings of the Wo men's Land Army. Miss Bill ings said at Amherst last nigh that college girls probably ar the best source of farm labor i the state with the exception o regular and experienced summe workers. The supervisor added that the college helpers are physically perfect and eager to make their contribution toward victory on the home front.—(U.P.)

* * *

FIVE valuable trotting horses were killed, and four others were rescued by police early today when fire destroyed a stable opposite the Metropolitan Racing Association track in Brighton. Metropolitan District Policemen Fred Campbell and Jeremiah Murphy discovered the fire, forced a door to the barn, and led out four horses before the flames drove the officers from the building. Police said the stables were leased to Allison Fowler, Arlington Heights, but he was out of town and could not be reached for an estimate of the damage.—(AP)

* * *

WILLIAM E. CLEGG, 50, veteran assistant librarian at the Boston Public Library and father of five children faced municipal court arraignment today after allegedly confessing to the theft of some $23,000 from the library employes' sick fund during the past 10 years. Described by authorities as "a model husband," Clegg surrendered at police headquarters yesterday and deposited a satchel containing $2060 on the police superintendent's desk as partial restitution. Treasurer of the sick fund for many years, Clegg said he had been living at a Springfield lodging house since he disappeared a week ago. A warrant charging him specifically with the larceny of $2000 had been issued by police, who were astonished to learn the true extent of his peculations. Clegg's salary was $2300 a year until last July when it was increased to $3000.—(U.P.)

MUSIC
Monday Symphony

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's subsidiary season was given last night at Symphony Hall, with Richard Burgin conducting, and with the following program:

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra..........Mozart
Symphony no. 3 in F major.....Brahms
Prelude to "Khovanstchina"...Moussorgsky
"Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Maurice Ravel.........Moussorgsky

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin conducting, did not present anything new or startling, either in program or performance. Rather, it consisted of a group of old and familiar friends, played in more or less routine fashion.

Mozart's delightful and ever young serenade had a tendency to drag, except in the Menuetto and Finale, where Mr. Burgin and the orchestra really got into the swing of things. The Brahms, on the other hand, was better performed in the earlier movements. There was considerable raggedness of attack in the Allegro finale, where the orchestra was not particularly responsive to the conductor's beat.

Following the intermission, Moussorgsky held the floor, first with the lyrically beautiful introduction to "Khovanstchina," and finally with Ravel's orchestration of "Pictures at an Exhibition." The latter group has been done by the orchestra so often that we expected a better performance than the one they presented. The playing was decidedly uneven, and Mr. Burgin's tempi were frequently unconventional, to say the least. In the "Great Gate at Kiev" he sacrificed melody for sheer noise, but the audience seemed to enjoy the crashing finish to the evening.

D. W. S.

A Creative Memorial

There are, usually, two types of memorial possible in commemoration of a man of genius. One of these—the customary one—is a memorial chiseled in marble or wrought through the skill of the architect. The other—less frequently invoked—is the sort of memorial which seeks to carry along down the years the creative impact of the personality it celebrates.

The Memorial Fund to be instituted, through voluntary subscription, to honor the achievements of Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who died last March in California, concerns the latter form of commemoration. It is to be employed for the discovery and encouragement of exceptional native American talent in the three fields in which Rachmaninoff won fame. As a beginning, a series of biennial contests will be inaugurated next Spring throughout this country.

Boston is proud to find that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony, has been chosen to head the artists' advisory committee for this fund. Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in the finding and development of musical talent is of long standing.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY SUNDAYS
Will Give Series Starting in October

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate next season a series of six Sunday afternoon concerts to take the place of those hertofore given Tuesday afternoons. In order to enable subscribers to take advantage of the present 10 per cent tax on tickets, to be doubled on April 1, the plans for the season are now being disclosed.

In addition to Serge Koussevitzky, now completing his 20th season, the conductors will be Richard Burgin, George Szell, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leonard Bernstein. The soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Zino Francescati and Ruth Posselt, violinists; Vladimir Horowitz, Robert Casadesus and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianists, and the two-piano team of Pierre Luboshutz and Zenia Nemenoff. The season will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 6.

RADFORD, VA.
STAR

MAR 1 - 1944

Violinist Proves Also Taxiderms

BOSTON — The first trumpet player of the Boston Symphony orchestra wanted to find some one to stuff his pet canary. So he called the nearest taxidermist—one S. W. Gerhardt of Jamaica Plain, near Boston.

Well, Gerhardt turned out to be a violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and a colleague of the trumpet player. He stuffs canaries in his spare time.

[55]

MUSIC

Feb 19

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and his talented protege, Leonard Bernstein, shared the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Bernstein conducted the first Boston performance of his own "Jeremiah" Symphony, and wound up the afternoon brilliantly with "El Salon Mexico," by Aaron Copland. Mr. Koussevitzky began the concert with "The Nocturnal Procession" by Rabaud, and Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony. Jennie Tourel, mezzo soprano, was soloist in the finale of Mr. Bernstein's work.

That Mr. Bernstein is greatly talented, both as composer and conductor, must have been obvious to all present. He had mastered, it seemed, all the details of his own score and that of Mr. Copland (who was present as a listener). His conducting, which dispensed with a baton, was firm, vigorous and graphic. His gestures, often similar to those of Mr. Koussevitzky, were never superfluous nor contrived merely for visual effect. They meant something to the interpretation of the music.

His conducting was like his music: direct, emotional, but poised and usually clear-cut. He was meticulous in giving cues, quick to adjust dynamic shadings, and above all he gave one the impression he knew constantly what he was about. Through the rhythmical involvements of his own scherzo he steered an apparently unperturbed course. In "El Salon Mexico," which he whisked along rapidly, he was as careful with sonorities as with rhythms and accents.

Orchestras, particularly the best, can be intractable toward newcomers on the stand. From young conductors they exact a stiff test of both talent and tact. Mr. Bernstein came out with flying colors for the Boston Symphony played with that combination of willing effort, precision and beauty that showed they admired him.

It will not disparage Mr. Bernstein's creative gifts to say that the "Jeremiah" Symphony is remarkable more for what it promises in future than for the achievement it represents. It is a work of evident purpose and consistent style, even if the unusual formal plan of two slow movements and a scherzo inevitably gives an impression of motion concentrated in one place. The idiom is contemporary if derivative, as inevitably it must be in the first major orchestral work of any composer.

Mr. Bernstein handles dissonance expressively, and to the voiced lamentations of Jeremiah over ruined Jerusalem, in the finale, he brings a well-sustained and effective melodic line. He was fortunate, too, in his soloist. Miss Tourel sang admirably.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the Friday subscribers magnificent sounds and colors and the warmest sort of feeling in the immaculate score of Rabaud and the wine-iest of all the Schumann symphonies.—C. W. D.

RDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 16th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Leonard Bernstein was guest conductor and Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Rabaud.......''La Procession Nocturne''
Schumann, Symphony No. 3 in E flat (''Rhenish''), Op. 97.
Bernstein....Symphony No. 1, ''Jeremiah''
Copland..............''El Salon Mexico''

It was Leonard Bernstein day at the symphony yesterday, no doubt about it. The first half of the program was filled with good old music very beautifully played and it contributed much, of course, to the quality and the satisfaction of the concert. In fact, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," a lovely piece of program music, managed to stick in the mind for all that came after it, while the Schumann, long unheard, surmounted the essentially inferior inspiration of its material and orchestral technic through the affectionate reading given it by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Yet it remained for Mr. Bernstein, the 25-year-old Bostonian and protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, to give the concert its memorable qualities, and to help him do it, his mentor graciously gave him the whole of the second half of the concert . . . not to mention his advice, his encouragement and his best wishes. And for its part, the orchestra played its collective head off to make good his debut here both as conductor and composer.

To consider Mr. Bernstein first as a composer, it must be said that his first symphony is a striking and significant composition It is not an original one in the sense that it departs violently from tradition or strives for brash, startling effects, and that is good. For frantic search for a new musical expression is as much of an attempt to escape the present as, for instance, the attempt to speak further in the romantic or classical idioms of the past. Thus Bernstein has spoken in a present-day idiom which employs, almost at random, influences of the past, present and future, and anyone looking fussily for "influences" could find a surprising number. But why bother with all that?

The fact is, Mr. Bernstein has taken his musical language where he has found it, but he has spoken his own mind without obtrusive effort to be American (in the sense of the League of Composers tribe), Jewish (in the sense of Bloch), neo-classical, neo-romantic, impressionist or anyone else. And for his lack of pretense, his ability to resist the smart suasions of the sleek mechanics currently manufacturing music, and above all for his honesty, he deserves enormous credit.

His "Jeremiah" is a work of immediate appeal to the ear and the emotions. The first movement, rather weaker than the other two, is one of unfulfilled tension, so to speak. Its material is broad and strong—and often beautiful, but it doesn't quite make its point. The second, an exciting orchestral scherzo, is one of conflicting rhythms and bitter sonorities, very evocative and effective. The third movement, sub-titled "Lamentation," is one of the remarkable movements of contemporary music, no question about it. It reminds one strongly of Mahler, and there is the same hesitancy, at the end, of the "Lied von der Erde," to touch the final chord. Its melodic material is profoundly moving, almost incredibly so to have been the inspiration of a youthful composer in these times. The vocal part, sung in Hebrew by Jennie Tourel was very beautiful, and Mme. Tourel sang it excellently.

Well, here we are again at the end of another column, and still nothing said of Mr. Bernstein's conducting. Imagine Serge Koussevitzky at the beginning of his career, perhaps, and you will be able to catch the essential quality of it. The same intensity the same orchestral technic, the same ability to make an orchestra sound (as witness the performance of Copland's priceless "El Salon Mexico"); even some of the same gestures.

Her

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth program of the Boston Symphony's shorter series is a first class example of how standard symphonic works can be made readily acceptable for repeated hearings. The secret lies, in this case, in the refreshing process of Richard Burgin's intense and personal recreation of those works.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," for instance, was not the tired old piece, familiar through countless slipshod radio performances, but young and fresh and luminous music. The strings were a trifle shrill in the high sections of the Menuetto, but for the remainder of the work comported themselves with their customary brilliance. Mr. Burgin played it unhurriedly, yet it had sparkle and bounce.

Mr. Burgin marked Brahms' Third Symphony with imagination and expressiveness. Certain transitions—particularly from the first to second themes of the third, and again at the same point in the final movement—were not always cleanly brought about. But in the main it was a sound and sturdy reading.

With two Moussorgsky works—the Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and "Pictures at an Exhibition"—Mr. Burgin led the orchestra through its paces, splashing orchestral colors prodigally and fully indulging what must be a delightful sense of humor. The orchestra players must have had a field day with the latter work since it gives a solo to nearly every first desk.

It is something of a tour de force to carry off familiar Mozart and Brahms with better than fair success. The audience gave Mr. Burgin a good solid round of applause for an evening of fine music. The program will be repeated today at 3.—J. W. R.

---

at Roseland-State.

He Feb 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Leonard Bernstein, the Boston b who was appointed assistant co ductor of New York's Philharmoni Symphony last fall, scored an un quivocal success both as composer an conductor at yesterday afternoon Symphony Concert. (In the second ha of the programme he introduced to u his First, or "Jeremiah" Symphon with Jennie Tourel singing the mezzo soprano solo required by the fina movement, "Lamentation," and h conducted a brilliant and truly reveal ng performance of Aaron Copland' "El Salon Mexico," never before hear here to such good advantage.)

In commenting upon what seemed t him a really significant occasion, thi reviewer finds himself in the predica ment of the Symphony man who i said to have remarked that he didn' dare say how good he thought M Bernstein was for fear of appearin ridiculous. However, he is willing t go all overboard and quote Schumann' famous salutation to Chopin: "Hats of gentlemen, a genius!" To be sure, w do not yet know how many kinds o music this 25-year-old maestro ca conduct. We do not know whether h will ever surpass or even equal hi first symphonic effort. But no matte The real point is that one cannot thin off-hand of any other American com position that has the drive, the poig nancy, the dramatic strength, the emo tional force of this "Jeremiah." And Mr. Bernstein is far from being what we refer to as a composer-conductor. He directs an orchestra as one to the manner born.

The titles of the three movements tell the story. The first two are called, respectively, "Prophecy" and "Profanation." The text from the Book of Lamentations, so superbly sung by Miss Tourel, is, quite appropriately, in the original Hebrew. Much of the applause in which the orchestra joined was, of course, directed at her.

In the first part of the season's most memorable concert Dr. Koussevitzky conducted a surpassingly beautiful performance of Rabaud's tone poem, "La Procession Nocturne" and he restored to us Schumann's Third, or "Rhenish" Symphony, last heard at the regular concerts in 1931. After Rabaud's exquisitely contrived sonorities, poor Schumann's orchestration sounded clumsier than ever, but his music is still refreshingly hearty, and also heart-warming in its mellowness and geniality. Dr. Koussevitzky led it con amore.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Familiar music made the programme of last evening's Symphony Concert conducted by Richard Burgin. The major item, Brahms' Third Symphony, was heard not long ago at the longer series from Dr. Koussevitzky. It might be said that Mr. Burgin's interpretation laid more stress on the classical aspects of the music and less on its romantic side. In any event, the performance was a singularly satisfying one and greatly relished by the audience.

No less successful was Mr. Burgin's treatment of the final item, Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as orchestrated by Ravel. The final picture, "The Great Gate of Kiev," was properly resplendent. Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchnia" made the rest of a thoroughly enjoyable concert, a repetition of which will be heard this afternoon.

Feb 29 Post

Post

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 26 1944

A New Mass

Gretchaninoff Work Receives Premiere in Boston

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Feb. 25.—There are several viewpoints to consider in appraising Alexander Gretchaninoff's "Missa Oecumenica," given its first performance here this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with four solo voices, chorus and organ. And it is hardly possible to accept the composition without reserve from any of them.

The first is the sentiment of the occasion and is associated with the fact that the mass is the largest work of its seventy-nine-year-old composer (who was present at the performance), and also that the premiere of the work, inspired by the "idea of the universal meaning of the churches," coincided with the beginning of a particularly significant Lenten season.

From the second (or church) viewpoint, the mass is chiefly sensual and hardly acceptable to any faith. (This is not to say that churches of all faiths in the present day offer better stuff, because they do not. The mass, however, is a melange of second-rate, turn-of-the-century operatic reminiscence, and although it often quotes modes of the Eastern and the Western church, one against the other, the supporting fabric violates the basic spirit of liturgical music by introducing subordinate tunes of a popular character.

In short, it is liturgical music of the genre of Rossini, Cherubini and Gounod, and will doubtless achieve a place on some future moto proprio.

The third approach is from its purely musical character, forgetting its unquestioned sincerity of purpose and its religious connotation. In this respect it is merely tedious. The composer speaks honestly enough in the idiom he knows best, a sort of lukewarm romanticism notable chiefly for the number of opportunities it provides the listener to police the work as a sort of tune detective. It is well written for the voice however, and the soloists (Maria Kurenko, Dorothy Cornish, Roland Hayes, Robert Hall Collins and chorus (St. Cecilia Society and Apollo Club), had little difficulty negotiating the six conventional sections of the mass. The orchestra, when not supporting the vocal line, played elegant figurations, and the whole was warmly conducted by Mr. Koussevitzky who commissioned the work through his music foundation in memory of his wife. R. E. Jr.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

Feb. 23, 1944

DOWN THE LINE

A PROPOSED plan to dispose of the 1943 bumper potato crop by distributing five to ten pounds free in exchange for a designated ration stamp encountered the opposition yesterday of Gov. C. A. Bottolfsen of Idaho. The plan, proposed by Tom Dyalfi New York produce broker, was submitted also to governors of Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, North Dakota and South Dakota.—(AP)

* * *

A SYNTHETIC radio beam is the newest noise-maker to invade the field of highbrow music. It's an electrical instrument especially constructed by the Bell Telephone Co. laboratory to simulate the sound of the radio beam used by aviators in night or blind flying. The gadget will be heard March 3 when the Boston Symphony Orchestra presents Samuel Barber's new air force symphony for the first time. On March 11 the orchestra will present the symphony in New York. —(U.P.)

* * *

BOSTON south end residents have been asked to search among ash barrels and open lots for the handbag of Mrs. Mary L. Hanson, 49, whose nude and ravished body was found in a cellar excavation Saturday. Police hoped last night that discovery of the handbag might provide a clue in the baffling slaying. They believed the purse contained about $20 in small bills. Meanwhile, authorities still held for questioning two suspects who were arrested earlier this week. Thus far, however, no trace has been found of the tall, thin man who allegedly accompanied Mrs. Hanson from a south end cafe where she last was seen alive.—(U.P.)

* * *

COLLEGE girls from Massachusetts Institutions again will furnish a sizeable share of the labor needed to produce food on Massachusetts farms this year, according to state supervisor Beatrice Billings of the Women's Land Army. Miss Billings said at Amherst last night that college girls probably are the best source of farm labor in the state with the exception of regular and experienced summer workers. The supervisor added that the college helpers are physically perfect and eager to make their contribution toward victory on the home front.—(U.P.)

* * *

FIVE valuable trotting horses were killed, and four others were rescued by police early today when fire destroyed a stable opposite the Metropolitan Racing Association track in Brighton. Metropolitan District Policemen Fred Campbell and Jeremiah Murphy discovered the fire, forced a door to the barn, and led out four horses before the flames drove the officers from the building. Police said the stables were leased to Allison Fowler, Arlington Heights, but he was out of town and could not be reached for an estimate of the damage.—(AP)

* * *

WILLIAM E. CLEGG, 50, veteran assistant librarian at the Boston Public Library and father of five children faced municipal court arraignment today after allegedly confessing to the theft of some $23,000 from the library employes' sick fund during the past 10 years. Described by authorities as "a model husband," Clegg surrendered at police headquarters yesterday and deposited a satchel containing $2060 on the police superintendent's desk as partial restitution. Treasurer of the sick fund for many years, Clegg said he had been living at a Springfield lodging house since he disappeared a week ago. A warrant charging him specifically with the larceny of $2000 had been issued by police, who were astonished to learn the true extent of his peculations. Clegg's salary was $2300 a year until last July when it was increased to $3000.—(U.P.)

Herald Feb

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's subsidiary season was given last night at Symphony Hall, with Richard Burgin conducting, and with the following program:

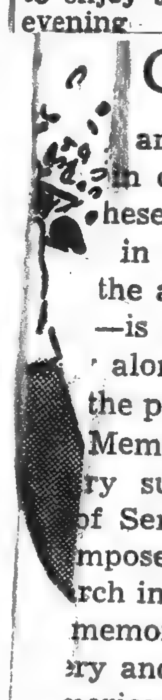
"Eine Kleine Nachtsmusik," Serenade for String Orchestra............Mozart
Symphony no. 3 in F major.....Brahms
Prelude to "Khovanstchina"..Moussorgsky
"Pictures at an Exhibition," orchestrated by Maurice Ravel........Moussorgsky

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin conducting, did not present anything new or startling, either in program or performance. Rather, it consisted of a group of old and familiar friends, played in more or less routine fashion.

Mozart's delightful and ever young serenade had a tendency to drag, except in the Menuetto and Finale, where Mr. Burgin and the orchestra really got into the swing of things. The Brahms, on the other hand, was better performed in the earlier movements. There was considerable raggedness of attack in the Allegro finale, where the orchestra was not particularly responsive to the conductor's beat.

Following the intermission, Moussorgsky held the floor, first with the lyrically beautiful introduction to "Khovanstchina," and finally with Ravel's orchestration of "Pictures at an Exhibition." The latter group has been done by the orchestra so often that we expected a better performance than the one they presented. The playing was decidedly uneven, and Mr. Burgin's tempi were frequently unconventional, to say the least. In the "Great Gate at Kiev" he sacrificed melody for sheer noise, but the audience seemed to enjoy the crashing finish to the evening. D. W. S.

Creative Memorial



are, usually, two types of memorial in commemoration of a man of genius. hese—the customary one—is a memorial in marble or wrought through the the architect. The other—less frequently —is the sort of memorial which seeks along down the years the creative im the personality it celebrates.

Memorial Fund to be instituted, through ry subscription, to honor the achieve of Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Rus mposer, conductor and pianist, who died rch in California, concerns the latter form memoration. It is to be employed for the ry and encouragement of exceptional na merican talent in the three fields in which aninoff won fame. As a beginning, a series nnial contests will be inaugurated next throughout this country.

ston is proud to find that Dr. Serge Kous ky, the distinguished conductor of the Bos ymphony, has been chosen to head the advisory committee for this fund. Dr. sevitzky's interest in the finding and devel nt of musical talent is of long standing.

SYMPHONY TO PLAY SUNDAYS

Will Give Series Starting in October

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate next season a series of six Sunday afternoon concerts to take the place of those hertofore given Tuesday afternoons. In order to enable subscribers to take advantage of the present 10 per cent tax on tickets, to be doubled on April 1, the plans for the season are now being disclosed.

In addition to Serge Koussevitzky, now completing his 20th season, the conductors will be Richard Burgin, George Szell, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leonard Bernstein. The soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Zino Francescati and Ruth Posselt, violinists; Vladimir Horowitz, Robert Casadesus and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianists, and the two-piano team of Pierre Luboshutz and Zenia Nemenoff. The season will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 6.

RADFORD, VA.
STAR

MAR 1 - 1944

Violinist Proves Also Taxiderms

BOSTON — The first trumpet player of the Boston Symphony orchestra wanted to find some one to stuff his pet canary. So he called the nearest taxidermist—one S. W. Gerhardt of Jamaica Plain, near Boston.

Well, Gerhardt turned out to be a violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and a colleague of the trumpet player. He stuffs canaries in his spare time.

Men of Music and Their Hobbies

Symphony orchestra members give a wartime twist to their hobbies.

Wide World Photos

JACOBUS LANGENOOEN, 'cellist has two hobbies—working for the relief of distressed Dutch seaman who help deliver supplies to the Allied forces overseas, and caricaturing his orchestral colleagues. Here he is (right) at work on an unflattering cartoon of Jesus Sanroma, the pianist.

JULIUS THEODOROWICZ, 'violinist, is a mycologist—mushroom expert to you. But his favorite subject of conversation is his son, with the U. S. Marines overseas.

A SORT of busman's holiday is the hobby of Henry Fabrizio, 'cellist shown at work on one of the cellos he makes. They're so good that the cello virtuoso Piatigorsky, amazed at the excellent qualities of a cello Fabrizio made for himself, ordered one like it. As Fabrizio works he thinks of his son, serving under enemy fire in the U. S. Army.

Things Aren't What They Seem, Especially Geniuses

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is difficult to accept Leonard Bernstein as a musical genius—which he unquestionably is—because he does not look like one, talk like one, or state that he is one. This is very confusing.

The public and, indeed, many people professionally associated with music in one capacity or another, are bred on the idea that a creative music genius is an exotic sort of character who emerges periodically from beneath a pile of manuscript paper with a new masterpiece, makes a few alarming statements about esoteric matters no one quite understands, and disappears under his manuscript paper where he exists, if at all, upon a few vitamin pills supplied by solicitous friends, while the light of inspiration burns as fiercely as magnesium until a new masterpiece is ready.

This legend has been fostered for years by the musical appreciation school of thought and is especially likely to be encountered on the radio when an announcer, armed with Tovey's "Essays in Musical Analysis" and a few popular biographies, sets out to conduct a program of recorded classical music. It is often met with, too, in the "birds, bees and flowers" school of critical thought which devotes most of its space to rhapsodical evocation of romantic pictures supposedly suggested by music. And it is also part and parcel of the phenomenon of "selling" classical music to the masses. In this latter form it has been increasingly in evidence since publishers discovered that the mere hooking of a fanciful title on a given composition would enhance its commercial value immeasurably—as witness the "Moonlight" Sonata. Thus fanciful titles and saucy biographical extravaganzas are the public relations policy of record companies, orchestras, concert bureaus and all others with a strong personal interest in that Virgil Thomson delights to call "the musical appreciation racket."

(It is quite true, of course, that many great composers and performers have been eccentrics, but certainly no more so than the great literary, graphic arts and historical personages. Besides, even the most commonplace person's life, subjected to the glare of public scrutiny, appears much more bizarre and eccentric than it really is.)

Be it as it may, 25-year-old Leonard Bernstein, who on Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony orchestra achieved a very real triumph both as conductor and composer, fulfills none of the qualities the public expects—one might even say "demands"—in a musical genius.

He is what he appears to be: a likeable young American; good looking, amiable, self-possessed, earnest, straightforward, and eager to get ahead in his chosen profession. He wears the same clothing as all other young Americans; dines in the same restaurants, lives in the same sort of house, has the same sort of family, goes to the same plays and movies, listens to the same radio programs, and reads the same books.

It also happens that he has very special musical gifts, and with them he has attained, at what is considered a fairly early age, a position of considerable prominence in the American musical world. Yet music has always produced far more than its share of prodigies and 25 is not young in an art noted for early maturity. But this is to digress again.

The facts of Mr. Bernstein's life are really quite simple. He was born in Lawrence, but was brought to Boston when five or six months old. He is thus a Bostonian to the core. He graduated from Boston Latin School in 1935 and from Harvard in 1939, majoring in music and the liberal arts. In the meantime he studied music at the Curtis School of Music in Philadelphia, and since his graduation from Harvard has worked closely with Dr. Koussevitzky (who "discovered" him) and the Koussevitzky Foundation at Tanglewood.

It was not until he was 10 years old that he turned to music, but from then on he demonstrated his inherent musical capacities so clearly that in three years he was capable of playing at sight the entire piano repertory. He started to compose when he started studying the piano, and now boasts a large output of compositions in various forms. Even so, he has never actually made a business of studying composition. The fact was—and is—composition came as easily to him as playing the piano and conducting an orchestra did. He doesn't know how he does it; he just does it. It is up to musicologists, critics and commentators to analyze his gift. So far as he is concerned, music is a natural means of expression; it makes no difference whether that expression takes the form of composition, performance or conducting.

This is not to say Mr. Bernstein's approach to his art is casual or improvisatory. He knows he has much to learn, and he spends every possible moment studying his art, its history, its esthetic and its technic. It is not to say, moreover, that Mr. Bernstein is without showmanship or practicality. He knows his is a difficult profession filled with jealousy, intrigue and public whim. He knows that music is both an art and a business. Regrettably enough, maturity in musical capacity comes much sooner than maturity in business, and so it is quite possible Mr. Bernstein faces many a heartbreak before he achieves a position in which he can demonstrate, beyond question, his true musical stature.

In the meantime, however, it is madness to allow questions of youth or appearance, lack of eccentricity or want of maturity, or any other consideration (such as having been born and completely educated in the U. S.), to obscure the basic fact of Mr. Bernstein's extraordinary musical gift. The young man is a genius, no doubt about it.

NAUGATUCK, CONN.
NEWS

FEB 29 1944

Finds Taxidermist Is His Colleague

Boston, Feb. 29—(UP)—George Mager of the Boston Symphony orchestra has good reason to believe that old saw about it being a small world.

Mager and his wife were heartbroken when their pet canary died, and decided to have it stuffer and kept in its cage.

Consulting the telephoning directory, they found that the nearest taxidermist was "S. W. Gerhardt."

Arriving at the address, Mager was astonished to discover the taxidermist was his colleague, Siegfried Gerhardt. Playing the viola in the Boston Symphony orchestra is Gerha[illegible] but he spends his free time at his hobby—stuffying such things as canaries.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH

MAR 2 - 1944

Boston Orchestra To Play Air Man's Symphony Friday

BOSTON—(AP)—A symphony produced by an Army Air Force corporal—among the first such works produced by a man in the Armed Forces — will have its premiere Friday by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The work was produced by Cpl. Samuel Barber of Philadelphia, Pa., and is dedicated to the Army Air Force.

The 34-year-old Philadelphian started and completed his Symphony No. 2 while in the service. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, said he would present it on a short tour next week.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

MAR 2 - 1944

Army Airman's Symphony To Have Premiere Friday

BOSTON, March 2.—(AP)—A symphony produced by an army air force corporal—among the first such works produced by a man in the armed forces—will have its premiere Friday by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The work was produced by Cpl. Samuel Barber of Philadelphia and is dedicated to the army air force.

The 34-year-old Philadelphian started and completed his Symphony Number Two while in the service. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, said he would present it on a short tour next week.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

MAR 2 - 1944

Symphony Will Play Corporal's Composition

BOSTON, March 2—(AP)—A symphony produced by an Army Air Force corporal—among the first such works produced by a man in the armed forces—will have its premiere Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work was produced by Corp. Samuel Barber of Philadelphia, Pa., and is dedicated to the Army Air Force.

The 34-year-old Philadelphian started and completed his symphony number two while in the service.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, said he would present it on a short tour next week.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

MAR 3 - 1944

BOSTON TO OFFER SOLDIER'S SYMPHONY

(The Associated Press)

Boston, March 2.—A symphony produced by an army air force corporal—among the first such works produced by a man in the armed forces—will have its premiere Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work was produced by Corporal Samuel Barber of Philadelphia, Pa., and is dedicated to the army air force.

The 34-year-old Philadelphian started and completed his symphony number two while in the service.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, said he would present it on a short tour next week.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

MAR 3 - 1944

BOSTON TO OFFER SOLDIER'S SYMPHONY

(The Associated Press)

Boston, March 2.—A symphony produced by an army air force corporal—among the first such works produced by a man in the armed forces—will have its premiere Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The work was produced by Corporal Samuel Barber of Philadelphia, Pa., and is dedicated to the army air force.

The 34-year-old Philadelphian started and completed his symphony number two while in the service.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, said he would present it on a short tour next week.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MAR 2 - 1944

Voegeli's Job Goes to Kuyper

Boston Man Named Symphony Manager

GEORGE A. KUYPER, associate business and advertising manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last six years, has been appointed manager of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, it was announced today by Edward L. Ryerson, president of the Orchestral Association.

Kuyper, who takes over his duties in Orchestra Hall on March 15, succeeds the late Henry E. Voegeli in the position.

The new symphony manager who is now 45, is qualified for his new position by a 20-year career in administrative and educational work, climaxed by his years in Boston.

Native of New Jersey.

A native of New Jersey, he graduated at Rutgers University and took his master's degree at Harvard. Upon completing his university work he spent two years at the University of Michigan as an instructor in English literature, leaving there to go to Boston University's college of business administration.

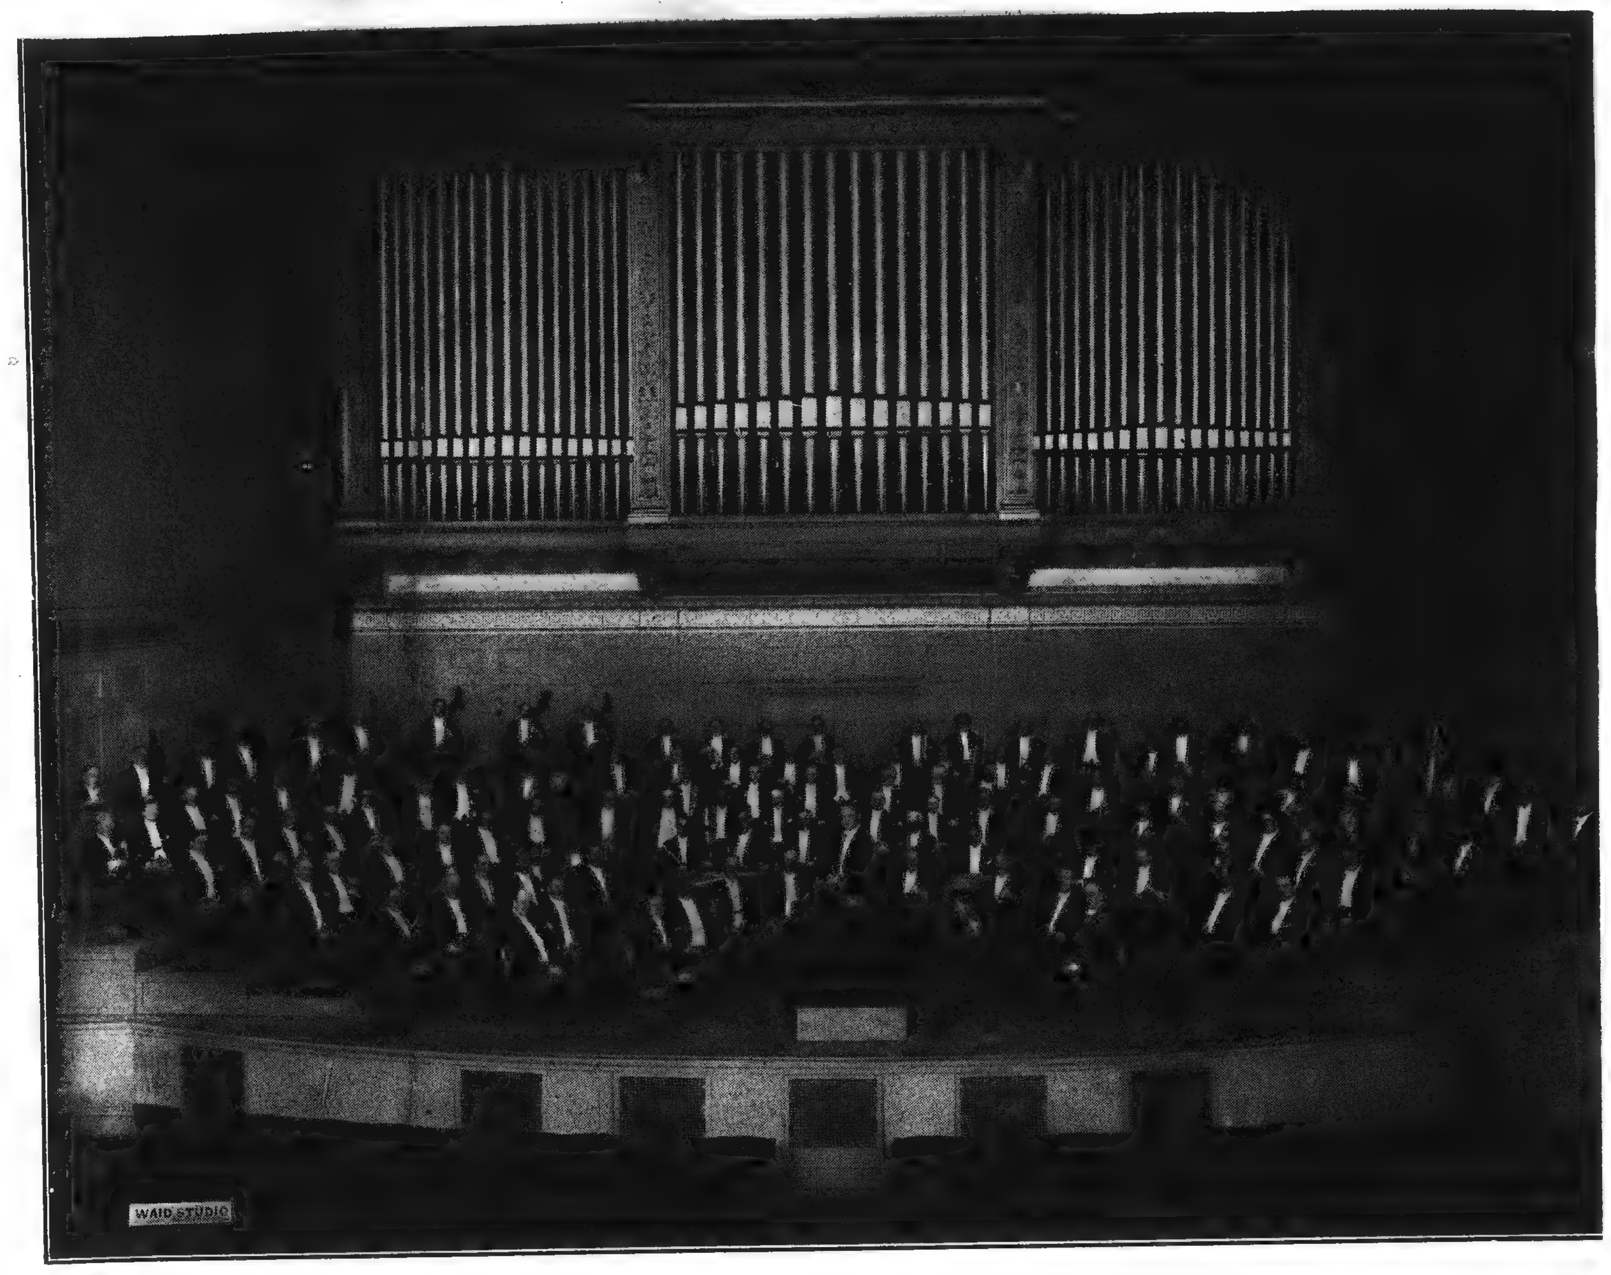
Later he accepted a post at New York University as a teaching fellow, assuming educational administrative duties at the same time.

Delighted, He Says.

In accepting the managership of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Kuyper made the following statement:

"I am delighted to come to Chicago because the future of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra looms up greater than that of any symphony orchestra in the country. It possesses a wonderful tradition plus a willingness to explore the new in music. I believe the Chicago Symphony Orchestra has unlimited opportunities."

THE PHILA. FORUM
MAGAZINE
PHILA. PA
MARCH, 1944



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The matchless Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting as usual, will be heard Wednesday evening March 29 in its annual Philadelphia Forum concert. We regret that at the time of going to press Dr. Koussevitzky was not yet ready to announce the program.

Serge Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. There was only one possible scholarship open to him, for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundredfold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their first symphony concert.

After the revolution Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. His span of years covers more than a quarter of the Orchestra's history and far exceeds that of any previous conductor. He has touched new heights of his art, and brought the Orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE

MAR 3 - 1944

MUSIC

By A. B. Dickson

One of the most significant programs we have heard over the air was recently provided by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

It was the radio premiere of the Ecumenical Mass commemorating Brotherhood week throughout the country, following a proclamation by President Roosevelt.

The mass was composed by Alexander Gretchaninov, famous Russian composer, who has made the United States his home in recent years. The great orchestra, two Boston singing societies and notable soloists officiated. The soloists were Maria Kurenko, Chicago soprano, Dorothy Collins, contralto, Ronald Hayes, famour Negro tenor and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

Gretchaninov, now in his 80th year, was born in Moscow and studied with Safanov and Rimsky-Korsakov. He has devoted most of his life to composition, and his church music follows the best traditions.

The annual meeting of the Music Teachers National Association in joint session with the National Association of Schools of Music will be held in Cincinnati March 22, 23 and 24. The general topic will be "Music in War; in Peace."

There will be greetings from such organizations as the Music Educators National Association, National Federation of Music Clubs, American Musicological Society and Music Library Association. Officers interested in music of the armed forces will be represented. Among other outstanding personalities are Howard Hanson noted conductor and composer, R T. Botkin of the Library of Congress, Eugene Goosens, conductor Cincinnati Symphony orchestra and Roy Harris, famous American composer.

Among the topics to be discussed are "War Reactions on Music," "Music in the United States Navy," "Music in the U. S. Army," "Pos War Music Introduction," "Folk Music and the Composer" "Musicology and Education."

The National Conference of Music Educators is scheduled for St Louis and will run from March to 8. Late reports indicate that Miss Bess Feather of Edison will attend and that Miss Helen Egger of Lew Wallace may also go.

Gary citizens, especially music lovers, should not miss hearing Dorothy Maynor, sensational young soprano, on Sunday afternoon, March 12. The proceeds go to a worthy cause.

Barber's New Symphony Definitely 'On the Beam'

Cpl Sam Barber's new Symphony is definitely on the beam. At least it is in the second movement, for there he produces the sound of the radio beam used in flying, and it figures as an important thematic idea.

This new Symphony, the second Barber has composed, is dedicated to the Army Air Forces, and it will be performed for the first times by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening.

Two years ago next August the Pennsylvania-born composer donned a GI uniform. Last August he was transferred to the Air Forces and shortly afterward he was given the assignment of writing music about the outfit. The Symphony which resulted is said to be the first serious music written about Uncle Sam's present Army by a man in uniform.

Got Theme In Flying

Cpl Barber, who is a nephew of the great contralto, Louise Homer, and who has had several works performed in previous years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, has been in town this week for rehearsals. Encountered in the corridor of Symphony Hall yesterday morning, he spoke with high enthusiasm of the cooperation and freedom granted him by the Army Air Forces during the composition of his piece.

"I got the 'feel' of the Air Forces when they sent me up with the pilots, navigators and bombadiers," he said. "I flew in all types of craft from heavy bombers to pursuit ships.

"It's a different world up there, in more ways than one. Up there, at night and in blind flying, the radio beam is the only connection with civilization down below. I've tried to suggest that. with purely musical means of course, in the second movement of my Symphony. And talking with the boys who have flown in actual combat opens up a new world of feeling, hearing them tell of going into danger, and, though they have returned, of seeing their pals badly wounded or killed."

That radio beam is produced from a special instrument made by the Bell Telephone laboratories of New York. It is an actual tone, the A on the first line above the treble clef. It blends with the orchestral instruments.

Music Goes Very Freely

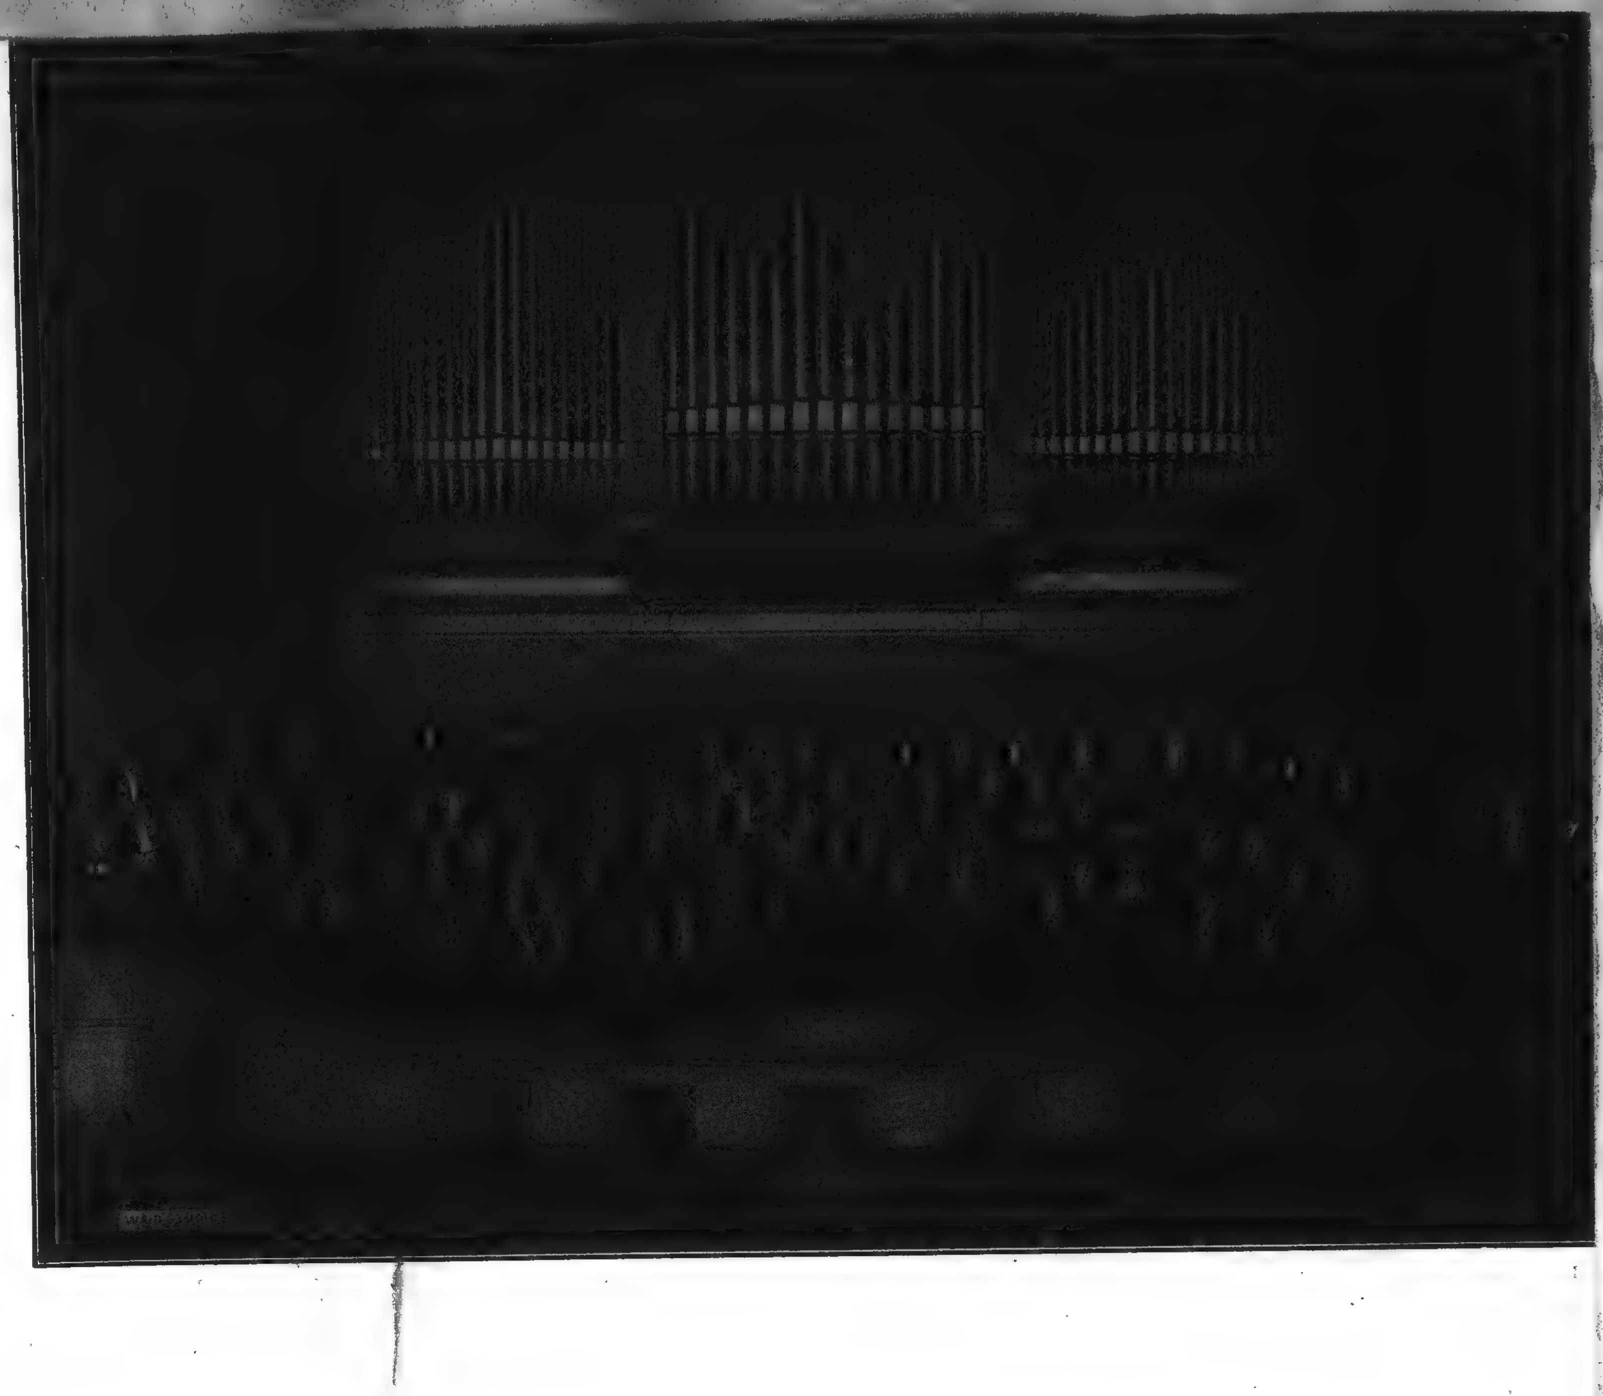
The Air Forces Symphony attempts to express that branch of the service in the emotional terms of music. It is not "program" music, however, and does not tell a story. The song of the Air Forces is not used.

"Terrifically difficult" are the words spoken of Cpl Barber's Symphony. The last movement, for example, begins very fast with no bar-lines between the notes. Barber wanted to express a spiral and believed the way to do it was to have the music go very freely, though with definite accents.

Cpl Barber began his Air Force duties at Fort Worth, Tex. Now he is attached to Stewart Field at West Point. He is a tall, lean fellow with a sensitive face and a quiet manner of speaking.

Incidentally, the OWI is going to have records made of the Symphony, which will be broadcast in Moscow, London and other cities of Allied countries.—C W D.

THE PHILA. FORUM
MAGAZINE
PHILA. PA
MARCH, 1944



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The matchless Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting as usual, will be heard Wednesday evening March 29 in its annual Philadelphia Forum concert. We regret that at the time of going to press Dr. Koussevitzky was not yet ready to announce the program.

Serge Koussevitzky was born in 1874 in the small, central Russian province of Tver. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. There was only one possible scholarship open to him, for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundredfold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their first symphony concert.

After the revolution Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. His span of years covers more than a quarter of the Orchestra's history and far exceeds that of any previous conductor. He has touched new heights of his art, and brought the Orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of seasons to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

GARY, IND.
POST-TRIBUNE

MAR 3 - 1944

MUSIC

By A. B. Dickson

One of the most significant programs we have heard over the air was recently provided by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

It was the radio premiere of the Ecumenical Mass commemorating Brotherhood week throughout the country, following a proclamation by President Roosevelt.

The mass was composed by Alexander Gretchaninov, famous Russian composer, who has made the United States his home in recent years. The great orchestra, two Boston singing societies and notable soloists officiated. The soloists were Maria Kurenko, Chicago soprano, Dorothy Collins, contralto, Ronald Hayes, famour Negro tenor and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

Gretchaninov, now in his 80th year, was born in Moscow and studied with Safanov and Rimsky-Korsakov. He has devoted most of his life to composition, and his church music follows the best traditions.

The annual meeting of the Music Teachers National Association in joint session with the National Association of Schools of Music will be held in Cincinnati March 22, 23 and 24. The general topic will be "Music in War; in Peace."

There will be greetings from such organizations as the Music Educators National Association, National Federation of Music Clubs, American Musicological Society and Music Library Association. Officers interested in music of the armed forces will be represented. Among other outstanding personalities are Howard Hanson noted conductor and composer, R. T. Botkin of the Library of Congress, Eugene Goosens, conductor Cincinnati Symphony orchestra and Roy Harris, famous American composer.

Among the topics to be discussed are "War Reactions on Music," "Music in the United States Navy," "Music in the U. S. Army," "Post War Music Introduction," "Folk Music and the Composer" "Musicology and Education."

The National Conference of Music Educators is scheduled for St. Louis and will run from March [illegible] to 8. Late reports indicate that Miss Bess Feather of Edison will attend and that Miss Helen Egger of Lew Wallace may also go.

Gary citizens, especially music lovers, should not miss hearing Dorothy Maynor, sensational young soprano, on Sunday afternoon, March 12. The proceeds go to a worthy cause.

[illegible]ew Symphony [illegible]ely 'On the Beam'

Herald Mar 3

[illegible] Barber's new Symphony is [illegible] on the beam. At least it is in the second movement, for there he produces the sound of the radio beam used in flying, and it figures as an important thematic idea.

This new Symphony, the second Barber has composed, is dedicated to the Army Air Forces, and it will be performed for the first times by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening.

Two years ago next August the Pennsylvania-born composer donned a GI uniform. Last August he was transferred to the Air Forces and shortly afterward he was given the assignment of writing music about the outfit. The Symphony which resulted is said to be the first serious music written about Uncle Sam's present Army by a man in uniform.

Got Theme in Flying

Cpl Barber, who is a nephew of the great contralto, Louise Homer, and who has had several works performed in previous years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, has been in town this week for rehearsals. Encountered in the corridor of Symphony Hall yesterday morning, he spoke with high enthusiasm of the cooperation and freedom granted him by the Army Air Forces during the composition of his piece.

"I got the 'feel' of the Air Forces when they sent me up with the pilots, navigators and bombardiers," he said. "I flew in all types of craft from heavy bombers to pursuit ships.

"It's a different world up there, in [illegible] night and in blind flying, the radio beam is the only connection with civilization down below. I've tried to suggest that, with purely musical means of course, in the second movement of my Symphony. And talking with the boys who have flown in actual combat opens up a new world of feeling, hearing them tell of going into danger, and, though they have returned, of seeing their pals badly wounded or killed."

That radio beam is produced from a special instrument made by the Bell Telephone laboratories of New York. It is an actual tone, the A on the first line above the treble clef. It blends with the orchestral instruments.

Music Goes Very Freely

The Air Forces Symphony attempts to express that branch of the service in the emotional terms of music. It is not "program" music, however, and does not tell a story. The song of the Air Forces is not used.

"Terrifically difficult" are the words spoken of Cpl Barber's Symphony. The last movement, for example, begins very fast with no bar-lines between the notes. Barber wanted to express a spiral and believed the way to do it was to have the music go very freely, though with definite accents.

Cpl Barber began his Air Forces duties at Fort Worth, Tex. Now he is attached to Stewart Field at West Point. He is a tall, lean fellow with a sensitive face and a quiet manner of speaking.

Incidentally, the OWI is [illegible] have records made of the Symphony, which will be broad[illegible]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
MAR 2 44

[58]

POST Daily Magazine and Comic SECTION
NEW YORK POST

Koussevitzky—A Man With a Post-war Dream

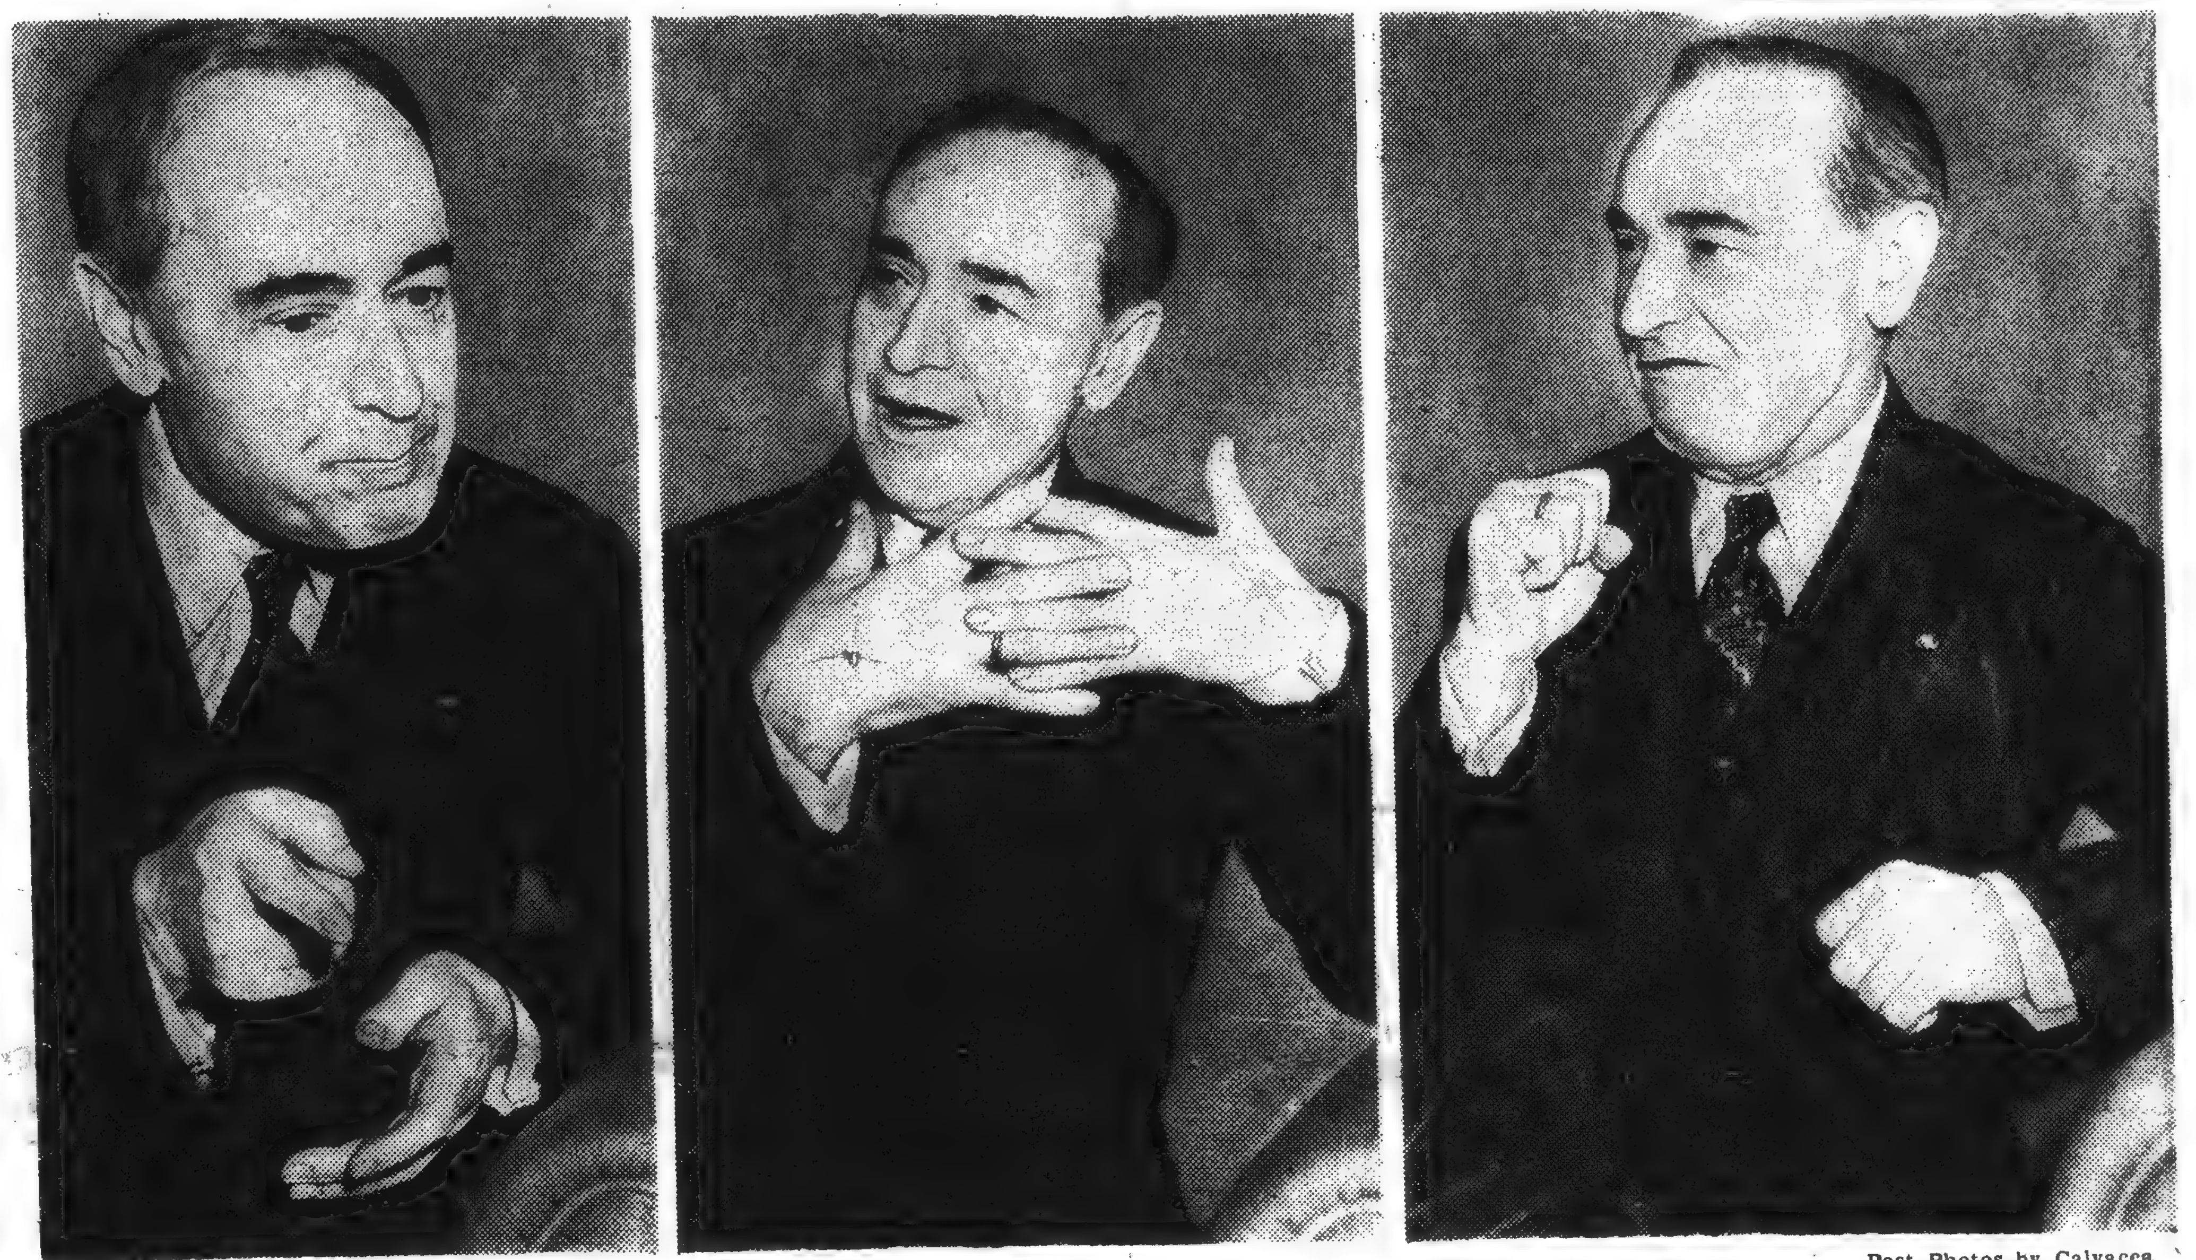
Close-up
MARCH 2, 1944

By MARY BRAGGIOTTI

"The whole of Europe lives these four years as in a hell. When it is over, we shall have to help the European countries not only with food and material things, but spiritually, too."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leaned forward in his chair in a Savoy-Plaza suite and continued: "We shall have to return to them the great art, the great values that we are keeping for them here. It is our obligation.

"Not only should the refugee artists return to their countries, but all artists should offer their services. Their appearances should be arranged by the governments of the United States and the various countries. We will gladly go with our orchestra to Europe immediately after the war."



GERMAN PEOPLE as much to blame . . . as Hitler for the h ell of war . . . declares Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Post Photos by Calvacca

Germans Don't Deserve It; Says People Chose Hitler

Dr. Koussevitzky's voice grew hard and the color deepened in his face.

"But not to Germany," he said decisively. "The Germans don't deserve it. It is the German people as much as Hitler himself who have made hell for the world. There was no revolution. Hitler was chosen by the people. They adopted his program to make the whole world slaves to Germany. The whole country must pay for its crime. The German people must win our respect again before they deserve the return of their own artists or the visits of foreign artists."

If Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony go to Europe, Boston will feel that it is doing without its very soul until they return. And the colossal radio audience which listens to them over the Blue Network each Saturday night will be making a substantial sacrifice towards the pleasure and morale of the people of Europe.

He Sailed Down the Volga With an Orchestra of 74

This is Dr. Koussevitzky's 20th season as conductor of the 63-year-old Boston Symphony—he's the first to stay in that coveted spot for longer than eight consecutive seasons.

Nineteen years ago last fall, when he arrived in America, Boston displayed its traditional wariness of strangers towards the double-bass virtuoso who was to conduct its cherished orchestra. And Koussevitzky had no intention of staying in the U. S. longer than a season or two.

But there must have been a chemical affinity between the Puritan city and the dynamic Russian who, in the early years of his conducting career, sailed down the Volga River with an orchestra of 74 men, often playing to people who had never known such a thing existed as a symphony orchestra.

The Boston orchestra had been sinking into a grevious rut since the reign of Karl Muck ended with that conductor's internment during the last war. The uncompromising Koussevitzky immediately sorted the chaff from the wheat among the personnel. He stepped up the orchestra's musicianship to top form and breathed into it the fire of life which, to the amazement of steady listeners, has flamed up with the heat of true inspiration at every single performance since 1924.

A champion of modern composers, he has introduced to the American public, Sibelius, Honegger, Walton, Copland, Prokofieff—to mention only a few. And it is he who is responsible for the Berkshire Music Center and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

His Passion for Music Inherited From Forebears

To Dr. Koussevitzky music is so overwhelming an element in his life that he can't say that he has a second interest—even paintings, of which he left a fine collection in Russia. He inherits his passion for music from generations on both sides of his family. His father was a violinist (and poor, so that he wanted little Serge to grow up to be a doctor or lawyer) and his mother, who died very young, a pianist.

He was born on July 26 — or July 13th, by the old Russian calendar — 1874, in a "very small little city near Kalinin."

"My father had a very hard time taking care of us after my mother died, but we were all good children and studied hard," he said, smiling. The maestro's emotions are close to the surface. His blue eyes fill with tears at a sad memory as easily as they crinkle with merriment or spark with indignation.

By the time he was 10 years old he had read a good percentage of the great works of Russian and French literature. Of those days, his strongest literary memory is of Tolstoi.

He Conducted Imaginary Orchestras When a Boy

"When I was about five," he reminisced, "I read tales by Tolstoi which I have never seen translated. They taught that strength lies not in force, but in God and truth. The influence of these tales I still feel now. They have guided my life. I think they should be translated for every child to read."

At about the time he started reading Tolstoi he began conducting imaginary symphony orchestras. At 14, with three rubles in his pocket and his worldly belongings in a pack on his back, the boy set out for the Philharmonic Conservatory of Moscow to apply for a scholarship in composition and conducting. As the only available scholarship was for the double bass, he settled for that—but rather half-heartedly.

"One day my teacher told me he would send me from the class if I did not work," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "As soon as I began to study seriously I realized the double bass could be developed as a solo instrument."

He became the finest double bass player in the world, giving recitals all over Europe and, later, in Boston and New York.

"I have not played for 10 years," he said. "Sometimes I cry because I have not the time!"

He was playing one evening in the salon of a rich Muscovite when he noticed a lovely girl who was really listening to his music instead of talking, as the other fashionable ladies were doing. It was romance—and in 1905 they were married. Mrs. Koussevitzky died in Boston only a few years ago.

His Was the First Real Symphony in Russia

The very year of their marriage the young couple were forced to flee from Russia to escape arrest by the Czar's henchmen. During that "exile" he made his début as conductor with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

"Every intelligent person took part in the revolution," explained the conductor.

It was in 1910 that Koussevitzky, with his own orchestra, made the first of his famous Volga trips. His was, in fact, the first real symphony orchestra in Russia. Symphony music had been played there, but always by opera orchestras. After the revolution, he became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra and one of the directors of the Grand Opera in Moscow, posts which he held until 1920, when he left to conduct orchestras in Paris, England, Italy, Spain and Portugal.

Dr. Koussevitzky lives in the Boston suburb of Brookline. For exercise, he walks as vigorously as he conducts. He sleeps poorly—four or five hours a night. He likes simple food and drinks "tea without tea"—hot water with lemon juice. He is known to his audiences and his friends as a meticulous dresser, but admits to no extravagance except, perhaps, shoes.

Of the effect that the war is having on musicians, the maestro said, "War will prove the fine processing of the inspired musicians—will make them all the more inspired. It will probably cast those who are not so talented into other fields, being unable to survive the ordeal of war."

Know Thyself

By Wells Carr

Are You Penny Wise?

That "corny", adage "a stitch in time saves nine," was never truer than today. You may ask why and wonder how it can be true in times when money is so plentiful for many people. "Easy come, easy go," you say. No need to be tight when you have it!

Before that loose change burns a hole in your pocket, answer two questions: What will you have to back you up if there's another depression? Are your pennies eating into vital materials needed for war?

Have a good time within reason—the relaxation and change are good for you. Get a few things you always needed, but hold onto those pennies, brother,

A score of 12 to 15 shows that despite increased income, you haven't gone spendthrift. A score between 3 and 9 shows that while you don't actually waste money, you live right up to the limit of your earnings. If you rate below 3 you're penny wise.

Score 0 for no. Add or subtract according to directions for yes. Then total your score.)

1. Are you trying to get remodeling or repairs done now that could wait? (sub. 3) ( )
2. Are you trying to get hold of the few remaining luxury items that may still be on the shelves? (sub. 3) ( )
3. Have you a sensible working budget that allows you to bank some money? (add 3) ( )
4. Can you meet your taxes and bills on time? (add 3) ( )
5. Does spending freely give you a sense of excitement or power? (sub. 3) ( )
6. Do you frequently try to impress others and overtip? (sub. 3) ( )
7. Does it bother you a little to see others spend their money foolishly? (add 3) ( )
8. Are you making your purchases for cash instead of credit? (add 3) ( )
9. Are you buying things to show your neighbors that you're "doing all right"? sub. 3) ( )
10. Are you saving your money for the wonderful things, like television that are promised after the war? (add 3) ( )

(Press Alliance, Inc.)

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 18th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, was the soloist. The program follows:

Mozart . . . Symphony in A major (K. 201)
Samuel Barber
Second Symphony ("Air Force")
Rachmaninoff
Concerto in D minor, No. 3, Op. 30

Any one of the three compositions on yesterday's program played as well as they were, would have given the concert a high position in the final summing up of Dr. Koussevitzky's 20th anniversary season. Coming as they did all of a lump yesterday—and all of them superbly played—they gave the concert a memorable aspect in a season, all things considered, of memorable concerts.

Most outstanding was the first performance of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, commissioned by and dedicated to the Army Air Force, of which Corp. Barber is a member. Certainly the most progressive branch of the armed forces in regard to its attitude towards creative talent within its own ranks, the Air Force has not by any means backed the wrong horse in Samuel Barber. Nor has it, in backing him, embarrassed his artistic integrity by "suggesting" he incorporate Air Force tunes or realistic sound effects and so forth. On the contrary, Corp. Barber appears to have been on his own, and as his very considerable musical powers mature with every large-scale work, he has come into his own with his Second Symphony.

Despite its fairly easy audience success, due in no small measure to the very striking finale, it is not a work which speaks quickly to an audience. Corp. Barber's idiom is advanced; often difficult in its harsh textures and its sonorities. His rhythms are sometimes so complicated as to convey a feeling of patchiness or of a halting, groping pace. This is especially true of the first movement, which contains interesting material but which fails to make its point through its almost self-conscious attempt to achieve new combinations and contrasts. It is, in short, Barber the technician at work. The second movement, in a fine lyrical vein, is a far more emotional conception especially as it introduces the melancholy sound of a radio beam (tapping out, for no reason at all they tell me, the letter "Y"). The third movement, a striking instance of a technical orchestral tour de force combined with a powerful emotional drive, is far and away the strongest of the three as well as the most immediately effective (which is not always the case). Thus the symphony has a cumulative effect as contrasted with the conventional symphony, which states its strongest material at the outset, and it may well have been Corp. Barber's intention to follow this really more logical procedure. In any case, it works, for the composer was given an unusually warm reception following the sincere (and technically fabulous performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

The Mozart Symphony, a gem without flaw, was done with unheard-of orchestral radiance, and the Rachmaninoff Concerto, by no means without flaw, was nonetheless in Vladimir Horowitz' prodigious performance of it, enough to unseat the most firmly established their holder. It [illegible] pretty close

PASTE OVER

MUSIC Mar

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Yesterday' Boston Symphony concert was one of those thrilling occasions that happen about twice a year. It began with Mozart of the A major Symphony (K. 201), progressed with the first performance of Cpl Samuel Barber's Second, or Army Air Forces, Symphony, and ended with pianist Vladimir Horowitz, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra giving a magnificent, an incredible performance of the D minor Concerto by Rachmaninoff.

The whole afternoon was a crescendo of excitement. At its end, as Mr. Horowitz returned again and again to the stage, the ordinarily self-contained Friday audience let loose with a burst of handclapping, stamping and cheers. This was the only possible conclusion to an interpretation whose emotional force had reached the ultimate peak of tension.

Mr. Horowitz must surely be the greatest keyboard technician of our time. He has his peers in the musicianship and style required for Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin and others. But I can think of no one else who plays with the same combination of speed, dexterity and smoothness. He can reduce legato passages to the merest wisps of tone; his octaves and arpeggios are like lightning and quite as dazzling; he can articulate a melody with absolute evenness. He is at his best when playing with orchestra, and in a Romantic masterpiece like this he is unique.

Cpl Barber was also received very enthusiastically when he appeared on the stage after his music had been played. His Symphony, dedicated to the United States Army Air Forces of which he is now a member, reflects emotionally what the composer feels about the branch of service. He says it is pure music, without a story. So it is, lean and muscular and very good. The dissonance is astringent but always purposeful. Barber has a fine sense of melody, witness the English horn solo of the slow movement, and other passages.

It is easy, however, to imagine a night flight in the second movement, with the radio beam simulated by an electrical tone generator. (This device proved legitimate, but as usual with such mechanical innovations, of limited interest.) Toward the end of the finale—which begins in a "spiral" theme which dispenses with bar lines—you can find the turbulence of an air raid: block busters dropping on the scream of a trumpet and exploding in the boom of tympani and other percussion.

More to the point, you can also regard this section as a deft musical recapitulation of preceding material. Technically the Symphony is very difficult and sophisticated. Furthermore it is individual and shows that Barber has developed himself into one of the most important American composers. We can all thank the Army that he was commissioned to write the work. And we can hope that other gifted composers now in uniform will be given similar opportunity.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their form the whole concert through. Mozart's not-often-heard and joyously youthful Symphony was done by a reduced orchestra with admirable clarity and precision, though the minuet went quite fast. In all respects this was a concert to be remembered.—C. W. D.

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA

Symphony Luncheon

Boris Goldovsky talked mainly about the music of Cpl Samuel Barber at the Symphony luncheon in the Oval Room of Hotel Copley Plaza yesterday. The composer was present and spoke himself, but preferred not to tell about his new Air Forces Symphony which is on the current Boston Symphony program.

Neither did Mr. Goldovsky explore the new work extensively, contenting himself to dwell on the music of Barber in general, and on the admirable precedent set by the Army in permitting a composer in the service to write serious music. Thereafter Mr. Goldovsy talked about certain characteristics of Mozart, which can be found in the A major Symphony, likewise on the Boston Symphony program. As usual, what he said was informative and well spiced with humor. C.W.D.

[59]

Globe Mar 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, which started off rather inoffensively with Mozart's youthful A major Symphony, suddenly sat up and became notable and exciting by reason of the first performance of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, dedicated to the Army Air Forces, in which he is now serving with the rank of corporal, and a performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto at the hands of that superpianist, Vladimir Horowitz. Heretofore one of our more urbane composers, with a decidedly lyrical bent, Mr. Barber has radically changed his tune. You might say the impact of war had wrung from him a grimmer, sterner music. He has stated explicitly that his latest work, commissioned by the Army Air Forces and begun last September, is in no sense programmatic, that the emphasis in it "is on the emotional rather than the narrative factor," to quote Mr. Burk's notes. Nevertheless, one cannot help feeling that in the "blockbustering" finish the planes are right over their target.

On first acquaintance, the second and third movements seem superior to the first in which, however, an evident sincerity of utterance compensates for a certain dryness and austerity. There is also a second theme of a distinctly, and hardly distinctively, melodious character.

The Andante begins and ends in decidedly emotional vein, with an unmistakably nostalgic note, but turns dull and uninteresting in the middle section. In the latter part there is introduced an especially constructed instrument that simulates the sound of a radio beam.

The last movement, it is a pleasure to record, is masterly and compelling throughout. It is enormously vital and vigorous, rich in both rhythmic and contrapuntal interest, and, as suggested above, the dynamic close gives a hint of the air force's real business in life.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had worked hard all the week and brought forth a masterly performance under the eyes and ears of the composer, who was called to the stage many times.

After the Symphony, Rachmaninoff's concerto, a bit old-fashioned when it was composed (in 1909), sounded as from another world, but the audience was due for change and contrast. We had heard Mr. Horowitz in this piece before and knew what to expect, from the marvelously controlled announcement of the chief theme to the hair-raising coda of the finale, which again brought the audience cheering to its feet. There is no one else who plays just that way.

Second Symphony Dedicated To The Army Air Forces

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 5 - 1944

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

MAR 4 - 1944

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

MAR 4 - 1944

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

MAR 4 - 1944

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 4 1944

WORCESTER, MASS.
~~GAZETTE~~
Telegram

MAR 4 1944

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

MAR 4 - 1944

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

MAR 5 - 1944

BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE TIMES

MAR 18 1944

Boston Symphony Will Celebrate Anniversary

Commemorating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakov, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will devote its entire program to two works of the celebrated Russian master, over the Blue Network and WJBO Saturday, at 7:30 p. m., Clifton Fadiman will, as usual, act as commentator during the intermission.

The program will open with a performance of "Dubinushka," a colorful and rhythmic work which the composer based upon an insurrectionary Russian folk tune in 1905.

Following this, the "Scheherazade" Suite will be played. This work repeats musically part of the tale with which the Sultana entertained the Sultan Schahriar during the thousand and one nights, thereby saving her life. The composer's program named for the four movements as follows: The Sea and Sinbad's Ship, the Narrative of the Kalandar Prince, the Young Prince and the Young Princess, and the Festival at Bagdad. This program is sponsored by Allis-Chalmers.

---

ce Symphony

al Block-buster

y Played at Boston

orp. Samuel Barber's second

er's Symphony
In Boston

Barber's Second Symphony a

Monitor March

By L. A. Sloper

Cpl. Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, dedicated to the Army Air Forces, had its first performance yesterday afternoon as the central number of the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony season. Sharing the honors of the occasion with him was Vladimir Horowitz, soloist in the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninov. The concert opened with Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201). Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

Corporal Barber is a familiar figure in Symphony Hall. We have heard and liked his Overture, "The School for Scandal," his Essay for Orchestra, and his Commando March. His Violin Concerto was unashamedly romantic. On the whole, that could not be said of his Second Symphony, which is couched in a very modern idiom.

At a first hearing this symphony made a strong impression. It is certainly the most ambitious work its author has presented. Without attempting to tell a story, it undoubtedly reflects emotions aroused by the composer's service in the Army Air Forces. They are powerful emotions, expressed by violent dissonances and conflicting rhythms, but also by intricate contrapuntal patterns and even by a lyricism that pervades the slow movement and intervenes in the first Allegro.

A great deal of attention probably will be attracted by the use in the middle movement (there are three in all) of an electrical device which simulates the sound of the radio beam that is used to guide aviators. This note is ingeniously employed in the orchestration, and is heard in muted trumpets as the movement closes.

The composer appeared on the platform to acknowledge the cordial applause of audience and orchestra.

The Mozart symphony played is that early work which was written when the composer was 18 and was revived by Dr. Koussevitzky seven seasons ago. It was played yesterday with delicacy and grace. The orchestra had been reduced to appropriate numbers, and the performance was free of those ex-

---

Symphony Preview

Mar 2 Boston

Barber's Second Symphony Dedicated to Army Air Forces

By Winthrop P. Tryon

When the United States Army sends to town a piece of music for presentation at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that, surely, is matter for remark. But comment in the case must be made with regard for censorship; and nothing must be presumed beyond what can fairly be inferred from news releases of the military public relations service. Thus to view the situation, a work bearing the title of Symphony, Dedicated to the Army Air Forces, comes to performance in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The composer, in the community of civilians, is no one else than Samuel Barber, and the piece of music under ordinary conditions will go into catalogue as his Symphony No. 2, op. 19. It will so stand, indeed, in the Boston Symphony program book, John N. Burk, editor. To be strictly official, however, the only way anybody by the name of Barber enters is in the status of an enlisted man, Corporal Barber.

⁂

The Army, then, may be said in all exactitude to submit to the attention of the Boston public a symphony in which Corporal Barber has a hand as the man who writes the notes. If a person on the outside is to get at what this record of thought and emotion awaiting disclosure in actual performance is like, some surmising has to be done. For that, perhaps a little consideration of how Mr. Barber puts notes on paper before he went into uniform and wore two-bar chevrons on his sleeve will help.

Further than that, though only a little further, there is the penciled manuscript of Corporal Barber, under what circumstances of convenience or inconvenience it may have been indited. This, held tightly in the Corporal's hand, or kept severely under his eye when for a moment laid down, would furnish a visitor at Symphony Hall offices more of a hint than might be imagined. Something eloquent inheres in notes drafted on lined folio sheets with lead pencil. A glance at them, and their message in a strange, yet not to be mistaken, manner replies.

⁂

Take that along with what the censorship, notwithstanding its reticence, lets escape, we may with some confidence proceed. Regard, now, the second movement, an Andante. Somewhere down in the texture of the score is a staff reserved for an electric instrument which taps out, more or less staccato-wise, the tone, A, of the aviator's "beam." Right there are elemental key, tempo, and mood, to say nothing else.

An Andante by Barber, we may be sure, will have a certain singing quality, more than one by almost any other of the present-day composing fraternity. His inclination is toward tunefulness, even if his pride of technique sometimes beguiles him into abstraction and complicated construction. He likes to make the string section sing, even when burdening it with elaborations of rhythm. He delights in a romantic solo moment for the flute or the horn, even if he has to go to the Impressionists for an idea; and for the English horn, too, if he must lean gently on Sibelius.

He has a peculiar fancy for the elegiac, and a power for sustaining it. Indeed, he can find his way around in the writing of a

---

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 8 - 1944

Boston Symphony And ~~Koussevitsky~~ Hailed As The Best

No Orchestra and No Director Excels Group Playing Last Night at Smith, Says Critic. Modest Leadership Especially Praised

Regretfully, for those who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall last night, the Smith college concert course was brought to a close. It was an auspicious end to a wonderful series, and last night's proceedings were easily the best of the season, for no orchestra in the world can surpass the Boston Symphony and no conductor surpasses the grandness of Serge Koussevitsky. Aside from Koussevitsky's impressive personality and authority, he gains much of his appeal through modesty and self effacement while before his listeners and his men. Not an extra movement of his arm does he indulge in, conducting sometimes, seemingly, with his jaw. Yet the precision and clarity that come forth is something amazing.

Brahms, Mozart and Berlioz provided the tried and true portion of last night's program and the argumentative part, for whoever cares to argue, came with the performance of Cpl. Samuel Barber's new symphony, his second, which he has dedicated to the army air forces. Between the commendable purpose and the lamentable achievement of Cpl. Barber there appears to be a gaping chasm. True, he is a young man with an undisputed musical background. There was certain evidence of musical literacy, and there was, besides, cleverness and a willingness to succomb to melody. But from such a disarray of brash noises, of striving after sheer volume with no evidence of logic, little can be expected in the way of appreciation later. The electrical instrument which simulates the sound of a radio flying beam used in the second movement was, of course, interesting, and so the audience thought. But where this becomes music is a first class mystery.

It remains, therefore, to praise the orchestra for a fine performance. With only five rehearsals of the symphony and mighty few performances since the first one, the results last night were a decided triumph. Koussevitsky deserves a special plaudit, moreover, for expending as much of his energy on this as he did on anything else on the program.

The evening opened with Mozart's string serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," in which the fabulously lovely string section of the orchestra played at its best. Passion and gorgeous tone came forth in the performance of Brahms' Third symphony, and in the lesser music of Berlioz, three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," the audience was treated to singular realization of the lightness which Berlioz meant.

Applause of the wildest sort greeted the finish of the program and college students, in their customary fashion, stamped their approval.—R. M. H.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 8 - 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLIMAXES SERIES

Smith College Audience Hears Barber's New Symphony—Next Year's Series Is Announced

Northampton, March 7—The Smith college concert course, as in a number of previous years, ended tonight with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall. As in previous years, it was the superlative evening of the series, a concert involving singular musical imagination and greatness. Serge Koussevitzky, if such a presumption may be pardoned, is growing better with age. His baton appears to have even more fluidity and ease than it has had in the past.

A crowded hall roared lusty approval both with tumultous applause and uninhibited stamping on the part of the college students. This was particularly evident after the performance of Corp Samuel Barber's new symphony, his second, dedicated to the army air forces which commissioned it and of which he is a member. The other works on the program were Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Brahms's Third symphony and excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Corp Barber's work, like most new works, needs more than one hearing to provide a definitive impression. This reviewer would prefer to leave the ultimate opinion of its musical value to posterity, with the postscript that posterity, in this instance, should be here in a year or less. However it is certain that this work was fashioned by a literate hand, a hand that combines scholarship with deftness. Much of it, in the fashion of many a modern work that attempts to look to the future, conveys an oppressive sense of strain. In other parts it achieves a lilt and loveliness that is quite commanding.

The Mozart with which the concert opened was a model of classical clarity and restraint. The Brahms symphony was replete with passion and beauty, aided and abetted in the composer's intention with some of the finest instrumental work imaginable, particularly in the fabulous string sections of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The excerpts from the Berlioz symphony were on an equal plane in performance if not in solid musical achievement.

A leaflet accompanying the program announced the concert course for next year. In addition to the regular concerts by the Boston and Cleveland symphonies, there will be a concert by the Little symphony founded and directed by Adolph Busch. Soloists include Erica Morini, violinist, William Kapell, pianist, and Martial Singher, French baritone.

PASTE OVER

G.X. MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Yesterday' Boston Symphony concert was one of those thrilling occasions that happen about twice a year. It began with Mozart of the A major Symphony (K. 201), progressed with the first performance of Cpl Samuel Barber's Second, or Army Air Forces, Symphony, and ended with pianist Vladimir Horowitz, Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra giving a magnificent, an incredible performance of the D minor Concerto by Rachmaninoff.

The whole afternoon was a crescendo of excitement. At its end, as Mr. Horowitz returned again and again to the stage, the ordinarily self-contained Friday audience let loose with a burst of handclapping, stamping and cheers. This was the only possible conclusion to an interpretation whose emotional force had reached the ultimate peak of tension.

Mr. Horowitz must surely be the greatest keyboard technician of our time. He has his peers in the musicianship and style required for Mozart, Beethoven, Chopin and others. But I can think of no one else who plays with the same combination of speed, dexterity and smoothness. He can reduce legato passages to the merest wisps of tone; his octaves and arpeggios are like lightning and quite as dazzling; he can articulate a melody with absolute evenness. He is at his best when playing with orchestra, and in a Romantic masterpiece like this he is unique.

Cpl Barber was also received very enthusiastically when he appeared on the stage after his music had been played. His Symphony, dedicated to the United States Army Air Forces of which he is now a member, reflects emotionally what the composer feels about the branch of service. He says it is pure music, without a story. So it is, lean and muscular and very good. The dissonance is astringent but always purposeful. Barber has a fine sense of melody, witness the English horn solo of the slow movement, and other passages.

It is easy, however, to imagine a night flight in the second movement, with the radio beam simulated by an electrical tone generator. (This device proved legitimate, but as usual with such mechanical innovations, of limited interest.) Toward the end of the finale—which begins in a "spiral" theme which dispenses with bar lines—you can find the turbulence of an air raid: block busters dropping on the scream of a trumpet and exploding in the boom of tympani and other percussion.

More to the point, you can also regard this section as a deft musical recapitulation of preceding material. Technically the Symphony is very difficult and sophisticated. Furthermore it is individual and shows that Barber has developed himself into one of the most important American composers. We can all thank the Army that he was commissioned to write the work. And we can hope that other gifted composers now in uniform will be given similar opportunity.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their form the whole concert through. Mozart's not-often-heard and joyously youthful Symphony was done by a reduced orchestra with admirable clarity and precision, though the minuet went quite fast. In all respects this was a concert to be remembered.—C. W. D.

HOTEL COPLEY PLAZA

Symphony Luncheon

Boris Goldovsky talked mainly about the music of Cpl Samuel Barber at the Symphony luncheon in the Oval Room of Hotel Copley Plaza yesterday. The composer was present and spoke himself, but preferred not to tell about his new Air Forces Symphony which is on the current Boston Symphony program.

Neither did Mr. Goldovsky explore the new work extensively, contenting himself to dwell on the music of Barber in general, and on the admirable precedent set by the Army in permitting a composer in the service to write serious music. Thereafter Mr. Goldovsy talked about certain characteristics of Mozart, which can be found in the A major Symphony, likewise on the Boston Symphony program. As usual, what he said was informative and well spiced with humor. C.W.D.

[59]

Post Mar 4

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, which started off rather inoffensively with Mozart's youthful A major Symphony, suddenly sat up and became notable and exciting by reason of the first performance of Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, dedicated to the Army Air Forces, in which he is now serving with the rank of corporal, and a performance of Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto at

---

Second Symphony Dedicated To The Army Air Forces

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 5 - 1944

DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

MAR 4 - 1944

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

MAR 4 - 1944

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

MAR 4 - 1944

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 4 1944

WORCESTER, MASS.
~~GAZETTE~~
Telegram

MAR 4 1944

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

MAR 4 - 1944

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

MAR 5 - 1944

ce Symphony

al Block-buster

y Played at Boston

orp. Samuel Barber's second

er's Symphony In Boston

Barber's Second Symphony a

Monitor March

By L. A. Sloper

Cpl. Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, dedicated to the Army Air Forces, had its first performance yesterday afternoon as the central number of the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony season. Sharing the honors of the occasion with him was Vladimir Horowitz, soloist in the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninov. The concert opened with Mozart's Symphony in A major (K-201). Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

Corporal Barber is a familiar figure in Symphony Hall. We have heard and liked his Overture, "The School for Scandal," his Essay for Orchestra, and his Commando March. His Violin Concerto was unashamedly romantic. On the whole, that could not be said of his Second Symphony, which is couched in a very modern idiom.

At a first hearing this symphony made a strong impression. It is certainly the most ambitious work its author has presented. Without attempting to tell a story, it undoubtedly reflects emotions aroused by the composer's service in the Army Air Forces. They are powerful emotions, expressed by violent dissonances and conflicting rhythms, but also by intricate contrapuntal patterns and even by a lyricism that pervades the slow movement and intervenes in the first Allegro.

A great deal of attention probably will be attracted by the use in the middle movement (there are three in all) of an electrical device which simulates the sound of the radio beam that is used to guide aviators. This note is ingeniously employed in the orchestration, and is heard in muted trumpets as the movement closes.

The composer appeared on the platform to acknowledge the cordial applause of audience and orchestra.

The Mozart symphony played is that early work which was written when the composer was 18 and was revived by Dr. Koussevitzky seven seasons ago. It was played yesterday with delicacy and grace. The orchestra had been reduced to appropriate numbers, and the performance was free of those ex-the hands of that superpianist, Vladimir Horowitz. Heretofore one of our more urbane composers, with a decidedly lyrical bent, Mr. Barber has radically changed his tune. You might say the impact of war had wrung from him a grimmer, sterner music. He has stated explicitly that his latest work, commissioned by the Army Air Forces and begun last September, is in no sense programmatic, that the emphasis in it "is on the emotional rather than the narrative factor," to quote Mr. Burk's notes. Nevertheless, one cannot help feeling that in the "blockbustering" finish the planes are right over their target.

On first acquaintance, the second and third movements seem superior to the first in which, however, an evident sincerity of utterance compensates for a certain dryness and austerity. There is also a second theme of a distinctly, and hardly distinctively, melodious character.

The Andante begins and ends in decidedly emotional vein, with an unmistakably nostalgic note, but turns dull and uninteresting in the middle section. In the latter part there is introduced an especially constructed instrument that simulates the sound of a radio beam.

The last movement, it is a pleasure to record, is masterly and compelling throughout. It is enormously vital and vigorous, rich in both rhythmic and contrapuntal interest, and, as suggested above, the dynamic close gives a hint of the air force's real business in life.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra had worked hard all the week and brought forth a masterly performance under the eyes and ears of the composer, who was called to the stage many times.

After the Symphony, Rachmaninoff's concerto, a bit old-fashioned when it was composed (in 1909), sounded as from another world, but the audience was due for change and contrast. We had heard Mr. Horowitz in this piece before and knew what to expect, from the marvelously controlled announcement of the chief theme to the hair-raising coda of the finale, which again brought the audience cheering to its feet. There is no one else who plays just that way.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE TIMES

MAR 18 1944

Boston Symphony Will Celebrate Anniversary

Commemorating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Nicolas Rimsky-Korsakov, the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will devote its entire program to two works of the celebrated Russian master, over the Blue Network and WJBO Saturday, at 7:30 p. m., Clifton Fadiman will, as usual, act as commentator during the intermission.

The program will open with a performance of "Dubinushka," a colorful and rhythmic work which the composer based upon an insurrectionary Russian folk tune in 1905.

Following this, the "Scheherazade" Suite will be played. This work repeats musically part of the tale with which the Sultana entertained the Sultan Schahriar during the thousand and one nights, thereby saving her life. The composer's program named for the four movements as follows: The Sea and Sinbad's Ship, the Narrative of the Kalandar Prince, the Young Prince and the Young Princess, and the Festival at Bagdad. This program is sponsored by Allis-Chalmers.

Symphony Preview

Mar Monitor

Barber's Second Symphony Dedicated to Army Air Forces

By Winthrop P. Tryon

When the United States Army sends to town a piece of music for presentation at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that, surely, is matter for remark. But comment in the case must be made with regard for censorship; and nothing must be presumed beyond what can fairly be inferred from news releases of the military public relations service. Thus to view the situation, a work bearing the title of Symphony, Dedicated to the Army Air Forces, comes to performance in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The composer, in the community of civilians, is no one else than Samuel Barber, and the piece of music under ordinary conditions will go into catalogue as his Symphony No. 2, op. 19. It will so stand, indeed, in the Boston Symphony program book, John N. Burk, editor. To be strictly official, however, the only way anybody by the name of Barber enters is in the status of an enlisted man, Corporal Barber.

* * *

The Army, then, may be said in all exactitude to submit to the attention of the Boston public a symphony in which Corporal Barber has a hand as the man who writes the notes. If a person on the outside is to get at what this record of thought and emotion awaiting disclosure in actual performance is like, some surmising has to be done. For that, perhaps a little consideration of how Mr. Barber puts notes on paper before he went into uniform and wore two-bar chevrons on his sleeve will help.

Further than that, though only a little further, there is the penciled manuscript of Corporal Barber, under what circumstances of convenience or inconvenience it may have been indited. This, held tightly in the Corporal's hand, or kept severely under his eye when for a moment laid down, would furnish a visitor at Symphony Hall offices more of a hint than might be imagined. Something eloquent inheres in notes drafted on lined folio sheets with lead pencil. A glance at them, and their message in a strange, yet not to be mistaken, manner replies.

* * *

Take that along with what the censorship, notwithstanding its reticence, lets escape, we may with some confidence proceed. Regard, now, the second movement, an Andante. Somewhere down in the texture of the score is a staff reserved for an electric instrument which taps out, more or less staccato-wise, the tone, A, of the aviator's "beam." Right there are elemental key, tempo, and mood, to say nothing else.

An Andante by Barber, we may be sure, will have a certain singing quality, more than one by almost any other of the present-day composing fraternity. His inclination is toward tunefulness, even if his pride of technique sometimes beguiles him into abstraction and complicated construction. He likes to make the string section sing, even when burdening it with elaborations of rhythm. He delights in a romantic solo moment for the flute or the horn, even if he has to go to the Impressionists for an idea; and for the English horn, too, if he must lean gently on Sibelius.

He has a peculiar fancy for the elegiac, and a power for sustaining it. Indeed, he can find his way around in the writing of a

---

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 8 - 1944

Boston Symphony And Koussevitsky Hailed As The Best

No Orchestra and No Director Excels Group Playing Last Night at Smith, Says Critic. Modest Leadership Especially Praised

Regretfully, for those who heard the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall last night, the Smith college concert course was brought to a close. It was an auspicious end to a wonderful series, and last night's proceedings were easily the best of the season, for no orchestra in the world can surpass the Boston Symphony and no conductor surpasses the grandness of Serge Koussevitsky. Aside from Koussevitsky's impressive personality and authority, he gains much of his appeal through modesty and self effacement while before his listeners and his men. Not an extra movement of his arm does he indulge in, conducting sometimes, seemingly, with his jaw. Yet the precision and clarity that come forth is something amazing.

Brahms, Mozart and Berlioz provided the tried and true portion of last night's program and the argumentative part, for whoever cares to argue, came with the performance of Cpl. Samuel Barber's new symphony, his second, which he has dedicated to the army air forces. Between the commendable purpose and the lamentable achievement of Cpl. Barber there appears to be a gaping chasm. True, he is a young man with an undisputed musical background. There was certain evidence of musical literacy, and there was, besides, cleverness and a willingness to succomb to melody. But from such a disarray of brash noises, of striving after sheer volume with no evidence of logic, little can be expected in the way of appreciation later. The electrical instrument which simulates the sound of a radio flying beam, used in the second movement, was, of course, interesting, and so the audience thought. But where this becomes music is a first class mystery.

It remains, therefore, to praise the orchestra for a fine performance. With only five rehearsals of the symphony and mighty few performances since the first one, the results last night were a decided triumph. Koussevitsky deserves a special plaudit, moreover, for expending as much of his energy on this as he did on anything else on the program.

The evening opened with Mozart's string serenade, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," in which the fabulously lovely string section of the orchestra played at its best. Passion and gorgeous tone came forth in the performance of Brahms' Third symphony, and in the lesser music of Berlioz, three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," the audience was treated to singular realization of the lightness which Berlioz meant.

Applause of the wildest sort greeted the finish of the program and college students, in their customary fashion, stamped their approval.—R. M. H.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 8 - 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLIMAXES SERIES

Smith College Audience Hears Barber's New Symphony—Next Year's Series Is Announced

Northampton, March 7—The Smith college concert course, as in a number of previous years, ended tonight with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall. As in previous years, it was the superlative evening of the series, a concert involving singular musical imagination and greatness. Serge Koussevitzky, if such a presumption may be pardoned, is growing better with age. His baton appears to have even more fluidity and ease than it has had in the past.

A crowded hall roared lusty approval both with tumultous applause and uninhibited stamping on the part of the college students. This was particularly evident after the performance of Corp Samuel Barber's new symphony, his second, dedicated to the army air forces which commissioned it and of which he is a member. The other works on the program were Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Brahms's Third symphony and excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" by Berlioz.

Corp Barber's work, like most new works, needs more than one hearing to provide a definitive impression. This reviewer would prefer to leave the ultimate opinion of its musical value to posterity, with the postscript that posterity, in this instance, should be here in a year or less. However it is certain that this work was fashioned by a literate hand, a hand that combines scholarship with deftness. Much of it, in the fashion of many a modern work that attempts to look to the future, conveys an oppressive sense of strain. In other parts it achieves a lilt and loveliness that is quite commanding.

The Mozart with which the concert opened was a model of classical clarity and restraint. The Brahms symphony was replete with passion and beauty, aided and abetted in the composer's intention with some of the finest instrumental work imaginable, particularly in the fabulous string sections of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The excerpts from the Berlioz symphony were on an equal plane in performance if not in solid musical achievement.

A leaflet accompanying the program announced the concert course for next year. In addition to the regular concerts by the Boston and Cleveland symphonies, there will be a concert by the Little symphony founded and directed by Adolph Busch. Soloists include Erica Morini, violinist, William Kapell, pianist, and Martial Singher, French baritone.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1 0 1944

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The program:
Eine kleine Nachtmusik (K. 525) . . . Mozart
Symphony No. 2, Op. 19 (dedicated to the Army Air Forces) . . . . . . Barber
Symphony No. 3, F major, Op. 30 . . Brahms
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." Berlioz

More Barber

NOT in several years has your announcer heard Serge Koussevitzky in such fine form as at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra itself in always in such perfect condition that one gets to thinking it doesn't make much difference how the conductor feels. It does, though. Because with him, too, at his best and well cast as to repertory, the music he plays can be as memorable an experience as the sound it makes.

* * *

Mozart's Kleine Nachtmusik is not perfect casting for the good Doctor. The rhythm of Mozart, his meter, his varied phraseology, the relation of ornament to melodic line, the function of off-beat accents and of surprise modulations all seem to escape him. The music comes out, in consequence, paled and a little nervous. But once this work was out of the way last night the concert took on color and command. I have seldom heard a reading of the Brahms Third Symphony (by far his best, in my modest opinion) that was at once so poetic, so gracious and so transparent. The Berlioz selections, ending as usual with the Rakoczy March, were so happily equilibrated in every way and so utterly delicious as sheer sound that their memory will remain, I am sure, for many years as a model of the way they can and should be performed.

* * *

Samuel Barber's Second Symphony is a broadly conceived work full of variety and emphasis. I admit some uncertainty as to what it is all about. If his First, which we heard on Wednesday at the Philharmonic, represents, as I think it does, a Hamlet-like backward yearning toward the womb of German Romanticism, this one may well be Hamlet in modern dress. I've a suspicion they are really the same piece. The new one is modernistic on the surface; at least an effort has been made to write in the dissonant style. But the melodic material would have been set off just as well, and probably better, by a less angular harmonic texture. Also, Mr. Barber does not handle dissonant counterpoint with much freedom.

* * *

The work seems to lack striking melody and contrapuntal life. There is lots of emphasis, but it is all of inferior material; and it is operated chiefly by instrumental weight rather than led up to by logic or by tonal rhetoric. Even the instrumentation, though competently calculated, is lacking in character. The constant abuse of instrumental doublings for purposes of emphasis has produced a muddiness of texture that weighs down further a piece already top-heavy with oratorical paraphernalia. Mr. Barber, at his best, is songful and elegiac. His harmonic instincts and training, though elegant, are conventional. Pending further acquaintance with his Second Symphony, I am inclined to think that the commission to write a work glorifying the Army Air Forces has led him to try his hand at a publicitary task for which he has little taste and less preparation.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

1944

Bostonians Give N. Y. Premiere Of New Symphony by Barber

By Harriett Johnson

The Army Air Forces commendably illustrated the esthetic aspects of its functioning recently by commissioning one of its corporals, Samuel Barber, to write a symphony. In Carnegie Hall last night, the Boston Symphony, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played a stirring New York premiere of the work.

While the music is not intended to be programmatic, its inspiration derives partly from influences in the Corporal's life during the past months at the Army Air Field in Fort Worth, Texas, and at Stewart Field, New York, where he has been stationed. A novelty of the second movement is the use of an electrical "tone generator," especially constructed by Bell Telephone Laboratories for the purpose of imitating the sound of a radio-beam. The instrument, probably effecting a more musical impression than the actual code signal employed for night and blind flying, created quite an atmosphere.

Surrounded by the composer's nocturnal sounding themes and his picturesque orchestration, the mood suggests flying at night without actually saying so in words.

Vitality and Strength

Corporal Barber has made his symphony stronger by not attempting to be descriptive. It is a relief to know that we are not obligated to conjure up sounds of airplane engines or the whirr of propellers when our ears take in the music. He stipulates that his use of the radio-beam signal is primarily musical. The total result is a three movement symphony (the second of the composer's) of extraordinary strength.

Much of it is complicated and dissonant, which does not add up to easy listening. But through the intangible medium of its multifarious tonal combinations the composition appears to have captured something of the conflicts, paradoxes, questionings and vitality of our present life. Yet its primary theme is positive. The composer affirms his belief through the rhythmic vigor of his themes, the soaring quality of his climaxes, the power and frequent brightness of his orchestration. The work also illustrates a technical and musical growth for the Corporal, who already has numerous orchestral works to his credit.

Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Symphony No. 3, by Brahms, and excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz were also performed by the orchestra.

Samuel Barber

Whose Second Symphony was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

MAR 1 0 1944

The AAF Gets A Symphony

Cpl. Samuel Barber of the Army Air Forces, whose Second Symphony was given its New York premiere last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, was, as a civilian, one of our most polished, well-mannered composers. His works were marked by a fine sense of proportion and were at their best when he expressed a kind of brooding intensity. His Essay for Strings and his setting of Dover Beach, for example, move their hearers by emotional understatement: there is deep feeling in them, but never an attempt, through harmonic, rhythmic or melodic eccentricities, to make a sensation.

It is too easy a guess to conclude that a vigorous Army life has ended this phase. Nevertheless, the Second Symphony is far more raucous (and I don't mean merely loud) than any earlier works of his that I know. His cross-rhythms—which he has used for other purposes before—are there to create nervousness; his underlying pattern of dissonances in the first movements is effective but tricky; and he uses an electric device to imitate the sound of a radio beam for no discernible reason excepting that the Symphony is dedicated to the Army Air Forces. For if the few sounds it made were there primarily for musical and not descriptive reasons, as the program notes said, they could just as well have made been by one of the woodwinds.

Mr. Barber's fine sense of proportion is still evident in the construction of each of the three movements, but his new-found muscular extroversion does not yet sound very convincing. Maybe it presages a wider development in one of our finest composers.

The other numbers on the program were Mozart's Eine Kleine Nachtmusik, the Brahms Third Symphony and three excerpts from The Damnation of Faust by Berlioz. Mr. Koussevitzky has conducted all of these here before and there is no need to remind you how well he does them.

—HENRY SIMON

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1 2 1944

Boston Orchestra Plays New Schuman Symphony

Work for Strings Features Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, performed a concert devoted to the Symphony for Strings of William Schuman, the Second Symphony (dedicated to the Army Air Forces) by Samuel Barber and "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakov at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The conductor and orchestra were in top form.

It was the first New York performance of the Schuman work. Barber's Symphony was reviewed by Virgil Thomson on Friday.

Rarely do American works get such a well rehearsed reading, but in spite of this the new Schuman Symphony, his fifth, remained as hard a nut to crack as when it was first performed from Boston over the radio. Filled with harmonic and thematic mannerisms borrowed from his other works, Schuman relies too much on re-using old material to give an impression of individuality. The first and second movements have a strained artificiality and an arbitrariness that works against the establishment of a continuity and a mood. Featuring awkward, truncated, unmelodic lines, the music leads up to climaxes that don't warrant all the fuss that leads up to them. In the last movement, for once, however, Schuman relaxes into graceful wit and gives evidence of a side far more appealing than anything he has so far written. The light and humorous may be one of the characters he can handle best, judging from this.

A performance by the Boston Symphony of Scheherazade is still one of the wonders of the musical world. This work is a touchstone that always brings out the orchestra's best playing year after year, and yesterday the artists brought their program to a close with as brilliant a performance as they have ever given.

E. C.

"Rakoczy." The hall was packed and there was much enthusiasm. It is due Mr. Barber to record that there was particularly long applause after his symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 1 1944

War Inspired Symphony

By GRENA BENNETT

War-inspired music was the feature of the program performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the first New York presentation of Cpl. Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, bearing a Dedication to the Army Air Forces.

Mr. Barber, one of the most important of contemporary American composers, began the score at the Army Air Field in Fort Worth, Texas, in September. He accompanied pilots on a number of flights, and while he insists the music is not intended to reflect his experiences in the air, the score reveals invention particularly in heavy dissonance and dynamics.

Otherwise the listener recognized fragmentary borrowings from many sources; some of these frank imitations and others deftly paraphrased. The slow movement contained some solacing measures resembling the lonesome tunes from remote mountain sections.

The introduction of an electrical instrument that lightly tapped a code in imitation of a radio beam, and a similar effect contributed by the regular musical instruments, muted and otherwise, were intended to suggest happenings in the planes of war.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

MAR 1 0 1944

BOSTONIANS PLAY NEW BARBER WORK

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

A new symphony by Samuel Barber was played at the Boston Symphony's concert last night in Carnegie Hall. It is his second and is dedicated to the Army Air Forces. The novelty is to be repeated by the Bostonians on Saturday afternoon, and since the Philharmonic-Symphony will revert to the same composer's earlier symphony in one movement this afternoon and again on Sunday, after having performed it on Wednesday night, Mr. Barber is in the enviable position of chalking off five Carnegie Hall performances in a single week. He was again present in his uniform as an Army corporal to take his composer bows last night.

Though his scoring makes use of an electrical instrument that simulates the sound of a radio beam, the composer has let it be known that this is in no sense program music, explaining that his use of the rhythmic code signal, ordinarily an aid in blind flying over unknown territory, is primarily musical and not descriptive. Only the dedication remains to explain his use of it at all. Musically, the simulated radio beam contributes little or nothing. Instruments of the orchestra could give a fair imitation of it, but the signal—save as it might serve the programmatic purpose that the composer disavows—is arbitrary and pointless.

Otherwise, we have here a symphony in three movements—allegro ma non troppo; andante un poco mosso; presto, allegro molto—that is harmonically the most "modern" and adventurous of Mr. Barber's usually orthodox compositions for orchestra. It is weakest thematically. Though there are moments of moderate charm, there is more that bespeaks a paucity of really salient ideas.

Besides the new work, Serge Koussevitzky led the always polished ensemble in performances of Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," the Brahms Third Symphony and the usual three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." In the Mozart serenade the strings played with a delectable lightness, without overriding the belief that this "night music" is for a smaller ensemble. The Brahms symphony was elegantly, if not very robustly, played. Dr. Koussevitzky can be counted upon to make Berlioz scintillant. Applause was tumultuous after the "Rakoczy" March.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 0 1944

NEW BARBER WORK HONORS AIR FORCES

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Group in Symphony—Ovation for Corporal-Composer

By OLIN DOWNES

The novelty of the concert given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall was Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, composed by commission of the Army Air Forces and dedicated to them. The symphony is farther to be broadcast over short wave stations by the Office of War Information and scores of the work sent to London and Moscow.

Corporal Barber was present last night to enjoy the very cordial reception given him and his symphony. After the performance he appeared in uniform on the stage to acknowledge long applause. He has been given opportunities for his creative work as a musician by the Army, which evidently has not been backward in recognizing his value as a composer as well as a soldier.

We are told that in this symphony Mr. Barber has made no attempt to convey a "program" or "story." It is true that he makes sounds which seem to have realistic suggestion, including the use of a special instrument, an electric "tone-generator," especially constructed for his purposes at the Bell Telephone Laboratories in New York, and used at the climax of the slow movement of his symphony in a way "which stimulates the sound of a radio-beam." Generally speaking, we would call this programmative. It is not the first time that a mechanical sound apparatus has been used in a symphonic score. The voice of a nightingale as canned on a Victor record has been used in a well known symphonic poem by Ottorino Respighi. But Mr. Barber is not writing of nightingales.

Structure of Symphony

What he is writing about, if anything specific, is left to our imagination—which seems a trifle casuistic. For if there was no definite idea in the music, why the special electrical instrument? An ordinary woodwind or combination of wind instruments could have produced as effective a tone color, wherever wanted. One would say that an imaginary flier has found the beam, and is sticking to it. There is any dramatic connotation you please in all this, but certainly it is not "pure music." It is, however, by the test of music and not by that of a "program," implicit ro otherwise, that we are to listen to this symphony.

It is a "modern" score, if modernity is assumed to be absent unless typified by dissonance. In structure this is the most close-knit and concise of his works we have heard. The first movement is clear and strong in outline and the last sounds brilliantly. Whether the slow movement is longer than its ideas justify, and whether this tonal speech is as native to Corporal Barber as earlier idioms which he has successfully treated is to be better decided after more than one hearing.

Mozart and Brahms Heard

The other compositions were Mozart's "Kliene Nachtmusik," Brahms' Third Symphony and the excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" which include the "Minuet of the Will'o the Wisps," the "Dance of the Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March." The conductor's approach impressed us as especially subjective. Precision and beautiful balance, perfect style in the turning of the phrase, preserved the indescribably eighteenth century quality of adorable music. The question of how many instruments should be employed to give ideal presentation of such a score is one susceptible to long debate. It was remarkable with what mastery Dr. Koussevitzky made a large orchestra sound like a small one, very fine in tone, consummately finished in articulation.

The announcement of the theme that leaps like a flash of lightning from the orchestra after the two stormy chords that define a principal interval of the Brahms symphony was in the great vein. The interpretation was virile and direct to the point of the conservative, if one accepts a pace in the third movement that hurried the gruppetto which ornaments the Schumannish motive, and an end almost too tranquil for the fundamental mood of the last movement, which is that of great spaces and wind-swept splendor.

The Berlioz pieces are sure-fire. We had anticipated more of diablerie in the Minuet of Mephistopheles' spirits. The orchestra displayed its delicacy in the diaphonus scoring of the waltz, and a plenitude of power in the fiery and rhapsodic performance of the [60]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 10 1944

Air Force Symphony Makes Bow

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Add to the music's growing tributes to the country's armed units, Cpl. Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, dedicated to the Army Air Forces, and given a local premiere by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

Cpl. Barber's symphonic ode to the branch in which he now serves is an outgrowth of personal flying experiences, though not intended to picture any actual flight. Featured in the andante movement is a radio-beam motif, worked in, however, for purely musical effect.

While the symphony may still be dubbed the Radio Beam Symphony or the Nosedive Symphony, Cpl. Barber planned it strictly as musico-emotional expression. If you don't feel up in the clouds while listening to it, remember it wasn't meant to be a musical logbook.

Symphonic Logic.

Yet it's hard to say whether Cpl. Barber's intentions come through clearly. The electrical instrument flashing the code signal in the andante, later picked up by muted trumpets, fits into the work's symphonic logic all right, but it brings in a programmatic note. A radio beam is still a radio beam, in or out of a symphony.

Although the work failed to measure up to Cpl. Barber's earlier symphony, premiered in a new version Wednesday night by the Philharmonic-Symphony, the andante sounds like a real flash of inspiration. The flying signal is a needed detail, but still only a detail.

What impressed me, apart from the smoothly-knit fabric of the movement, was Cpl. Barber's success in getting over the pathos and loneliness of solo night or blind flying. You sense the feeling of growing tension and bleak waiting in the music.

Style Jagged.

The end movement, written briskly around a spiral figure, roughly suggestive not so much of an upward spin, but of the reaction to one, isn't bad in make-up and continuity. As for the opening movement, the jagged idiom, zig-zag style, and shrieking cross-currents, just didn't seem to be the language Cpl. Barber is most fluent in.

As a whole, the revised first symphony holds up better in compactness and unity. Yet, the Air Forces Symphony has its timely points, though I suspect people will hear the radio beam device and some of the first-movement whirring and clanging as parts of a symphonic news report on aeronautics.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading seemed designed to put the new score on a par with the repertory best. The fine orchestra gave it everything it had. In fact, Cpl. Barber got the same consideration as Mozart, Brahms and Berlioz, who joined him on last night's program.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 13 1944

Boston Orchestra Plays New Schuman Symphony

Work for Strings Features Carnegie Hall Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitsky, performed a concert devoted to the Symphony for Strings of William Schuman, the Second Symphony (dedicated to the Army Air Forces) by Samuel Barber and "Scheherazade" by Rimsky-Korsakov at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The conductor and orchestra were in top form.

It was the first New York performance of the Schuman work. Barber's Symphony was reviewed by Virgil Thomson on Friday.

Rarely do American works get such a well rehearsed reading, but in spite of this the new Schuman Symphony, his fifth, remained as hard a nut to crack as when it was first performed from Boston over the radio. Filled with harmonic and thematic mannerisms borrowed from his other works, Schuman relies too much on re-using old material to give an impression of individuality.

A performance by the Boston Symphony of Scheherazade is still one of the wonders of the musical world. This work is a touchstone that always brings out the orchestra's best playing year after year, and yesterday the artists brought their program to a close with as brilliant a performance as they have ever given.

E. C.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 10 1944

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Introduces Barber's Second Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Out of the war effort has come Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, which was given its first New York performance by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. Direct contact with the experiences of aviators supplied the background, and the work is dedicated to the army air forces. Aside from these facts, Corporal Barber has made no attempt to write a program symphony; instead he has attempted to express emotional reactions musically.

That some of these emotions are determined, keen and hard can readily be discerned in the discordant parts of the score; that some of them are groping, bewildered and deadening can be gathered from still other parts. Mr. Barber has been successful in creating certain atmospheric conditions both figurative and literal. There is the sense of spaciousness, of mechanical friction, of realistic experience. The harshness of the opening measures of the first movement gives way to more stabilized harmonies as the music pursues regular sonata form. The second movement is of nocturnal character and employs the code signal of the radio beam as part of the musical development. A finale is suggestive of harnessed energy, of monotony, of conquering spirit as it passes through a set of variations and short fugato.

But the work is short on sustained melody, losing effect thereby. Much of the technical sound of contemporary orchestral writing detracts from the impression of the whole, leaving the listener interested but not quite satisfied. As for the ecstacy of flying, there appears to be little; instead grimness predominates. This music sounds like a literal translation of emotional reactions rather than an imaginative expression of them.

The concert opened with a refined performance of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," continued with a mellowed conception of Brahms' Third Symphony played with measured tread, and ended with the familiar three excerpts from Berlioz' "Damnation of Faust." The exquisite finesse of the playing robbed some of this music of its robustness: refinement may be too refined.

Concert at Academy

Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony in its fourth Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music this evening. The program consists of William Schuman's "Symphony for Strings," Robert Schumann's Rhenish Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

Boston Symphony Plans for the 1944-'45 Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 64th season next Oct. 6 under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky, who will then begin his 21st successive season as its conductor.

Soloists to appear with the orchestra in the series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will include violinists Jascha Heifetz, Zino Francescatti and Ruth Posselt; pianist Vladimir Horowitz, Robert Casadesus and Jesus Maria Sanroma, and the two-piano team Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff.

Three notable guest conductors are announced in addition to Richard Burgin, the associate conductor; George Szell, now conductor at the Metropolitan Opera Company; Dimitri Mitropoulos, who made his American debut at these concerts in 1936, and Leonard Bernstein, who conducted the orchestra a few weeks ago.

An important change is that in the shorter afternoon series of six concerts, which until now have been given on Tuesday afternoons. These will be given instead on six Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall at 3:30. The change in the day has been made in response to an evident demand under present conditions. The Monday evening series of six Monday evening concerts will be given as usual.

Renewals are being made and subscriptions taken at the present government tax rate of 10 percent until April 1, when the 20 percent tax ruling will go into effect.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 12 1944

WORK BY SCHUMAN IN PREMIERE HERE

His 'Symphony for Strings' Is Played at Carnegie Hall by Boston Orchestra

Compositions of his adopted country and of his native Russia formed the program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The American works performed consisted of William Schuman's "Symphony for Strings," which received its New York première, and Corp. Samuel Barber's Second Symphony, accorded its second presentation. Russia was represented by the "Schéhérazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, the centenary of whose birth occurs this month.

After the cacophonies and complexities that prevailed in the contemporary offerings by Mr. Schuman and Mr. Barber during the first half of the concert, the spontaneous, natural and euphonious music of Rimsky-Korsakoff's wonderously contrived score spoke its powerful message on behalf of the essential simplicity of artistic creations destined to survive. "Schéhérazade" says what it has to say with such directness and clarity that anyone can comprehend its intentions, and yet it is so fascinatingly constructed and orchestrated with such supreme skill that it can hold the attention of the most sophisticated listener.

Dr. Koussevitzky could hardly have celebrated the Rimsky-Korsakoff anniversary more fittingly than he did with his magnificent reading of this ever-popular and ingratiating suite. The leisurely tempo employed made it possible for all of the exquisite detail lavished on each the four movements to be clearly defined and of enchanting effectiveness in an interpretation equally remarkable for its richness of exotic coloring, tonal glamour and sensousness, and evocation of highly contrasted moods. The leader spent no end of loving care on every page of the masterpiece and his men responded with a zeal that made for the utmost perfection of performance on the part of all concerned.

Mr. Schuman's new symphony, his fifth, was written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and was first presented by the same forces in Boston last November. It comprises three movements, the first, "Molto agitato e energico," being followed by a Larghissimo and a final Presto. The opening division is robust and austere. The second, chiefly for muted strings, proved rather vague and wandering in its melodic outline, with a strange climax for the upper strings and some interesting coloring in its closing harmonies. The last division made a less positively defined impression than the rest, and in parts reminded one of Tchaikovsky's procedure in certain of his scherzos in its treatment of piggicate. All of this music was masterly in its treatment of dissonant counterpoint, logical and in each of its movements well unified in style. But in general it was dry and not particularly communicative.

N. S.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 11 1944

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday night. The program:
Eine kleine Nachtmusik (K. 525) . . . Mozart
Symphony No. 2, Op. 19 (dedicated to the Army Air Forces) . . . . Barber
Symphony No. 3, F major, Op. 30 . . Brahms
Excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." Berlioz

More Barber

NOT in several years has your announcer heard Serge Koussevitzky in such fine form as at Thursday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra itself is always in such perfect condition that one gets to thinking it doesn't make much difference how the conductor feels. It does, though. Because with him, too, at his best and well cast as to repertory, the music he plays can be as memorable an experience as the sound it makes.

* * *

Mozart's Kleine Nachtmusik is not perfect casting for the good Doctor. The rhythm of Mozart, his meter, his varied phraseology, the relation of ornament to melodic line, the function of off-beat accents and of surprise modulations all seem to escape him. The music comes out, in consequence, pallid and a little nervous. But once this work was out of the way Thursday night the concert took on color and command. I have seldom heard a reading of the Brahms Third Symphony (by far his best, in my modest opinion) that was at once so poetic, so gracious and so transparent. The Berlioz selections, ending as usual with the Rakoczy March, were so happily equilibrated in every way and so utterly delicious as sheer sound that their memory will remain, I am sure, for many years as a model of the way they can and should be performed.

* * *

Samuel Barber's Second Symphony is a broadly conceived work full of variety and emphasis. I admit some uncertainty as to what it is all about. If his First, which we heard on Wednesday at the Philharmonic, represents, as I think it does, a Hamlet-like backward yearning toward the womb of German Romanticism, this one may well be Hamlet in modern dress. I've a suspicion they are really the same piece. The new one is modernistic on the surface; at least an effort has been made to write in the dissonant style. But the melodic material would have been set off just as well, and probably better, by a less angular harmonic texture. Also, Mr. Barber does not handle dissonant counterpoint with much freedom.

* * *

The work seems to lack striking melody and contrapuntal life. There is lots of emphasis, but it is all of inferior material; and it is operated chiefly by instrumental weight rather than led up to by logic or by tonal rhetoric. Even the instrumentation, though competently calculated, is lacking in character. The constant abuse of instrumental doublings for purposes of emphasis has produced a muddiness of texture that weighs down further a piece already top-heavy with oratorical paraphernalia. Mr. Barber, at his best, is songful and elegiac. His harmonic instincts and training, though elegant, are conventional. Pending further acquaintance with his Second Symphony, I am inclined to think that the commission to write a work glorifying the Army Air Forces has led him to try his hand at a publicitary task for which he has little taste and less preparation.

Mitropoulos to Conduct Symphony

In its announcement of its forthcoming 64th season beginning next Oct. 6, the Boston Symphony orchestra revealed today that its guest conductors for next season include Dmitri Mitropoulos, George Szell and Leonard Bernstein, and that soloists include Heifetz, Horowitz, Casadesus, Francescatti, Sanroma, Ruth Posselt and Luboschutz and Nemenoff.

In announcing its 64th season, the trustees of the orchestra pointed out that subscription renewals made before April 1 could be taken at the present government tax rate. Dr. Koussevitzky will enter his 21st year as conductor of the orchestra next season.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 11 1944

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Boston Symphony Gives Its Fourth Brooklyn Concert at the Academy

Whatever the intention, the program for the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last night resolved itself into a study of styles in composition. It was the juxtaposition of the music of William Schuman of New York City, born in 1910, and that of Robert Schumann of Zwickau, Saxony, born in 1810, that precipitated discussion. The interval of 100 years also came into focus because Rimsky-Korsakov of "Schehrazade" fame was born March 18, 1844. But though the arrangement of the program had been so nicely timed, the performances were not so well timed. The result was that, in spite of some marvelous playing on the part of the orchestra, the concert was not altogether satisfying as Boston Symphony concerts usually are.

Rimsky-Korsakov saved the evening for having written the now shop-worn musical fantasy of the Arabian Nights which still holds its lustre and charms its audiences after half a century even when the music is too deliberately paced and the performance lacks the necessary sparkle. Koussevitzky has always broadened his tempos too much, but now they are slow to the point of dragging. When he did tighten up, the music acquired the right amount of scintillation. But this came only in flashes. Had not the orchestra played so clearly and so precisely throughout, the disappointment would have been more marked.

Robert Schumann, of the two "n's," won out over him of the one "n" through quality of inspiration, of warmth and of melody. Robert's Third Symphony was the work played. It is a happier work than Koussevitzky made it sound last night, for the performance was in need of more good all-round spirits than this painstaking interpretation allowed. The flush of romanticism was missing.

Though not marked as a first New York performance, William Schuman's Symphony for Strings (his Fifth) was heard for the first time. Its three movements sounded like much ado about getting some music written, but left this listener in an unresponsive mood. The workmanship was good, the intent as good, but that something more, which in this case was the need of some flowing melody to relieve the rhythmic patterns, just wasn't there. The composer was on hand to take bows. He needed to bow to the orchestra for having done so much for his music. What an inferior performance would have revealed, however, does not call for speculation.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
MAR 13 1944

NEW SCHUMAN WORK

William Schuman may be entering a more normal phase of composition, or so it would seem, at least, from a luminous reading of his Symphony for Strings, which had its first New York performance at the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. He was less inclined in this work to pellet his audience with ideas which strain for easy attention. This may have been partly because he could not rely upon the assembled forces of the brass, but it also indicated a trend toward consistency and integration. These qualities showed up more particularly in contrast to Samuel Barber's loose and rhetorical Second Symphony, which Serge Koussevitzky repeated after having introduced it here only two days before. None of the Schuman ideas are as striking as those in his "Festival Overture" or as bold as some in his Third Symphony, but they tend to move forward, even if not always eventfully. The second movement is too long and static. The program closed with Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade."

A. V. B.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

5 1944

Fine Symphonic Program By Boston Music Group

By LESLIE MOORE

The Civic Music Association presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at the Auditorium last night in this program:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik (K 525) Mozart
Allegro
Romanza
Menuetto: Allegretto
Rondo: Allegro

Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Opus 90 Brahms
Allegro con brio
Andante
Poco allegretto
Allegro

Prelude to "Khovanstchina" Moussorgsky
Fantasia "Francesca da Rimini" Tchaikovsky

Here was a program that had just about everything symphonic. It had the clean sparkle of Mozart in the spontaneous serenade, for strings only. Some may, for all I care, argue that this and kindred Mozart should be done by a quintet to capture its essential fragility. To say that is to reckon without the astonishing ensemble virtuosity of the Boston strings, and without the Koussevitzky touch that can, on demand, be as lightsome as a breeze. Whether in the flowing air of the menuetto or the brilliant rondo, last night's work treated Mozart delightfully.

Reason and Poetry

The program had the intellect of Brahms, the magnificent blend of reason and sheer poetry which enter his third symphony. This opus, which so excites the Brahms devotee, leaps from romance to declamation, from intensity to serenity, and back again. The brasses shone in the conbrio. The woodwinds knew beauty in the organlike passages of the andante. The strings were eloquent in the grace of the third movement, and the whole orchestra rallied nobly to the challenge of Brahms in the finale.

Probably the curiously inspired Moussorgsky has no greater exponent than Dr. Koussevitzky. Anyway, you came to believe that last night, if you were not previously convinced by the Boston recording of the Khovanstchina prelude. Aside from its message as part of an opera, the prelude, thanks in good part to Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestrating, becomes remarkable music, structurally and melodically, all superbly demonstrated by the Boston orchestra's interplay of string and woodwind themes and variations, and climaxed by an incredible whisper of a pianissimo in the best Koussevitzky manner. The program had that.

It had the uninhibited musical emotion of Tchaikovsky loosed on the Dante story of poor Francesca. It may have been the shrewd conducting of a double-bass virtuoso, which Koussevitsky is when he wants to be, but at any rate the solid bass foundation which marks the opening of this symphonic poem gathered tremendous power. The sustained qualities of the middle or narrative portions were exquisitely done by clarinet and strings. And the third section, with its fury, violence and swift lulls, winding up with those celebrated, walloping and ominous chords of the full orchestra, brought the whole program to a rousing climax.

The program had Koussevitzky, a great conductor, a conscientious and courageous musician, a man of artistic dignity and relentless good taste. There is little more that can be said of him to add to volumes already written. We must be grateful that Koussevitzky, with just enough showmanship to make him interesting, can bring his great orchestra here annually at the full flower of his own and the organization's inspiring careers.

Mar 18 MUSIC Gof

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is observing another anniversary at the Boston Symphony concerts this week: the centenary of the birth of Nikolai Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakoff on March 18, 1844. The Russian composer is accordingly represented by his setting of the folk song, "Dubinushka," and the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." After intermission comes the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist.

The performance yesterday afternoon of "Scheherazade" was not without some technical blemishes, but was at the same time one of the most exciting I can remember. And even on a warmish, damp day, which can do strings no good, the orchestra sounded superbly rich and deep.

Those who felt that Rimsky's anniversary might better have been served by music infrequently played today—such as the "Antar" Symphony—must have had their feelings changed by this eloquent "Scheherazade" and the vigor of "Dubinushka." The little folk song of workers, which became a revolutionary tune in 1905, is of no great artistic stature. But it does have that cumulative and irresistible force common to melodies in which, figuratively, runs the blood of the great masses of people. "Dubinushka," like "La Marseillaise" and "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," is a march of victory.

After the spectacular Russian music, Brahms' uncompromisingly structural Violin Concerto had to stand on its own feet, which it did quite easily, since it is a masterpiece. The performance, both solo and orchestral, was a crescendo that found its peak in the finale. It took a while for the first movement to get off the ground. But after it did, there was a steady interpretive soaring.

Mr. Szigeti is a fine musician in whose art are the essential qualities of grace, dignity and an interpretive ease which can be termed scholarly contemplation. There is never any doubt as to the refinement of his playing, his mastery of style. On the other hand, he seldom lets himself go in flights of emotional ecstasy.

Yesterday his tone was on the whole smoother and more fluid than I have heard it to be, and a genuine lyrical warmth ran through the slow movement and finale. In general, however, this reviewer thought his performance to be more refined than exalting.—C. W. D.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MAR 26 1944

Famed Boston Orchestra Will Be Here Dec. 9

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and his great Boston symphony orchestra will come to Milwaukee next Dec. 9 for an Auditorium concert under Arion Musical club auspices.

Arrangements have been made to use the full capacity of the main Auditorium hall, about 6,500 seats, and advance ticket sales will begin at once.

The Boston symphony of 105 men has been heard in recent weeks in Saturday night radio concerts over the Blue network, under auspices of the Allis-Chalmers Co.

The Boston symphony was founded by Henry L. Higginson of Boston. A student of music in Vienna in 1860, he was impressed by the famous orchestra there, and he resolved that Boston must some day have one, too. Twenty years later, when business success had brought him sufficient means, Higginson engaged the best musicians he could find and induced Georg Henschel, a young conductor of talent, to come over from England to be their leader.

The Boston orchestra played its first concert on Oct. 22, 1881.

In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky arrived in America to conduct the group.

Sales of Boston orchestra recordings total more than 1,000,000 per year.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 15 1944

Boston Symphony Gives Fifth Civic Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

The fifth of the Civic Music concerts was another of those inspiring orchestral experiences that the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be counted upon to give. Last night a capacity Auditorium audience heard this superb organization led by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program opened with the delightfully embroidered Mozart "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which brought out in full relief the remarkable richness and uniform bowing of the strings. In contrast to the Brahms score which followed, this Mozart music maintains a consistent eloquence. Dr. Koussevitzky's approach to the classic style is painstaking. Typically, he uses the very minimum of motion seemingly only for achieving desired nuances, accents and subtleties of detail. Although a slightly slower tempo for the "Rondo" movement is perhaps more to our liking, there was no loss of rhythmic stability. In short, last night's Mozart had a crystalline clarity and coolness that would refresh the most exacting classic devotee.

Russian Selections

It is not for the purpose of "boarding the bandwagon" that we re-affirm the critical consensus that the final two movements of Brahms' "Third Symphony, Opus 90" lapse into comparative mediocrity in which Brahms becomes tonally harsh and orchestrally confused. The problem then is whether the two superlative opening movements are to be sacrificed, and the answer is obviously in the negative. Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of Brahms is heroic rather than purely stimulative. In matters of balance he prevents the sweep of foreground melodies from trampling the rich underlying detail.

After intermission, the orchestra and conductor concerned themselves with two colorful excerpts from Russian pens—Moussorgsky's "Prelude" to the opera "Khovantchina" and Tschaikowsky's "Francesca Da Rimini." Last night's readings were typical. Dr. Koussevitzky derives from his native music an intensity without affectation. The Moussorgsky opus emphasized the remarkably gentle flexibility of the organization. There was a pizzicato motive that hushed itself almost to a whisper. It was a psychological as well as musical interpretation.

Next Concert March 27

We have read of Tschaikowsky's dissatisfaction with the "Rimini" music. He referred to its "meaningless uproar" and "sham exquisiteness." It is true that he made full use of his "bag of tricks" even to the wailing woodwind solos and well-distributed chromatic runs, but in spite of its obvious "fireworks," it has strong appeal, notably in those passages where the high strings entreat to the accompaniment of heavy brass and percussion backgrounds. Technically, there was nothing to be desired, even in the "exposed" excerpts for the brass section. The audience expressed itself with emphasis by hearty and prolonged applause.

The next concert on March 27 will return Soprano Helen Traubel to the Civic Music stage.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

MAR 17 1944

Koussevitzky to Stay ~~as Symphony Leader~~

BOSTON, March 17—(A. P)—The Boston Symphony orchestra will begin its 64th season next October 6 under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony hall officials announced today.

The coming season will mark Koussevitzky's 21st successive year as conductor of the orhcestra.

The announcement said three guest conductors will appear with the orchestra next year in addition to Richard Burgin, the associate conductor.

They include George Szell, now conductor at the Metropolitan Opera company; Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAR 18 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS FOR 64TH SEASON

BOSTON, (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 64th season next October 6 under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky. The coming season will mark Koussevitzky's 21st successive year as conductor of the orchestra. The announcement said three guest conductors will appear with the orchestra next year in addition to Richard Burgin, the associate conductor. They include George Szell, now conductor at the Metropolitan Opera Co.; Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony society.

URDAY, MARCH 18, 1

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 17th program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Joseph Szigeti, violinist, was the soloist. The program was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Rimsky-Korsakov, "Dubinushka," Op. 62; Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," Op. 35.
Brahms, Concerto in D major for Violin and orchestra, Op. 7.

If there's one thing to leave the commentator speechless it is a program such as that given yesterday. The pieces on the program were all old and true friends, one back for a welcome visit, the other returning a little too soon after his last visit to be appreciated to the full (but still good company), and the performance by the orchestra, the conductor and the soloist was capital all the way through. And that, for all practical purposes, about sums it all up.

The principal reason for the appearance so soon again of our trusty old friend "Scheherazade" was to observe the 100th anniversary of its composer's birth (March 18, 1844). Little indeed can be added at this point to the position Rimsky-Korsakov occupies in music. He was, there is little question, one of the many fine composers on the second team. And, like many a fine man on the second team, he can prove a very spectacular performer when he gets his chance, as witness the enormous success "Scheherazade achieved yesterday afternoon, and certainly will again tonight.

As was the case with many of the composers on the fringes of greatness (for instance, C. P. E. Bach, Chopin, Liszt, etc.), Rimsky-Korsakov's chief contribution to music, besides such indubitably fine works as "Scheherazade," "Coq d'Or" and "Snegourochka," was in the way of technical or idiomatic innovation. With Rimsky the orchestra was everything, and he was the first to apply the science of acoustics to the principles of orchestration, even going so far as to apply mathematical formulae to orchestra balance and sonority.

The result, aside from the purely technical aspects which have clearly influenced virtually all composers ever since his day, was a brilliance, a clarity and a scintillating quality which, combined with his pseudo-oriental melodic invention, gave his scores an opulence and an elan not to be resisted . . . provided the melodic quality (as in "Scheherazade") is not too banal. And it is especially not to be resisted in Dr. Koussevitzky's fervent conception of it and the orchestra's fabulous performance of it. It is one of the latter-day miracles.

The Brahms Violin Concerto, certainly after Beethoven's the greatest of all, was given a nobly conceived although not always nobly executed performance by Joseph Szigeti. His technic does not always keep abreast of his superb musicianship, but even so, it it not easy to imagine a more telling traversal of this great composition. The orchestral accompaniment, or, more correctly, the orchestral performance with the soloist was notable for the warmth of its textures and the unanimity of its utterance.

Next week Andre Kostelanetz conducts the orchestra, Lily Pons appearing in two groups of songs with orchestral accompaniment. Stravinsky's Suite from "The Firebird" is the featured item on the program, with pieces by Kabalevsky, Creston and Albeniz and vocal pieces by Gretry, Milhaud, Mozart and Rachmaninoff.

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1944

Symphony Honors Rimsky-Korsakov

By L. A. Sloper

The nineteenth program of the Boston Symphony season is dedicated to the memory of Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov, who was born on March 18, 1844. Works by the Russian composer occupy the first half of the program: the orchestral setting of the Russian folk song, "Dubinushka," and the symphonic Suite "Schéhérazade." The Brahms Violin Concerto fills the second half of the program, with Joseph Szigeti as soloist.

It is not easy to pay tribute to Rimsky in the concert hall. He was a great master of orchestration, but his orchestral works are not substantial enough to fill a program. "Schéhérazade," the most popular of them, has been played so much that it is no longer very effective for habitual concertgoers, in spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's unsparing labors to make it so. He does dramatize vividly the tale of the Prince Kalandar, but the Young Prince and the Young Princess are not very interesting people musically, and the sea and the festival and the wreck are pretty repetitious and pretty tame today.

"Dubinushka" holds of course far less of musical value. It might be better to try something else when there is reason to list a Rimskyan item—a suite from one of his operas, for example. But then, perhaps, we should be crying out for "Schéhérazade" again. What we really need in Boston is a performance of "The Snow Maiden" or "The Golden Cockerel" at the Opera House. Alas, that prospect is remote indeed.

Mr. Szigeti has played here several times before, and we have had occasion to admire his technique and his seriousness of purpose, but it may be doubted whether the Brahms Concerto is the best vehicle for his art. His tone is sweet but not very broad, and he seemed yesterday not to be too happy with the composer's romantic lyricism. His performance was made choppy by his rather erratic rhythms, and the full beauties of the songful Adagio were not conveyed. He was warmly applauded, nevertheless, by audience and orchestra.

VIRGINIA, MINN.
ENTERPRISE

MAR 18 1944

By C. E. BUTTERFIELD

New York—(AP)— When the Boston Symphony orchestra and ~~the spotlight bands~~, which follow each other regularly on the schedule, go on the Blue next Saturday night they will be presented as a combined hour and a half, first classical, then "hot" music.

It will be done by a radio link between the studio audiences in Symphony Hall, Boston, and in the Milwaukee Auditorium.

HIBBING, MINN.
TRIBUNE

MAR 18 1944

NEW YORK (AP)—When the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ~~spotlight~~ bands, which follow each other regularly on the schedule, go on the BLU next Saturday night, they will be presented as a combined hour and a half, first classical, then "hot" music.

It will be done by a radio link between the studio audiences in Symphony Hall, Boston, and in the Milwaukee auditorium.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAR 18 1944

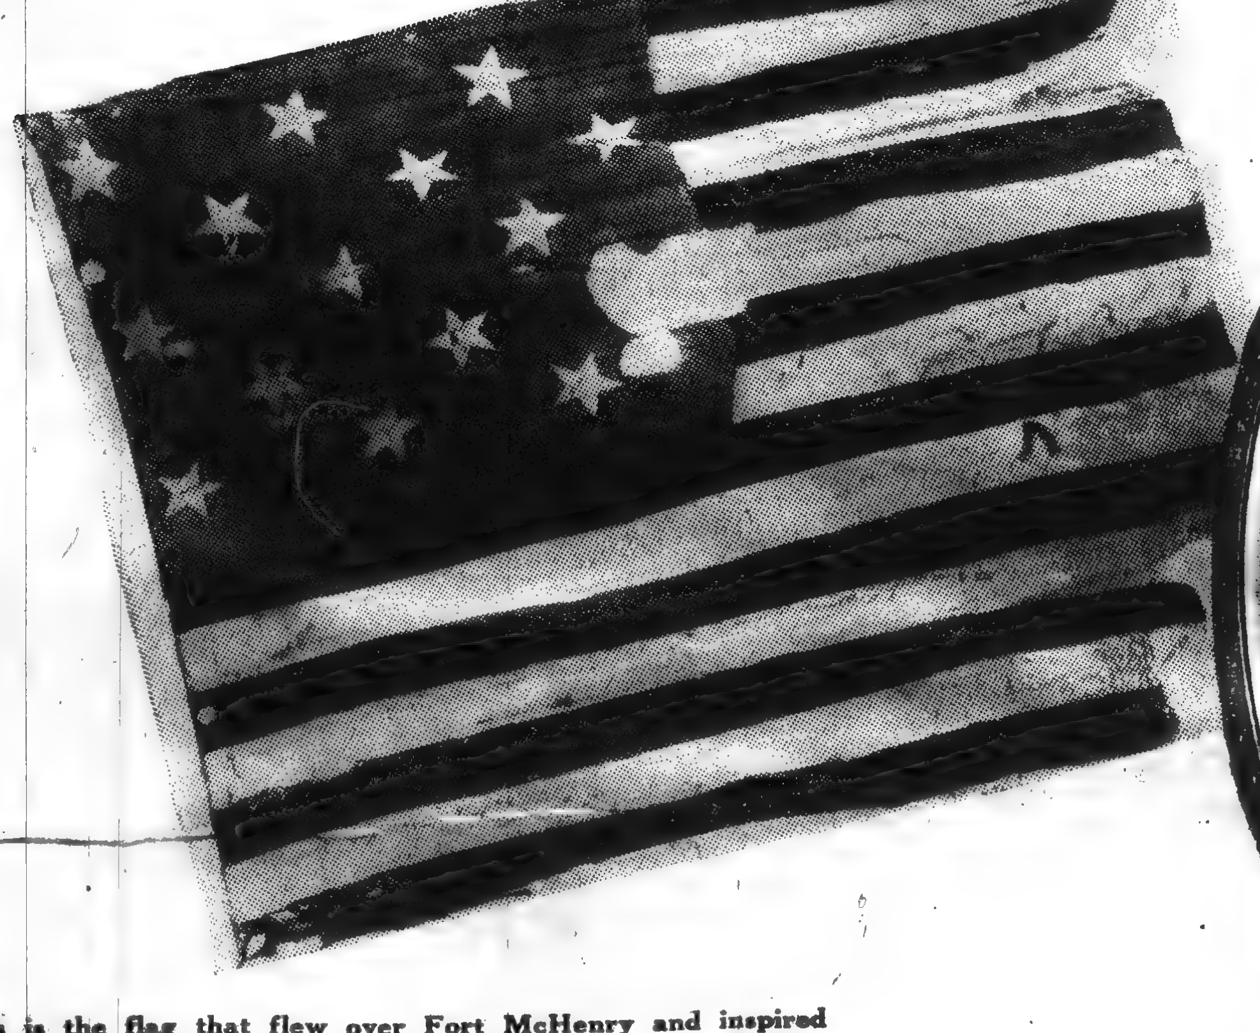
Boston Re-engages Koussevitzky

BOSTON, March 17 ~~(P)—The~~ Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its sixty-fourth season next Oct. 6 under the directorship of Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony Hall officials announced today. It will be Mr. Koussevitzky's twenty-first successive year as conductor of the orchestra. Guest conductors, in addition to Richard Burgin, the associate conductor, will include George Szell, now conductor at the Metropolitan Opera Company; Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society.

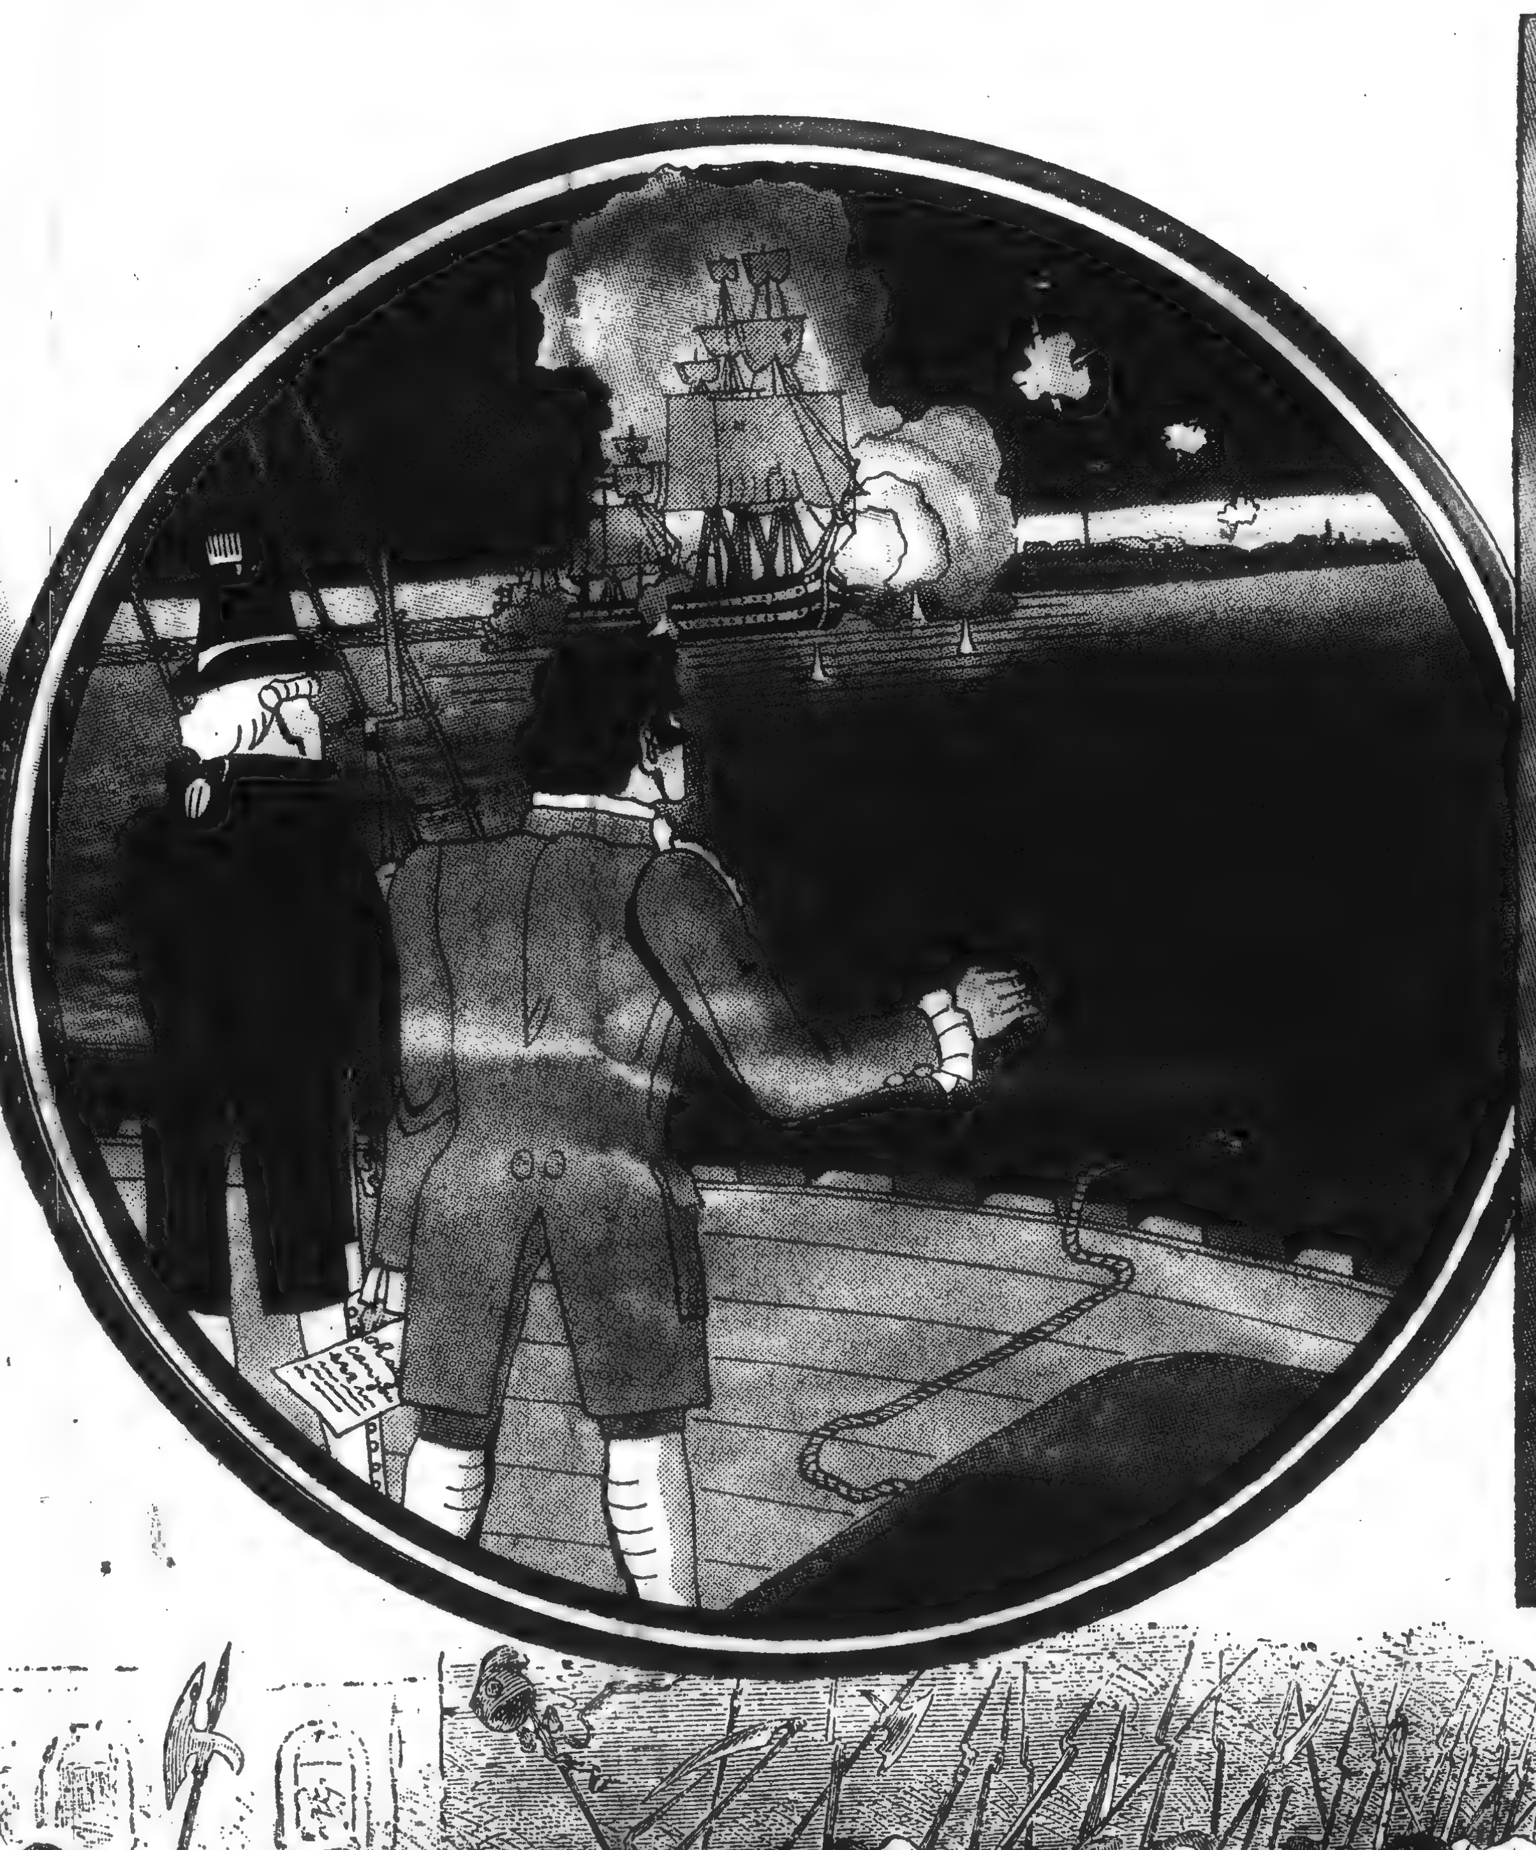
[62]

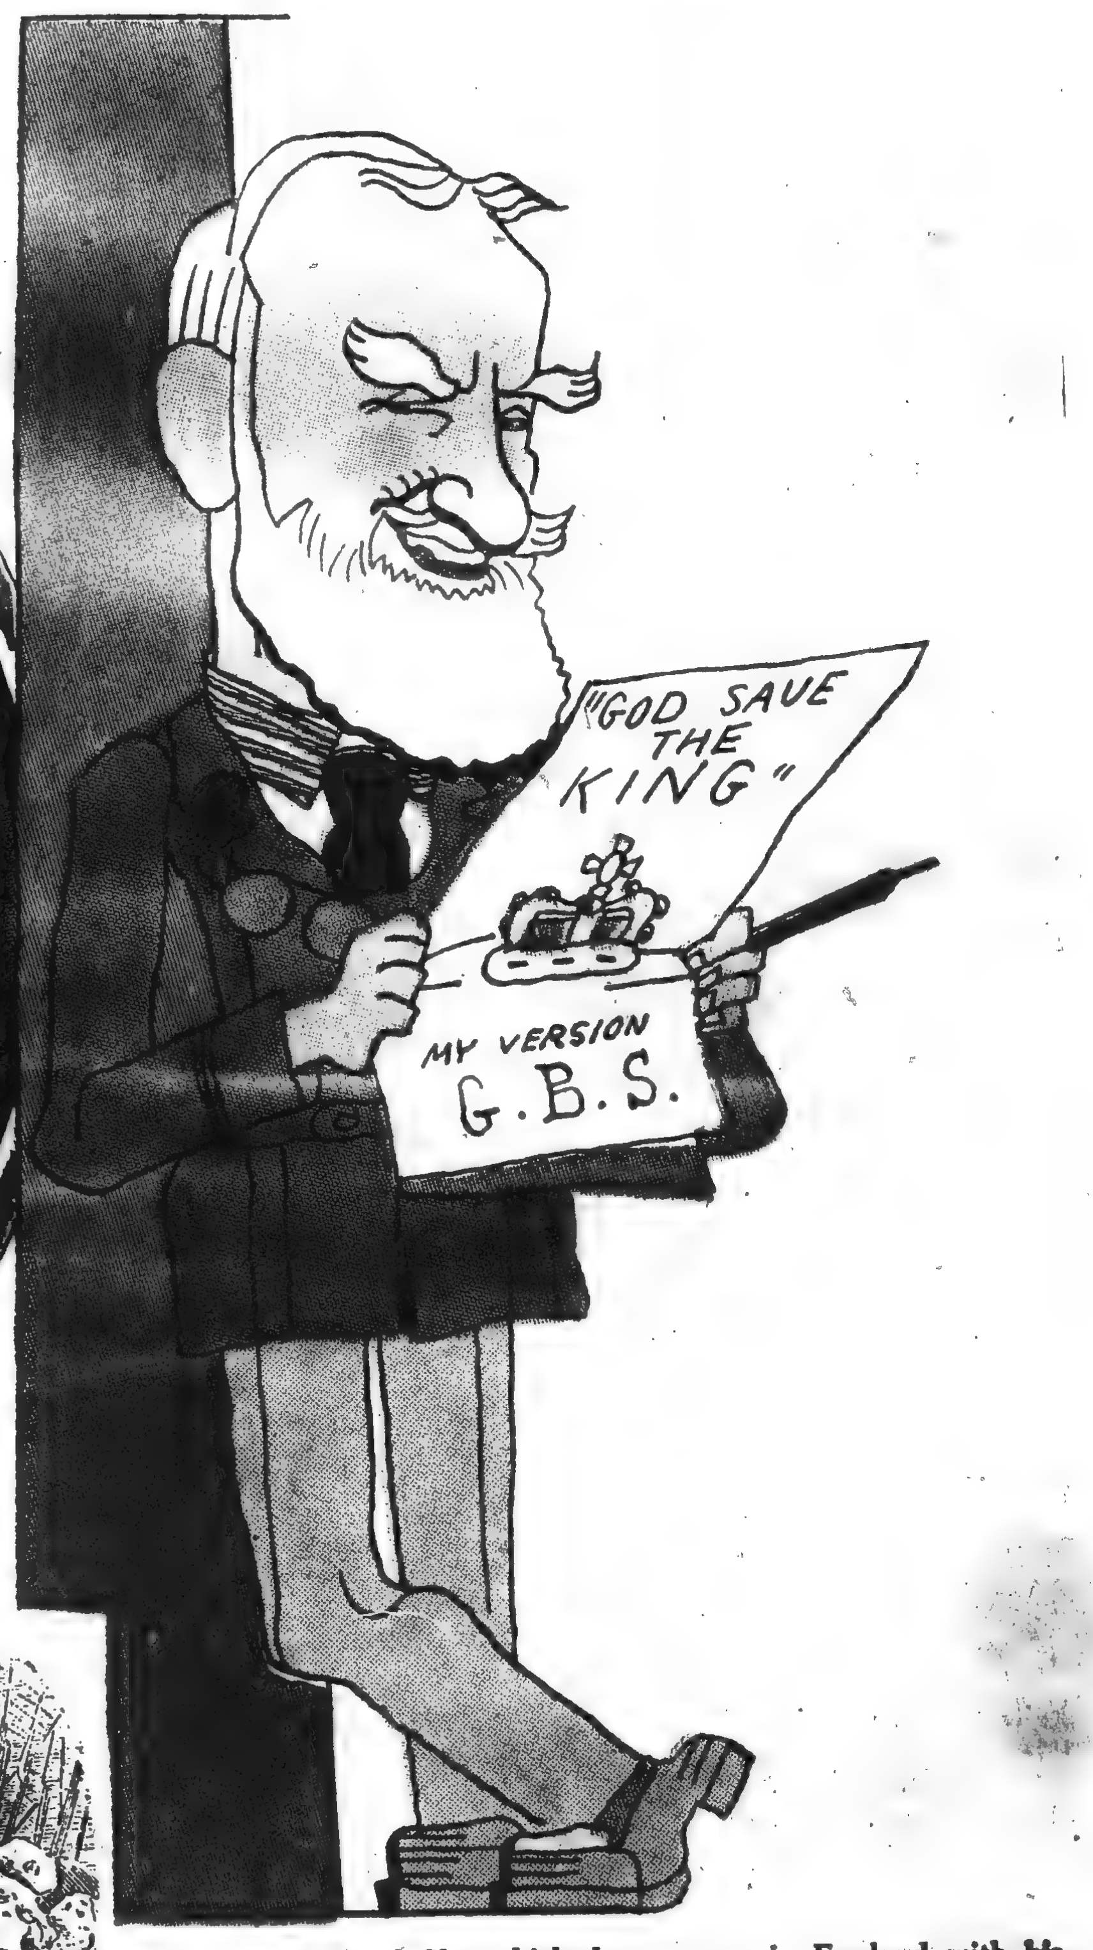
INFORMATION OBSCURED

There Is No Official Version of Our National Anthem



This is the flag that flew over Fort McHenry and inspired Francis Scott Key to write "The Star Spangled Banner."





George Bernard Shaw kicked up a row in England with his proposed new verse for "God Save the King."

By WENDALL HAZEN

The recent excitement over the playing of Stravinsky's version of "The Star Spangled Banner," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the row kicked up in England over George Bernard Shaw's proposed new verse for "God Save The King," brings up an interesting point, but settles no arguments.

That point is, just what is the official and legal version of either piece of music, both officially adopted as the national anthems of the two governments?

In the case of "God Save The King," the issue is further complicated by the fact that it not only serves as the national anthem of Great Britain and the Commonwealth of Nations, but is also officially recognized in Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Switzerland, and was so recognized in the former German states of Bavaria, Prussia, Saxony and Wurttemberg, and in the cities of Hamburg, Mecklenburg and Weimar. Moreover, the tune is that of "America," our own runner-up as a national hymn, although without official governmental appointment as such.

When the English adopted the tune, it had already served as the popular choice for a long time. The actual music was made official but the words have kept Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the composition consisting of the words and music known as "The Star-Spangled Banner," is designated the national anthem of the United States of America."

In a bibliography of the song published by Joseph Muller in 1935, more than 200 different versions of the music were recorded. Thus Igor Stravinsky's version, played for a Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ruled out by the Boston Police department on the following evening, was just as much a playing of "the words and music known as the Star Spangled Banner," quoting the Congressional bill, as any other.

EMBELLISHMENTS FORBIDDEN

The State law invoked at Symphony forbids "embellishments" or the playing of the piece as a part of any other or as an exit march. What actually constitutes an embellishment in a musical sense is obscure, especially where there exists no legal score in the first place.

According to Webster's dictionary, embellishment means "that which adds beauty or elegance"; in special relation to music, "ornament."

Neither of these definitions gives much help in the present case as Stravinsky's own reason for presenting his version royalty free to the American public was, according to a printed note on his orchestral score, as follows:

"Searching about for a vehicle through which I might best express my gratitude at the prospect of becoming an American citizen, I chose to harmonize and orchestrate as a national choral the beautiful sacred anthem, 'The Star Spangled Banner.'

"It is a desire to do my bit in these grievous times toward fostering and preserving the spirit and patriotism in this country that inspires me to tender this, my humble work, to the American people."

The Boston police department said a firm and distinct "No."

Stravinsky is by no means the first to attempt to change the music of our national anthem, nor the first to come to grief in that attempt. The music to which it is usually sung is that of a once popular drinking tune, "Anacreon in Heaven," imported from England and widely used in the earlier days here to fit many different popular ditties.

Objection has often been made by singers that it is too high for the ordinary voice as usually played. For this reason changes have been suggested at various times. But Stravinsky's attempt at change is the first to be made from purely patriotic reasons.

FIEDLER SUGGESTED CHANGE

Back in 1937, Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the Boston Pops concerts and then a playing member of the Symphony Orchestra, suggested a new version for easier rendition which was seriously considered at the annual convention of the National Music Teachers' Association in Pittsburgh. No action was taken and what happened to the Fiedler version is probably unknown except by himself. Perhaps it is the version he uses at his own Pops concerts, or at the Charles River Basin. If so, the Boston police department hasn't noticed the change.

In the following year, Vincent Lopez, popular radio and dance band leader, started a national row by offering a revised version of his own. It got as far as a proposed petition to President Roosevelt to prevent any tampering with the tune, and then vanished as most public controversies do.

A Boston singing teacher, Raffaello Martino, took his turn at tinkering with the score in 1941. He not only lowered the high notes, but he made one change in the words, switching "Oh say does that star spangled banner yet wave," to "Oh the star spangled banner in triumph doth wave," all in the interests of better breathing on the part of the singers. Music publishers considered the Martino version, but decided on a hands-off policy so far as results are discoverable.

As late as 1942, Captain Howard Bronson, in charge of music for the army's morale division, in collaboration with Dr. George Sallade Howard, associate professor of music at Pennsylvania State College, produced a stream-lined version of the anthem for army use. Copies were supplied without charge to every army band in the service. So if you see the Boston police in active combat with the next army band which ventures to play "The Star Spangled Banner" here, you will know why, even if the bandsmen may be a bit puzzled by the interference.

COPY OF ORIGINAL HERE

The only strictly legal rendition of the national anthem, according to police interpretation, as evidenced in the Stravinsky incident, would be to have a piano thump out the first published version of the song. And that is made especially easy for Bostonians, for a copy of the original score is the proud possession of the Boston Public Library.

If, however, a genuine American version be wanted, music written especially for the anthem and not a borrowed drinking song of questionable moral standing, that, too, can be accomplished.

"The Star Spangled Banner" was sung with American music especially composed for the words sometime between 1816 and 1825, only a few years following its original appearance, as words only, in a broadcast published in Baltimore in 1814. "Broadcast" did not mean a radio programme then, as radio was yet to be invented, but a single sheet of paper which was printed and placed on sale much as the words of popular songs are now hawked about in the streets.

This purely American version was first sung from the stage of a New York theatre by two actors, Messrs. Darley and Nichols. It was composed by John H. Hewitt and published by J. A. & W. Geis, 223 Maiden Lane, New York city.

The composer was the orchestra leader of the famous old theatrical organization known as The American Company, and he wrote a considerable number of patriotic tunes for use in the theatres in which he was responsible for the music.

A score of the Hewitt version was discovered in 1930 in Philadelphia, where the American company also operated. A facsimile copy of that score rests in the Boston Athenaeum.

While there must have been orchestrations made by Mr. Hewitt, as the music was played in a theatre, none has as yet been discovered by musicologists.

An investigation in 1919 by the Library of Congress revealed that 90 different versions of the music had been used and that more than 20 different lyrics had been sung to the tune of John Spofford Smith's "Anacreon in Heaven" in this country between 1797 and 1813, when it finally became the more-or-less official background of the song that was to become our national anthem.

As to that classic announcement by radio announcer Gene Hamilton on the night of Jan. 9 that "Mr. Stravinsky will play 'The Star Spangled Banner' in its customary version," the word "customary" was chosen after the most careful consideration of the right word to be used. For, quite aside from the musical interest of the police department of Boston, the playing of the national anthem always has been at least a minor problem for symphony orchestras.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SCORE

Due to the lack of any official version carrying a government seal of approval or acceptance, and also due to the fact that the anthem is not, like that of England, a "must," on every public performance of every kind from opera to a circus, symphony orchestras seldom have had need of an orchestral score of the piece.

Most of them, including the Boston Symphony, culled an orchestration from Victor Herbert's "American Fantasy" when World war I. made the piece a symphonic "must."

Later, feeling the need of a better singing version, the Boston Symphony Orchestra commissioned the late Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory faculty to make a symphony orchestra score. It was first played under the direction of Henri Raboud, Dec. 30 and 31, 1918, and has remained the "official" version used at Symphony up to the Stravinsky incident of last month.

As to the recent fuss stirred up by Shaw and his newly-suggested verse for Britain's national anthem, "God Save the King," it should have caused little excitement. The words of that widely-sung anthem have changed almost with the regularity of the seasons up to recent years.

KING SLOWED IT

No further back than March, 1933, the playing of the tune got a going over by no less a personage than King George himself. He was annoyed at the speed with which it was usually played, especially by army bands, and ordered it slowed down. Necessary orders were issued and the tune is now played in exactly one-quarter more time than it used to take.

Objection was also made in 1933 to the most recent British army publication of the music that it was too high, being scored in B-flat. This brings up a parallel to repeated objections of our own musicians and teachers that "The Star Spangled Banner" is also too high.

As to the change in words in "God Save the King," it has been going on industriously ever since the song was first introduced to the British public from the stage of Drury Lane Theatre in 1745.

It was a fearsome time in the country's history. George II. was on the throne and the Young Pretender had already landed in Scotland with no kindly intentions visible or suspected.

Following the evening's performance of Ben Jonson's drama, "The Alchemist," and before the audience had time to leave, the curtain rose again and three of the leading singers of the day sang the song.

Other theatres took up the song and practice, which probably originated the custom, strictly enforced wherever the British flag waves, of bringing to an end any public performance with a singing of "God Save the K in the words to fit about every historical event of importance that took place in England.

There is a bit of doubt as to who actually was the composer, although a noted musician, John Bull, quite appropriately, is the leading choice. Claims for at least seven others have been entered at various times, including Lully, the noted Italian composer.

One incident in connection with the tune was the playing of it for George III. who was on the throne during what may perhaps be politely termed our own little unpleasantness with Great Britain in Colonial days. The ancient record reads:

"The king bathes, and with great success; a machine follows the royal personage into the sea, filled with fiddlers, who play 'God Save the King,' as His Majesty takes his plunge."

A new version of words had been done for George's wedding. The song got an anti-Napoleonic twist in the year 1803. Coronation versions were the rule, one being done for William IV. in 1830 and another for Queen Victoria, who also had another for her wedding with Albert. Another one marked the wedding in 1858, which was to result in the birth of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.

LONGFELLOW'S CONTRIBUTION

The death of Albert was marked by another version, also the attempted assassination of Victoria in 1882. Both jubilee celebrations of England's longest-lived ruler, that of 1887 and the Diamond Jubilee of 1897, had its own rewrite of the national anthem. One version was contributed by our own Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Edward VIII., in 1901, was responsible for another version, this one by H. W. Taunt of Oxford.

The English version crossed the sea with the Colonists and was in common usage in concerts here from 1745 to 1761.

In 1831 the tune was selected as the musical accompaniment to the Rev. Samuel Francis Smith's lyrics, and was naturalized as "America, My Country 'Tis of Thee." Many believed that it, and not "The Star Spangled Banner," should have been officially recognized as our national anthem.

Shaw is the latest, in England, to attempt a revision of the words used in the British national anthem. He wants to substitute for the present second verse, by no means a masterpiece of poetic technique, the following:

"Oh Lord our God arise
All our salvation lies
In Thy great hands.
Center his thoughts on Thee
Let him God's captain be
Thine to eternity.
God save the King."

The present version is:

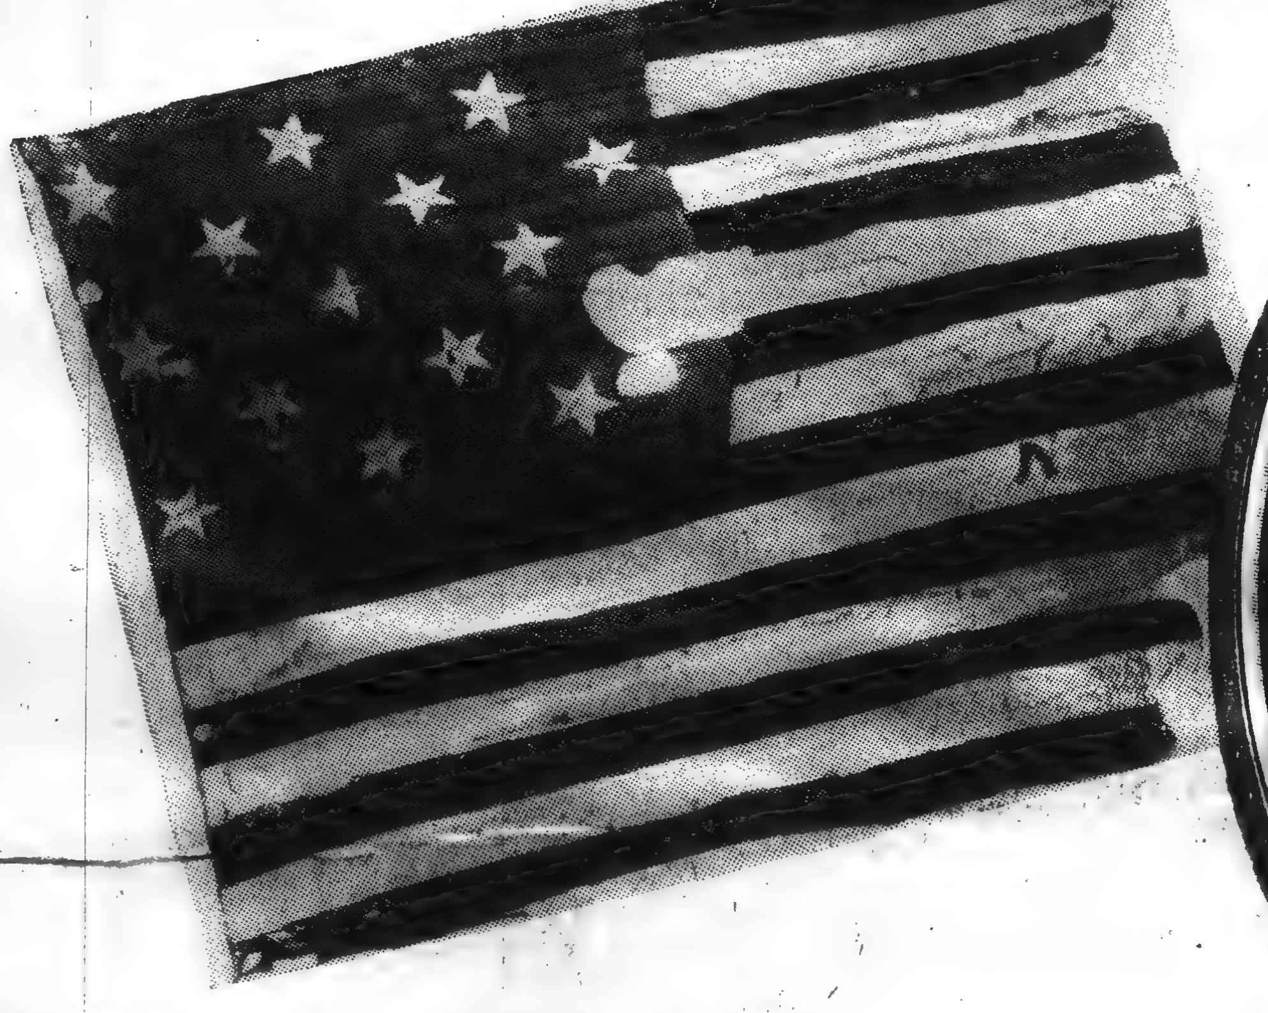
"O Lord our God arise
Scatter his enemies
And make them fall!
Confound their politics
Frustrate their knavish tricks!
On thee our hopes we fix
God save us all!

His collaborator is no less a musical personage than Sir Edward Elgar, but the public is annoyed.

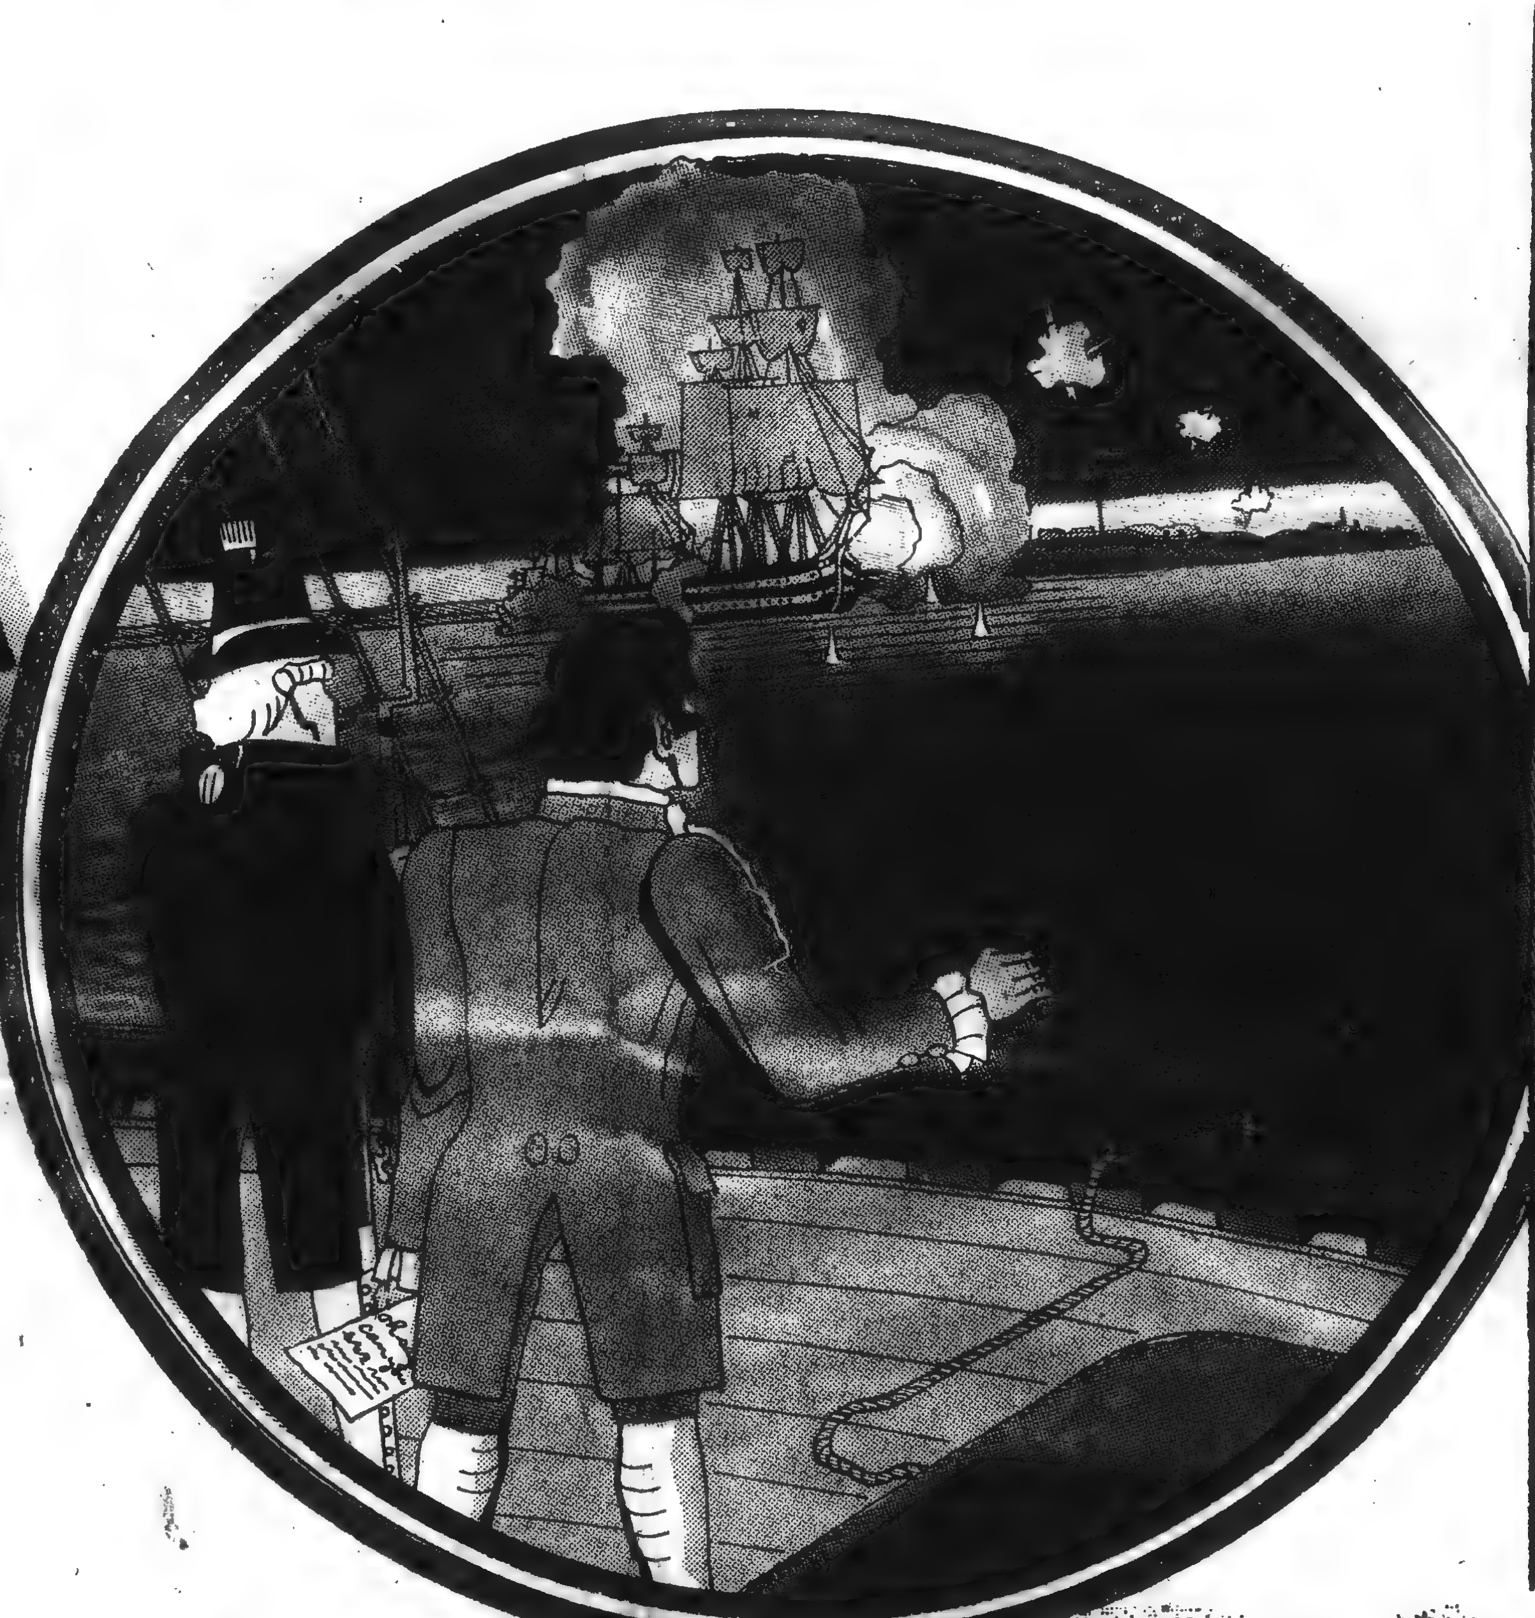
Church dignitaries, says Shaw, want that second verse kept in because, in their opinion, "the ordering about of God Almighty is the special business of the Church of England."

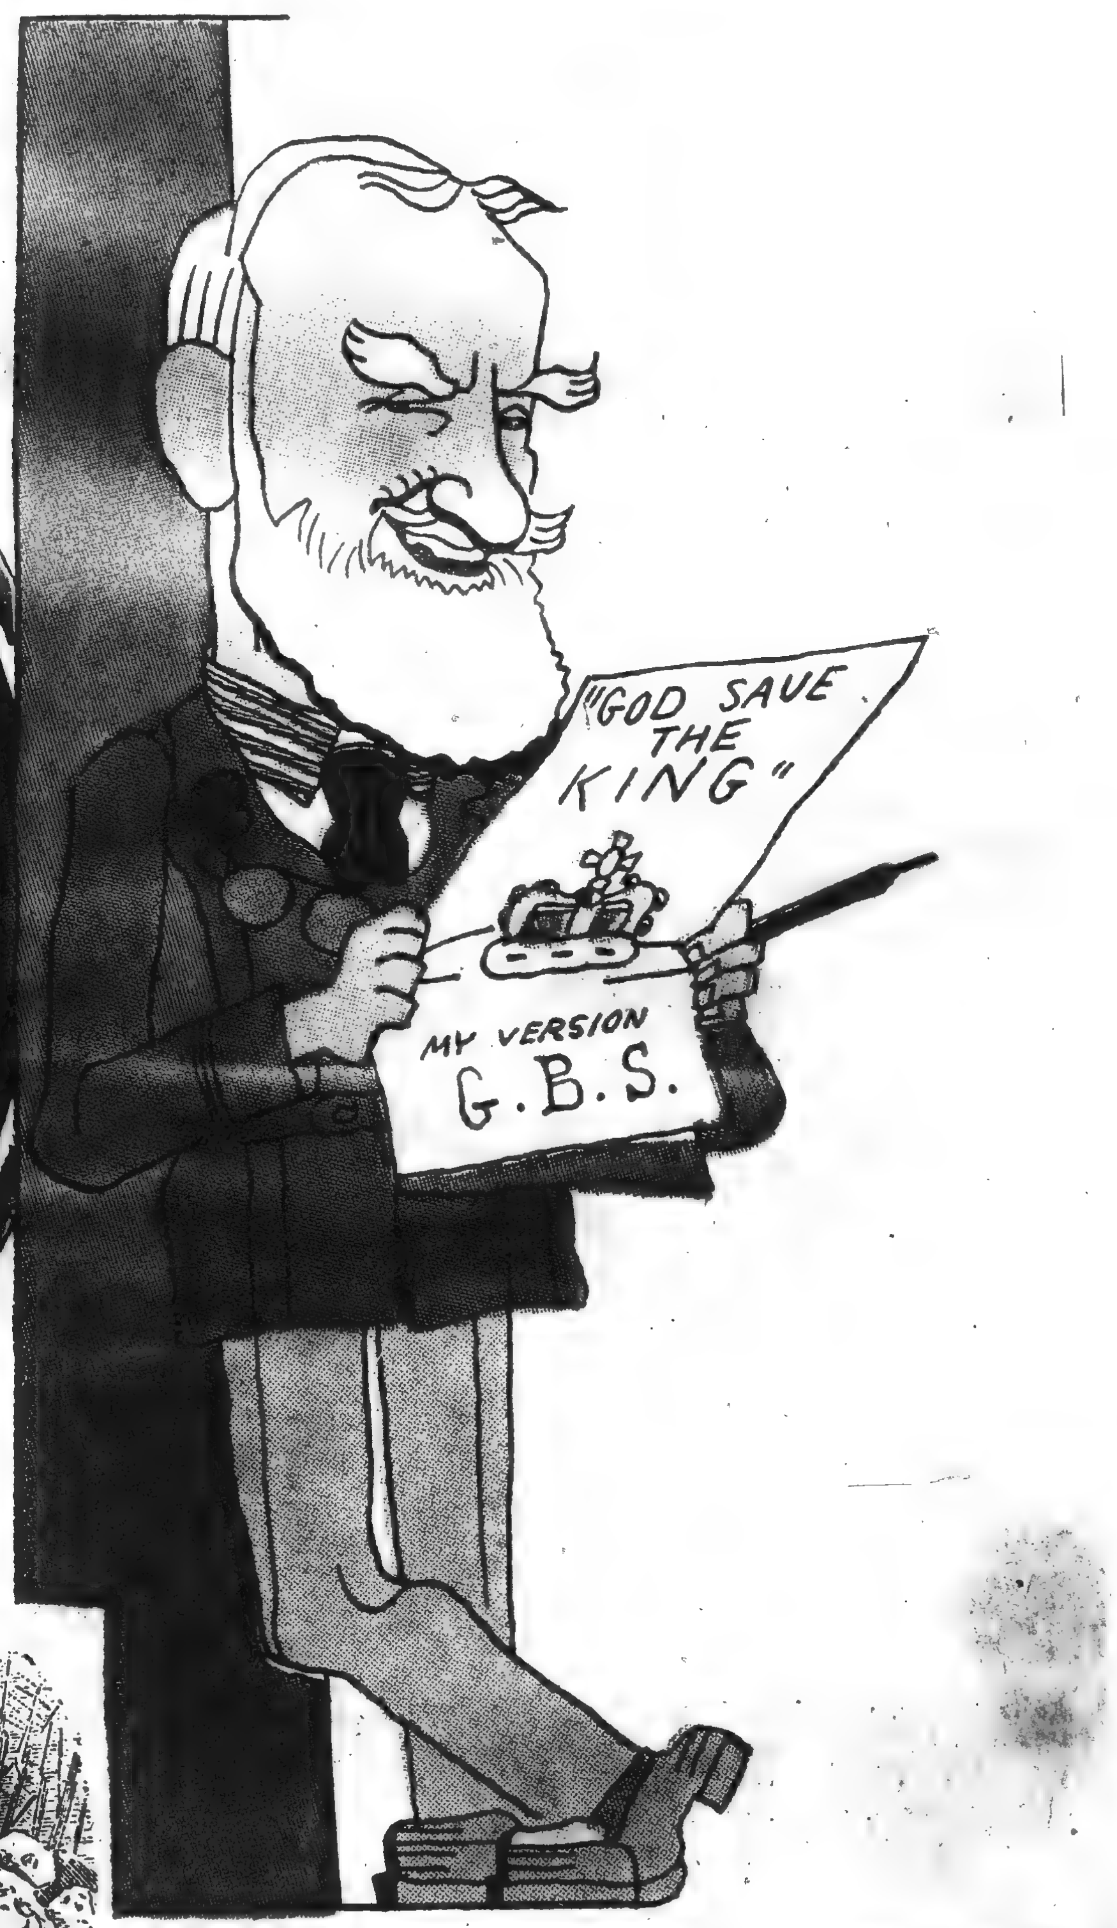
INFORMATION OBSCURED

There Is No Official Version of Our National Anthem



This is the flag that flew over Fort McHenry and inspired Francis Scott Key to write "The Star Spangled Banner."





George Bernard Shaw kicked up a row in England with his proposed new verse for "God Save the King."

By WENDALL HAZEN

The recent excitement over the playing of Stravinsky's version of "The Star Spangled Banner," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the row kicked up in England over George Bernard Shaw's proposed new verse for "God Save The King," brings up an interesting point, but settles no arguments.

That point is, just what is the official and legal version of either piece of music, both officially adopted as the national anthems of the two governments?

In the case of "God Save The King," the issue is further complicated by the fact that it not only serves as the national anthem of Great Britain and the Commonwealth of Nations, but is also officially recognized in Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Switzerland, and was so recognized in the former German states of Bavaria, Prussia, Saxony and Wurttemberg, and in the cities of Hamburg, Mecklenburg and Weimar. Moreover, the tune is that of "America," our own runner-up as a national hymn, although without official governmental appoint[illegible] as such.

[illegible] the English adopted the tune, it had al[illegible] served as the popular choice for a long time. [illegible] actual music was made official but the words [illegible] Repr[illegible] the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the composition consisting of the words and music known as "The Star-Spangled Banner," is designated the national anthem of the United States of America."

In a bibliography of the song published by Joseph Muller in 1935, more than 200 different versions of the music were recorded. Thus Igor Stravinsky's version, played for a Friday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and ruled out by the Boston Police department on the following evening, was just as much a playing of "the words and music known as the Star Spangled Banner," quoting the Congressional bill, as any other.

EMBELLISHMENTS FORBIDDEN

The State law invoked at Symphony forbids "embellishments" or the playing of the piece as a part of any other or as an exit march. What actually constitutes an embellishment in a musical sense is obscure, especially where there exists no legal score in the first place.

According to Webster's dictionary, embellishment means "that which adds beauty or elegance"; in special relation to music, "ornament."

Neither of these definitions gives much help in the present case as Stravinsky's own reason for presenting his version royalty free to the American public was, according to a printed note on his orchestral score, as follows:

"Searching about for a vehicle through which I might best express my gratitude at the prospect of becoming an American citizen, I chose to harmonize and orchestrate as a national choral the beautiful sacred anthem, 'The Star Spangled Banner.'

"It is a desire to do my bit in these grievous times toward fostering and preserving the spirit and patriotism in this country that inspires me to tender this, my humble work, to the American people."

The Boston police department said a firm and distinct "No."

Stravinsky is by no means the first to attempt to change the music of our national anthem, nor the first to come to grief in that attempt. The music to which it is usually sung is that of a once popular drinking tune, "Anacreon in Heaven," imported from England and widely used in the earlier days here to fit many different popular ditties.

Objection has often been made by singers that it is too high for the ordinary voice as usually played. For this reason changes have been suggested at various times. But Stravinsky's attempt at change is the first to be made from purely patriotic reasons.

FIEDLER SUGGESTED CHANGE

Back in 1937, Arthur Fiedler, popular conductor of the Boston Pops concerts and then a playing member of the Symphony Orchestra, suggested a new version for easier rendition which was seriously considered at the annual convention of the National Music Teachers' Association in Pittsburgh. No action was taken and what happened to the Fiedler version is probably unknown except by himself. Perhaps it is the version he uses at his own Pops concerts, or at the Charles River Basin. If so, the Boston police department hasn't noticed the change.

In the following year, Vincent Lopez, popular radio and dance band leader, started a national row by offering a revised version of his own. It got as far as a proposed petition to President Roosevelt to prevent any tampering with the tune, and then vanished as most public controversies do.

A Boston singing teacher, Raffaello Martino, took his turn at tinkering with the score in 1941. He not only lowered the high notes, but he made one change in the words, switching "Oh say does that star spangled banner yet wave," to "Oh the star spangled banner in triumph doth wave," all in the interests of better breathing on the part of the singers. Music publishers considered the Martino version, but decided on a hands-off policy so far as results are discoverable.

As late as 1942, Captain Howard Bronson, in charge of music for the army's morale division, in collaboration with Dr. George Sallade Howard, associate professor of music at Pennsylvania State College, produced a stream-lined version of the anthem for army use. Copies were supplied without charge to every army band in the service. So if you see the Boston police in active combat with the next army band which ventures to play "The Star Spangled Banner" here, you will know why, even if the bandsmen may be a bit puzzled by the interference.

COPY OF ORIGINAL HERE

The only strictly legal rendition of the national anthem, according to police interpretation, as evidenced in the Stravinsky incident, would be to have a piano thump out the first published version of the song. And that is made especially easy for Bostonians, for a copy of the original score is the proud possession of the Boston Public Library.

If, however, a genuine American version be wanted, music written especially for the anthem and not a borrowed drinking song of questionable moral standing, that, too, can be accomplished.

"The Star Spangled Banner" was sung with American music especially composed for the words sometime between 1816 and 1825, only a few years following its original appearance, as words only, in a broadcast published in Baltimore in 1814. "Broadcast" did not mean a radio programme then, as radio was yet to be invented, but a single sheet of paper which was printed and placed on sale much as the words of popular songs are now hawked about in the streets.

This purely American version was first sung from the stage of a New York theatre by two actors, Messrs. Darley and Nichols. It was composed by John H. Hewitt and published by J. A. & W. Geis, 223 Maiden Lane, New York city.

The composer was the orchestra leader of the famous old theatrical organization known as The American Company, and he wrote a considerable number of patriotic tunes for use in the theatres in which he was responsible for the music.

A score of the Hewitt version was discovered in 1930 in Philadelphia, where the American company also operated. A facsimile copy of that score rests in the Boston Athenaeum.

While there must have been orchestrations made by Mr. Hewitt, as the music was played in a theatre, none has as yet been discovered by musicologists.

An investigation in 1919 by the Library of Congress revealed that 90 different versions of the music had been used and that more than 20 different lyrics had been sung to the tune of John Spofford Smith's "Anacreon in Heaven" in this country between 1797 and 1813, when it finally became the more-or-less official background of the song that was to become our national anthem.

As to that classic announcement by radio announcer Gene Hamilton on the night of Jan. 9 that "Mr. Stravinsky will play 'The Star Spangled Banner' in its customary version," the word "customary" was chosen after the most careful consideration of the right word to be used. For, quite aside from the musical interest of the police department of Boston, the playing of the national anthem always has been at least a minor problem for symphony orchestras.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SCORE

Due to the lack of any official version carrying a government seal of approval or acceptance, and also due to the fact that the anthem is not, like that of England, a "must," on every public performance of every kind from opera to a circus, symphony orchestras seldom have had need of an orchestral score of the piece.

Most of them, including the Boston Symphony, culled an orchestration from Victor Herbert's "American Fantasy" when World war I. made the piece a symphonic "must."

Later, feeling the need of a better singing version, the Boston Symphony Orchestra commissioned the late Frederick S. Converse of the New England Conservatory faculty to make a symphony orchestra score. It was first played under the direction of Henri Raboud, Dec. 30 and 31, 1918, and has remained the "official" version used at Symphony up to the Stravinsky incident of last month.

As to the recent fuss stirred up by Shaw and his newly-suggested verse for Britain's national anthem, "God Save the King," it should have caused little excitement. The words of that widely-sung anthem have changed almost with the regularity of the seasons up to recent years.

KING SLOWED IT

No further back than March, 1933, the playing of the tune got a going over by no less a personage than King George himself. He was annoyed at the speed with which it was usually played, especially by army bands, and ordered it slowed down. Necessary orders were issued and the tune is now played in exactly one-quarter more time than it used to take.

Objection was also made in 1933 to the most recent British army publication of the music that it was too high, being scored in B-flat. This brings up a parallel to repeated objections of our own musicians and teachers that "The Star Spangled Banner" is also too high.

As to the change in words in "God Save the King," it has been going on industriously ever since the song was first introduced to the British public from the stage of Drury Lane Theatre in 1745.

It was a fearsome time in the country's history. George II. was on the throne and the Young Pretender had already landed in Scotland with no kindly intentions visible or suspected.

Following the evening's performance of Ben Jonson's drama, "The Alchemist," and before the audience had time to leave, the curtain rose again and three of the leading singers of the day sang the song.

Other theatres took up the song and practice, which probably originated the custom, strictly enforced wherever the British flag waves, of bringing to an end any public performance with a singing of [illegible] the K[illegible] in the words [illegible] to fit about every historical event of importance that took place in England.

There is a bit of doubt as to who actually was the composer, although a noted musician, John Bull, quite appropriately, is the leading choice. Claims for at least seven others have been entered at various times, including Lully, the noted Italian composer.

One incident in connection with the tune was the playing of it for George III. who was on the throne during what may perhaps be politely termed our own little unpleasantness with Great Britain in Colonial days. The ancient record reads:

"The king bathes, and with great success; a machine follows the royal personage into the sea, filled with fiddlers, who play 'God Save the King,' as His Majesty takes his plunge."

A new version of words had been done for George's wedding. The song got an anti-Napoleonic twist in the year 1803. Coronation versions were the rule, one being done for William IV. in 1830 and another for Queen Victoria, who also had another for her wedding with Albert. Another one marked the wedding in 1858, which was to result in the birth of Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany.

LONGFELLOW'S CONTRIBUTION

The death of Albert was marked by another version, also the attempted assassination of Victoria in 1882. Both jubilee celebrations of England's longest-lived ruler, that of 1887 and the Diamond Jubilee of 1897, had its own rewrite of the national anthem. One version was contributed by our own Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Edward VIII., in 1901, was responsible for another version, this one by H. W. Taunt of Oxford.

The English version crossed the sea with the Colonists and was in common usage in concerts here from 1745 to 1761.

In 1831 the tune was selected as the musical accompaniment to the Rev. Samuel Francis Smith's lyrics, and was naturalized as "America, My Country 'Tis of Thee." Many believed that it, and not "The Star Spangled Banner," should have been officially recognized as our national anthem.

Shaw is the latest, in England, to attempt a revision of the words used in the British national anthem. He wants to substitute for the present second verse, by no means a masterpiece of poetic technique, the following:

"Oh Lord our God arise
All our salvation lies
In Thy great hands.
Center his thoughts on Thee
Let him God's captain be
Thine to eternity.
God save the King."

The present version is:

"O Lord our God arise
Scatter his enemies
And make them fall!
Confound their politics
Frustrate their knavish tricks!
On thee our hopes we fix
God save us all!

His collaborator is no less a musical personage than Sir Edward Elgar, but the public is annoyed.

Church dignitaries, says Shaw, want that second verse kept in because, in their opinion, "the ordering about of God Almighty is the special business of the Church of England."

SUNDAY CONCERTS BY HUB ORCHESTRA NEXT SEASON

LIST OF GUEST LEADERS ALSO ANNOUNCED

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE world changes and institutions great and small must change with it or lose their hold upon the public. Which is another way of saying that the Symphony Orchestra is well advised to shift, as of next season, its six Tuesday afternoon concerts to approximately the same hour on Sunday. With everyone, generally speaking, a lot busier than in more peaceful times, mid-week matinees just don't go. There has been a steady drop in patronage at the Tuesday concerts and a corresponding tendency to place as many musical events as possible on Sunday, the day when people feel freer for such pursuits.

When the Tuesday concerts were begun in 1925, the second year of Dr. Koussevitzky's reign, they followed a course independent of the Monday evening ones, which had been inaugurated four years earlier. For the former, Dr. Koussevitzky devised programmes of an historical, one might say educational, nature, with an idea, no doubt, of catching some of the school trade. The works played in these half-dozen matinees were presented chronologically, or grouped according to national schools. One season was confined to music of the 19th century. Certain pieces turned up on these occasions that were not heard in the longer series or on Monday evenings and Dr. Koussevitzky's procedure seemed well justified. However, the preparing of three sets of programmes imposed a considerable strain on both conductor and orchestra and, in time, the Monday-Tuesday concerts became a pair, like those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Regarding the new Sunday afternoon concerts, it appears now that the programmes will be of a general nature, drawn in the main from the current repertory, but they will not duplicate those of the other two series. The six Monday evening concerts will, of course, continue as before. Save for soloists' numbers, they have not as a rule offered music peculiar to themselves.

Ordinarily the Symphony Orchestra makes its announcements early in September, but in this respect as well the times have forced its hand. Beginning with April 1 the amusement tax will be raised from 10 per cent to 20, and those who buy their season tickets now will save some money. This little detail has probably had its effect upon the sale of opera tickets which, by report, has been brisk, indeed.

Under ordinary circumstances, then, we would not have learned for several months that Messrs. Mitropoulos, Szell and Bernstein have been engaged as guest conductors for the season of 1944-45, which will be Dr. Koussevitzky's 21st. Without intending any reflection upon Vladimir Golschmann, who appeared here for a fortnight in January, or upon Andre Kostelanetz, who takes over this week while his wife, Lily Pons, makes her Boston Symphony debut, it is gratifying to have men of abilities so conspicuous as those of Mr. Mitropoulos and Mr. Szell in charge while Dr. Koussevitzy is on holiday. As a promising talent, Leonard Bernstein deserves his chance.

When the Greek conductor came to Boston seven seasons ago he was very definitely a dark horse. Few, even among well informed people hereabouts, were aware of his existence. The almost sensational impression which he created then, and on his subsequent appearance a year later, is now a matter of history. Having established himself in Minneapolis, where he still functions, Mr. Mitropoulos greatly augmented his reputation in the East by his engagements as guest with the New York Philharmonic Symphony. It would not be too much to call him the outstanding conductor of his particular generation.

Getting back to the Kostelanetz family, the conductor, who has been doing a lot of guesting with symphony orchestras of late, will introduce two works to us, the Overture to the opera "Colas Breugnon," by the Soviet composer, Dimitri Kabalevsky, and Paul Creston's "Frontiers," dedicated to Mr. Kostelanetz. The other orchestral pieces will be Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite and three numbers from Albeniz's "Iberia," as orchestrated by Arbos. Mme. Pons will sing an air by Gretry, four songs by Milhaud, Rachmaninoff's "Vocalise" and Mozart's Variations, as arranged by La Forge. Nothing routine about that programme.

YOUTH CONCERT WEDNESDAY

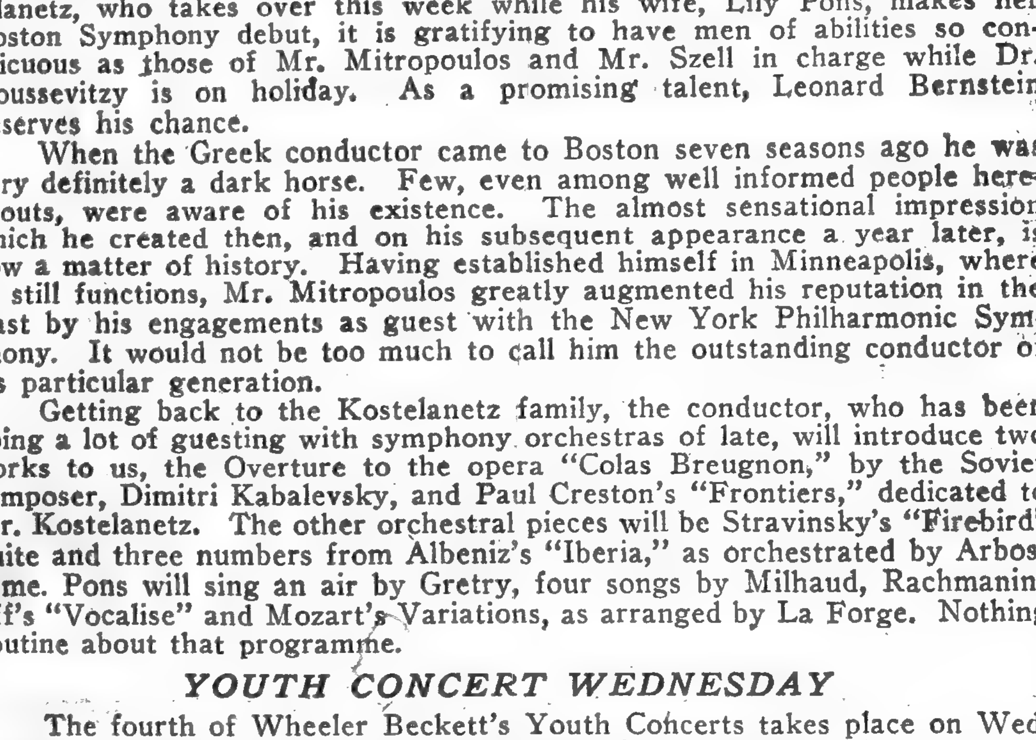
The fourth of Wheeler Beckett's Youth Concerts takes place on Wednesday afternoon and that always enterprising conductor will restore to Symphony Hall Mendelshson's delightful orchestral fairy tale, the Overture, "The Fair Melusina," last heard there in 1906. Its long neglect had disturbed this department considerably and Mr. Beckett graciously credits it with bringing the work to his attention in a recent paragraph on the Youth Concerts and their programmes. Mr. Beckett will also play for the youngsters a Reverie of his own, written in 1942 and brought out by him at an Esplanade Concert in the summer of that year. Sibelius' "Valse Triste," Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," Franck's Symphonic Variations, with Althea Everitt as the soloist, and the Finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony make the rest of the programme.

There will be two recitals at Symphony Hall this week by eminent artists, Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, this afternoon, and Roland Hayes, the tenor, on Thursday evening.

GARDNER, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 27 1944

CONDUCTOR WITH PROTEGE



Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor, looks over a musi al score with Leonard Bernstein, a former student of Koussevitzky's who ow is assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 23 1944

MEMORIAL IS SET UP FOR RACHMANINOFF

Discovery and Encouragement of Pianists, Composers and Conductors Is Goal

Plans international in scope were announced yesterday by the Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund, Inc., to honor the memory of the famous Russian musician who died last March 28 in Beverly Hills, Calif., at the height of his fame.

The purpose of the new organization, instituted at the request of Mrs. Rachmaninoff, the composer's widow, who is its honorary president, is to discover and encourage exceptional native talent in the three fields in which Rachmaninoff won eminence—as pianist, conductor and composer—and thereafter to effect an interchange of such talent between the United States and Russia, which has been asked to cooperate when international conditions make it possible to reciprocate in these exchanges.

The Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund will start its activities with a competition for pianists. The awards to the winner will be a season's coast-to-coast concert tour of the United States, including appearance with leading symphony orchestras, under joint management of the principal American concert organizations.

The first of three biennial contests planned will take place next spring. Thereafter the plans for the selection of conductors and composers will be perfected.

Vladimir Horowitz, close to Rachmaninoff as artist and friend, has accepted the presidency of the organization, whose offices are at Steinway Hall, 113 West Fifty-seventh Street.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is chairman of the Artists Advisory Committee, whose members include many of the most distinguished names in the field of music.

The vice presidents are Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, Mrs. Horowitz, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Walter W. Naumburg, Miss Sophie Satin, Theodore E. Steinway and Allen Wardwell. Olin Downes is chairman of the executive committee, which includes Mrs. Horowitz, Mrs. Downes, Mrs. John T. Pratt, Mrs. Frederick Steinway, Mrs. Kahn, André Maximov, Miss Satin and Miss Martha Winslow. Mrs. Pratt is chairman of the board of directors, serving on which are thirty-seven men and women prominently associated with the field of music.

The Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund, Inc., is supported wholly by voluntary contributions. To each contributor, whatever the amount, will be sent a certificate of membership.

In setting forth the purposes of the new organization, Mr. Horowitz said:

"The Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund has been formed to honor the memory of the great musician whose name it bears and to set forth his purposes and ideals. His life held a two-fold significance—artistic and humanitarian. When, during his last years, at the height of his fame, his native Russia was attacked by enemies that threatened to destroy her, Rachmaninoff despite his previous political differences with the land of his birth, contributed large sums from the receipts of his concerts to the Russian War Relief. In a reciprocal spirit the Soviet Government instituted festivals in his honor. The Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund, Inc., desires to carry forward in his name this noble spirit of reciprocity through cultural interchanges between the two nations."

SYMPHONY TO PLAY SUNDAYS

Will Give Series Starting in October

Post Mar 2?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate next season a series of six Sunday afternoon concerts to take the place of those hertofore given Tuesday afternoons. In order to enable subscribers to take advantage of the present 10 per cent tax on tickets, to be doubled on April 1, the plans for the season are now being disclosed.

In addition to Serge Koussevitzky, now completing his 20th season, the conductors will be Richard Burgin, George Szell, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leonard Bernstein. The soloists will include Jascha Heifetz, Zino Francescati and Ruth Posselt, violinists; Vladimir Horowitz, Robert Casadesus and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianists, and the two-piano team of Pierre Luboshutz and Zenia Nemenoff. The season will open Friday afternoon, Oct. 6

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 24 1944

Homemade Cello Delights World Famous Virtuoso

BOSTON (AP)—A homemade violincello with remarkable tonal qualities—an instrument so fine that Gregor Piatigorsky wants one like it—has been constructed by a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra in his tiny cellar workshop.

Boston-born Enrico Fabrizio is the creator, still a little amazed at the beauties of his hobby shop handiwork.

Amazed, too, is Piatigorsky, one of the world's leading players of the 'cello, who is appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony today.

The unusual meeting between the homemade 'cello and the master performer occurs in the guest artist's room at Symphony Hall. Fabrizio shows him the instrument. Towering Piatigorsky picks it up in one huge hand—he's well over six feet in height—and admires the craftsmanship.

He borrows a bow, stoops over—he can't wait to find a chair to sit in—and begins playing. The expressive face breaks into a smile as rich, vibrant tones pour from the instrument.

"Good," he mumurs, patting the neck fondly. "What is it?"

Half a dozen watching members of the orchestra speak as one man. "Fabrizio's. He made it himself."

HE LIKES IT

"Bravo!" exclaims Piatigorsky. "I like it very much. Make me one."

He begins playing again, interpreting some of those lovely lyric measures from the Brahms double violincello concerto. Then Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's distinguished conductor, enters and warm greetings are exchanged between the two Russian-born artists.

Piatigorsky returns the homemade cello to its beaming creator and unpacks his own cello, made by Domenico Montagna in 1739. It was given him by the late Ernest B. Dane, one-time president and treasurer of the Boston Symphony.

"I come from Philadelphia in an upper berth," he says. "I sleep with this between my legs all night."

The picture of the tremendous man wound round his cello draws smiles from the growing audience.

"How is it today?" Jean Bedetti, first cellist in the orchestra, asks.

INSTRUMENTS VARIABLE

"She is moody," Piatigorsky explains. "You know instruments, they are like people. Sometimes they do not feel so good. In this country, when one travels great distances — in Florida one night and Maine the next—it is not always good. The sudden change in climate sometimes affects the quality of the instrument."

Other cellists from the orchestra, Hippolyte Droghmans, Carl Zeise, Joseph Zimbler and Mischa Nieland, crowd around Fabrizio as Piatigorsky prepares to go on stage.

Fabrizio proudly explains about his home-made cello. He has been with the orchestra since 1918 and a few years ago he began working with wood in his cellar workshop at his Arlington, Mass., home.

"This cello took about two years to make in my spare time," he says. "I was lucky to have some fine old wood to work with. The worst problem was setting the neck correctly. That took almost a month.

"When I began scraping and polishing I knew I had something. Every time I scraped, the instrument would speak for itself. Then when it was done I couldn't believe it, the sound was so fine.

9 COATS OF VARNISH

"I put on nine coats of varnish, rubbing the instrument down each time."

"While I was making it," he said, smiling reminiscently, "I hung it out on the clothes line in the sun on clear days from a half-hour before noon until a half-hour after noon.

"I guess the neighbors thought I was crazy."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In effect, the B. S. O. is rushing the season this week with a pair of very special Pop concerts, minus the tables and the refreshments but plus the 20-odd men who do not play under Mr. Fiedler, not to mention Lily Pons and her husband, Andre Kostelanetz, who made his Boston debut as conductor. Needless to say, the demand for seats exceeded the supply.

The first number on the programme was Dmitri Kabalevsky's Overture to his opera, "Colas Breugnon," after Romain Robin. The piece has been going the rounds of the American orchestras, but yesterday's brilliant performance was the first in these parts. Excellent Pops material, by the way, it is full of lusty high spirits. It is also marked by the highly professional competence that comes so naturally to European composers.

Mme. Pons appeared on the scene to sing a charming air from Gretry's comic opera, "Zemire et Azor," and with a performance of the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" the first half of the concert came to an end.

After intermission Mr. Kostelanetz offered the suite of three numbers from Albeniz' "Iberia," as orchestrated by Arbos, and the rest belonged to his attractive spouse. The first and most ponderable of Mme. Pons' remaining numbers was a group of four Ronsard Chanson's, set to music especially for her by Darius Milhaud.

Mme. Pons looked as cute as ever and sang in the main with her accustomed skill, but her music lay almost entirely in the upper register which, in the end, made for monotony. Mr. Laurent supplied the flute obbligatos in the Gretry and the Mozart.

Mar 23
Post

URDAY, MARCH 25, 1

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Andre Kostelanetz conducting, gave the 20th program of its 63rd season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Lily Pons, soprano, was the soloist. The program:

Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon"
Creston ...."Frontiers"
Stravinsky....Suite from "The Firebird"
Gretry..Aria, "La Fauvette avec ses petits" from "Zemire et Azor"
Albeniz Suite from "Iberia" (orch. Arbos)
Milhaud.....Quatre Chansons de Ronsard
Rachmaninoff ....Vocalise
Mozart..Variations, "Ah, vous dirai-je maman" (K. 265); arr. LaForge

Yesterday's novel concert proved three things very nicely: that Andre Kostelantez is a good, sound conductor; that Lily Pons is an especially delightful singer when she has a conductor before her and an orchestra behind her; and that a change of pace in the symphony season always makes for an agreeable concert. And "agreeable" is what everything was yesterday; nothing earth-shaking, just pleasant music expertly set forth.

There were two things, however, which gave it moments of real musical vitality. The first was Paul Creston's "Frontiers," a brief and unpretentious, but surprisingly eloquent tone poem depicting the spirit of the westward movement of the American pioneers. It is a thoroughly enjoyable composition, sincere, melodic and without a semblance of self-conscious striving. Mr. Creston, no musical brick builder, obviously knew where he was going before he started, and he refrained from pausing on the wayside to inflate his music with pompous technical bric-a-brac. "Frontiers" is an honest piece, in short, and consequently a very good one.

The second noteworthy thing was Darius Milhaud's "Quatre Chansons de Ronsard." Conceived with the unity of a tiny four-movement symphony for voice and orchestra, the songs are by all odds the finest things Milhaud has done since he made his home in America. They express, in the first place, the composer's view that without melody, music is nothing, but he goes further than that in his wonderful delicacy of proportions, his exquisite clarity of scoring, and his charming harmonic flavor. And added to that he has the "x" factor necessary to all songs: the quality of expressing perfectly in music the essence of the verse. Miss Pons (who commissioned the songs) gave them just the proper interpretative piquance and negotiated the vocal line excellently. The other pieces she sang were outright coloratura display, and she was in good form throughout. In the Gretry and the Mozart Georges Laurent supplied beautiful flute obbligatos.

Mr. Kostelanetz, a conductor with a meticulous beat and a thorough command of orchestral technic, made the orchestra sound splendidly although his approach was always a little too reserved and straightforward to excite either the orchestra or the audience. Guest conductor and soloist were warmly applauded by the audience, which forgot that the rules prohibit encores and stood about for some time after the Mozart hoping to persuade the musicians to defy the house rules.

The orchestra is out of town on its final tour next week, but returns on April 6 and 7 with Rudolf Serkin as piano soloist and with G. Wallace Woodworth as guest conductor in a program featuring Beethoven's Emperor Concerto, a new symphony by Walter Piston and Haydn's 80th Symphony.

[65]

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 23 1944

U. S. and Russia May Exchange Musical Talent

Conductors, Composers and Pianists To Be Traded as Rachmaninoff Memorial

A post-war exchange of young pianists, composers and conductors between the United States and the Soviet Union to serve as a memorial to Sergei Rachmaninoff was announced yesterday by the Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund, Inc., an organization which has the nation's leading musicians on its advisory committee and board.

Rachmaninoff died last March 28 in Beverly Hills, Calif., less than two months after he became an American citizen. The memorial was conceived by a small group of his friends, headed by his widow, Mrs. Natalie Rachmaninoff.

The announcement was made as part of an observance of the first anniversary of Rachmaninoff's death, which will include a memorial service at 8 p. m. on March 28 in the Russian Orthodox Church of Christ the Saviour, 51 East 121st Street, and a performance of Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony by the Boston Symphony, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, over the Blue Network on Saturday evening, April 1.

May Start Next Year

The exchange of musical talent between Russia and the United States will begin in 1945—if world conditions permit—with exchange concert tours by the finest young pianists the two countries have to offer.

Present plans call for biennial nation-wide competitions, the first of which is scheduled for the spring of 1945, following six regional contests throughout the country next fall. Pianists between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five will be eligible, with the exception of men and women in the armed forces who will be unable to compete until they pass their twenty-ninth birthday. It is planned to include composers and conductors in later contests.

The immediate award to the national winner will be a concert tour which will include appearances with the leading symphony orchestras in America, followed by a similar tour of the Soviet Union if the Soviet government approves and supports the plan. Though the plan has not yet been considered by government officials in Moscow, Soviet Embassy officials in Washington have given it enthusiastic, though unofficial, support.

It is hoped that the Soviet Union will conduct similar contests in Russia, the winner to receive an American concert tour under the sponsorship of the Rachmaninoff Memorial Fund.

Funds To Be Solicited

The fund will be supported entirely by voluntary contributions received at its offices in Steinway Hall, 113 West Fifty-seventh Street. Plans are being made to canvass music lovers throughout the United States and 300,000 handbills have been printed which will be inserted in symphony concert programs.

Mrs. Rachmaninoff said yesterday at her home, 136 East Sixty-fourth Street: "Mr. Rachmaninoff always had a great interest in young talent and mourned the fact that he had so little time to help the young musicians brought to him for auditions and the young composers whose works he was asked to review. That is why we, who wanted to do something to make a memorial to his name, evolved the fund.

Mrs. Rachmaninoff is honorary president of the fund, and Vladimir Horowitz, Russian-born pianist who was a close friend of Mr. Rachmaninoff, is president. Mrs. John T. Pratt is chairman of the board; Mrs. Frederick T. Steinway is treasurer; Olin Downes, music critic of "The New York Times," is chairman of the executive committee; Mrs. Olin Downes is corresponding secretary, and Miss Martha Winslow is executive director.

Vice-presidents of the fund include Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander, Mrs. Vladimir Horowitz, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Walter W. Naumburg, Miss Sophie Satin, a sister of Mrs. Rachmaninoff; Theodore E. Steinway and Allen Wardwell.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 31 1944

Carnegie Hall Concert By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts Work by Rachmaninoff

Serge Koussevitzky's program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the organization's final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night was cannily calculated to reveal the incomparable virtuosity of the orchestra and the conductor's own virtuosic gifts. All three works chosen by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance were among the most sumptuously orchestrated in the symphonic literature: Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, played to commemorate the first anniversary of the death of the Russian composer, which took place on March 28, 1943; Strauss's "Tod und Verklaerung" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite.

The result was a veritable tonal piling of Pelion on Ossa until the ear became surfeited with gorgeous, glowing and shimmering sounds and wished for the less pretentious but more substantial musical delights provided by a Mozart or a Haydn. Mr. Koussevitzky elicited the last drop of emotion from the Rachmaninoff and Strauss works and the audience was greatly pleased.

J. D. B.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

MAR 26 1944

Three score and nine years from the night Abraham Lincoln passed from the American scene to the ranks of earth's immortals, his memory will be tendered unique tribute by the premiere performance of the Sixth Symphony of Roy Harris, preeminent American composer.

The work, specially commissioned by the Blue network and based upon the Gettysburg Address, will be performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and will be broadcast over WGH and the Blue network Saturday, April 15, from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m.

The Sixth Symphony is in four movements: "Awakening," a prelude reflecting the opening passage; "Conflict," a fantasy dramatizing war; "Dedication," a chorale of dedication to the dead, and "Affirmation," a fugue reflecting the faith in mankind that rings forth from the last paragraph of the passage.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

MAR 30 1944

Bostonians play Brahms First in Forum visit

Local concert-goers had their opportunity to compare the talents of the local village band with those of the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra when the Beantowners came here for their annual concert, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum, at the Academy of Music last night. And after the tall, gaunt maestro, Serge Koussevitzky, had batoned his music-makers through a trio of varied works, the would-be critics begged for time before casting their ballots.

Koussevitzky is no newcomer to these parts, since these annual visitations have been a milestone in harmonic activities hereabouts. He is a concise, dramatic, capable musician who commands every talent of his troupe. He is demanding in his request for performance and he usually receives the response for which he searches. He has a friendly, mild-like approach, but he reads the score with an acknowledged artistry. He leaves no corner unturned in his effort to make each presentation surpass its previous performance.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

MAR 26 1944

Music And Music Makers

Impressions of the Symphony

By
Arthur W. Hepner

Thomas B. Sherman, music critic, is on a brief vacation in New York. Arthur W. Hepner of the Post-Dispatch staff, who has assisted Sherman this winter in reviewing local concerts, writes his impressions on a season by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra.

IN 15 years of concert-going, I have heard most of the major symphony orchestras in this country, principally the "big three" on the Eastern seaboard—the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia Orchestra and New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra. It was with a certain sense of curious anticipation that I came to St. Louis this year and for the first time heard the orchestra under Mr. Golschmann.

I would not hesitate for a moment to say that, with the exception of the "big three," the orchestra here makes music as engagingly and sensitively as any other in the land. That Mr. Golschmann has a fine sense of ensemble and sympathy for the art of orchestral music is indisputable; that the ensemble is composed mainly of orchestral musicians who can stand on a footing with colleagues elsewhere, likewise. The string section, to lay special stress, performs with an assurance, suppleness and tonal purity that gives the conductor a firm base upon which to work.

* * *

OF COURSE, THIS observation does not lose sight of certain elements of dead wood in the orchestra. You find them everywhere, except perhaps in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was Artur Rodzinski's elimination of the dead wood in the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra last spring which brought down the tempest of the instrumentalists' gods. Orchestra players are no longer a dime a dozen, and we cannot help but hope Mr. Golschmann will find able replacements for some of the dead wood when engaging the orchestra players for next year.

During the winter, I had occasion to call attention to the relaxed quality of the orchestra in an article on how Mr. Golschmann rehearses the ensemble. That quality is always evident, but one wonders whether it is a wholly desirable asset. At times, it would seem to get into the way of a bold and epic interpretation, especially when the ensemble's tonal productive capacities are already limited by its smaller numbers. Often, the readings lacked bite and the dynamic drive which Mitropoulos—not very popular here—or Koussevitzky gives to music.

* * *

It is a matter of personal taste, doubtless, as to which is preferable in performance, intensity or relaxation. The question is whether intensity can be achieved without creating an impression of forcing with a small ensemble. I think it can and there were occasions on which Mr. Golschmann demonstrated this. And these performances — such as the supremely beautiful reading of Vaughn Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis—were far superior to anything else heard during the season.

* * *

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

MAR 3 - 1944

Named Orchestra Manager

CHICAGO, March 2. (UP)—George A. Kuyper, Boston, has been appointed manager of the Chicago Symphony orchestra. Kuyper for the last six years has been business and advertising manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Lily Pons Symphony Soloist With Kostelanetz to Conduct

Monitor

By L. A. Sloper

Mar 25

It was like ancient times in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, when André Kostelanetz directed the twentieth Friday concert of the Boston Symphony season. At least, those times seem ancient, when there could be eight numbers on a symphony program, four of them calling for the cooperation of a vocalist, two with flute obbligato.

Since the singer yesterday was Lily Pons, this was an occasion. Looking very charming in a gown and cap that suggested Francesca, she won the audience completely. It seems a pity that somebody, conductor or flute soloist, could not have appeared as Paolo. But perhaps that wouldn't have worked out so well, sartorially.

Mme. Pons occupies a lonely peak today in the coloratura field. Her light voice is sure in pitch, and she can still reach the F in alt, as she proved in her concluding piece, Mozart's Variations on "Ah, vous dirai-je maman," arranged for voice and orchestra by Frank La Forge. This is an agreeable display piece, of which the artist made the most.

* * *

Here, and in an aria from Grétry's "Zémire et Azor," her voice and M. Laurent's flute complemented each other suavely. The aria, seldom heard now, is characteristic of its period, full of florid grace, and the singer gave full value to its mannered style.

A group of settings by Milhaud of four songs of Ronsard had their first local hearing. Playful or wistful in turn, they were well received. The orchestral accompaniment is unobtrusive.

One of the most interesting items of the day was Rachmaninov's Vocalise. The program notes told us that the composer orchestrated this wordless song for Dr. Koussevitzky's Moscow concerts in the season of 1915-16. In the present performance Mme. Pons took the melody given to solo violin in the orchestral version. The work is somberly lyrical, and beautifully scored, and its performance was a high light of the afternoon.

With all this time and space devoted to the soloist, it was impossible for Mr. Kostelanetz to present a big symphonic work. He compensated for this lack by offering two orchestral novelties. The opening number was the overture to Dmitri Kabalevsky's opera, "Colas Breugnon" (after Romain Rolland). This turned out to be a lively, forthright composition. It received an appropriately lusty performance.

* * *

Paul Creston's "Frontiers" also was heard for the first time in Boston. It is an impressionistic-romantic piece designed to depict the character of the American pioneers, the obstacles they met, their relentless march onward. Conventional in form and style, it conveys atmosphere and mood.

For the rest, Mr. Kostelanetz offered the Stravinsky "Fire Bird" Suite and Albeniz's Suite from "Ibéria." He is a businesslike conductor, free of pose or affectation. He secures accurate performances, faithful to the intention of the composer, and does not try to impose his personal mark on the scores. Both Mme. Pons and he were warmly received.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST

MAR 31 1944

Final Concert Of Season By Bostonians

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Anyone who thinks of the Russian temperament as cold, distant and remote should have heard Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, performed last night in Carnegie Hall by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On this fifth and final visit of the season to New York the orchestra played the symphony in commemoration of the composer's death a year ago.

Its general atmosphere of passionate exuberance, its warm melodies, its soaring climaxes—these positive characteristics make a vital impression on the listener. Much of Rachmaninoff's orchestral music is derivative in the sense that many of his compositions are reminiscent of one another. Phrases of the symphonies seem related to those of the concertos and vice versa. Nevertheless, tremendous beauty, vibrant creative vitality as well as highly skilled workmanship are present in the best illustrations of his creative ability, such as this second symphony.

Superb Discipline

"Death and Transfiguration," tone-poem by Richard Strauss, and Ravel's Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite made up the completed program. The superb discipline and beauty of tonal quality, so characteristic of the Bostonians, were notably presented last night. Maestro Koussevitzky was the serene arbiter of all that took place and his conceptions of the three different composers' styles were intelligently differentiated and stunningly projected. The first phase of his musical farewell party was a distinguished occasion. On Saturday afternoon the final concert will be presented.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Yesterday's Boston Symphony concert at Symphony Hall was quite a glamorous affair, decidedly different from what the Friday subscribers are accustomed to hearing. The glamor was provided by the presence as guest conductor of Andre Kostelanetz, noted maestro of the airwaves, and of his famous wife, Metropolitan Opera soprano, as soloist.

In its large assortment of composers and pieces, this program suggested both the old-fashioned "grand concert" and the new-fashioned potpourri you frequently hear at light symphonic radio concerts. Mr. Kostelanetz gave three "first times in Boston; the Soviet Dmitri Kabalevskys' "Colas Breugnon" overture, Paul Creston's "Frontiers" and four lovely songs by Darius Milhaud on poems by Ronsard. Stravinsky's "Firebird" Suite and Arbos' orchestration of three of the "Iberia" piano pieces by Albeniz also were played.

Mr. Kostelanetz, inclined to baldness and stoutness, made a businesslike figure on the stand. Everything went off briskly and vigorously, and there was so much attention to rhythms that some of the music seemed rough about the edges. The guest showed himself a well-routined technician, though there was little imagination or delicacy in his conducting, apart from the slow sections of the "Firebird."

An orchestra so sensitive as the Boston Symphony is always changed in tonal quaity when a guest directs it. Only the woodwinds invariaby retain their individual timbre. The tone yesterday was dominated by that mixture of "slick and shrill" you find in much radio and film music.

Kabalevsky's Overture reveals an expert technical hand, and it bubbles like champagne. The Overture is part of an opera Kabalevsky wrote in 1037 after the Burgundian novel of Romain Rolland. Mr. Creston's laborious "Frontiers" is another of those depictons of wide-open-spaces, in an idiom which straddles conservative and radical attitudes.

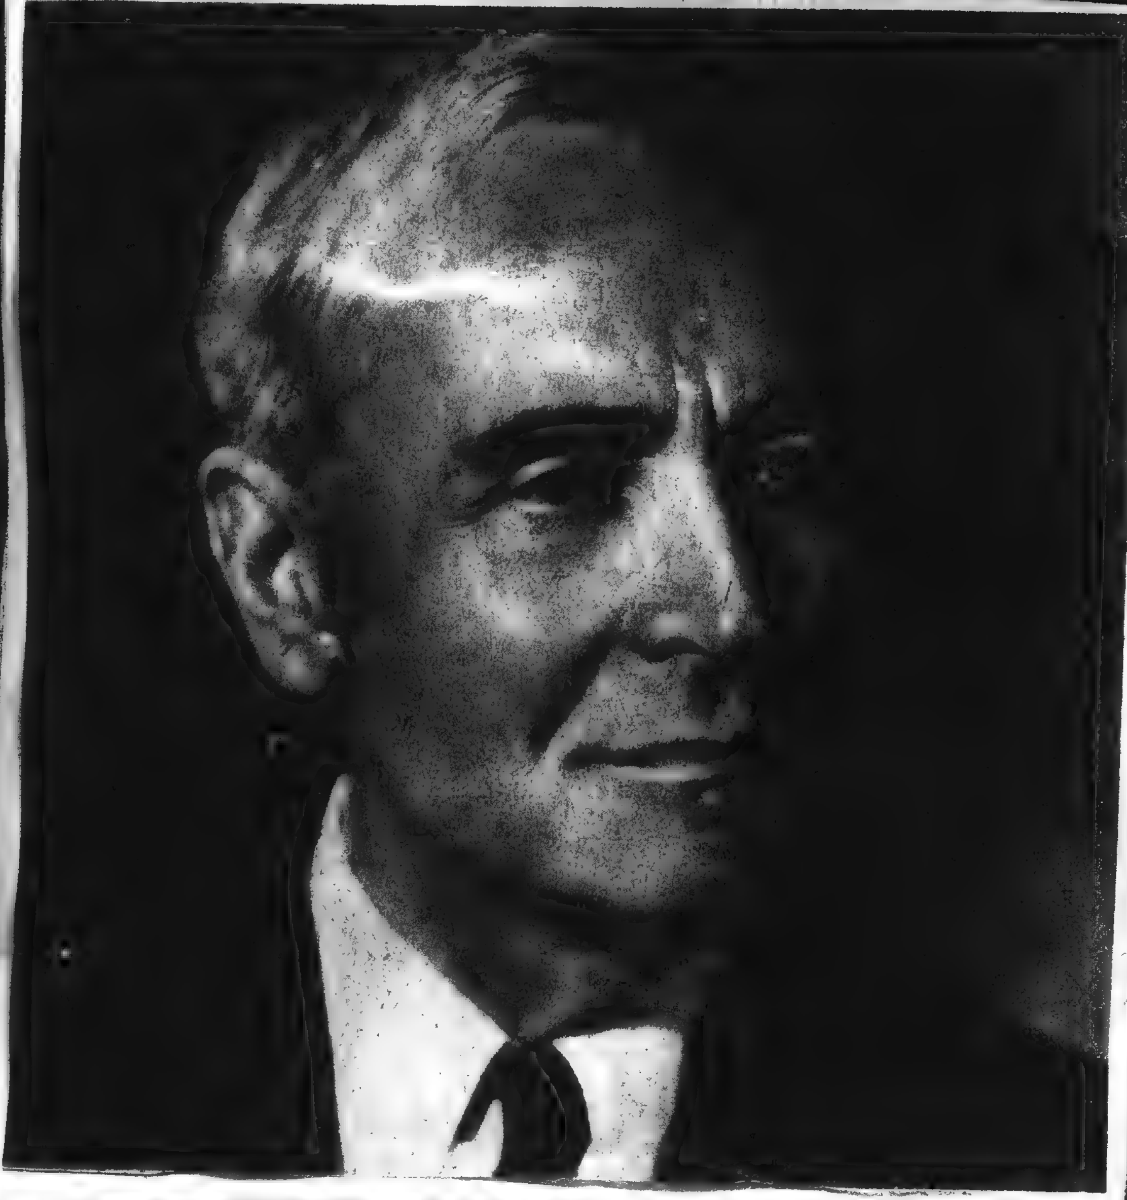
Milhaud's four songs, composed for Miss Pons, are utterly delightful in their exploitation of the characteristics of a high coloratura voice, and they sound very difficult. The poems are "To a Fountain," "To Cupid," "Hush, Chatterer" and "God Keep You."

Miss Pons sang them ably and gave an impression of brilliance and buoyancy. She was also heard in an aria from Gretry's "Zemire et Azor," Rachmaninoff's Vocalise and Frank LaForge's unnecessary vocal arrangement of Mozart's Variations on "Ah, vous dirai-je Maman," whose words were sung in English. Her voice was fresh and accurately pitched, but she interpolated many aspirated h's before vowels. Miss Poons looked charming in a blue period gown and, as always, was rapturously applauded. Mr. Kostelanetz, too, was well received.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

MAR 26 1944

COMMUNITY CONCERT ARTISTS APPEARING IN [illegible] SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY

America's foremost symphony returns another year under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. (LEFT)

[67]

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAR 30 1944

Boston Symphony Gives Concert Here

By Linton Martin

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were in top form when they gave their annual concert for the Forum in Academy last night. Not, come to think of it, that the distinguished maestro and his musicians have been anything less than that on their yearly visits here in recent seasons.

But last night they seemed to be especially inspired, playing with a brilliance of tone and sensitiveness of interpretation that was breathtaking, amply earning the enthusiastic response of the large audience.

SYMPHONIC STAPLES

In accordance with his custom at his concerts here, Mr. Koussevitzky presented a program of symphonic staples, this time consisting of the Haydn G major Symphony, generally listed as No. 88; Debussy's "Sea Sketches," and the Brahms First Symphony in C minor.

The cheerful little earful of the [illegible] symphony of course comes around regularly in all its sparkling length of 22 minutes, which the conductor shortened a bit last night by his brisk tempi. And both the Debussy sketches and the Brahms symphony were played earlier this season by Mr. Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, so that hearing them on this occasion provided something of a post-view under different hands.

SUPERB MUSICIANSHIP

On this score, the showmanship exercised by the Boston leader might perhaps be questioned. Perhaps he feels that novelties might prove a bit too "debatable" for this city, even if they afforded a field for discussion.

But certainly nobody could question the superb musicianship, the almost superhuman perfection and precision of the playing of the Boston band, which has a glistening surface of sound like clearest sunlight, marked by a transparency of tone even in the most complex pages and passages.

Familiar as all three of Mr. Koussevitzky's offerings were for the sophisticated symphonic citizens of this city, at least they were so arranged on the program as to provide contrast.

FACETS DISCLOSED

And each disclosed a different facet of the conductor's qualities and equipment—the quite irresistible rhythm of the sunny little Haydn symphony, which he kept perfectly proportioned within its own framework and properly scaled; the shimmering, iridescent tonal tints of the Debussy sketches; and the treatment of the Brahms symphony that was both poetic and imposing.

It is always a privilege to hear the Boston Symphony under its noted leader. It was again last night. But probably even the most incurably conservative Forum member would not mind a bit, or at least not very much, if Mr. Koussevitzky's programs provided more novelty than they generally do.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 31 1944

MUSIC By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Honors Rachmaninoff In Bostonians' Carnegie Program

Koussevitzky chose to take note of the anniversary and to honor the memory of Rachmaninoff, who died a year ago Tuesday, by playing his Symphony in E Minor, No. 2, at the final evening concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night. It was a wonderful tribute, for the conductor was steeped in the romanticism of the work and the players gave of their best in an exceptionally satisfying performance.

If the music sounded old fashioned to some, the reason lay simply in the fact that Rachmaninoff was writing in the established tradition of the 19th century music. That tradition is not easily brushed aside because it belongs to another day, for the music finds a responsive chord in the hearts of many of the audience. That kind of response like still water runs deep. It springs out of the eternal love of melody. Rachmaninoff loved melody, too, and his long-spun lines have their appeal however heavily they may be scored.

Rachmaninoff may not have been an innovator, but he was a satisfier. Time will probably relegate his music to an historical category, but for present generations he will still hold a firm place because of the pleasure his music brings when so understandingly unfolded as it was last night.

Still another enveloping performance served to reaffirm the forcefulness and durability of Richard Strauss' Tone Poem: "Death and Transfiguration." It surged forth in all the glory of the Boston Symphony's tonal splendors and became another testimony to the greatness of Koussevitzky as a conductor. The music and the performance made a profound effect on the audience.

The concert ended with the "Daphnis and Chloe" Second Suite of Ravel, a Koussevitzky war-horse if ever there were one. It made an excellent finale for this well-planned program, played so memorably.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 31 1944

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN BRILLIANT EVENT

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

At the final Thursday concert of their Carnegie Hall series, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston ~~Symphony~~ honored the memory of Sergei Rachmaninoff by playing his Second Symphony. It was written nearly forty years ago, when Rachmaninoff was in his earlier 30's and was one of fortune's favorites, so busy and popular in Russia that to find the seclusion to compose he withdrew to Dresden. The two cataclysmic wars which were to engulf the world in his time had cast no shadows of tragedy to come upon his retreat.

The E minor symphony is a happy one. As heard again last night, it yielded almost nothing of that brooding and melancholy that have so personal an expression in many of Rachmaninoff's compositions, the early ones included. If there is no bitterness such as some have found in the much later Rhapsody on a Theme by Paganini, neither is there the darkly meditative outgiving of "The Isle of the Dead," which was about contemporaneous with the E minor Symphony.

The spirit of this symphony is chivalresque. It is a confident and healthful work, in which moves the stir of ambition. There is brave adventure here, as there is a manly grasp of the problems of composition. The symphony perhaps falls short of greatness. Its thematic substance may be even a little less than its composer's best. The second and third piano concertos and certainly the Rhapsody are more distinctively the Rachmaninoff who was among us a little more than a year ago. But it is a pleasure to listen to a work so well written, so warm in its content and so beautifully orchestrated, irrespective of its late-Romantic idiom that is here and there decried.

Last night's performance was a stimulating one, if not quite the Boston Symphony's best in minor details of unity and precision. The orchestra fairly surpassed itself, however, in Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Ravel's second "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite, two of our continuing miracles of orchestral virtuosity and color. If there was cause to wonder momentarily how the Ravel ballet music would fare after the sumptuous peroration of the Strauss, it was soon swept away by the dazzling splendor of the French masterpiece. Dr. Koussevitzky seems always to perform this suite incomparably well.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 31 1944

Symphony Honors Rachmaninoff

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

A vibrant reading of the late Serge Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, tingling with warmth and power, featured last night's Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall, as observance of the first anniversary of the composer's death.

No better tribute could hav been devised by Serge Koussevitzk and his men. Some of Rachmaninoff's best music is embedded in this score, and no commemorative homage can excel the artistic treatment of a great artist's work The two Serges met on even ground last night.

Rachmaninoff's 37-year-old score, once widely flouted as a pianist's misguided pretention a large-scale composition, still thrives, thanks to rich melody and frank drama, interwoven in an intensely glowing fabric. Many other scores rated higher at the time of its premiere are now dustily slumbering on library shelves

Showed Dramatic Technic.

The answer was in the warm response aroused by last night's hearing. Audiences still throb to Rachmaninoff's symphonic sway The nostalgic melody is wrapped in rich-hued harmonies that gush over into schmalz in places, but along with a heartwarming sequence of theme is one of the shrewdest grasps of dramatic technic in music.

Of course, it's too early to predict how long Rachmaninoff's scores will keep. So much of Rachmaninoff's personality was merged with the keyboard, many feared the pianist's death would be reflected in a declining interest in his music.

Tones Brilliant.

But Rachmaninoff's concertos and symphonies pack so much enduring art in the way of haunting themes and sweeping suspense of structure, that they may even outlast many likelier-seeming items in the modern repertory—a few of the scores of Richard Strauss, for example. There will always be room for Rachmaninoff's kind of artistic appeal.

If super-brilliant tone, uncanny precision, and unctuous lyric style can win fresh converts to any composer's music, Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Second Symphony must have brought in dozens of recruits to the Rachmaninoff cause last night. Those still in doubt will probably stay that way.

Also listed were two other samples of mammoth tone—Strauss' Death and Transfiguration and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2—both read in similarly vital fashion. The orchestra piled up layers of vivid volume, mounting to the peak outburts. That was a lot of tone being minted in Carnegie Hall last night, and all of it on the gold standard.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL
MAR 26 1944

AT BROADCAST These are a few of the thousands of Allis-Chalmers employes who crowded the Auditorium for the Louis Armstrong broadcast Saturday night, while the Trumpet King and his orchestra gave out on a national hookup. Their applause was switched into the end of a Boston Symphony program, to blend with an ovation for Andre Kostelanetz. Sentinel photo.

Whistle Blows for A-C Workers So They Knock Off for Some Dancing

By DOROTHY MADLE

Nearly 20,000 gates and chicks, after a week og high voltage equipment, fine tolerances and circuit breaks, went out to spoil while Saturday night at the Auditorium, where Satchmo was booked for a session.

All right. All right. We'll start over. Louis Armstrong and his orchestra, broadcasting on the Coca-Cola program, were featured at a party Saturday night at the Auditorium, for Allis-Chalmers employes.

The party started at 8, and before you could say "Can I borrow your frame for this struggle" the main arena was packed so tightly with war workers it would take a pair of outsize calipers to estimate the crowd.

Then Satchmo came on stage. The crowd jammed the arena; it filled the corridors; alligators deployed to the adjoining halls; a few wistful cats, when The Satchmo got the reap beat down to fine micrometer measurement, jived hardily in the street.

Most of the kidlies stayed in the terrestrial firetrap, keeping the sight of Louis and his boys with the licorice sticks and the 3,600 RPM beat, although in such a packed spot dancing was strictly from hunger. You couldn't even manipulate a half twist without first clearing a space with your elbows, much less swing out for some solid rug cutting.

O. K. O. K. There was dancing all over the place, but the majority remaained in the main arena, which soon became too crowded for free movement.

During the broadcast, the crowd cheerfully obeyed the announcer's signals for alternate silence and frantic applause. In one point only it failed to comply. Many ebullient ones couldn't refraain from whistling.

Backstage during intermission, Armstrong smiled broadly as he signed autographs. He said:

"This sure is a party. Not a squade guy here."

And that, Graandpapa, did not mean what you were taught to think it would. He meant that no misfits were present.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 31 1944

CONCERT TRIBUTE TO RACHMANINOFF

Dr. Koussevitzky Marks First Anniversary of Composer's Death With 2d Symphony

By OLIN DOWNES

The program given by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, almost exactly on the anniversary of Rachmaninoff's death last March 28, and coincidently with the establishment of the memorial society which bears his name, began with that lamented composer's Second Symphony and continued with the "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss. The sequence needed no underscoring save the intensities and eloquence of the music. At the end came a fillip of sheer and irresistible entertainment—the far-famed Boston Symphony performance of the excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe."

Yet each of the items on this program, aside from special and poignant associations, would have been engrossing. Witness the strength and vitality of Rachmaninoff's eloquent and unrevolutionary symphony; a work which keeps its position in the repertory not by the novelty of its terms but solely because of the feeling and invention, emotion and Slavic color and splendid structure of the music. It has a quality of organic development which sustains the interest of the listener throughout its considerable length. Interest never flags for an instant. Nothing is without the logic of beauty. And, despite the classic form, the symphony is a highly personal document. Also it sounds superbly, and with a special lustre from the devoted ministrations of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony.

Nor is "Tod und Verklaerung" a novelty. Liszt and Wagner are its forbears, yet here again is a composer with an intense conviction in what he has to say, and a certain faculty for blazing portraiture. Theatrical this may sound in certain pages, but so is Verdi's "Requiem," played here at a recent concert performance, theatrical. Last night's tone poem is the characteristic speech of the young Strauss who once shook the world with the unheard-of intensities of his art. The somber opening; the depiction of a lifetime as the field of battle that it is, and the long triumphant ascent to the final rainbow chord of transfiguration are pages that still grip and take us far from the pettiness of the "vie quotidienne."

An evening of masterful interpretation of a program which may have been a horrible slump into the sound, safe and sane, but which did not seem to hang heavy upon Dr. Koussevitzky's conscience, or that of his players, or the audience! And the Boston Symphony's evocation of Ravel's glowing, scintillant music is so remarkable for its tonal glory, precision and "panache" that it almost surpasses the music itself in its values—almost becomes, in and of itself, a work of art. No audience listens to it without cheering, as did last night's audience.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

31 1944

Tribute At Carnegie

By GRENA BENNETT

A tribute to an honored and gifted musician was the first offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky began his program with the E minor Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer who died a year ago.

The Symphony is one of the most admired in the composer's vast store of creations and is a memento of the period that was richest in invention. This provided grateful material for interpretation by the Bostonians who seemed especially en rapport with the music which was performed in the grand manner, with stressed poignancy in the stately opening phrases that assumed the character of a threnody.

Throughout the four movements the audience listened enthralled to a gloriously devised example of musical architecture directed by a scrupulous stylist and read by sensitive and responsive instrumentalists.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was a fitting follow-up to the symphony and the complexion of that part of the program, and the list ended with a blithely poetic reading of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

* * *

Zinka Milanov gave a magnificent portrayal of Leonore in last evening's performance of "Trovatore" at the Metropolitan. Her voice was glowingly brilliant and smoothly produced.

Kerstin Thorborg evidently found the tessaturo in Azucena's arias a bit too high which caused some forcing of her usually beautiful voice. Alexander Sved as De Luna sang sonorously and well, particularly in the aria "Ilbalen" which received an ovation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
APR 1 - 1944

Film to Glorify Carnegie Hall

Carnegie Hall's star-studded career will be made into a million-dollar Technicolor movie, impresario Boris Morros revealed yesterday as he signed a contract with the hall's board of directors.

Morros, who will produce and direct for United Artists, said the Carnegie directors capitulated after holding out two years because they wanted a strictly factual presentation of its history.

"The picture will be made a year from next May," Morros said, explaining research would require that time.

"It's going to be the life story of a Carnegie Hall box holder, and Ronald Colman will be the fictitious Carnegie patron," he revealed.

Picture will feature Benny Goodman and Paul Whiteman's bands, and Serge Koussevitzky's and Arturo Toscanini's orchestras, Morros emphasized, since all have appeared at the hall.

Asked if he thought jitterbugs and bobbysocks would be interested in the serious music in the picture, Morros said the war would "undoubtedly" be over by the time the picture is finished.

"And when the armistice is signed," he added, "swing music will vanish. It's only a symptom of public hysteria, anyway."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD
MAR 30 1944

Boston Symphony Plays Here

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, paid their annual visit to the Academy of Music last night under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

It is probably good for those of us who are likely to get smug about our own great Philadelphia Orchestra to be reminded at least once a year that there are other superlative symphonic organizations in this country. And Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, as usual, performed that eye-opening function admirably last night.

Nicely Balanced

The program was nicely balanced on peaks of the classical, romantic and impressionist schools of the last two centuries with Haydn's Symphony in G No. 88; the Brahms First Symphony and Debussy's "La Mer."

Dr. Koussevitzky is apparently one of those conductors who believes that Haydn should be played with a minimum of "interpretation," and the result last night was a forthright performance of great clarity but some angularity. Under this approach the symphony's first movement lost a little of its playfulness, and the Minuet sounded martial rather than courtly. But there were compensations. It was good to hear the slow movement spared any sentimentality and the bustling Finale had inspiring pace and fine firm texture.

Debussy's Seascape

Debussy's superb seascape, "La Mer," found the conductor in magnificent control of the winds and waters. In this complex and miraculous score Dr. Koussevitsky particularly showed his ability to integrate his orchestral forces in a single fabric, to achieve that propulsive sweep and that balanced unity of orchestral voices that give music perspective in three dimensions and are the sure sign of a master on the podium.

The Brahms First was given a reading notable for its warmth and dignity. It was not a passionately romantic Brahms, but it was beautifully perceptive, and, once more, a triumph of balanced ensemble playing, projected on a three-dimensional scale.

Comparisons Inevitable

In their annual visits here, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians come, in a way, as guests of our musical community. And appraising the assets of a guest is, perhaps bad manners. Yet comparisons between this member of the country's orchestral "Big Three" and our own are inevitable. And, in brief, last night's box score seemed to show as last year's did, that the Boston strings, though brilliant, lack the silken warmth of Dr. Ormandy's fiddlers, and that his woodwinds are dry and sparse in the same comparison. The Boston brasses, however, are particularly golden and solid, and the discipline of all hands is superb and unanimous.

It should hardly be necessary to add that last night's concert was a memorable one; that Dr. Koussevitzky is still one of the world's great maestros and that it would be a pleasure to hear him and his band much oftener than once a year.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 3 - 1944

Boston Symphony Concludes Season

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the season's last New York concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, which opened the program, was such a delight as performed by the visiting orchestra that it is to be hoped Mr. Koussevitzky's series here next season will afford us more than one occasion of hearing the symphonic masterpieces of the eighteenth century. Debussy's "La Mer," which followed, had magnificent color, but the structure was not as well delineated as it might have been. The Brahms First Symphony, however, followed with exceptional clarity and strength. A. V. B.

[68]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 31 1944

Symphony Honors Rachmaninoff

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI

A vibrant reading of the late Serge Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, tingling with warmth and power, featured last night's Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall, as observance of the first anniversary of the composer's death.

No better tribute could hav been devised by Serge Koussevitzk and his men. Some of Rachmaninoff's best music is embedded ir this score, and no commemorative homage can excel the artistic treatment of a great artist's work The two Serges met on ever ground last night.

Rachmaninoff's 37 - year - olc score, once widely flouted as a pianist's misguided pretention a large-scale composition, stil thrives, thanks to rich melody anc frank drama, interwoven in an intensely glowing fabric. Many other scores rated higher at the time of its premiere are now dustily slumbering on library shelves

Showed Dramatic Technic.

The answer was in the warm response aroused by last night's hearing. Audiences still throb to Rachmaninoff's symphonic sway The nostalgic melody is wrappec in rich-hued harmonies that gush over into schmalz in places, but along with a heartwarming sequence of theme is one of the shrewdest grasps of dramatic technic in music.

Of course, it's too early to predict how long Rachmaninoff's scores will keep. So much of Rachmaninoff's personality was mergec with the keyboard, many fearec the pianist's death would be reflected in a declining interest ir his music.

Tones Brilliant.

But Rachmaninoff's concertos and symphonies pack so much enduring art in the way of haunting themes and sweeping suspense of structure, that they may even outlast many likelier-seeming items in the modern repertory—a few of the scores of Richard Strauss, for example. There will always be room for Rachmaninoff's kind of artistic appeal.

If super-brilliant tone, uncanny precision, and unctuous lyric style can win fresh converts to any composer's music, Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Secon Symphony must have brought in dozens of recruits to the Rachmaninoff cause last night. Those still in doubt will probably stay that way.

Also listed were two other samples of mammoth tone—Strauss' Death and Transfiguration and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2—both read in similarly vital fashion. The orchestra piled up layers of vivid volume, mounting to the peak outburts. That was a lot of tone being minted in Carnegie Hall last night, and all of it on the gold standard.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

MAR 31 1944

Tribute At Carnegie

By GRENA BENNETT

A tribute to an honored and gifted musician was the first offering of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last evening, when Conductor Serge Koussevitzky began his program with the E minor Symphony of Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer who died a year ago.

The Symphony is one of the most admired in the composer's vast store of creations and is a memento of the period that was richest in invention. This provided grateful material for interpretation by the Bostonians who seemed especially en rapport with the music which was performed in the grand manner, with stressed poignancy in the stately opening phrases that assumed the character of a threnody.

Throughout the four movements the audience listened enthralled to a gloriously devised example of musical architecture directed by a scrupulous stylist and read by sensitive and responsive instrumentalists.

Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" was a fitting follow-up to the symphony and the complexion of that part of the program, and the list ended with a blithely poetic reading of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite No. 2.

* * *

Zinka Milanov gave a magnificent portrayal of Leonore in last evening's performance of "Trovatore" at the Metropolitan. Her voice was glowingly brilliant and smoothly produced.

Kerstin Thorborg evidently found the tessaturo in Azucena's arias a bit too high which caused some forcing of her usually beautiful voice. Alexander Sved as De Luna sang sonorously and well, particularly in the aria "Ilbalen" which received an ovation.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

MAR 26 1944

AT BROADCAST These are a few of the thousands of Allis-Chalmers employes who crowded the Auditorium for the Louis Armstrong broadcast Saturday night, while the Trumpet King and his orchestra gave out on a national hookup. Their applause was switched into the end of a Boston Symphony program, to blend with an ovation for Andre Kostelanetz. Sentinel photo.

Whistle Blows for A-C Workers So They Knock Off for Some Dancing

By DOROTHY MADLE

Nearly 20,000 gates and chicks, after a week og high voltage equipment, fine tolerances and circuit breaks, went out to spoil awhile Saturday night at the Auditorium, where Satchmo was booked for a session.

All right. All right. We'll start over. Louis Armstrong and his orchestra, broadcasting on the Coca-Cola program, were featured at a party Saturday night at the Auditorium, for Allis-Chalmers employes.

The party started at 8, and before you could say "Can I borrow your frame for this struggle" the main arena was packed so tightly with war workers it would take a pair of outsize calipers to estimate the crowd.

Then Satchmo came on stage. The crowd jammed the arena; it filled the corridors; alligators deployed to the adjoining halls; a few wistful cats, when The Satchmo got the reap beat down to fine micrometer measurement, jived hardily in the street.

Most of the kidlies stayed in the terrestrial firetrap, keeping the sight of Louis and his boys with the licorice sticks and the 3,600 RPM beat, although in such a packed spot dancing was strictly from hunger. You couldn't even manipulate a half twist without first clearing a space with your elbows, much less swing out for some soli rug cutting.

O. K. O. K. There was dancing all over the place, but the majority remaained in the main arena, which soon became too crowded for free movement.

During the broadcast, the crowd cheerfully obeyed the announcer's signals for alternate silence and frantic applause. In one point only it failed to comply. Many ebullient ones couldn't refraain from whistling.

Backstage during intermission, Armstrong smiled broadly as he signed autographs. He said:

"This sure is a party. Not a squade guy here."

And that, Graandpapa, did not mean what you were taught to think it would. He meant that no misfits were present.

NEW YORK, N.
TIMES

MAR 31 194

CONCERT TRIBU TO RACHMANIN

Dr. Koussevitzky Marks Anniversary of Compos Death With 2d Sympho

By OLIN DOWNES

The program given by Koussevitzky and the Boston phony Orchestra last night in negie Hall, almost exactly o anniversary of Rachmani death last March 28, and c dently with the establishme the memorial society which his name, began with tha mented composer's Secon phony and continued wi
"Death and Transfiguratio
Richard Strauss. The seq needed no underscoring sav intensities and eloquence o music. At the end came a fi sheer and irresistible ente ment—the far-famed Boston phony performance of the ex from Ravel's "Daphnis et C

Yet each of the items o program, aside from specia poignant associations, would been engrossing. Witness strength and vitality of Rac noff's eloquent and unrev ary symphony; a work which its position in the repertory no the novelty of its terms but so because of the feeling and inve tion, emotion and Slavic color an splendid structure of the music. It has a quality of organic development which sustains the interest of the listener throughout its considerable length. Interest never flags for an instant. Nothing is without the logic of beauty. And, despite the classic form, the symphony is a highly personal document. Also it sounds superbly, and with a special lustre from the devoted ministrations of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony.

Nor is "Tod und Verklaerung" a novelty. Liszt and Wagner are its forbears, yet here again is a composer with an intense conviction in what he has to say, and a certain faculty for blazing portraiture. Theatrical this may sound in certain pages, but so is Verdi's "Requiem," played here at a recent concert performance, theatrical. Last night's tone poem is the characteristic speech of the young Strauss who once shook the world with the unheard-of intensities of his art. The somber opening; the depiction of a lifetime as the field of battle that it is, and the long triumphant ascent to the final rainbow chord of transfiguration are pages that still grip and take us far from the pettiness of the "vie quotidienne."

An evening of masterful interpretation of a program which may have been a horrible slump into the sound, safe and sane, but which did not seem to hang heavy upon Dr. Koussevitzky's conscience, or that of his players, or the audience! And the Boston Symphony's evocation of Ravel's glowing, scintillant music is so remarkable for its tonal glory, precision and "panache" that it almost surpasses the music itself in its values—almost becomes, in and of itself, a work of art. No audience listens to it without cheering, as did last night's audience.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

APR 1 - 1944

Film to Glorify Carnegie Hall

Carnegie Hall's star-studded career will be made into a million-dollar Technicolor movie, impresario Boris Morros revealed yesterday as he signed a contract with the hall's board of directors.

Morros, who will produce and direct for United Artists, said the Carnegie directors capitulated after holding out two years because they wanted a strictly factual presentation of its history.

"The picture will be made a year from next May," Morros said, explaining research would require that time.

"It's going to be the life story of a Carnegie Hall box holder, and Ronald Colman will be the fictitious Carnegie patron," he revealed.

Picture will feature Benny Goodman and Paul Whiteman's bands, and Serge Koussevitzky's and Arturo Toscanini's orchestras, Morros emphasized, since all have appeared at the hall.

Asked if he thought jitterbugs and bobbysocks would be interested in the serious music in the picture, Morros said the war would "undoubtedly" be over by the time the picture is finished.

"And when the armistice is signed," he added, "swing music will vanish. It's only a symptom of public hysteria, anyway."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

MAR 30 1944

Boston Symphony Plays Here

By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, paid their annual visit to the Academy of Music last night under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

It is probably good for those of us who are likely to get smug about our own great Philadelphia Orchestra to be reminded at least once a year that there are other superlative symphonic organizations in this country. And Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, as usual, performed that eye-opening function admirably last night.

Nicely Balanced

The program was nicely balanced on peaks of the classical, romantic and impressionist schools of the last two centuries with Haydn's Symphony in G No. 88; the Brahms First Symphony and Debussy's "La Mer."

Dr. Koussevitzky is apparently one of those conductors who believes that Haydn should be played with a minimum of "interpretation," and the result last night was a forthright performance of great clarity but some angularity. Under this approach the symphony's first movement lost a little of its playfulness, and the Minuet sounded martial rather than courtly. But there were compensations. It was good to hear the slow movement spared any sentimentality and the bustling Finale had inspiring pace and fine firm texture.

Debussy's Seascape

Debussy's superb seascape, "La Mer," found the conductor in magnificent control of the winds and waters. In this complex and miraculous score Dr. Koussevitsky particularly showed his ability to integrate his orchestral forces in a single fabric, to achieve that propulsive sweep and that balanced unity of orchestral voices that give music perspective in three dimensions and are the sure sign of a master on the podium.

The Brahms First was given a reading notable for its warmth and dignity. It was not a passionately romantic Brahms, but it was beautifully perceptive, and, once more, a triumph of balanced ensemble playing, projected on a three-dimensional scale.

Comparisons Inevitable

In their annual visits here, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians come, in a way, as guests of our musical community. And appraising the assets of a guest is, perhaps bad manners. Yet comparisons between this member of the country's orchestral "Big Three" and our own are inevitable. And, in brief, last night's box score seemed to show as last year's did, that the Boston strings, though brilliant, lack the silken warmth of Dr. Ormandy's fiddlers, and that his woodwinds are dry and sparse in the same comparison. The Boston brasses, however, are particularly golden and solid, and the discipline of all hands is superb and unanimous.

It should hardly be necessary to add that last night's concert was a memorable one; that Dr. Koussevitzky is still one of the world's great maestros and that it would be a pleasure to hear him and his band much oftener than once a year.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 3 - 1944

Boston Symphony Concludes Season

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the season's last New York concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, which opened the program, was such a delight as performed by the visiting orchestra that it is to be hoped Mr. Koussevitzky's series here next season will afford us more than one occasion of hearing the symphonic masterpieces of the eighteenth century. Debussy's "La Mer," which followed, had magnificent color, but the structure was not as well delineated as it might have been. The Brahms First Symphony, however, followed with exceptional clarity and strength. A. V. B.

Two Conductors: the young distinguished Bernstein; the great Koussevitzky

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the 21st program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn ......Symphony No. 80 in D min
Piston ....Symphony No.
Beethoven ....Concert
No. 5 in E flat, Op. 73 ("Emperor")

It is, when you think it over, remarkable that a man who has devoted his musical career to the training and conducting of choral groups (the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, in partcular), could step before 110 crack symphonic musicians and produce such well-disciplined and well-integrated music as G. Wallace Woodworth did yesterday. True, the finesse, the perfect schooling and the warm glow of a Dr. Koussevitzky were not there, but considering Mr. Woodworth's experience at so arduous and exacting a task, it must be considered a very impressive display of musicianship. It lent a concert, already interesting for its new music and its soloist, an additional pleasure.

This is not to say Mr. Woodworth is a green hand with an orchestra. He has done odd jobs of orchestral conducting for some years and, in fact, was conductor of the school orchestra at Tanglewood some seasons back. Thus he knows his business. More than that, he has a sound, steady style, sufficient authority to command attention and respect, and a good bit of flair into the bargain. He never did set the orchestra on edge, so to speak, but he did make good and lively music free of emotional distortion or capriciousness. The Haydn Symphony, delightfully unfamiliar, was especially well done.

Walter Piston's Second Symphony didn't appeal to me very much for reasons not quite clear to me at the moment. It was just good, neat, clean and tidy; not dry and not juicy. Here and there it seemed a little manufactured and, in the second theme of the first movement, what would be known outside the concert hall as "corny." It starts out very well indeed with a distinguished and beautiful strain. Then comes that pseudo-American tune, characteristic of all American composers laboring under the delusion that they must be American, and it is not until the end of the movement that the noble mood of the opening is restored. The second movement also begins beautifully, but its texture is so polyphonically sustained the ear demands more contrast in note values before it is over. The finale resumes the exploitaton of rythmic device and the search for new sonorities, and is suitably agitated. I should like to hear Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings again soon, but somehow or other the symphony finds me neither hot nor cold.

The concert came to a fine close with a good but not great performance by Rudolf Serkin and the orchestra under Mr. Woodworth of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. In sections it was most eloquently realized; in others it was not quite so satisfactory. The audience was cordially disposed toward conductor, soloist and, in the case of the new symphony, the composer, and all three were given warm receptions. Next week we shall have Roy Harris' new Sixth Symphony, a Concerto Grosso of Handel, and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

G. Wallace Woodworth conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Following the practice always observed during Holy Week, the Friday concert was advanced to Thursday. The evening concert will, as usual, be given tomorrow at 8:30, when Mr. Woodworth will repeat his program of the D minor Symphony, No. 80, by Haydn; Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the "Emperor" [illegible]ano Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

Although yesterday was the first time that Mr. Woodworth had conducted the full Boston Symphony at one of its regular concerts, the admired conductor of the Harvard Glee Club has had a long association with the orchestra. For many choral scores presented by the Boston Symphony he has prepared the Harvard and Radcliffe voices. He conducted one of the chamber concerts last Summer, when he gave the first local performance of this very Haydn Symphony. In short, he is as well known and liked in Symphony Hall as within the Harvard Yard.

He gave a very good account of himself yesterday. There were depth and style and feeling and poise in all his readings. The Haydn went nicely; to Mr. Piston's work, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Woodworth seemed to bring smoothness and eloquence. And the orchestra played well for him. Indeed, more than any other guest conductor I have heard this season, Mr. Woodworth made the orchestra sound indisputably like the Boston Symphony.

In Beethoven's great Concerto there were flaws of precision and of tempo between orchestra and soloist, and the performance as a whole, though brilliant and exciting, was a bit rough and on the nervous side. Tomorrow night it probably will go better. But the cumulative effect was highly satisfying, and Mr. Serkin, Mr. Woodworth and the orchestra all deserved their hearty reception. Incidentally, if memory is correct, Mr. Woodworth did not once take a bow without asking the orchestra to rise.

Mr. Piston's Second Symphony, commissioned by the Alice M. Ditson Fund of Columbia University and first played in Washington, D. C., last March, shows a new side of Piston. The three movements have traces of academicism and echoes of Hindemith and other composers. But they are full of melodic juice, and their agreeable idiom makes this the most easily assimilable of any of Piston's serious music. Work and composer were favorably received.

Alfred Einstein, the noted musicologist now at Smith College, may be credited with revival of the Haydn Symphony, one of five put together by him from parts reposing in the British Museum. It was composed at Eisenstadt about 1783, and it is a beautiful Symphony, mellifluous and vigorous, scored for seven winds and strings. Yesterday's performance, by a reduced orchestra, was the first at these concerts. We may all hope that the great Haydn resurrection now in progress will continue.—C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1944

MUSIC By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Programs Three Master Works for Final Brooklyn Concert

Final concerts must bring special inspiration to Serge Koussevitzky. Following a memorable evening of virtuoso performances in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, he came to the Academy of Music last night to make the last Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony equally memorable. The Brooklyn program, however, demanded a different kind of performance, for it listed three of the great masterpieces of symphonic literature. These called for deep-seated interpretation wherein effectiveness was quite a secondary matter.

But the Boston Symphony has not been called the first orchestra of the land in any hasty appraisal; it met its more challenging problems with the keenest kind of musicianship, creating under the baton of its inspired leader three superlative performances. Artistry was demanded and artistry resulted in some phenominal realization of detail. Because of the transparency of the playing, several slips were the more noticeable; but they were quickly submerged in the quality of the playing and the aural beauties of instrumental sounds.

The program opened with Mozart's E Flat Symphony, one of the last three which proclaim the peak of the composer's symphonic achievements. The elegant simplicity of the music was matched in the performance; so, for that matter, was the charm. Perhaps there could have been a bit more gaiety arising out of a slight increase in tempo; but this was a performance in the classic tradition and it carried the atmosphere of near-perfection along with it.

There followed one of Koussevitzky's special achievements: his performance of Debussy's "La Mer," wherein he enhances the impressionistic effect of the music by the refinement of his interpretation. He has conducted a more magnificent performance of this work, but this was one to treasure. As for the music, it grows more and more on the listener. There is nothing quite like it in all musical literature: a lonely masterpiece of its kind.

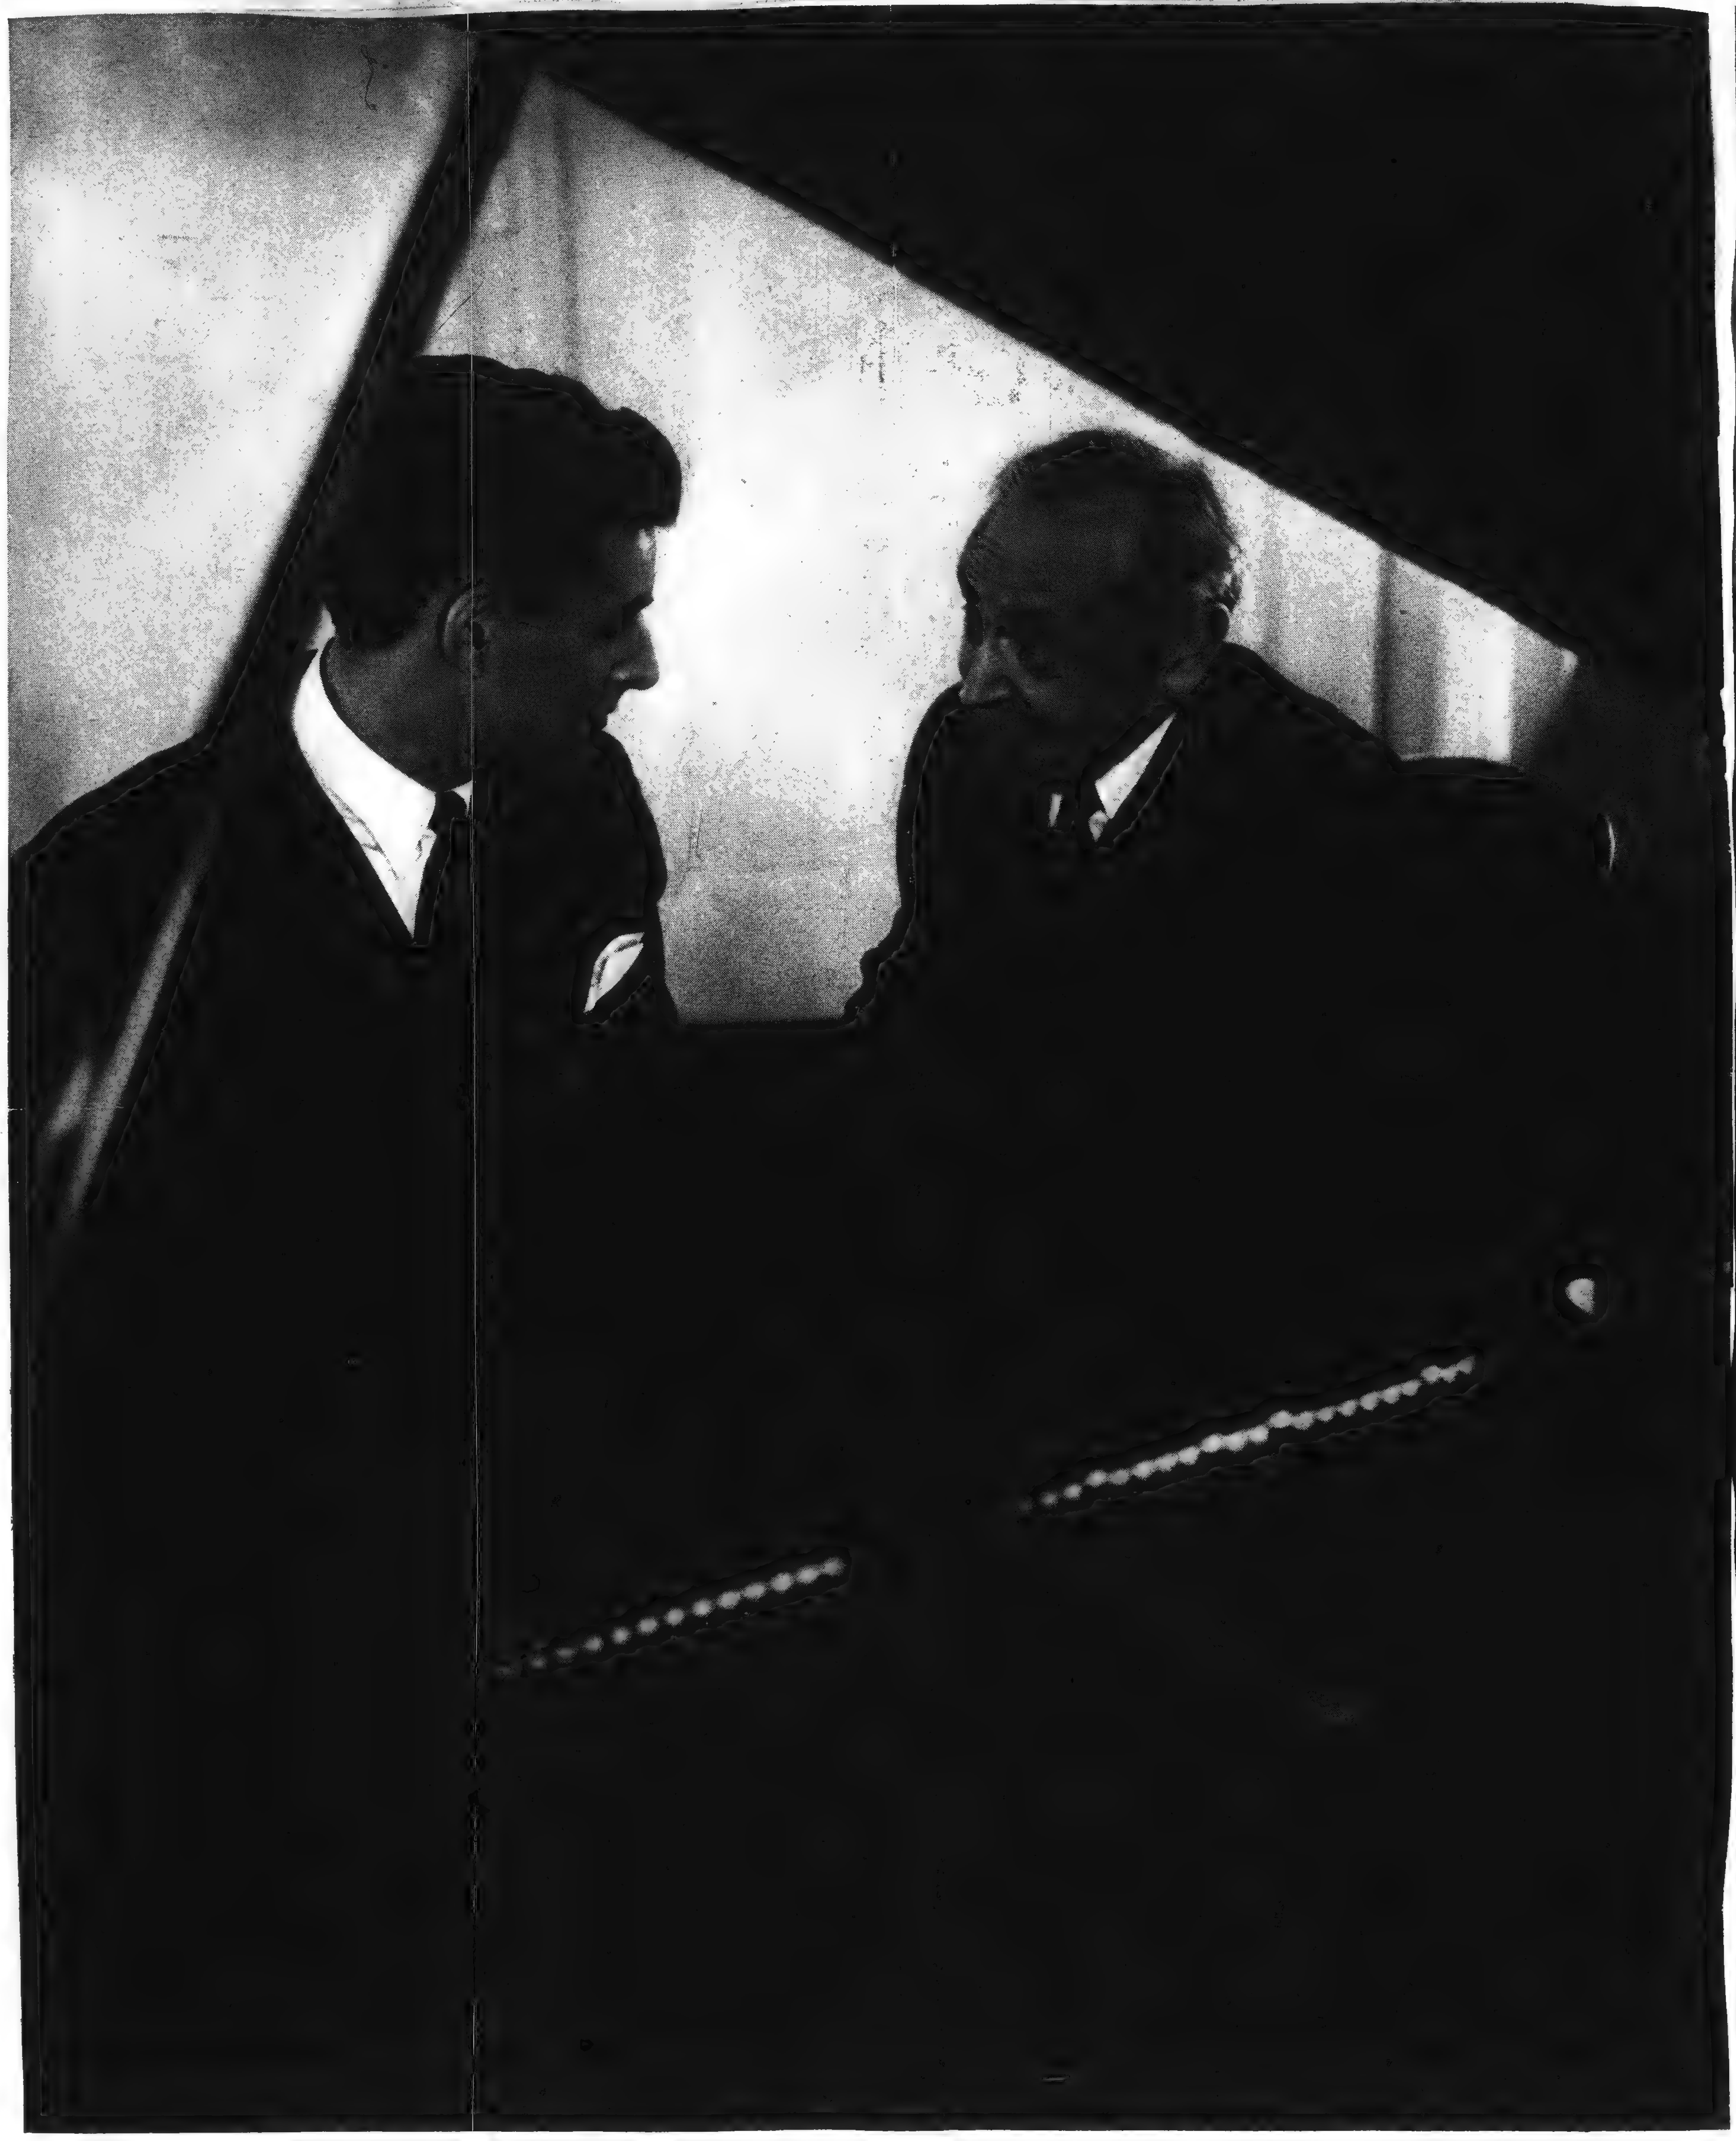
Brahms' Second Symphony brought the concert to a triumphant close. The performanse sounded well, though the spirited finale tended to emphasize a certain lack of vitality in parts of the other movements. The first movement tended to lag without actually getting out of hand; but then there is a persistent deliberateness about Koussevitzky's tempos. This conductor's brand of magic, however, is always at his command. He sprinkled it freely on all the music of the program last night. There was little question that such great music so played carries some of the most transcendent power in the world.

Bridgeport Conn
Post

APR 16 1944

RED ENVOY TO VISIT BOSTON

BOSTON, April 15—(AP) Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, when he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth symphony.



Two Conductors: the young distinguished Bernstein; the great Koussevitzky

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the 21st program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn ......Symphony No. 80 in D minor
Piston .... Symphony No. 2
Beethoven ....Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Op. 73 ("Emperor")

It is, when you think it over, remarkable that a man who has devoted his musical career to the training and conducting of choral groups (the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, in partcular), could step before 110 crack symphonic musicians and produce such well-disciplined and well - integrated music as G. Wallace Woodworth did yesterday. True, the finesse, the perfect schooling and the warm glow of a Dr. Koussevitzky were not there, but considering Mr. Woodworth's experience at so arduous and exacting a task, it must be considered a very impressive display of musicianship. It lent a concert, already interesting for its new music and its soloist, an additional pleasure.

This is not to say Mr. Woodworth is a green hand with an orchestra. He has done odd jobs of orchestral conducting for some years and, in fact, was conductor of the school orchestra at Tanglewood some seasons back. Thus he knows his business. More than that, he has a sound, steady style, sufficient authority to command attention and respect, and a good bit of flair into the bargain. He never did set the orchestra on edge, so to speak, but he did make good and lively music free of emotional distortion or capriciousness. The Haydn Symphony, delightfully unfamiliar, was especially well done.

Walter Piston's Second Symphony didn't appeal to me very much for reasons not quite clear to me at the moment. It was just good, neat, clean and tidy; not dry and not juicy. Here and there it seemed a little manufactured and, in the second theme of the first movement, what would be known outside the concert hall as "corny." It starts out very well indeed with a distinguished and beautiful strain. Then comes that pseudo-American tune, characteristic of all American composers laboring under the delusion that they must be American, and it is not until the end of the movement that the noble mood of the opening is restored. The second movement also begins beautifully, but its texture is so polyphonically sustained the ear demands more contrast in note values before it is over. The finale resumes the exploitaton of rythmic device and the search for new sonorities, and is suitably agitated. I should like to hear Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings again soon, but somehow or other the symphony finds me neither hot nor cold.

The concert came to a fine close with a good but not great performance by Rudolf Serkin and the orchestra under Mr. Woodworth of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. In sections it was most eloquently realized; in others it was not quite so satisfactory. The audience was cordially disposed toward conductor, soloist and, in the case of the new symphony, the composer, and all three were given warm receptions. Next week we shall have Roy Harris' new Sixth Symphony, a Concerto Grosso of Handel, and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

G. Wallace Woodworth conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Following the practice always observed during Holy Week, the Friday concert was advanced to Thursday. The evening concert will, as usual, be given tomorrow at 8:30, when Mr. Woodworth will repeat his program of the D minor Symphony, No. 80, by Haydn; Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the "Emperor" Piano Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

Although yesterday was the first time that Mr. Woodworth had conducted the full Boston Symphony at one of its regular concerts, the admired conductor of the Harvard Glee Club has had a long association with the orchestra. For many choral scores presented by the Boston Symphony he has prepared the Harvard and Radcliffe voices. He conducted one of the chamber concerts last Summer, when he gave the first local performance of this very Haydn Symphony. In short, he is as well known and liked in Symphony Hall as within the Harvard Yard.

He gave a very good account of himself yesterday. There were depth and style and feeling and poise in all his readings. The Haydn went nicely; to Mr. Piston's work, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Woodworth seemed to bring smoothness and eloquence. And the orchestra played well for him. Indeed, more than any other guest conductor I have heard this season, Mr. Woodworth made the orchestra sound indisputably like the Boston Symphony.

In Beethoven's great Concerto there were flaws of precision and of tempo between orchestra and soloist, and the performance as a whole, though brilliant and exciting, was a bit rough and on the nervous side. Tomorrow night it probably will go better. But the cumulative effect was highly satisfying, and Mr. Serkin, Mr. Woodworth and the orchestra all deserved their hearty reception. Incidentally, if memory is correct, Mr. Woodworth did not once take a bow without asking the orchestra to rise.

Mr. Piston's Second Symphony, commissioned by the Alice M. Ditson Fund of Columbia University and first played in Washington, D. C., last March, shows a new side of Piston. The three movements have traces of academicism and echoes of Hindemith and other composers. But they are full of melodic juice, and their agreeable idiom makes this the most easily assimilable of any of Piston's serious music. Work and composer were favorably received.

Alfred Einstein, the noted musicologist now at Smith College, may be credited with revival of the Haydn Symphony, one of five put together by him from parts reposing in the British Museum. It was composed at Eisenstadt about 1783, and it is a beautiful Symphony, mellifluous and vigorous, scored for seven winds and strings. Yesterday's performance, by a reduced orchestra, was the first at these concerts. We may all hope that the great Haydn resurrection now in progress will continue.—C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1944

MUSIC By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Programs Three Master Works for Final Brooklyn Concert

Final concerts must bring special inspiration to Serge Koussevitzky. Following a memorable evening of virtuoso performances in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, he came to the Academy of Music last night to make the last Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony equally memorable. The Brooklyn program, however, demanded a different kind of performance, for it listed three of the great masterpieces of symphonic literature. These called for deep-seated interpretation wherein effectiveness was quite a secondary matter.

But the Boston Symphony has not been called the first orchestra of the land in any hasty appraisal; it met its more challenging problems with the keenest kind of musicianship, creating under the baton of its inspired leader three superlative performances. Artistry was demanded and artistry resulted in some phenominal realization of detail. Because of the transparency of the playing, several slips were the more noticeable; but they were quickly submerged in the quality of the playing and the aural beauties of instrumental sounds.

The program opened with Mozart's E Flat Symphony, one of the last three which proclaim the peak of the composer's symphonic achievements. The elegant simplicity of the music was matched in the performance; so, for that matter, was the charm. Perhaps there could have been a bit more gaiety arising out of a slight increase in tempo; but this was a performance in the classic tradition and it carried the atmosphere of near-perfection along with it.

There followed one of Koussevitzky's special achievements: his performance of Debussy's "La Mer," wherein he enhances the impressionistic effect of the music by the refinement of his interpretation. He has conducted a more magnificent performance of this work, but this was one to treasure. As for the music, it grows more and more on the listener. There is nothing quite like it in all musical literature: a lonely masterpiece of its kind.

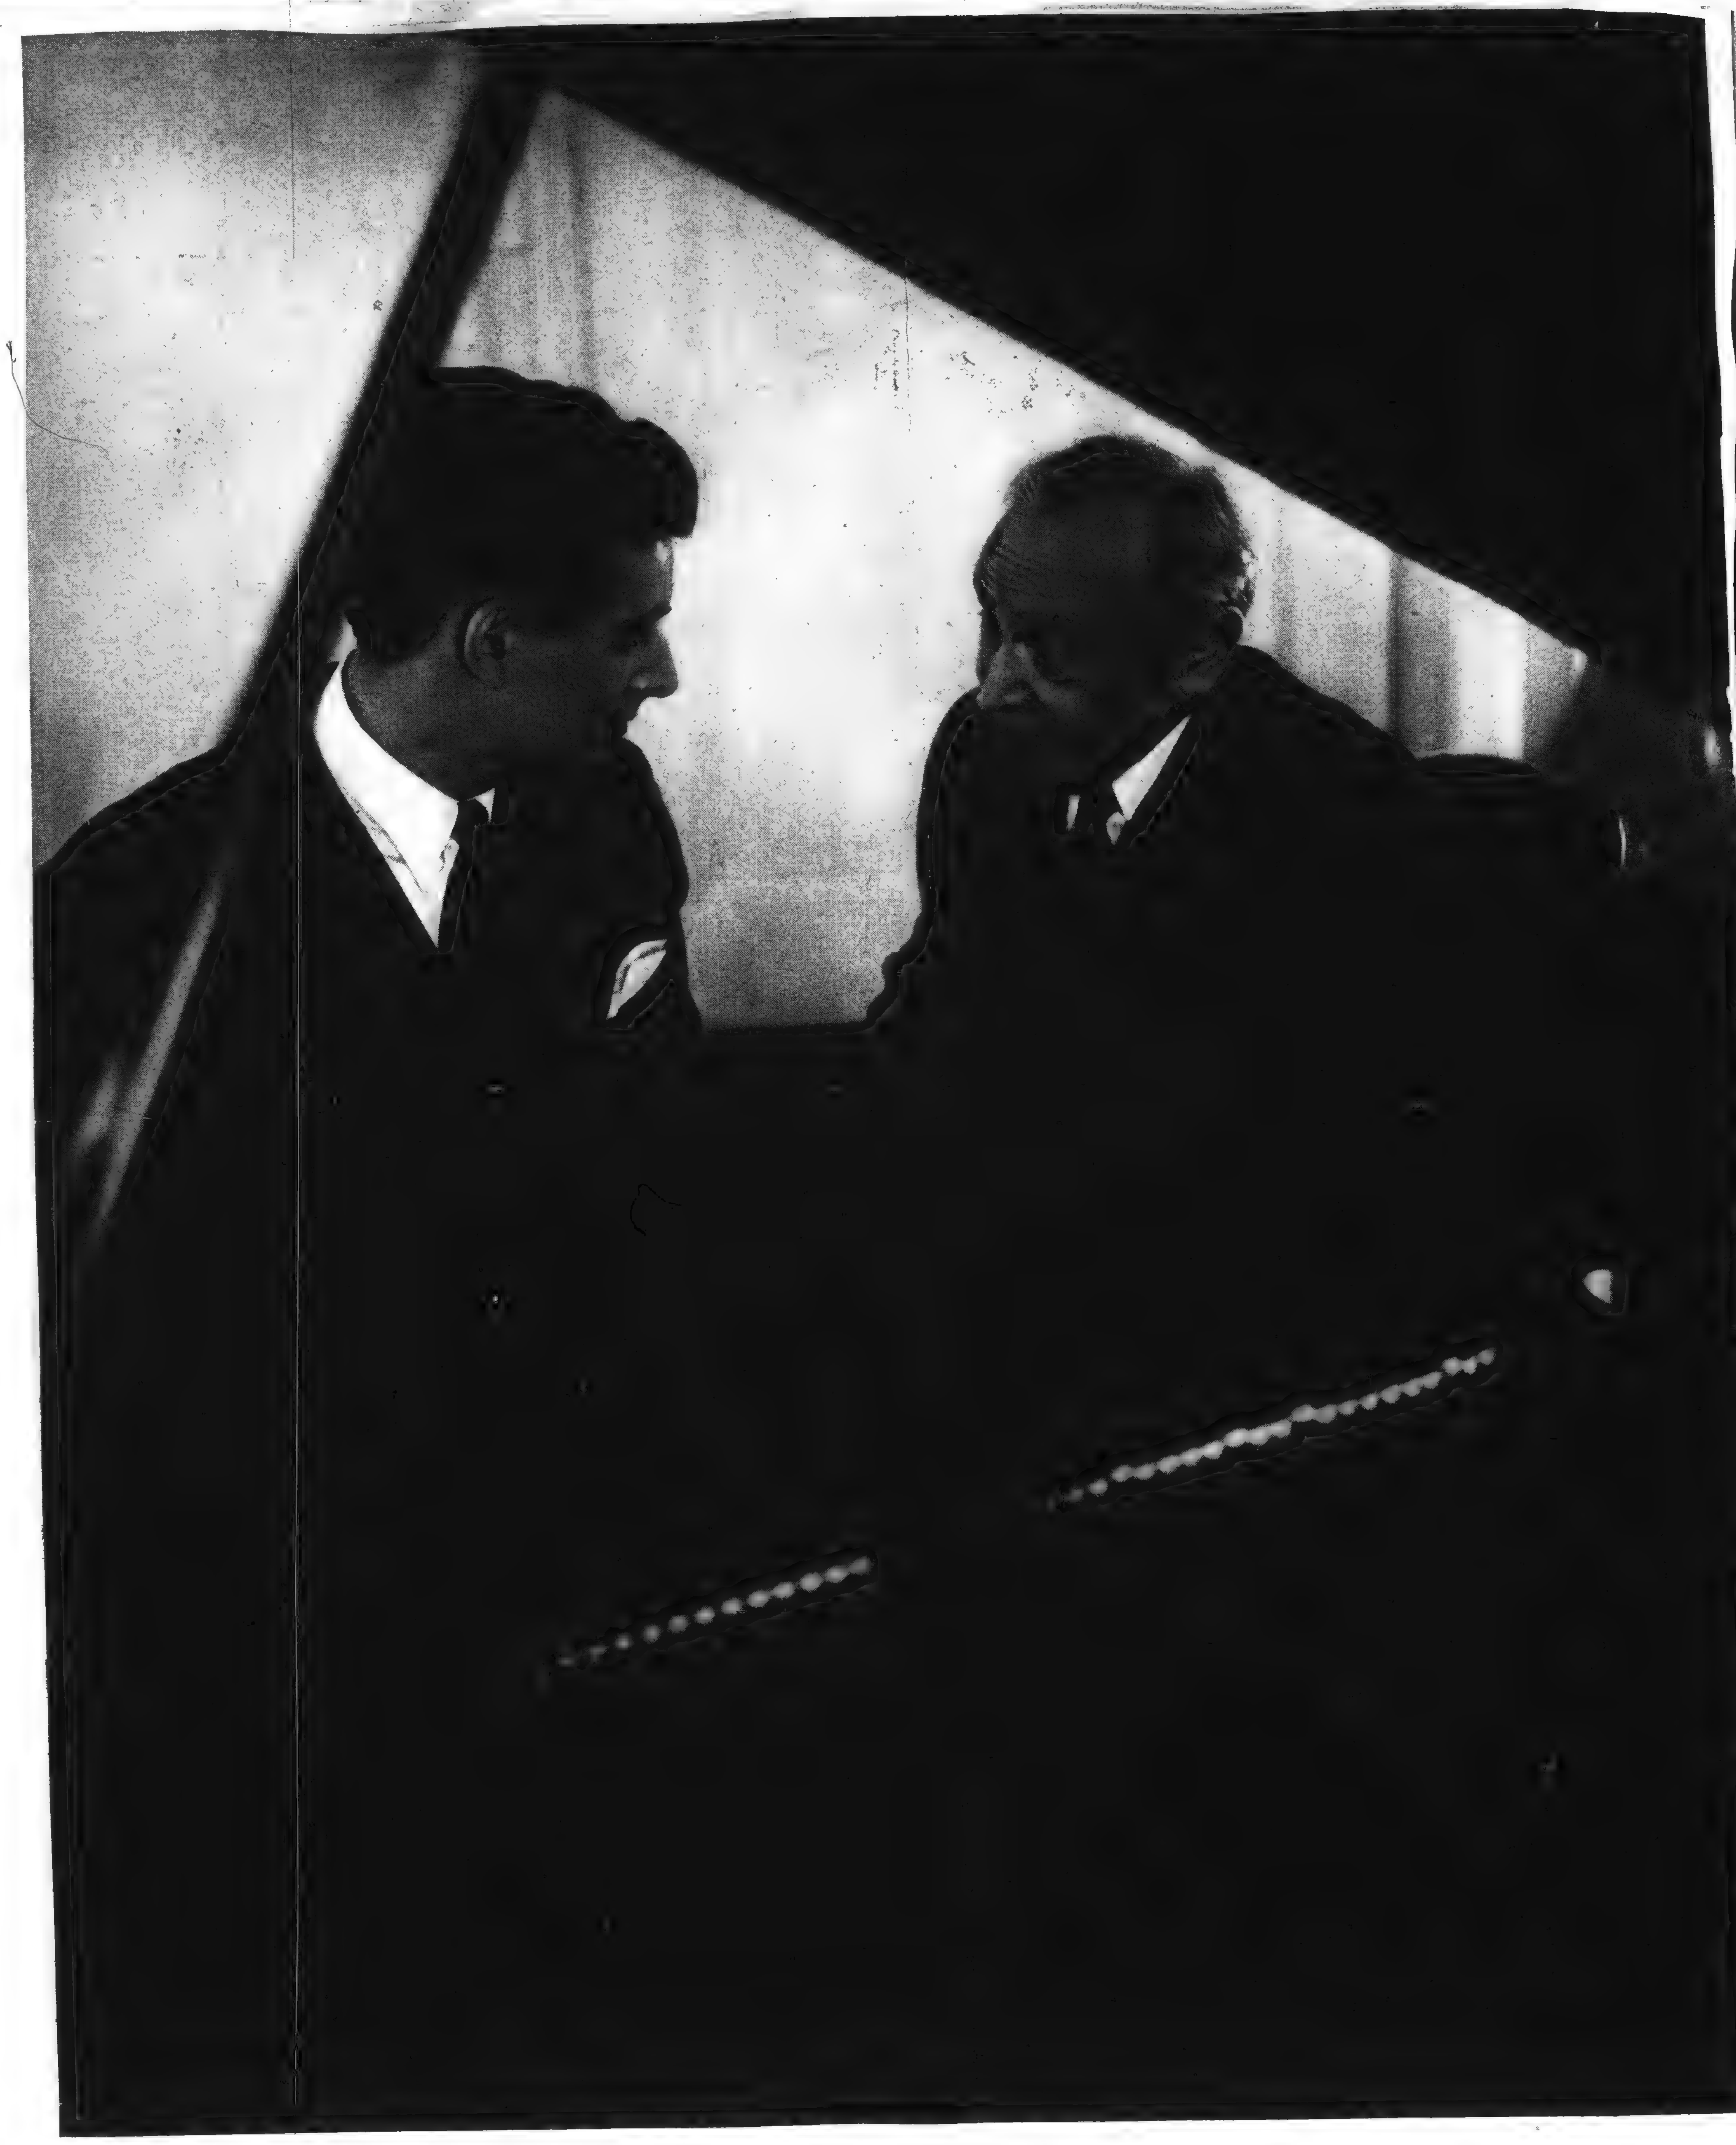
Brahms' Second Symphony brought the concert to a triumphant close. The performance sounded well, though the spirited finale tended to emphasize a certain lack of vitality in parts of the other movements. The first movement tended to lag without actually getting out of hand; but then there is a persistent deliberateness about Koussevitzky's tempos. This conductor's brand of magic, however, is always at his command. He sprinkled it freely on all the music of the program last night. There was little question that such great music so played carries some of the most transcendent power in the world.

Bri

APR 16 1944

RED ENVOY TO SIT BOSTON

BOSTON, April 15—(AP) Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, whe . he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth symphony.



Two Conductors: the young distinguished Bernstein; the great Koussevitzky

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the 21st program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn ..... Symphony No. 80 in D minor
Piston .... Symphony No. 2
Beethoven .... Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Op. 73 ("Emperor")

It is, when you think it over, remarkable that a man who has devoted his musical career to the training and conducting of choral groups (the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, in partcular), could step before 110 crack symphonic musicians and produce such well-disciplined and well-integrated music as G. Wallace Woodworth did yesterday. True, the finesse, the perfect schooling and the warm glow of a Dr. Koussevitzky were not there, but considering Mr. Woodworth's experience at so arduous and exacting a task, it must be considered a very impressive display of musicianship. It lent a concert, already interesting for its new music and its soloist, an additional pleasure.

This is not to say Mr. Woodworth is a green hand with an orchestra. He has done odd jobs of orchestral conducting for some years and, in fact, was conductor of the school orchestra at Tanglewood some seasons back. Thus he knows his business. More than that, he has a sound, steady style, sufficient authority to command attention and respect, and a good bit of flair into the bargain. He never did set the orchestra on edge, so to speak, but he did make good and lively music free of emotional distortion or capriciousness. The Haydn Symphony, delightfully unfamiliar, was especially well done.

Walter Piston's Second Symphony didn't appeal to me very much for reasons not quite clear to me at the moment. It was just good, neat, clean and tidy; not dry and not juicy. Here and there it seemed a little manufactured and, in the second theme of the first movement, what would be known outside the concert hall as "corny." It starts out very well indeed with a distinguished and beautiful strain. Then comes that pseudo-American tune, characteristic of all American composers laboring under the delusion that they must be American, and it is not until the end of the movement that the noble mood of the opening is restored. The second movement also begins beautifully, but its texture is so polyphonically sustained the ear demands more contrast in note values before it is over. The finale resumes the exploitaton of rythmic device and the search for new sonorities, and is suitably agitated. I should like to hear Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings again soon, but somehow or other the symphony finds me neither hot nor cold.

The concert came to a fine close with a good but not great performance by Rudolf Serkin and the orchestra under Mr. Woodworth of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. In sections it was most eloquently realized; in others it was not quite so satisfactory. The audience was cordially disposed toward conductor, soloist and, in the case of the new symphony, the composer, and all three were given warm receptions. Next week we shall have Roy Harris' new Sixth Symphony, a Concerto Grosso of Handel, and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

G. Wallace Woodworth conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Following the practice always observed during Holy Week, the Friday concert was advanced to Thursday. The evening concert will, as usual, be given tomorrow at 8:30, when Mr. Woodworth will repeat his program of the D minor Symphony, No. 80, by Haydn; Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the "Emperor" Piano Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

Although yesterday was the first time that Mr. Woodworth had conducted the full Boston Symphony at one of its regular concerts, the admired conductor of the Harvard Glee Club has had a long association with the orchestra. For many choral scores presented by the Boston Symphony he has prepared the Harvard and Radcliffe voices. He conducted one of the chamber concerts last Summer, when he gave the first local performance of this very Haydn Symphony. In short, he is as well known and liked in Symphony Hall as within the Harvard Yard.

He gave a very good account of himself yesterday. There were depth and style and feeling and poise in all his readings. The Haydn went nicely; to Mr. Piston's work, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Woodworth seemed to bring smoothness and eloquence. And the orchestra played well for him. Indeed, more than any other guest conductor I have heard this season, Mr. Woodworth made the orchestra sound indisputably like the Boston Symphony.

In Beethoven's great Concerto there were flaws of precision and of tempo between orchestra and soloist, and the performance as a whole, though brilliant and exciting, was a bit rough and on the nervous side. Tomorrow night it probably will go better. But the cumulative effect was highly satisfying, and Mr. Serkin, Mr. Woodworth and the orchestra all deserved their hearty reception. Incidentally, if memory is correct, Mr. Woodworth did not once take a bow without asking the orchestra to rise.

Mr. Piston's Second Symphony, commissioned by the Alice M. Ditson Fund of Columbia University and first played in Washington, D. C., last March, shows a new side of Piston. The three movements have traces of academicism and echoes of Hindemith and other composers. But they are full of melodic juice, and their agreeable idiom makes this the most easily assimilable of any of Piston's serious music. Work and composer were favorably received.

Alfred Einstein, the noted musicologist now at Smith College, may be credited with revival of the Haydn Symphony, one of five put together by him from parts reposing in the British Museum. It was composed at Eisenstadt about 1783, and it is a beautiful Symphony, mellifluous and vigorous, scored for seven winds and strings. Yesterday's performance, by a reduced orchestra, was the first at these concerts. We may all hope that the great Haydn resurrection now in progress will continue.—C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1944

MUSIC By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Programs Three Master Works for Final Brooklyn Concert

Final concerts must bring special inspiration to Serge Koussevitzky. Following a memorable evening of virtuoso performances in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, he came to the Academy of Music last night to make the last Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony equally memorable. The Brooklyn program, however, demanded a different kind of performance, for it listed three of the great masterpieces of symphonic literature. These called for deep-seated interpretation wherein effectiveness was quite a secondary matter.

But the Boston Symphony has not been called the first orchestra of the land in any hasty appraisal; it met its more challenging problems with the keenest kind of musicianship, creating under the baton of its inspired leader three superlative performances. Artistry was demanded and artistry resulted in some phenominal realization of detail. Because of the transparency of the playing, several slips were the more noticeable; but they were quickly submerged in the quality of the playing and the aural beauties of instrumental sounds.

The program opened with Mozart's E Flat Symphony, one of the last three which proclaim the peak of the composer's symphonic achievements. The elegant simplicity of the music was matched in the performance; so, for that matter, was the charm. Perhaps there could have been a bit more gaiety arising out of a slight increase in tempo; but this was a performance in the classic tradition and it carried the atmosphere of near-perfection along with it.

There followed one of Koussevitzky's special achievements: his performance of Debussy's "La Mer," wherein he enhances the impressionistic effect of the music by the refinement of his interpretation. He has conducted a more magnificent performance of this work, but this was one to treasure. As for the music, it grows more and more on the listener. There is nothing quite like it in all musical literature: a lonely masterpiece of its kind.

Brahms' Second Symphony brought the concert to a triumphant close. The performance sounded well, though the spirited finale tended to emphasize a certain lack of vitality in parts of the other movements. The first movement tended to lag without actually getting out of hand; but then there is a persistent deliberateness about Koussevitzky's tempos. This conductor's brand of magic, however, is always at his command. He sprinkled it freely on all the music of the program last night. There was little question that such great music so played carries some of the most transcendent power in the world.

APR

RED ENVOY TO SIT BOSTON

BOSTON, April 15—(AP) Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, whe he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth symphony.

Two Conductors: the young distinguished Bernstein; the great Koussevitzky

---

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, gave the 21st program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Haydn ..... Symphony No. 80 in D minor
Piston ..... Symphony No. 2
Beethoven ..... Concerto No. 5 in E flat, Op. 73 ("Emperor")

It is, when you think it over, remarkable that a man who has devoted his musical career to the training and conducting of choral groups (the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, in partcular), could step before 110 crack symphonic musicians and produce such well-disciplined and well - integrated music as G. Wallace Woodworth did yesterday. True, the finesse, the perfect schooling and the warm glow of a Dr. Koussevitzky were not there, but considering Mr. Woodworth's experience at so arduous and exacting a task, it must be considered a very impressive display of musicianship. It lent a concert, already interesting for its new music and its soloist, an additional pleasure.

This is not to say Mr. Woodworth is a green hand with an orchestra. He has done odd jobs of orchestral conducting for some years and, in fact, was conductor of the school orchestra at Tanglewood some seasons back. Thus he knows his business. More than that, he has a sound, steady style, sufficient authority to command attention and respect, and a good bit of flair into the bargain. He never did set the orchestra on edge, so to speak, but he did make good and lively music free of emotional distortion or capriciousness. The Haydn Symphony, delightfully unfamiliar, was especially well done.

Walter Piston's Second Symphony didn't appeal to me very much for reasons not quite clear to me at the moment. It was just good, neat, clean and tidy; not dry and not juicy. Here and there it seemed a little manufactured and, in the second theme of the first movement, what would be known outside the concert hall as "corny." It starts out very well indeed with a distinguished and beautiful strain. Then comes that pseudo-American tune, characteristic of all American composers laboring under the delusion that they must be American, and it is not until the end of the movement that the noble mood of the opening is restored. The second movement also begins beautifully, but its texture is so polyphonically sustained the ear demands more contrast in note values before it is over. The finale resumes the exploitaton of rythmic device and the search for new sonorities, and is suitably agitated. I should like to hear Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings again soon, but somehow or other the symphony finds me neither hot nor cold.

The concert came to a fine close with a good but not great performance by Rudolf Serkin and the orchestra under Mr. Woodworth of Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto. In sections it was most eloquently realized; in others it was not quite so satisfactory. The audience was cordially disposed toward conductor, soloist and, in the case of the new symphony, the composer, and all three were given warm receptions. Next week we shall have Roy Harris' new Sixth Symphony, a Concerto Grosso of Handel, and Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

G. Wallace Woodworth conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Following the practice always observed during Holy Week, the Friday concert was advanced to Thursday. The evening concert will, as usual, be given tomorrow at 8:30, when Mr. Woodworth will repeat his program of the D minor Symphony, No. 80, by Haydn; Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the "Emperor" Piano Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as soloist.

Although yesterday was the first time that Mr. Woodworth had conducted the full Boston Symphony at one of its regular concerts, the admired conductor of the Harvard Glee Club has had a long association with the orchestra. For many choral scores presented by the Boston Symphony he has prepared the Harvard and Radcliffe voices. He conducted one of the chamber concerts last Summer, when he gave the first local performance of this very Haydn Symphony. In short, he is as well known and liked in Symphony Hall as within the Harvard Yard.

He gave a very good account of himself yesterday. There were depth and style and feeling and poise in all his readings. The Haydn went nicely; to Mr. Piston's work, heard in Boston for the first time, Mr. Woodworth seemed to bring smoothness and eloquence. And the orchestra played well for him. Indeed, more than any other guest conductor I have heard this season, Mr. Woodworth made the orchestra sound indisputably like the Boston Symphony.

In Beethoven's great Concerto there were flaws of precision and of tempo between orchestra and soloist, and the performance as a whole, though brilliant and exciting, was a bit rough and on the nervous side. Tomorrow night it probably will go better. But the cumulative effect was highly satisfying, and Mr. Serkin, Mr. Woodworth and the orchestra all deserved their hearty reception. Incidentally, if memory is correct, Mr. Woodworth did not once take a bow without asking the orchestra to rise.

Mr. Piston's Second Symphony, commissioned by the Alice M. Ditson Fund of Columbia University and first played in Washington, D. C., last March, shows a new side of Piston. The three movements have traces of academicism and echoes of Hindemith and other composers. But they are full of melodic juice, and their agreeable idiom makes this the most easily assimilable of any of Piston's serious music. Work and composer were favorably received.

Alfred Einstein, the noted musicologist now at Smith College, may be credited with revival of the Haydn Symphony, one of five put together by him from parts reposing in the British Museum. It was composed at Eisenstadt about 1783, and it is a beautiful Symphony, mellifluous and vigorous, scored for seven winds and strings. Yesterday's performance, by a reduced orchestra, was the first at these concerts. We may all hope that the great Haydn resurrection now in progress will continue.—C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1944

MUSIC By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Programs Three Master Works for Final Brooklyn Concert

Final concerts must bring special inspiration to Serge Koussevitzky. Following a memorable evening of virtuoso performances in Carnegie Hall on Thursday, he came to the Academy of Music last night to make the last Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony equally memorable. The Brooklyn program, however, demanded a different kind of performance, for it listed three of the great masterpieces of symphonic literature. These called for deep-seated interpretation wherein effectiveness was quite a secondary matter.

But the Boston Symphony has not been called the first orchestra of the land in any hasty appraisal; it met its more challenging problems with the keenest kind of musicianship, creating under the baton of its inspired leader three superlative performances. Artistry was demanded and artistry resulted in some phenominal realization of detail. Because of the transparency of the playing, several slips were the more noticeable; but they were quickly submerged in the quality of the playing and the aural beauties of instrumental sounds.

The program opened with Mozart's E Flat Symphony, one of the last three which proclaim the peak of the composer's symphonic achievements. The elegant simplicity of the music was matched in the performance; so, for that matter, was the charm. Perhaps there could have been a bit more gaiety arising out of a slight increase in tempo; but this was a performance in the classic tradition and it carried the atmosphere of near-perfection along with it.

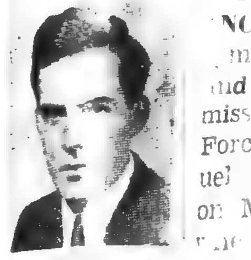
There followed one of Koussevitzky's special achievements: his performance of Debussy's "La Mer," wherein he enhances the impressionistic effect of the music by the refinement of his interpretation. He has conducted a more magnificent performance of this work, but this was one to treasure. As for the music, it grows more and more on the listener. There is nothing quite like it in all musical literature: a lonely masterpiece of its kind.

Brahms' Second Symphony brought the concert to a triumphant close. The performance sounded well, though the spirited finale tended to emphasize a certain lack of vitality in parts of the other movements. The first movement tended to lag without actually getting out of hand; but then there is a persistent deliberateness about Koussevitzky's tempos. This conductor's brand of magic, however is always at his command. He sprinkled it freely on all the music of the program last night. There was little question that such great music so played carries some of the most transcendent power in the world.

RED ENVOY TO VISIT BOSTON

BOSTON, April 15 (AP) Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, when he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth symphony.

ETUDE
PHILA., PA
APRIL, 1944



SAMUEL BARBER

THE FIRST PERFORMANCE of a full-length symphony, composed for and dedicated with permission to the Army Air Forces by Corporal Samuel Barber, took place on March 3 in Boston, when the work was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky. The "Symphony [illegible] the Army Air Forces." [illegible] September at Fort Worth [illegible] Field, Texas, where Corporal B[illegible] pilots in many flight [illegible] work in this form. [illegible] "Symphony" have been written [illegible] the distinction of [illegible] American works produced t[illegible] Salzburg, w[illegible] it was con[illegible] Artur Rodzinski. The new [illegible] movements and makes [illegible] wind movement of an elec[illegible] instrument especially constructed [illegible] Bell Telephone laboratory to [illegible] the sound of the radio beam [illegible] flight or [illegible] flying.

Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony Has Its First Performance

By L. A. Sloper

The event of the antepenultimate Friday afternoon concert of the symphony season, given yesterday in Symphony Hall, was the first performance of Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony. This work is already known as the "Gettysburg" Symphony, since the composer has said that it is based upon Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

The spectacle of a world at war has naturally engaged the attention of composers. Artists have always been interested in the efforts of peoples to solve their problems by killing one another. Beethoven wrote a "Battle" Symphony, Tchaikovsky the "1812" Overture, neither of which stands in the first rank of musical compositions.

Usually artistic remark on world catastrophe awaits the conclusion of the struggle. During this war there has been a good deal of musical comment already. Most of it, not surprisingly, has come from Britain, Russia, and the United States. Of the musical historians, Shostakovitch and Harris have held most attention.

Both of them have written symphonies to commemorate the heroic deeds of the Soviet armies: Shostakovitch's Seventh and Harris' Fifth. Now Shostakovitch has written an Eighth Symphony to forecast victory, and Harris a Sixth, dedicated to the Armed Forces of the United States. There seems to be a friendly antiphonal competition between the two men.

A year ago another American musician, Aaron Copland, composed a "Lincoln Portrait," built around words of the statesman himself, spoken in the third section of the work by a Narrator. In commenting on this work I wrote: "Of course the composer was wise in making no attempt to compete with or elaborate upon the words of the Emancipator."

Mr. Harris has been bolder, and perhaps less wise. The Gettysburg Address has long been accepted as one of the masterpieces of oratory. To attempt to say it over again in music is like Massine trying to tell us by means of choregraphy what Brahms meant to say in the Fourth Symphony. It is an undertaking not likely to succeed.

Nevertheless, Harris, like Massine, has tried, and unquestionably his attempt is earnest and sincere. Naturally, also, in view of his technical accomplishments, the piece commands respect as a composition. If the author does not achieve all he hoped, probably another composer could have done no better, if as well.

The four movements of the symphony bear the titles, "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation," and each has been inspired by particular phrases of the Address. The composer has relied extensively upon the use of pedal point, repetition of themes, and crescendo. For most of the way the work is built on long lyrical lines, but in the Scherzo ("Conflict") he glances not only at Shostakovitch but at Tchaikovsky, and in the Finale ("Affirmation") he employs the fugal form. Yet the work as a whole is wanting in contrast and does not escape montony.

The performance, under Dr. Koussevitzky's devoted guidance, was brilliant, and did, one feels sure, all that possibly could be done for the symphony.

The concert opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, op. 3, no. 6, in G minor, and closed with Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

Soviet Ambassador in Hub to Hear Symphony

FIRST VISIT OF SOVIET AMBASSADOR
Andrei Gromyko and Mrs. Gromyko came to Boston for the first time to hear the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony last night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's rendition of the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony lured the Soviet ambassador and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Andrei Gromyko, from the busy embassy in Washington to Boston last night. The ambassador, who replaced Maxim Litvinoff, had never been in the Cradle of Liberty and said he hoped to take a ride through historic Boston before his departure today.

Mr. Gromyko, the youngest diplomat of his rank in Washington, said that he could not comment on American lend-lease other than to say that "Russia was receiving it and needed lots of it." He refused to make any predictions as to the war's duration.

Following the concert the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reception in honor of the ambassador and his wife. Accompanying the ambassador was the first secretary of the Soviety embassy and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bazuikin.

VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.

APR 1 - 1944

BERNSTEIN AND KOUSSEVITZKY

e. pho[illegible]raphed especially for Vogue, are two of most-[illegible]ked-about conductors in this country. enty-y[illegible]old Serge Koussevitzky, who for twenty rs has [illegible] the great Boston Symphony Orch into exquisite sonority; and twenty-five-year-ol onard Bernstein who, in this one season, came o his own. The peak of his dramatic year was th nducting rece[illegible] of his own Jeremiah symph[illegible] h the Boston. ([illegible]n this photograph was taken, . Bernstein was explaining to Mr. Koussevitzky okowski's interpretation of the Sunday befor . Koussevitzky's blue eyes bulged.)

Mr. Bernstein, who has been the assistant co ctor of the New York Philharmonic this year a ll be a guest conductor next, made his début last vember without rehearsal. He substituted at a few urs' notice for Bruno Walter. The next day, the tics flung into the pot every elaborate musical ad- tive of adulation. But The Daily News explaine imply, likening the opportunity to "a shoestring ch in centre field. Make it, and you're a hero. ff it, and you're a dope. He made it."

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

APR 5 - 1944

'Woody' Conducts Boston Symphony

Boston, April 5—(AP)—A choral leader who could not sing well enough to make the Harvard Glee club will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday afternoon. He is G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society for the past 10 years and a pianist.

"Woody," as he is known to hundreds of past and present students, tried out for the Glee club when a freshman at Harvard in 1920.

Dr. Archibald T. Davison, the conductor, listened for a few minutes and then told him quite frankly: "You simply can't sing, my dear boy."

The evening of the day he was rejected as a singer "Woody" won acceptance as piano accompanist for the Glee club. He toured Europe with the organization and later was appointed temporary conductor. He became permanent conductor in 1934 when Dr. Davison retired.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 2 - 1944

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert in Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its fifth matinee concert of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program consisted of the Haydn Symphony in G Major, (No. 88), Debussy's three symphonic sketches, known as "La Mer," and the Brahms First Symphony in C Minor.

The juxtaposition of the modest Haydn Symphony to the luxurious display of French impressionism made an amusing contrast of two ways in which the symphonic ensemble can be impressive in sound. The Debussy work remains a fine period piece, albeit perhaps somewhat arbitrarily named. The performance was scintillating and vibrant, stressing the rich variety of contrasting timbres. Particularly the last movement, with its snatches of Wagnerian harmony and its Franckian theme, brought to mind Cocteau's remark of two decades ago in which he alluded to the similarity between Wagner's fog and Debussy's mist. It is difficult not to feel that the work's true raison d'etre is the (for its time) novel orchestration, yet even though now hundreds of people can and do score in the same fashion, especially in commercial music, there still is a vast difference between the original, and its subsequent emulators, from Ravel to Morton Gould.

Dr. Koussevitzky extracted much charm from the Haydn piece, with special emphasis on phrasing and rhythm in the minuet. The Brahms First was constructed in full view of the spectator, with all its formal dignity and harmonic directness, the opening and closing movements receiving treatment which gave the music the highest eloquence. In general the string section seemed just the least bit under the weather, compared to the superb sounds it usually makes.

P. B.

THEATRE

BOSTON ORCHESTRA BRINGS 63d SEASON TO CLOSE HERE

TWENTIETH YEAR AS LEADER FOR DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

WITH the performance of Bach's B minor Mass this afternoon and evening, the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends its 63d season and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky his 20th. In other words, the Russian conductor has been at his post for nearly a third of the orchestra's history. This has been the normal state of affairs in Chicago, which had had but two conductors for its orchestra up to the beginning of the present season, Theodore Thomas and the late Frederick Stock, but it is something new in Boston. Eight leaders preceded Dr. Koussevitzky and two of them, Gericke and Muck, had two terms.

Such complete identification of a great orchestra and a distinguished director can serve to heighten the prestige of both, and that is exactly what has happened in the present instance. The Boston Symphony was the foremost orchestra in this country long before Dr. Koussevitzky came to us, though it lost that position temporarily as a result of the first World war and the ill-advised strike, which, together, made it necessary for, first, Mr. Monteux and then Dr. Koussevitzky to build it up anew. The latter has done his part of the job with a thoroughness that even the warmest of his admirers would not have anticipated.

But there is another side to the question, namely, that with one conductor in charge over so long a period the repertory is bound to reflect a single outlook, the performances a single personality. The first difficulty was long resolved in Dr. Koussevitzky's case by the truly amazing range of his programmes. Of late years, however, he has viewed his responsibilities in a rather different light. Remaining faithful to his novelties, now largely American, he has come to rely more and more upon the most familiar classics for the rest. Aside from the semi-occasional revivals, we have experienced a freshening of the basic repertory largely through the efforts of the guest conductors—more power to them—and of Associate Conductor Richard Burgin. Occasioally, too, one of these visitors has given us a new and welcome angle on some standard work; for example, Vladimir Golschmann's "Eroica" last January and George Szell's version of the Schubert C major in the season before. Additional instance might easily be cited.

Programme-making is a complicated business, and the best laid plans may often go awry. Last fall Dr. Koussevitzky announced his intention of reviving Schubert's Sixth Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Third and Dvorak's Fourth and of introducing to us the Third of Rachmaninoff. If none of these was forthcoming we did get Schumann's Third and Mendelssohn's "Scotch," both of which had been absent for several years; along with Mahler's "Song of the Earth," the conducting of which unexpectedly fell to Mr. Burgin. Another needed revival, that of Bruckner's Eighth, was projected but fell through because of the drafting of a horn player. This mighty score demands eight, four of whom must play the "Bayreuth" tubas. We have not had a Bruckner symphony now in a shockingly long time.

NATIVE COMPOSERS' YEAR

This was truly the native composers' year. No less than eight new American symphonies were heard, if we may place Russian-born Nicolai Berezowsky's Fourth in this category, most of them for the first time anywhere. This particular work was conducted by its composer, as were Hanson's Fourth, Gardner Read's Second and Bernstein's First, titled "Jeremiah." A. Wallace Woodworth gave us the Second of Piston and Dr. Koussevitzky the Fifth of Schuman (for strings), the Sixth of Harris and Barber's Second. Those of Bernstein and Barber were far and away the best.

Superior to Mr. Piston's surprisingly conventional effort was his sterling Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings. Paul Creston, whose name like that of Leonard Bernstein, was new to the Symphony programmes, was represented by an innocuous "Pastorale and Tarantelle," which Mr. Golschmann conducted at a Monday-Tuesday pair, and the agreeably panoramic "Frontiers," which we owed to Andre Kostelanetz. Another and shorter "Western" was Lukas Foss' "The Prairie," and its young composer was also a newcomer. Of little moment were Barber's "Commando March" and Bennett's symphonic synthesis of "Porgy and Bess." Most of us like our "Porgy" straight. It is perhaps significant that the only American piece that was not a novelty was Copland's "El Salon Mexico," given a revealing performance by Mr. Bernstein, who is gifted both as conductor and composer.

NON-AMERICAN WORKS

Of the non-American new pieces the most imposing were Shostakovich's uneven Eighth Symphony, the most satisfying in their very different ways were Kabalevsky's brilliant Overture to his opera, "Colas Breugnon," disclosed to us by Mr. Kostelanetz, and Stravinsky's Ode in memory of Mme. Koussevitzky. In a concert of his own music Mr. Stravinsky brought us his not-too-convincing "Norwegian Moods" and his amusing "Circus Polka," soon to find its way to the Pops. His curious harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner" stirred up a typical teapot tempest.

* * * *

Arthur Fiedler begins his 15th season as Pops conductor on Tuesday evening.

BELMONT, MASS
CITIZEN
4/7/44

Local Artists Exhibit Work In Symphony Hall

An exhibit of paintings by a group of Belmont Hill artists, took place at Symphony Hall, Boston, Thursday of this week, and will be continued through April 15. The exhibiting artists are:

Nelson Chase, Kathryn Nason (Mrs. Walter Piston), Grace D. Reasoner, C. Scott White, John Sharman and Karl Zerbe.

This exhibit is in connection with the regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played a new symphony composed by Walter Piston of Belmont Hill. This is the second symphony which the Alice H. Diston Fund of Columbia University commissioned to be written. It was first played by Hans Kindler of the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., March 4 of this year.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 8 - 1944

Symphony Program Honors Rachmaninoff

Serge Koussevitzky, who is completing his 20th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct his orchestra at the closing concert of the Providence season in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky will honor the memory of his friend and colleague Sergei Rachmaninoff, who died a year ago March 28 by conducting Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony in E minor. The second part of the program will consist of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe."

MUSIC
By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.
phony Concert

Boston Symphony orchestra, G.
Woodworth conducting, gave the ogram of its 63d season in Sym-Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf pianist, was the soloist. The n was as follows:
y.....Symphony No. 80 in D minor en .... Symphony No. 2 s in E flat, Op. 73 ("Emperor") Concerto
, when you think it over, reble that a man who has de-his musical career to the g and conducting of choral
(the Harvard and Radcliffe in partcular), could step be-10 crack symphonic musicians roduce such well-disciplined ell - integrated music as G. e Woodworth did yesterday.
he finesse, the perfect school-nd the warm glow of a Dr.
evitzky were not there, but ering Mr. Woodworth's ex-ce at so arduous and exacting
, it must be considered a very sive display of musicianship.
a concert, already interesting new music and its soloist, an nal pleasure.
is not to say Mr. Woodworth reen hand with an orchestra.
s done odd jobs of orchestral cting for some years and, in vas conductor of the school tra at Tanglewood some sea-
ack. Thus he knows his busi-
More than that, he has a steady style, sufficient auto command attention and
, and a good bit of flair into rgain. He never did set the tra on edge, so to speak, but make good and lively music emotional distortion or casness. The Haydn Symdelightfully unfamiliar, was lly well done.
er Piston's Second Symphony appeal to me very much for s not quite clear to me at ment. It was just good, neat, and tidy; not dry and not Here and there it seemed a anufactured and, in the seceme of the first movement, ould be known outside the hall as "corny." It starts y well indeed with a distinand beautiful strain. Then that pseudo-American tune, teristic of all American com-laboring under the delusion ey must be American, and t until the end of the move-hat the noble mood of the is restored. The second ent also begins beautifully, texture is so polyphonically ed the ear demands more t in note values before it is The finale resumes the ex-n of rythmic device and the for new sonorities, and is agitated. I should like to r. Piston's Prelude and Alle-organ and strings again ut somehow or other the ny finds me neither hot nor concert came to a fine close good but not great perform-Rudolf Serkin and the or-under Mr. Woodworth of ven's "Emperor" concerto. In it was most eloquently

; in others it was not quite factory. The audience was disposed toward conduc-oist and, in the case of the mphony, the composer, and e were given warm recep-Next week we shall have Roy new Sixth Symphony, a o Grosso of Handel, and sohn's "Scottish" Sym-

1944

SIT BOSTON

(AP) Andrei nbassador to vill make his ext Saturday, l guest of the rchestra at a Shostakovitch piece of its ymphony triumphant ce sounded rited finale certain lack the other movement ctually get-hen there is ness about This con-however, is

He sprin-
e music of
There was great music of the most e world.

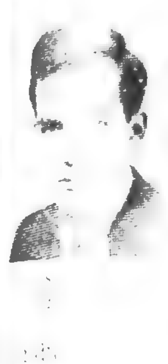
ETUDE
PHILA., PA
APRIL, 1944



Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony Has Its First Performance

By L. A. Sloper

The event of the antepenultimate Friday afternoon concert of the symphony season, given yesterday in Symphony Hall, was the first performance of Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony. This work is already known as the "Gettysburg" Symphony, since the composer has said that it is based upon Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

The spectacle of a world at war has naturally engaged the attention of composers. Artists have always been interested in the efforts of peoples to solve their problems by killing one another. Beethoven wrote a "Battle" Symphony, Tchaikovsky the "1812" Overture, neither of which stands in the first rank of musical compositions.

Usually artistic remark on world catastrophe awaits the conclusion of the struggle. During this war there has been a good deal of musical comment already. Most of it, not surprisingly, has come from Britain, Russia, and the United States. Of the musical historians, Shostakovitch and Harris have held most attention.

Both of them have written symphonies to commemorate the heroic deeds of the Soviet armies: Shostakovitch's Seventh and Harris' Fifth. Now Shostakovitch has written an Eighth Symphony to forecast victory, and Harris a Sixth, dedicated to the Armed Forces of the United States. There seems to be a friendly antiphonal competition between the two men.

A year ago another American musician, Aaron Copland, composed a "Lincoln Portrait," built around words of the statesman himself, spoken in the third section of the work by a Narrator. In commenting on this work I wrote: "Of course the composer was wise in making no attempt to compete with or elaborate upon the words of the Emancipator."

Mr. Harris has been bolder, and perhaps less wise. The Gettysburg Address has long been accepted as one of the masterpieces of oratory. To attempt to say it over again in music is like Massine trying to tell us by means of choregraphy what Brahms meant to say in the Fourth Symphony. It is an undertaking not likely to succeed.

Nevertheless, Harris, like Massine, has tried, and unquestionably his attempt is earnest and sincere. Naturally, also, in view of his technical accomplishments, the piece commands respect as a composition. If the author does not achieve all he hoped, probably another composer could have done no better, if as well.

The four movements of the symphony bear the titles, "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation," and each has been inspired by particular phrases of the Address. The composer has relied extensively upon the use of pedal point, repetition of themes, and crescendo. For most of the way the work is built on long lyrical lines, but in the Scherzo ("Conflict") he glances not only at Shostakovitch but at Tchaikovsky, and in the Finale ("Affirmation") he employs the fugal form. Yet the work as a whole is wanting in contrast and does not escape montony.

The performance, under Dr. Koussevitzky's devoted guidance was brilliant, and did, one feels sure, all that possibly could be done for the symphony.

The concert opened with Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, op. 3, no. 6, in G minor, and closed with Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Soviet Ambassador in Hub to Hear Symphony

FIRST VISIT OF SOVIET AMBASSADOR

Andrei Gromyko and Mrs. Gromyko came to Boston for the first time to hear the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony last night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's rendition of the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony lured the Soviet ambassador and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Andrei Gromyko, from the busy embassy in Washington to Boston last night. [illegible] vinoff, had never been in the Cradle of [illegible] Boston before his [illegible] diplomat [illegible] said that he could not comment on American lend-lease other than to say that "Russia was receiving it and needed lots of it." He refused to make any predictions as to the war's duration.

Following the concert the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a reception in honor of the ambassador and his wife. Accompanying the ambassador was the first secretary of the Soviety embassy and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Vladimir Bazikin.

VOGUE
GREENWICH, CONN.

APR 1 - 1944

RNSTEIN AND KOUSSEVITZKY

[illegible] especially for Vogue, [illegible] conductors in this [illegible] George Koussevitzky, who for [illegible] great Boston Symphony Orch [illegible] ority: and twenty- [illegible] year-ol [illegible] who, in this one sea- [illegible] of his dramatic year [illegible] his own Jeremiah symph [illegible] this photograph was tak [illegible] ining to Mr. Koussevitzk [illegible] n of the Sunday befor [illegible] eyes bulged.

M [illegible] n, who has been the assistant [illegible] York Philharmonic this year [illegible] nductor next, made his début [illegible] rehearsal. He substituted at a [illegible] Bruno Walter. The next day, the [illegible] put every elaborate musical a [illegible] n. But The Daily News explaine [illegible] the opportunity to "a shoestrin [illegible] centre field. Make it, and you're a hero [illegible] you're a dope. He made it."

APR 2 - 1944

Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert in Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its fifth mátinee concert of the season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The program consisted of the Haydn Symphony in G Major, (No. 88), Debussy's three symphonic sketches, known as "La Mer," and the Brahms First Symphony in C Minor.

The juxtaposition of the modest Haydn Symphony to the luxurious splay of French impressionism made an amusing contrast of two ways in which the symphonic ensemble can be impressive in sound. The Debussy work remains a fine period piece, albeit perhaps somewhat arbitrarily named. The performance was scintillating and vibrant, stressing the rich variety of contrasting timbres. Particularly the last movement, with its snatches of Wagnerian harmony and its Franckian theme, brought to mind Cocteau's remark of two decades ago in which he alluded to the similarity between Wagner's fog and Debussy's mist. It is difficult not to feel that the work's true raison d'etre is the (for its time) novel orchestration, yet even though now hundreds of people can and do score in the same fashion, especially in commercial music, there still is a vast difference between the original, and its subsequent emulators, from Ravel to Morton Gould.

Dr. Koussevitzky extracted much charm from the Haydn piece, with special emphasis on phrasing and rhythm in the minuet. The Brahms First was constructed in full view of the spectator, with all its formal dignity and harmonic directness, the opening and closing movements receiving treatment which gave the music the highest eloquence. In general the string section seemed just the least bit under the weather, compared to the superb sounds it usually makes.

P. B.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

APR 5 - 1944

'Woody' Conducts Boston Symphony

Boston, April 5—(AP)—A choral leader who could not sing well enough to make the Harvard Glee club will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday afternoon. He is G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society for the past 10 years and a pianist.

"Woody," as he is known to hundreds of past and present students, tried out for the Glee club when a freshman at Harvard in 1920.

Dr. Archibald T. Davison, the conductor, listened for a few minutes and then told him quite frankly: "You simply can't sing, my dear boy."

The evening of the day he was rejected as a singer "Woody" won acceptance as piano accompanist for the Glee club. He toured Europe with the organization and later was appointed temporary conductor. He became permanent conductor in 1934 when Dr. Davison retired.

THEATRE

BOSTON ORCHESTRA BRINGS 63d SEASON TO CLOSE HERE

TWENTIETH YEAR AS LEADER FOR DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

WITH the performance of Bach's B minor Mass this afternoon and evening, the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe assisting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra ends its 63d season and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky his 20th. In other words, the Russian conductor has been at his post for nearly a third of the orchestra's history. This has been the normal state of affairs in Chicago, which had had but two conductors for its orchestra up to the beginning of the present season, Theodore Thomas and the late Frederick Stock, but it is something new in Boston. Eight leaders preceded Dr. Koussevitzky and two of them, Gericke and Muck, had two terms.

Such complete identification of a great orchestra and a distinguished director can serve to heighten the prestige of both, and that is exactly what has happened in the present instance. The Boston Symphony was the foremost orchestra in this country long before Dr. Koussevitzky came to us, though it lost that position temporarily as a result of the first World war and the ill-advised strike, which, together, made it necessary for, first, Mr. Monteux and then Dr. Koussevitzky to build it up anew. The latter has done his part of the job with a thoroughness that even the warmest of his admirers would not have anticipated.

But there is another side to the question, namely, that with one conductor in charge over so long a period the repertory is bound to reflect a single outlook, the performances a single personality. The first difficulty was long resolved in Dr. Koussevitzky's case by the truly amazing range of his programmes. Of late years, however, he has viewed his responsibilities in a rather different light. Remaining faithful to his novelties, now largely American, he has come to rely more and more upon the most familiar classics for the rest. Aside from the semi-occasional revivals, we have experienced a freshening of the basic repertory largely through the efforts of the guest conductors—more power to them—and of Associate Conductor Richard Burgin. Occasioally, too, one of these visitors has given us a new and welcome angle on some standard work; for example, Vladimir Golschmann's "Eroica" last January and George Szell's version of the Schubert C major in the season before. Additional instance might easily be cited.

Programme-making is a complicated business, and the best laid plans may often go awry. Last fall Dr. Koussevitzky announced his intention of reviving Schubert's Sixth Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Third and Dvorak's Fourth and of introducing to us the Third of Rachmaninoff. If none of these was forthcoming we did get Schumann's Third and Mendelssohn's "Scotch," both of which had been absent for several years; along with Mahler's "Song of the Earth," the conducting of which unexpectedly fell to Mr. Burgin. Another needed revival, that of Bruckner's Eighth, was projected but fell through because of the drafting of a horn player. This mighty score demands eight, four of whom must play the "Bayreuth" tubas. We have not had a Bruckner symphony now in a shockingly long time.

NATIVE COMPOSERS' YEAR

This was truly the native composers' year. No less than eight new American symphonies were heard, if we may place Russian-born Nicolai Berezowsky's Fourth in this category, most of them for the first time anywhere. This particular work was conducted by its composer, as were Hanson's Fourth, Gardner Read's Second and Bernstein's First, titled "Jeremiah." A. Wallace Woodworth gave us the Second of Piston and Dr. Koussevitzky the Fifth of Schuman (for strings), the Sixth of Harris and Barber's Second. Those of Bernstein and Barber were far and away the best.

Superior to Mr. Piston's surprisingly conventional effort was his sterling Prelude and Allegro for organ and strings. Paul Creston, whose name like that of Leonard Bernstein, was new to the Symphony programmes, was represented by an innocuous "Pastorale and Tarantelle," which Mr. Golschmann conducted at a Monday-Tuesday pair, and the agreeably panoramic "Frontiers," which we owed to Andre Kostelanetz. Another and shorter "Western" was Lukas Foss' "The Prairie," and its young composer was also a newcomer. Of little moment were Barber's "Commando March" and Bennett's symphonic synthesis of "Porgy and Bess." Most of us like our "Porgy" straight. It is perhaps significant that the only American piece that was not a novelty was Copland's "El Salon Mexico," given a revealing performance by Mr. Bernstein, who is gifted both as conductor and composer.

NON-AMERICAN WORKS

Of the non-American new pieces the most imposing were Shostakovich's uneven Eighth Symphony, the most satisfying in their very different ways were Kabalevsky's brilliant Overture to his opera, "Colas Breugnon," disclosed to us by Mr. Kostelanetz, and Stravinsky's Ode in memory of Mme. Koussevitzky. In a concert of his own music Mr. Stravinsky brought us his not-too-convincing "Norwegian Moods" and his amusing "Circus Polka," soon to find its way to the Pops. His curious harmonization of "The Star-Spangled Banner" stirred up a typical teapot tempest.

* * * *

Arthur Fiedler begins his 15th season as Pops conductor on Tuesday evening.

BELMONT, MASS
CITIZEN
4/7/44

Local Artists Exhibit Work In Symphony Hall

An exhibit of paintings by a group of Belmont Hill artists, took place at Symphony Hall, Boston, Thursday of this week, and will be continued through April 15. The exhibiting artists are:

Nelson Chase, Kathryn Nason (Mrs. Walter Piston), Grace D. Reasoner, C. Scott White, John Sharman and Karl Zerbe.

This exhibit is in connection with the regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played a new symphony composed by Walter Piston of Belmont Hill. This is the second symphony which the Alice H. Diston Fund of Columbia University commissioned to be written. It was first played by Hans Kindler of the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., March 4 of this year.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 8 - 1944

Symphony Program Honors Rachmaninoff

Serge Koussevitzky, who is completing his 20th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct his orchestra at the closing concert of the Providence season in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening. Dr. Koussevitzky will honor the memory of his friend and colleague Sergei Rachmaninoff, who died a year ago March 28 by conducting Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony in E minor. The second part of the program will consist of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration" and the Second Suite from Ravel's Ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 8 - 1944

Broken Back Helped His Composing Technique!

Harris' 6th Symphony Debuts Next Saturday

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Roy Harris.

When Roy Harris counts his blessings, past and present, he never fails to include a broken back, received during his Guggenheim Fellowship days in Paris, 1931.

"I was laid up for eight months—not supposed to move at all, you know," he said the other day at the Lotos Club. "I couldn't have moved if I'd wanted to. But it was a wonderful eight months in so far as it aided my composing technique. I learned to compose in my head, without piano or manuscript, or any tools at all. See what I mean? Now I do that all the time. And it's a great advantage."

While the benefits he derived from that accident turned out to be real ones, he doesn't recommend going to such extremes for them. Mr. Harris has wit, you see.

He has been called "America's No. 1 composer" by Nicolas Slonimsky, and there is good foundation for the statement. He has recived honors from high quarters all over the world, even to a dramatically worded message of greeting from Soviet colleagues. In short, Roy Harris, Colorado-born composer of pioneer stock, is a world figure, a distinction attained by a singular honesty of purpose, in addition to considerable learning and imagination.

Inspired by Lincoln.

Next Saturday evening over the Blue Network (WJZ locally) Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony will be given its premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky The work was commissioned by Mark Woods, president of the Blue Network. It is in four movements its inspiration being Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

The movements and Mr. Harris' explanation of them follow: (1) Awakening, "a prelude reflecting the opening passage of Lincoln's speech;" (2) Conflict, "a fanta dramatizing war;" (3) Dedicatio "a long chorale of dedication the dead;" (4) Affirmation, fugue reflecting the mood strong faith in mankind that rin forth from the last paragraph Lincoln's address."

Every composer has a credo or should have. We have kno for a long time what the Ha credo is. He words it this w "I am trying to write a mu which expresses our time a period in America and which serviceable to our musical life. serviceable I mean music which effectively uses the instrumental and choral and other resources available at present.

"As I see it," he continued, "a composer is a combination of inventor and manufacturer, his raw materials—or musical ideas—being inside himself. The composer has two major problems; (a) to stay away from the world long enough to create a marketable product, and (b) to market it. Now the first problem is esthetic, historical, social, spiritual, emotional, intellectual; his second problem is to put the sum total of his thoughts and moods in those categories in a serviceable form."

The tendency is to get away from long forms, according to Mr. Harris. It is by no means something to rush into, this business of writing more briefly. But he believes that it is worth every composer's serious consideration.

New Avenues on Radio.

"I've been made much aware of this tendency of late," he said. "For instance, Paul Whiteman has commissioned me to do a piece for his radio orchestra. It is a small orchestra, but by means of a series of soundboard reflections and microphone technique, it is able to have a flexibility in dynamics and tone color which are germane to broadcasting. One flute, as an illustration, could play a solo against a big accompaniment in brass. This has not been possible in the concert hall, as you know. It is broadcasting that now opens these new avenues to us."

Mr. Harris declared that the old symphonic practices of the 18th and 19th centuries were conceived for a society which moved in a much slower tempo than ours. The distribution of music, also, was limited, as compared to present day standards. Therefore, the idea of long developments, long forms was suitable to the time.

"Any really smart swing orchestra," he said, "expresses our own time a good deal better than do many of the ambitious works written today, no matter how good they may be. The form usually favored by swing orchestras is Theme and Variations. In that, you see, there is practically no repetition or development.. But you do find in the music of such a group a wonderful variety, wonderful contrast in tone, color and dynamics. Some of the orchestrations are remarkable. And that's why our people like that music. They can't go to sleep on it, you know."

Thanks to radio and records, so-called serious music is just beginning to open the door to mass public acceptance. "Up to now, Mr. Harris said, "pop music has had all the better of it. Shakespearean drama, to draw an analogy, is one thing and the general run of movies is another, but the movies reach many more people. That, of course, paves the way for better movies.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 5 1944

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

APR 5 1944

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 5 1944

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

APR 5 - 1944

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

APR 5 - 1944

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL

APR 5 - 1944

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN

APR 5 - 1944

No Singing on This Program

BOSTON (AP)—A choral leader who could not sing well enough to make the Harvard Glee club will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday afternoon.

He is G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe choral society for the past 10 years and a pianist of ability.

"Woody," as he is known to hundreds of past and present students, tried out for the Glee club when a freshman at Harvard in 1920.

Dr. Archibald T. Davison, the conductor, listed for a few minutes and then told him quite frankly: "You simply can't sing, my dear boy."

The evening of the day he was rejected as a singer "Woody" won acceptance as piano accompanist for the Glee club. He toured Europe with the organization and later was appointed temporary conductor. He became permanent conductor in 1934 when Dr. Davison retired.

In recent years he has grown proficient as an instrumental leader, appearing at the pops, the Esplanade concerts and at last summer's chamber music concerts.

Tomorrow afternoon "Woody" will become the first man ever to conduct the Boston symphny who was not an established orchestral conductor or a composer-conductor.

Incidentally, there is no singing on his program.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

April 7 44

As conductor of the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is constantly collaborating—a performance of Bach's B minor Mass is being prepared for April 30—G. Wallace Woodworth is to that organization what a chorus master is to an opera company. Last summer he directed a pair of the orchestra's so called chamber concerts, and this week he is having his first opportunity to lead the full band in a pair of regular concerts. Because of Good Friday, the first of these took place yesterday afternoon. The other will come tomorrow night.

A feature of Mr. Woodworth's concert of last August was the first performance hereabouts of Haydn's Symphony No. 80, in D minor, reconstructed by Alfred Einstein from a set of parts in the British Museum. The symphonies of Haydn's middle years are still comparatively unknown and if this engaging work is a fair sample, it is high time we made the acquaintance of some of the others. The first movement is vigorous and dramatic, the last is provocative rhythmically. The middle ones are less outstanding, but far from negligible.

To Haydn's symphony succeeded the Second of Walter Piston, which had its first performance in Washington a month ago. By it one was reminded of the story of the young composer who asked Verdi what type of music he would employ in a certain situation. Verdi replied that he would just write some music, and that is exactly what Mr. Piston has done. He has not tried to be original, or individual, or contemporaneous, or American, or anything else in particular. The first two movements might almost be considered reactionary in style. They are melodious and far from dissonant, as that term is understood nowadays. With the energetic finale things wake up a bit, though even here by certain standards Mr. Piston is conservative. Given what seemed to be a just and revealing presentation by the composer's colleague, the Symphony greatly pleased the audience, which was probably prepared for something quite different.

To an unfamiliar classic and a novelty, Mr. Woodworth added a staple repertory piece, the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as the soloist. Orchestrally and pianistically, the performance was sound and musicianly. Mr. Serkin played with the brilliance, the sympathy and discernment that were to be expected from him. Yet for this observer the performance was somehow not one to get excited over. The audience thought otherwise.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

APR 3 - 1944

Boston Symphony Enthralls 2,700 at University Concert

Satisfying Program Conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Including Beethoven, Debussy and Tschaikowsky

By MARY PURNELL

Greeted by storms of applause from 2,700 members of the music-hungry populace hereabouts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made their annual appearance at Rutgers Gymnasium yesterday afternoon. The concert had all the anticipated brilliance.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, major work on the program, received a triumphantly beautiful performance, conducted with precision and deep insight by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The opening Allegro con brio and the revolutionary funeral march, one reason the symphony startled the world over a century ago, are so vastly conceived that, on hearing them, a ridiculous fear arises that the Scherzo may seem frivolous and the short finale meager; yet the essential rightness of the concluding movements still sound forth in a positive way.

The intensity and spirit of the first movement and Scherzo and the universal compassion breathed by the funeral march as conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky dismissed as trivial any reminders that the symphony was composed as a tribute to Napoleon. The real hero of the "Eroica" is Beethoven himself; its drive, originality and grandeur reflect him and no smaller person.

Although this performance led one to wonder what was left that could possibly add to the afternoon, the audience was enthusiastic over the three final compositions, two Debussy Nocturnes and Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," all of which evoked an appropriately springtime mood.

Delicate Portrayal

"Clouds," the first of the familiar Debussy pieces, was played exquisitely, with the fineness of tone characteristic of this orchestra, while the electrifying effect of "Festivals" on the audience may be compared only with that produced by Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite last year, so vividly was it performed.

Staunch Tschaikowsky fans, the audience also enjoyed to the utmost "Francesca," a tonal impression of the 13th figure described by Dante. The work depicts the tempests of the underworld eternally lashing the girl and Paolo, brother of her husband, as punishment for their love. In contrast is set the gentle episode of the lovers' story.

"Francesca" has alternately been ranked with Tschaikowsky's most impressive works by some and pronounced "too long and too loud" by others. The truth, of course, lies between these extremes. "Francesca" has forcefulness and dramatic impact. Magnified yesterday by the playing of a great orchestra and stirring conducting, these qualities made "Francesca" seem splendid, indeed.

Many soldiers and WAC's and students from other parts of the state swelled the audience. In spite of the rain, there was a touch of spring color in the costumes of women attending.

Old, New Hits For Pops Fans

The blend of popular classics and such popular music, old and new, as is suitable for performance by a symphony orchestra, that has made the Pop Concerts irresistible entertainment for more than half a century, again will characterize them during their 59th season, beginning Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall. The occasion will make Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor.

The opening night program will be notable for the latest addition to its endlessly delightful repertoire, selections from the Rodgers and Hart score, "Oklahoma!" Broadway's first musical.

Other program items will be the popular "Holiday for Strings," Elgar's march, "Pomp and Circumstance"; the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz"; Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" Gavotte and his march from his "Love of Three Oranges"; Bach's "Wachet Auf" from cantata 160, some Strauss waltzes and Walton's "Facade" suite.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 2 - 1944

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Haydn, Debussy and Brahms Works at Final Concert

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. For the event the conductor had chosen three sharply contrasted masterpieces by Haydn, Debussy and Brahms, each of which gloried in a superlative reading.

The program opened with the Haydn symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 88) from the second Paris set. With the slow introduction to the initial allegro of this work, it at once became obvious that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were definitely in the vein for an afternoon of great music-making.

The precision and bite of the fortissimo chords for full orchestra, the importance given the rests between them, the impressiveness of the softly answering strings, were factors that lent unusual effectiveness to the preludial measures. All that followed was as successful in maintaining the classic character of the symphony, while at the same time investing its four movements with intense vitality and full-blooded tone. The noble song of the Largo soared forth in soulful, rich sonorities, but never overstepped the bounds of its essential simplicity, while the finale was given with a rhythmic charm and infectuousness that made it exceptionally ingratiating.

Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent account of Debussy's "La Mer" was again worthy of all of the encomiums that have been expended on his presentations of the impressionistic creation in the past. From its mysterious opening bars to the scintillant peroration of the last of its three movements it was a revelation in play of prismatic color, dynamic gradations of the most subtle type, and positive projection of all of the varied moods of the sea from playful abandon to stormy tumultuousness.

The First symphony of Brahms which closed the concert, received an interpretation as extraordinary for grandeur of conception as for tonal splendor. It was all on a heroic scale, throbbing with inner life and marvelously communicative throughout. The andante with its fascinating combination of warmth and tenderness; the third movement, taken at the rapid pace favored by conductors at present, yet filled with all the grace that commonly escapes at this tempo and the finale, which was beyond praise in its eloquence and tonal splendor, were so many concomitants of a magisterial and unforgettable performance, that roused the large audience to a fervent demonstration at the close.

IN MEMORIAM

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In memory of Cardinal O'Connell the Largo from Vivaldi's orchestral concerto in D minor has been added to this week's final Symphony programme. Not only a music-lover but an accomplished musician and composer, the late Cardinal was, in his more active years, a frequent attendant at the Friday Symphony matinees. Did it enter into Dr. Koussevitzky's mind that Vivaldi was himself a priest? And how much more suitable and appropriate these beautifully solemn measures than the conventional funeral march.

As originally announced, the programme heard yesterday consisted only of two symphonies, the Fourth of Brahms and the Fifth of Beethoven. So familiar are these masterpieces and the Koussevitzkyan performance of them that further comment at this time is hardly necessary. Certain general observations on the conductor's 19th season and the orchestra's 63d will appear in the music columns tomorrow.

PASTE OVER

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
APR 8 - 1944

Broken Back Helped His Composing Technique!

Harris' 6th Symphony Debuts Next Saturday

By ROBERT BAGAR.

Roy Harris.

When Roy Harris counts his blessings, past and present, he never fails to include a broken back, received during his Guggenheim Fellowship days in Paris, 1931.

"I was laid up for eight months—not supposed to move at all, you know," he said the other day at the Lotos Club. "I couldn't have moved if I'd wanted to. But it was a wonderful eight months in so far as it aided my composing technique. I learned to compose in my head, without piano or manuscript, or any tools at all. See what I mean? Now I do that all the time. And it's a great advantage."

While the benefits he derived from that accident turned out to be real ones, he doesn't recommend going to such extremes for them. Mr. Harris has wit, you see.

He has been called "America's No. 1 composer" by Nicolas Slonimsky, and there is good foundation for the statement. He has recived honors from high quarters all over the world, even to a dramatically worded message of greeting from Soviet colleagues. In short, Roy Harris, Colorado-born composer of pioneer stock, is a world figure, a distinction attained by a singular honesty of purpose, in addition to considerable learning and imagination.

Inspired by Lincoln.

Next Saturday evening over the Blue Network (WJZ locally) Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony will be given its premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The work was commissioned by Mark Woods, president of the Blue Network. It is in four movements its inspiration being Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address.

The movements and Mr. Harris' explanation of them follow: (1) Awakening, "a prelude reflecting the opening passage of Lincoln's speech;" (2) Conflict, "a fantasy dramatizing war;" (3) Dedication, "a long chorale of dedication to the dead;" (4) Affirmation, "a fugue reflecting the mood of strong faith in mankind that rings forth from the last paragraph of Lincoln's address."

Every composer has a credo—or should have. We have known for a long time what the Harris credo is. He words it this way: "I am trying to write a music which expresses our time and period in America and which is serviceable to our musical life. By serviceable I mean music which effectively uses the instrumental and choral and other resources available at present.

"As I see it," he continued, "a composer is a combination of inventor and manufacturer, his raw materials—or musical ideas—being inside himself. The composer has two major problems; (a) to stay away from the world long enough to create a marketable product, and (b) to market it. Now the first problem is esthetic, historical, social, spiritual, emotional, intellectual; his second problem is to put the sum total of his thoughts and moods in those categories in a serviceable form."

The tendency is to get away from long forms, according to Mr. Harris. It is by no means something to rush into, this business of writing more briefly. But he believes that it is worth every composer's serious consideration.

New Avenues on Radio.

"I've been made much aware of this tendency of late," he said. "For instance, Paul Whiteman has commissioned me to do a piece for his radio orchestra. It is a small orchestra, but by means of a series of soundboard reflections and microphone technique, it is able to have a flexibility in dynamics and tone color which are germane to broadcasting. One flute, as an illustration, could play a solo against a big accompaniment in brass. This has not been possible in the concert hall, as you know. It is broadcasting that now opens these new avenues to us."

Mr. Harris declared that the old symphonic practices of the 18th and 19th centuries were conceived for a society which moved in a much slower tempo than ours. The distribution of music, also, was limited, as compared to present day standards. Therefore, the idea of long developments, long forms was suitable to the time.

"Any really smart swing orchestra," he said, "expresses our own time a good deal better than do many of the ambitious works written today, no matter how good they may be. The form usually favored by swing orchestras is Theme and Variations. In that, you see, there is practically no repetition or development.. But you do find in the music of such a group a wonderful variety, wonderful contrast in tone, color and dynamics. Some of the orchestrations are remarkable. And that's why our people like that music. They can't go to sleep on it, you know."

Thanks to radio and records, so-called serious music is just beginning to open the door to mass public acceptance. "Up to now, Mr. Harris said, "pop music has had all the better of it. Shakespearean drama, to draw an analogy, is one thing and the general run of movies is another, but the movies reach many more people. That, of course, paves the way for better movies.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 5 1944

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 5 1944

Man Who Failed To Make Club, Leads Symphony

BOSTON, April 5 (AP)—A choral leader who could not sing well enough to make the Harvard Glee Club will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday afternoon.

He is G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society for the past 10 years and a pianist of ability.

"Woody," as he is known to hundreds of past and present students, tried out for the glee club when a freshman at Harvard in 1920.

Dr. Arc[illegible]

ATTL

APR 5-

No Singing on This Program

BOSTON (AP)—A choral leader who could not sing well enough to make the Harvard Glee club will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra Thursday afternoon.

He is G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe choral society for the past 10 years and a pianist of ability.

"Woody," as he is known to hundreds of past and present students, tried out for the Glee club when a freshman at Harvard in 1920.

Dr. Archibald T. Davison, the conductor, listed for a few minutes and then told him quite frankly: "You simply can't sing, my dear boy."

The evening of the day he was rejected as a singer "Woody" won acceptance as piano accompanist for the Glee club. He toured Europe with the organization and later was appointed temporary conductor. He became permanent conductor in 1934 when Dr. Davison retired.

In recent years he has grown proficient as an instrumental leader, appearing at the pops, the Esplanade concerts and at last summer's chamber music concerts.

Tomorrow afternoon "Woody" will become the first man ever to conduct the Boston symphny who was not an established orchestral conductor or a composer-conductor.

Incidentally, there is no singing on his program.

NSWICK, N. J.
E NEWS
1944

Boston Symphony Enthralls 2,700 at University Concert

Satisfying Program Conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Including Beethoven, Debussy and Tschaikowsky

By MARY PURNELL

Greeted by storms of applause from 2,700 members of the music-hungry populace hereabouts, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky made their annual appearance at Rutgers Gymnasium yesterday afternoon. The concert had all the anticipated brilliance.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3, major work on the program, received a triumphantly beautiful performance, conducted with precision and deep insight by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The opening Allegro con brio and the revolutionary funeral march, one reason the symphony startled the world over a century ago, are so vastly conceived that, on hearing them, a ridiculous fear arises that the Scherzo may seem frivolous and the short finale meager; yet the essential rightness of the concluding movements still sound forth in a positive way.

The intensity and spirit of the first movement and Scherzo and the universal compassion breathed by the funeral march as conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky dismissed as trivial any reminders that the symphony was composed as a tribute to Napoleon. The real hero of the "Eroica" is Beethoven himself; its drive, originality and grandeur reflect him and no smaller person.

Although this performance led one to wonder what was left that could possibly add to the afternoon, the audience was enthusiastic over the three final compositions, two Debussy Nocturnes and Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," all of which evoked an appropriately springtime mood.

Delicate Portrayal

"Clouds," the first of the familiar Debussy pieces, was played exquisitely, with the fineness of tone characteristic of this orchestra, while the electrifying effect of "Festivals" on the audience may be compared only with that produced by Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite last year, so vividly was it performed.

Staunch Tschaikowsky fans, the audience also enjoyed to the utmost "Francesca," a tonal impression of the 13th figure described by Dante. The work depicts the tempests of the underworld eternally lashing the girl and Paolo, brother of her husband, as punishment for their love. In contrast is set the gentle episode of the lovers' story.

"Francesca" has alternately been ranked with Tschaikowsky's most impressive works by some and pronounced "too long and too loud" by others. The truth, of course, lies between these extremes. "Francesca" has forcefulness and dramatic impact. Magnified yesterday by the playing of a great orchestra and stirring conducting, these qualities made "Francesca" seem splendid, indeed.

Many soldiers and WAC's and students from other parts of the state swelled the audience. In spite of the rain, there was a touch of spring color in the costumes of women attending.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Haydn, Debussy and Brahms Works at Final Concert

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave the final concert of its New York season yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. For the event the conductor had chosen three sharply contrasted masterpieces by Haydn, Debussy and Brahms, each of which gloried in a superlative reading.

The program opened with the Haydn symphony in G major (B. and H. No. 88) from the second Paris set. With the slow introduction to the initial allegro of this work, it at once became obvious that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were definitely in the vein for an afternoon of great music-making.

The precision and bite of the fortissimo chords for full orchestra, the importance given the rests between them, the impressiveness of the softly answering strings, were factors that lent unusual effectiveness to the preludial measures. All that followed was as successful in maintaining the classic character of the symphony, while at the same time investing its four movements with intense vitality and full-blooded tone. The noble song of the Largo soared forth in soulful, rich sonorities, but never overstepped the bounds of its essential simplicity, while the finale was given with a rhythmic charm and infectuousness that made it exceptionally ingratiating.

Dr. Koussevitsky's magnificent account of Debussy's "La Mer" was again worthy of all of the encomiums that have been expended on his presentations of the impressionistic creation in the past. From its mysterious opening bars to the scintillant peroration of the last of its three movements it was a revelation in play of prismatic color, dynamic gradations of the most subtle type, and positive projection of all of the varied moods of the sea from playful abandon to stormy tumultuousness.

The First symphony of Brahms, which closed the concert, received an interpretation as extraordinary for grandeur of conception as for tonal splendor. It was all on a heroic scale, throbbing with inner life and marvelously communicative throughout. The andante with its fascinating combination of warmth and tenderness; the third movement, taken at the rapid pace favored by conductors at present yet filled with all the grace that commonly escapes at this tempo, and the finale, which was beyond praise in its eloquence and tonal splendor, were so many concomitants of a magisterial and unforgettable performance, that roused the large audience to a fervent demonstration at the close.

IN MEMORIAM

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In memory [illegible] Largo from [illegible] certo in D minor [illegible] week's final Symph[illegible] only a music-lover [illegible] musician and compos[illegible] nal was, in [illegible] frequent attendan[illegible] phony mat[illegible] Koussevi[illegible] himself a pr[illegible] suitable [illegible] tifully [illegible] ventional [illegible]

As originally [illegible] gramme heard yesterday [illegible] of two symphon[illegible] Brahms and [illegible] familiar are [illegible] the Koussevitzkyan [illegible] them that further comment [illegible] is hardly necessary [illegible] observations on the condu[illegible] season and the orchestra's [illegible] pear in the music columns [illegible]

Old, New Hits For Pops Fans

The blend of popular classics and such popular music, old and new, as is suitable for performance by a symphony orchestra, that has made the Pop Concerts irresistible entertainment for more than half a century, again will characterize them during their 59th season, beginning Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall. The occasion will make Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor.

The opening night program will be notable for the latest addition to its endlessly delightful repertoire, selections from the Rodgers and Hart score, "Oklahoma!" Broadway's first musical.

Other program items will be the popular "Holiday for Strings," Elgar's march, "Pomp and Circumstance"; the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz"; Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" Gavotte and his march from his "Love of Three Oranges"; Bach's "Wachet Auf" from cantata 160, some Strauss waltzes and Walton's "Fascade" suite.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As conductor of the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is constantly collaborating—a performance of Bach's B minor Mass is being prepared for April 30—G. Wallace Woodworth is to that organization what a chorus master is to an opera company. Last summer he directed a pair of the orchestra's so called chamber concerts, and this week he is having his first opportunity to lead the full band in a pair of regular concerts. Because of Good Friday, the first of these took place yesterday afternoon. The other will come tomorrow night.

A feature of Mr. Woodworth's concert of last August was the first performance hereabouts of Haydn's Symphony No. 80, in D minor, reconstructed by Alfred Einstein from a set of parts in the British Museum. The symphonies of Haydn's middle years are still comparatively unknown and if this engaging work is a fair sample, it is high time we made the acquaintance of some of the others. The first movement is vigorous and dramatic, the last is provocative rhythmically. The middle ones are less outstanding, but far from negligible.

To Haydn's symphony succeeded the Second of Walter Piston, which had its first performance in Washington a month ago. By it one was reminded of the story of the young composer who asked Verdi what type of music he would employ in a certain situation. Verdi replied that he would just write some music, and that is exactly what Mr. Piston has done. He has not tried to be original, or individual, or contemporaneous, or American, or anything else in particular. The first two movements might almost be considered reactionary in style. They are melodious and far from dissonant, as that term is understood nowadays. With the energetic finale things wake up a bit, though even here by certain standards Mr. Piston is conservative. Given what seemed to be a just and revealing presentation by the composer's colleague, the Symphony greatly pleased the audience, which was probably prepared for something quite different.

To an unfamiliar classic and a novelty, Mr. Woodworth added a staple repertory piece, the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolf Serkin as the soloist. Orchestrally and pianistically, the performance was sound and musicianly. Mr. Serkin played with the brilliance, the sympathy and discernment that were to be expected from him. Yet for this observer the performance was somehow not one to get excited over. The audience thought otherwise.

RKER
K CITY
APR 8 - 1944

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mostly Standard Music

THE perfor ance of Ver Requiem at the M ropolitan last w was in the nature a double benefacti because it brought a handsome sum the Red Cross a brought forward a superb presentati of a musical masterpiece. Bruno Walt conducted, and his Requiem had t same warmth and power that h marked his direction of Verdi opera The soloists—Zinka Milanov, Kerst Thorborg, Charles Kullman, and N cola Moscona—collaborated ably. Sp cial mention should be made of the re markable singing of Mme. Milanov whose fine voice provided some of th most beautiful sound that has been hear hereabouts all season. There was excel lent assistance from the Metropolitan chorus, prepared for the occasion by Giacomo Spadoni, and from the Metropolitan orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff died a little more than a year ago, and in his memory the Boston Symphony, on its Thursday-evening program in Carnegie Hall, included his second symphony. This symphony has been in the standard orchestral repertory ever since its première some thirty-five years ago and will probably stay there a good many years more. It is fairly long, and considered rather old-fashioned by some, but it has rich melodies and sweeps along so well that, when it's finished, you know you've heard something substantial. Serge Koussevitzky conducted it with his customary enthusiasm and devotion.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who has served the Philharmonic-Symphony this season as assistant conductor, pinch-hitter, and director of part of a concert, turned up with a complete program of his own last week. I heard this one at its second, or Saturday-night, performance, at which a capacity audience raised repeated ructions of delight over this young musician, who turned in expert and animated performances of music by Mozart, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Copland, and Bernstein.

Mr. Bernstein was represented as a composer by a symphony entitled "Jeremiah," with movements named "Prophecy," "Profanation," and "Lamentation," the last being an extended mezzo-soprano solo, impressively sung by Jennie Tourel. This symphony started a good deal of discussion in the lobby after the concert. The opinions I heard varied, all right, because the symphony is fairly provocative music, both in style and in form. The first movement is melodiously declamatory and generally persuasive. The second, a scherzo designed, according to the composer, "to give a general sense of the destruction and chaos brought on by the pagan corruption within the priesthood and the people," is rhythmically ingenious and has plenty of instrumental color, but it seems overcrowded. The finale, with a text from the Book of Lamentations, has breadth and power. Mr. Bernstein's writing for orchestra is surehanded, and I suspect that there will be more of his works around for public consideration before long.

Bridgeport Post

APR 12 1944

Saturday night at 8:30, the Boston Symphony — on WNAB-Blue at 8:30—presents the world premiere of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 6, based on Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

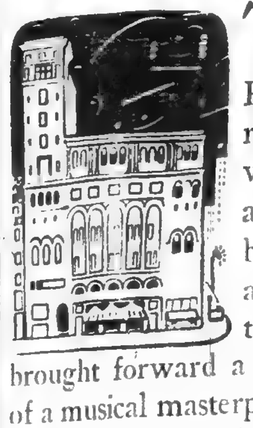
Sunday [illegible] WABC-[illegible] at 3 p. m. Dr. Artur Rodzinski conducts the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the [illegible] Symphonies of Beetho-

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

APR 8 - 1944

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mostly Standard Music



THE performance of Verdi's Requiem at the Metropolitan last week was in the nature of a double benefaction, because it brought in a handsome sum for the Red Cross and brought forward a superb presentation of a musical masterpiece. Bruno Walter conducted, and his Requiem had the same warmth and power that has marked his direction of Verdi operas. The soloists—Zinka Milanov, Kerstin Thorborg, Charles Kullman, and Nicola Moscona—collaborated ably. Special mention should be made of the remarkable singing of Mme. Milanov, whose fine voice provided some of the most beautiful sound that has been heard hereabouts all season. There was excellent assistance from the Metropolitan chorus, prepared for the occasion by Giacomo Spadoni, and from the Metropolitan orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff died a little more than a year ago, and in his memory the Boston Symphony, on its Thursday-evening program in Carnegie Hall, included his second symphony. This symphony has been in the standard orchestral repertory ever since its première some thirty-five years ago and will probably stay there a good many years more. It is fairly long, and considered rather old-fashioned by some, but it has rich melodies and sweeps along so well that, when it's finished, you know you've heard something substantial. Serge Koussevitzky conducted it with his customary enthusiasm and devotion.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who has served the Philharmonic-Symphony this season as assistant conductor, pinch-hitter, and director of part of a concert, turned up with a complete program of his own last week. I heard this one at its second, or Saturday-night, performance, at which a capacity audience raised repeated ructions of delight over this young musician, who turned in expert and animated performances of music by Mozart, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Copland, and Bernstein.

Mr. Bernstein was represented as a composer by a symphony entitled "Jeremiah," with movements named "Prophecy," "Profanation," and "Lamentation," the last being an extended mezzo-soprano solo, impressively sung by Jennie Tourel. This symphony started a good deal of discussion in the lobby after the concert. The opinions I heard varied, all right, because the symphony is fairly provocative music, both in style and in form. The first movement is melodiously declamatory and generally persuasive. The second, a scherzo designed, according to the composer, "to give a general sense of the destruction and chaos brought on by the pagan corruption within the priesthood and the people," is rhythmically ingenious and has plenty of instrumental color, but it seems overcrowded. The finale, with a text from the Book of Lamentations, has breadth and power. Mr. Bernstein's writing for orchestra is sure-handed, and I suspect that there will be more of his works around for public consideration before long.

Bridgeport Post

APR 12 1944

Saturday night at 8:30, the Boston Symphony — on WNAB-Blue at 8:30—presents the world premiere of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 6, based on Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Serge Koussevitzky conducts. Sunday, on WABC-[illegible] at 3 p. m. Dr. Arthur Rodzinski conducts the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the First Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 9 - 1944

Rudolf Serkin Concert Soloist

By BETSY WARREN

A Harvard day at Symphony Hall, Boston, Thursday afternoon with G. Wallace Woodworth conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Walter Piston's second symphony—both members of the Harvard College music faculty—plus Rudolph Serkin, soloist, playing Beethoven's Emperor Concerto drew a full house of admirers.

Mr. Woodworth, who has had great success as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, now seems prone to extend his endeavors into orchestral fields. With a well-planned program — Haydn, Symphony in D minor, No. 80; Piston, Symphony No. 2; and Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73—interest was sustained throughout by impersonal unfolding of musical content rather than by personal conspicuousness. In comparison with more gymnastic conductors, Mr. Woodworth directs a little on the stolid side; while the orchestra, under his direction never quite gave out its stunning lustre of tone.

After a few moments of Piston's Symphony No. 2, it became apparent that here too, in the last stronghold of the frantic French dissonance, the charm of melody and triad consonance had conquered. The first two movements were superior in structure and material to the third; although the seco nd might be said to be almost too continuous, with hardly an intensifying let-up in its progress. A similarity to the manner of Milhaud is noticeable in the rhythms of the first and last movements.

A first performance of Haydn's Symphony in D minor brings to mind the many other works of his which are still waiting contemporary audiences. Certainly if each succeeding first performance discloses so commanding a piece of music, the Haydn star may again rise to its proper glory.

Rudolph Serkin's execution of the Beethoven piano concerto No. 5 can be classified as one of the best achievements of Boston Symphony soloists for this season. With his customary crisp and lucid tone, the concerto was obviously plain sailing. It remained only for him to add the graces of his own conscientious interpretation.

Next week's Symphony program includes: Handel, Concerto Grosso; Roy Harris, Symphony No. 6 (first performance); Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

APR 9 1944

Roy Harris' 6th Hits Air On Saturday

Boston Orchestra Will Offer Composition By American

BASED on Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg, address and dedicated to the fighting men and women of America on all the battlefronts, a new American Symphony will be given its premiere performance Saturday night the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Roy Harris "Sixth Symphony" is the new work, to be heard from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m.

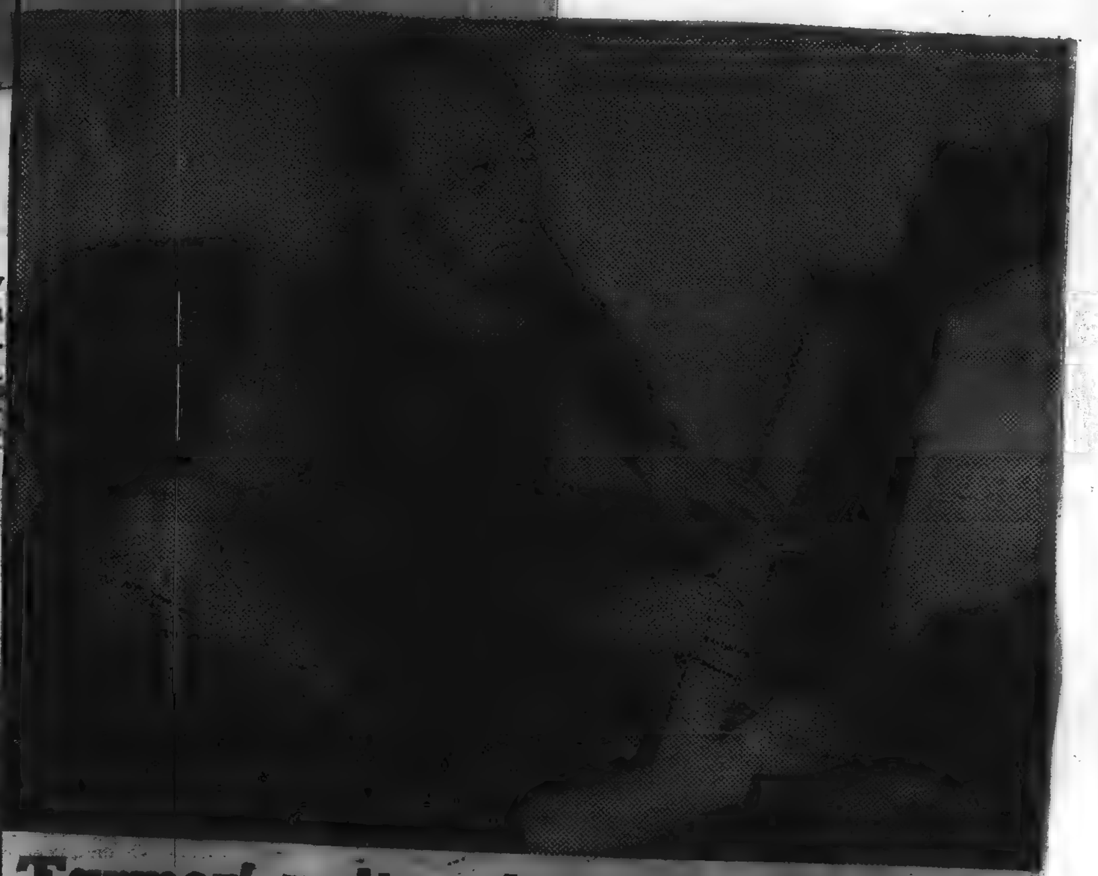
The composer was commissioned last Spring by the Blue Network to write the symphony in the interest of American Culture, following the world-wide acclaim accorded his "Fifth" which was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union.

Harris' Fifth Symphony was the first work of its kind to be written by an American. The new composition is in four movements.

Harris, born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Okla., on Lincoln's birthday, is regarded as one of the most promising figures in classical music to arise on the American scene.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES

APR 8 1944



'Farmer' writes sixth symphony—Dirt farmer turned musician, 44-year-old Roy Harris completes sixth symphonic work, in it sets to music Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Now composer-in-residence at Colorado college, Colorado Springs, Harris quit soil at 28 to study musical composition, has won plaudits of music world. In campus home Mrs. Harris listens to excerpts from new work, which Boston Symphony will premiere next Saturday, 79th anniversary of Great Emancipator's death. (Wide World Photo)

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Handel....Concerto Grosso in G minor, Op. 6, No. 6
Harris..........Symphony No. 6, Op. 60
Mendelssohn.....Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 56 ("Scottish")

As one who can be led to the Harris fountain but cannot swallow the waters thereof, I must confess I was unmoved by Mr. Harris' latest determined go at creating the Great American Symphony, the premiere of which was the chief event on yesterday's symphony program.

There was little of a rewarding nature in the composition as pure music itself, it seemed to me, outside of a few clever tricks in instrumentation, but what really sticks in the craw is that the composer believes he can force music of an abstract nature to express intellectual or ideological concepts if he tries hard enough. There can be no doubt that he does so because he says he has tried to do so in the program notes.

He says that this symphony represents the "great cycle (of) the intellectual or spiritual growth of people." He says he finds the Gettysburg Address of Lincoln is the expression of that cycle, and to it he has turned "for guidance." The first movement, then, represents awakening; the second, conflict; the third dedication, and so on. The audience reads all this in the program notes and then listens for literal evidence of the ideas. To one listener, perhaps, a thump on the drums stands for a semi-colon in the speech; to another it stands for rifle fire, and to a third it conveys the idea of "conceived in liberty." This is foolishness and distorts, of course, Mr. Harris' obviously sincere intention. Yet he invites it by telling us what he is trying to do in specific terms. He would be well advised, I think, to confide his titles and his program notes to his intimates and keep the rest of us guessing. Then imagine his satisfaction when the critics and commentators guess 100 per cent wrong!

While the symphony never approaches the level of the Fifth Symphony, it has some interesting moments, but they are interesting chiefly in a technical fashion. The manner in which, for instance, he builds the climax of the first movement (generally the best) through the almost unobtrusive addition of voices. The long pedal chord of the second movement is striking, but chiefly as a new treatment of a hoary old device. On the whole, however, I found the music, as music, a little tedious.

The concert began with a marvelously refined and poised performance of Handel's Sixth Concerto Grosso. It is hard to be sure, in a case like that, who is responsible for the miracle, Koussevitzky, the string section of the orchestra, or Handel himself. Of course it is a perfect amalgamation of all three, but it has to be heard to be believed. The same was more or less true of the Mendelssohn "Scottish" Symphony, a fine work but almost too elegant and well-bred to bear. Dr. Koussevitzky has recently been subjecting Mendelssohn's life and works to a complete re-study, and yesterday's vivifying performance of the Symphony was certainly a direct result.

Next week Shostakovitch's Eighth has its turn and Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto (William Kapell, soloist) its return.

[illegible], apr. 15/44

Symphony Concert For Military Folk

A concert, free to members of the military services, will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday at 4 P. M. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, who are contributing their service. Tickets may be obtained at the Soldiers' and Sailors' Committee, 48 Boylston street, or at the Symphony Hall box office.

While only those in uniform may apply for tickets, each applicant may request two tickets, one of which may be used for a civilian guest.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1944

Harris's Sixth Symphony

Kouss[illegible]s Bostonians in Work by U. S. Composer

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, April 14.—Commissioned by the Blue Network last May, Roy Harris's Sixth Symphony was given its premiere in Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The composition, in four movements representing, according to the composer, "the great cycle of the intellectual or spiritual growth of people" as exemplified in Lincoln's Gettysburg address, had as subtitles "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and Affirmation."

Dedicated 'with respect, to the Armed Forces of our nation," the symphony was received with moderate approval by teh audience. The composer was present to take a bow on the stage.

Before Mr. Harris came the Handel of the G minor Concerto Grosso for strings and after him the Mendelssohn of the "Scotch" Symphony. This concerto is one of the finest of the set of 12 that Handel composed in the fall of 1739; and while, on the whole, a less brilliant achievement than the "Italian" Symphony, its romantic companion was most welcome. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky finds these symphonies to be too sharply contrasted. A little more sip and zest in the faster portions and a less sentimentalized treatment of the opening of the first movement might have imparted to the "Scotch" a fuller measure of vitality. The concerto, too, was dragged at times, but in both works the orchestra sounded superbly.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

1944 — april 15

Of late our American composers have been endeavoring to ride to fame on the shoulders of Abraham Lincoln. We have had at least two Lincoln symphonies and a Lincoln "portrait," and now comes Roy Harris with a Sixth Symphony, based on the Gettysburg Address. With the composer in attendance it received its first performance at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. It will be repeated tonight.

In the four movements respectively entitled "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation," Mr. Harris would interpret musically the thoughts and emotions inspired by Lincoln's immortal words. Unhappily the monotonous result fails to bear out these laudable intentions. There are impressive moments in each of the movements. Here and there come flashes of beauty or bursts of eloquence. But the difficulty is that having expressed a certain mood in his opening measures, Mr. Harris continues to extend it, to enlarge upon it, only in the end to defeat his purpose.

---

apr 15

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The new Sixth Symphony by Roy Harris was given its first performance at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program began with the G minor Concerto Grosso for strings, Op. 6, No. 6, by Handel, and ended with Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

Mr. Harris' work, commissioned by the Blue Network over which it will be broadcast for the first time tonight, has as yet no characterizing sub-title. Perhaps it will come to be known as his "Lincoln" Symphony, for in the mind of the composer the music is closely associated with the Gettysburg Address. They Symphony is dedicated "With Respect, to the Armed Forces of Our Nation."

In idiom the Sixth Symphony is recognizably pure Roy Harris. The strings, the brass and other instruments, the turns of harmony and counterpoint, have, in the main, the unmistakable sounds you can find in Harris' orchestral works from the Third Symphony onward. But the scoring indicates a clarifying process, in spite of all its dissonance. The sonorities of the Sixth are more transparent than in anything Harris has done before.

Whether the work is unmistakably an expression of Lincoln's classic speech only time can reveal to us. I doubt that, without the composer's explanation, I would have thought so. Music without words is abstract, and when a composer tries to put a literary pictorial or dramatic attribute in music, his avowal that he has done so is the only evidence in support of his idea.

Mr. Harris has not only claimed association between his music and the Gettysburg Address, but he has titled the four movements in accordance with the thought expressed in certain sections. The first movement is "Awakening" ("Fourscore and seven years ago . . ."); the tumultuous second is "Conflict" ("Now we are engaged in a great civil war . . ."); "Dedication" refers to "We are met on a great battlefield of that war," and "Affirmation" (a fugue that doesn't sound like one) reflects that singing paragraph which is one of the great utterances in all the history of mankind, and which concludes ". . . government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

There are many fine pages in the Symphony, many expertly wrought measures and some very fascinating sounds. Whether or not the dissonant ostinato that pervades most of "Conflict" was inspired by Shostakovich is of no consequence. The device is common currency, and Mr. Harris has used it graphically. But one got a disturbing impression that, for all its merit, the Sixth Symphony is pretentious and much too long for the essential worth of its musical—mind you, musical—ideas.

Only repeated hearings, however, will confirm or refute the accuracy of these observations. Yesterday's audience gave cordial applause to Mr. Harris when he appeared after the performance and to Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for an eloquent reading.

The Handel Concerto Grosso, certainly not the most interesting of the 12, was another testimonial to the glory of the Boston strings. Mendelssohn's Symphony, apart from a mannered phrasing of the opening theme, was beautifully vital and expressive.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

APR 7 - 1944

WOODWORTH LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Harvard Glee Club Direction Conducts Me. Man's Work Skillfully

BOSTON, April 6-AP-A thoroughly agreeable combination of maestro and musician from Harvard University dominated today's Boston Symphony concert, with G. [illegible]th making his first appearance as conductor on a program featuring Walter Piston's new Second Symphony.

For ten years Woodworth has directed the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choral society, developing the conductor's art with his students and during guest appearances at the pops and Esplanade concerts.

Woodworth's calm competence on the podium today provided ample evidence of mature mastery. He conducted with ease and authority and seemed especially en rapport during the new Piston Symphony, a lyric, melodious work very pleasing to hear.

The composer, a Rockland, Me., native and now on the musical faculty at Harvard, wrote the symphony for the Alice M. Ditson fund, Columbia University. It had its world premiere by the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington March 5 and was performed for the first time in Boston today.

ue!

...e now, Mr.
...e has had all
...hakespearean
...ology, is one
...run of mov-
...movies reach
... That, of
...r for better

RK, N. Y.
MES
1944

YMPHONY
ASON HERE

Leads Group in ssy and Brahms
Final Concert

EL STRAUS

Symphony Orches-erge Koussevitzky, concert of its New yesterday afternoon
all. For the event had chosen three rasted masterpieces
ebussy and Brahms, gloried in a super-

in opened with the hony in G major
o. 88) from the sec-
With the slow in-the initial allegro of at once became ob-
r. Koussevitzky and definitely in the vein
oon of great music-

lon and bite of the ords for full orches-rtance given the rests
n, the impressiveness
y answering strings, that lent unusual ef-
o the preludial meas-t followed was as sucaintaining the classic the symphony, while time investing its four with intense vitality oded tone. The noble Largo soared forth in sonorities, but never the bounds of its eslicity, while the finale ith a rhythmic charm ousness that made it
y ingratiating.
sevitzky's magnificent Debussy's "La Mer" worthy of all of the en-at have been expended sentations of the im-
c creation in the past.
ysterious opening bars illiant peroration of the three movements it was n in play of prismatic amic gradations of the e type, and positive pro-all of the varied moods from playful abandon to multuousness.
t symphony of Brahms,
ed the concert, received etation as extraordinary ur of conception as for ndor. It was all on a le, throbbing with inner arvelously communica-ghout. The andante with nating combination of nd tenderness; the third
, taken at the rapid pace
y conductors at present, with all the grace that escapes at this tempo.
inale, which was beyond its eloquence and tonal were so many concomia magisterial and unfor-performance, that roused e audience to a fervent ation at the close.

MEMORIAM
EN STOREY SMITH

f Cardinal O'Connell the Vivaldi's orchestral conor has been added to this ymphony programme. Not over but an accomplished composer, the late Cardihis more active years, a dant at the Friday Symes. Did it enter into Dr.
's mind that Vivaldi was est? And how much more appropriate these beau-measures than the con-eral march.
ly announced, the prod yesterday consisted only phonies, the Fourth of the Fifth of Beethoven. So these masterpieces and vitzkyan performance of rther comment at this time ecessary. Certain general on the conductor's 20th he orchestra's 63d will ap-music columns tomorrow.

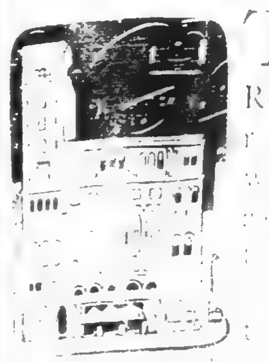
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mostly Standard Music



THE performance of Verdi's Requiem at the Metropolitan last week was in the nature of a double benefaction, because it brought in a handsome sum for the Red Cross and brought forward a [illegible] presentation of music [illegible]. Bruno Walter conducted, and his Requiem had the same warmth and power that has marked his direction of Verdi operas. The soloists—Zinka Milanov, Kerstin Thorborg, Charles Kullman, and Nicola Moscona—collaborated ably. Special mention should be made of the remarkable singing of Mme. Milanov, whose fine voice provided some of the most beautiful sound that has been heard hereabouts all season. There was excellent assistance from the Metropolitan chorus, prepared for the occasion by Giacomo Spadoni, and from the Metropolitan orchestra.

Sergei Rachmaninoff died a little more than a year ago, and in his memory the Boston Symphony, in its Thursday-evening program in Carnegie Hall, included his second symphony. This symphony has been in the standard orchestral repertory ever since its première some thirty-five years ago and will probably stay there a good many years more. It's fairly long, and considered rather old-fashioned by some, but it has rich melodies and sweeps along so well that, when it's finished, you know you've heard something substantial. Serge Koussevitzky conducted it with his customary enthusiasm and devotion.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, who has served the Philharmonic-Symphony this season as assistant conductor, pinch-hitter, and director of part of a concert, turned up with a complete program of his own last week. I heard this one at its second, or Saturday-night, performance, at which a capacity audience raised repeated ructions of delight over this young musician, who turned in expert and animated performances of music by Mozart, Mendelssohn, Tchaikovsky, Copland, and Bernstein.

Mr. Bernstein was represented as a composer by a symphony entitled "Jeremiah," with movements named "Prophecy," "Profanation," and "Lamentation," the last being an extended mezzo-soprano solo, impressively sung by Jennie Tourel. This symphony started a good deal of discussion in the lobby after the concert. The opinions I heard varied, all right, because the symphony is fairly provocative music, both in style and in form. The first movement is melodiously declamatory and generally persuasive. The second, a scherzo designed, according to the composer, "to give a general sense of the destruction and chaos brought on by the pagan corruption within the priesthood and the people," is rhythmically ingenious and has plenty of instrumental color, but it seems overcrowded. The finale, with a text from the Book of Lamentations, has breadth and power. Mr. Bernstein's writing for orchestra is sure-handed, and I suspect that there will be more of his works around for public consideration before long.

Saturday night at 8:30, the Boston Symphony — on WNAB-Blue at 8:30—presents the world premiere of Roy Harris' Symphony No. 6, based on Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

Sunday, on WABC-CBS at 3 p. m. Dr. Arthur Rodzinski conducts the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the First Symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 9 - 1944

Rudolf Serkin Concert Soloist

By BETSY WARREN

A Harvard day at Symphony Hall, Boston, Thursday afternoon with G. Wallace Woodworth conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Walter Piston's second symphony—both members of the Harvard College music faculty—plus Rudolph Serkin, soloist, playing Beethoven's Emperor Concerto drew a full house of admirers.

Mr. Woodworth, who has had great success as conductor of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, now seems prone to extend his endeavors into orchestral fields. With a well-planned program — Haydn, Symphony in D minor, No. 80; Piston, Symphony No. 2; and Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73—interest was sustained throughout by impersonal unfolding of musical content rather than by personal conspicuousness. In comparison with more gymnastic conductors, Mr. Woodworth directs a little on the stolid side; while the orchestra, under his direction never quite gave out its stunning lustre of tone.

After a few moments of Piston's Symphony No. 2, it became apparent that here too, in the last stronghold of the frantic French dissonance, the charm of melody and triad consonance had conquered. The first two movements were superior in structure and material to the third; although the second might be said to be almost too continuous, with hardly an intensifying let-up in its progress. A similarity to the manner of Milhaud is noticeable in the rhythms of the first and last movements.

A first performance of Haydn's Symphony in D minor brings to mind the many other works of his which are still waiting contemporary audiences. Certainly if each succeeding first performance discloses so commanding a piece of music, the Haydn star may again rise to its proper glory.

Rudolph Serkin's execution of the Beethoven piano concerto No. 5 can be classified as one of the best achievements of Boston Symphony soloists for this season. With his customary crisp and lucid tone, the concerto was obviously plain sailing. It remained only for him to add the graces of his own conscientious interpretation.

Next week's Symphony program includes: Handel, Concerto Grosso; Roy Harris, Symphony No. 6 (first performance); Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 3.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

APR 9 1944

Roy Harris' 6th Hits Air On Saturday

Boston Orchestra Will Offer Composition By American

BASED on Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg, address and dedicated to the fighting men and women of America on all the battlefronts, a new American Symphony will be given its premiere performance Saturday night the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Roy Harris "Sixth Symphony" is the new work, to be heard from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m.

The composer was commissioned last Spring by the Blue Network to write the symphony in the interest of American Culture, following the world-wide acclaim accorded his "Fifth" which was dedicated to the people of the Soviet Union.

Harris' Fifth Symphony was the first work of its kind to be written by an American. The new composition is in four movements.

Harris, born in a log cabin in Lincoln County, Okla., on Lincoln's birthday, is regarded as one of the most promising figures in classical music to arise on the American scene.

[72]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TIMES

APR 8 1944

'Farmer' writes sixth symphony—

Dirt farmer turned musician, 44-year-old Roy Harris completes sixth symphonic work, in it sets to music Lincoln's Gettysburg address. Now composer-in-residence at Colorado college, Colorado Springs, Harris quit soil at 28 to study musical composition, has won plaudits of music world. In campus home Mrs. Harris listens to excerpts from new work, which Boston Symphony will premiere next Saturday, 79th anniversary of Great Emancipator's death. (Wide World Photo)

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d program of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Handel....Concerto Grosso in G minor Op. 6, No. 6
Harris...........Symphony No. 6, Op. 60
Mendelssohn.......Symphony No. 3 in A minor, Op. 56 ("Scottish")

As one who can be led to the Harris fountain but cannot swallow the waters thereof, I must confess I was unmoved by Mr. Harris' latest determined go at creating the Great American Symphony, the premiere of which was the chief event on yesterday's symphony program.

There was little of a rewarding nature in the composition as pure music itself, it seemed to me, outside of a few clever tricks in instrumentation, but what really sticks in the craw is that the composer believes he can force music of an abstract nature to express intellectual or ideological concepts if he tries hard enough. There can be no doubt that he does so because he says he has tried to do so in the program notes.

He says that this symphony represents the "great cycle (of) the intellectual or spiritual growth of people." He says he finds the Gettysburg Address of Lincoln is the expression of that cycle, and to it he has turned "for guidance." The first movement, then, represents awakening; the second, conflict; the third dedication, and so on. The audience reads all this in the program notes and then listens for literal evidence of the ideas. To one listener, perhaps, a thump on the drums stands for a semi-colon in the speech; to another it stands for rifle fire, and to a third it conveys the idea of "conceived in liberty." This is foolishness and distorts, of course, Mr. Harris' obviously sincere intention. Yet he invites it by telling us what he is trying to do in specific terms. He would be well advised, I think, to confide his titles and his program notes to his intimates and keep the rest of us guessing. Then imagine his satisfaction when the critics and commentators guess 100 per cent wrong!

While the symphony never approaches the level of the Fifth Symphony, it has some interesting moments, but they are interesting chiefly in a technical fashion. The manner in which, for instance, he builds the climax of the first movement (generally the best) through the almost unobtrusive addition of voices. The long pedal chord of the second movement is striking, but chiefly as a new treatment of a hoary old device. On the whole, however, I found the music, as music, a little tedious.

The concert began with a marvelously refined and poised performance of Handel's Sixth Concerto Grosso. It is hard to be sure, in a case like that, who is responsible for the miracle, Koussevitzky, the string section of the orchestra, or Handel himself. Of course it is a perfect amalgamation of all three, but it has to be heard to be believed. The same was more or less true of the Mendelssohn "Scottish" Symphony, a fine work but almost too elegant and well-bred to bear. Dr. Koussevitzky has recently been subjecting Mendelssohn's life and works to a complete re-study, and yesterday's vivifying performance of the Symphony was certainly a direct result.

Next week Shostakovitch's Eighth has its turn and Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto (William Kapell, soloist) its return.

", apr. 15/44

Symphony Concert For Military Folk

A concert, free to members of the military services, will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday at 4 P. M. by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, who are contributing their service. Tickets may be obtained at the Soldiers' and Sailors' Committee, 48 Boylston street, or at the Symphony Hall box office.

While only those in uniform may apply for tickets, each applicant may request two tickets, one of which may be used for a civilian guest.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Of late our American composers have been endeavoring to ride to fame on the shoulders of Abraham Lincoln. We have had at least two Lincoln symphonies and a Lincoln "portrait," and now comes Roy Harris with a Sixth Symphony, based on the Gettysburg Address. With the composer in attendance it received its first performance at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. It will be repeated tonight.

In the four movements respectively entitled "A w a k e n i n g," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation," Mr. Harris would interpret musically the thoughts and emotions inspired by Lincoln's immortal words. Unhappily the monotonous result fails to bear out these laudable intentions. There are impressive moments in each of the movements. Here and there come flashes of beauty or bursts of eloquence. But the difficulty is that having expressed a certain mood in his opening measures, Mr. Harris continues to extend it, to enlarge upon it, only in the end to defeat his purpose.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1944

Harris's Sixth Symphony

Koussevitzky Leads Bostonians in Work by U. S. Composer

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, April 14.—Commissioned by the Blue Network last May, Roy Harris's Sixth Symphony was given its premiere in Symphony Hall this afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The composition, in four movements representing, according to the composer, "the great cycle of the intellectual or spiritual growth of people" as exemplied in Lincoln's Gettysburg address, had as subtitles "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and Affirmation."

Dedicated 'with respect, to the Armed Forces of our nation," the symphony was received with moderate approval by teh audience. The composer was present to take a bow on the stage.

Before Mr. Harris came the Handel of the G minor Concerto Grosso for strings and after him the Mendelssohn of the "Scotch" Symphony. This concerto is one of the finest of the set of 12 that Handel composed in the fall of 1739; and while, on the whole, a less brilliant achievement than the "Italian" Symphony, its romantic companion was most welcome. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky finds these symphonies to be too sharply contrasted. A little more zip and zest in the faster portions and a less sentimentalized treatment of the opening of the first movement might have imparted to the "Scotch" a fuller measure of vitality. The concerto, too, was dragged at times, but in both works the orchestra sounded superbly.

---

apr. 13

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The new Sixth Symphony by Roy Harris was given its first performance at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program began with the G minor Concerto Grosso for strings, Op. 6, No. 6, by Handel, and ended with Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony.

Mr. Harris' work, commissioned by the Blue Network over which it will be broadcast for the first time tonight, has as yet no characterizing sub-title. Perhaps it will come to be known as his "Lincoln" Symphony, for in the mind of the composer the music is closely associated with the Gettysburg Address. They Symphony is dedicated "With Respect, to the Armed Forces of Our Nation."

In idiom the Sixth Symphony is recognizably pure Roy Harris. The strings, the brass and other instruments, the turns of harmony and counterpoint, have, in the main, the unmistakable sounds you can find in Harris' orchestral works from the Third Symphony onward. But the scoring indicates a clarifying process, in spite of all its dissonance. The sonorities of the Sixth are more transparent than in anything Harris has done before.

Whether the work is unmistakably an expression of Lincoln's classic speech only time can reveal to us. I doubt that, without the composer's explanation, I would have thought so. Music without words is abstract, and when a composer tries to put a literary pictorial or dramatic attribute in music, his avowal that he has done so is the only evidence in support of his idea.

Mr. Harris has not only claimed association between his music and the Gettysburg Address, but he has titled the four movements in accordance with the thought expressed in certain sections. The first movement is "Awakening" ("Fourscore and seven years ago . . ."; the tumultuous second is "Conflict" ("Now we are engaged in a great civil war . . ."); "Dedication" refers to "We are met on a great battlefield of that war," and "Affirmation" (a fugue that doesn't sound like one) reflects that singing paragraph which is one of the great utterances in all the history of mankind, and which concludes ". . . government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

There are many fine pages in the Symphony, many expertly wrought measures and some very fascinating sounds. Whether or not the dissonant ostinato that pervades most of "Conflict" was inspired by Shostakovich is of no consequence. The device is common currency, and Mr. Harris has used it graphically. But one got a disturbing impression that, for all its merit, the Sixth Symphony is pretentious and much too long for the essential worth of its musical—mind you, musical—ideas.

Only repeated hearings, however, will confirm or refute the accuracy of these observations. Yesterday's audience gave cordial applause to Mr. Harris when he appeared after the performance, and to Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra for an eloquent reading.

The Handel Concerto Grosso, certainly not the most interesting of the 12, was another testimonial to the glory of the Boston strings. Mendelssohn's Symphony, apart from a mannered phrasing of the opening theme, was beautifully vital and expressive.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

APR 7 - 1944

WOODWORTH LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Harvard Glee Club Direction Conducts Me. Man's Work Skillfully

BOSTON, April 6-AP-A thoroughly agreeable combination of maestro and musician from Harvard University dominated today's Boston Symphony concert, with G. Wallace Woodworth making his first appearance as conductor on a program featuring Walter Piston's new Second Symphony.

For ten years Woodworth has directed the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe choral society, developing the conductor's art with his students and during guest appearances at the pops and Esplanade concerts.

Woodworth's calm competence on the podium today provided ample evidence of mature mastery. He conducted with ease and authority and seemed especially en rapport during the new Piston Symphony, a lyric, melodious work very pleasing to hear.

The composer, a Rockland, Me., native and now on the musical faculty at Harvard, wrote the symphony for the Alice M. Ditson fund, Columbia University. It had its world premiere by the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington March 5 and was performed for the first time in Boston today.

PASTE OVER

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

APR 14 1944

Premiere Broadcast of New Harris Symphony

AN EVENT of prime importance to the world of music takes place when the new Symphony No. 6 of Roy Harris, based on Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, is given its world premiere by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 5:30 p.m. tomorrow over KGO and the Blue Network.

The Sixth Symphony, which was commissioned by the Blue Network last May as a contribution to American culture, is dedicated to the men and women of America in the armed services all over the world. It will be performed on the sixty-ninth anniversary of Lincoln's death by Booth's bullet on April 15, 1865.

The first movement of the work, entitled "Awakening," is a prelude embodying the opening passage of Lincoln's speech. The second movement, "Conflict," is a fantasy dramatizing war. The third movement is a long chorale of eulogy to the dead, called "Dedication." The final movement, "Affirmation," is a fugue reflecting the note of firm faith ringing forth from the closing paragraph of the Gettysburg speech.

Of interest to a people now familia with the Gettysburg Address since child hood are some of the comments made by newspapers within twenty-four hours after the address was given on Novembe 19, 1863:

Said a writer in nearby Harrisburg: ". . . We pass over the silly remarks of the President; for the credit of the nation we are willing that the veil of oblivion shal be droppeed over them and that they shal no more be repeated or thought of."

An editorial in a Chicago paper reported: ". . . The cheek of every American must tingle with shame as he reads the silly, dish-watery utterances of the man who has to be pointed out to intelligent foreigners as the President of the United States."

A writer for a Richmond, Va., newspaper said: ". . . Kings are usually made to speak in the magniloquent language supposed to be suited to their elevated position. On the present occasion, Lincoln acted the clown."

Today few people can even remembe the names, much less the words, of those whose speeches were so highly praised b the reporters present that day, and comes as a shock to be reminded of th abuse and humiliation Lincoln suffere because of that speech. However, th martyred President has been vindicate and in the Harris Symphony is paid measure of the tribute he has so long de served.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1944

Harris's Sixth Symphony

Koussevitzky Leads Bostonians in Work by U. S. Composer

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, April 14.—Commissioned by the Blue Network last May, Roy Harris's Sixth Symphony was given its premiere in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The composition, in four movements representing, according to the composer, "the great cycle of the intellectual or spiritual growth of people" as exemplified in Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, had as subtitles "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation."

Dedicated "with respect, to the Armed Forces of our nation," the symphony was received with moderate approval by the audience. The composer was present to take a bow on the stage.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
~~JOURNAL-COURIER~~
Register

APR 16 1944

ENVOY TO VISIT BOSTON

Boston, April 15.—(AP)—Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, when he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, symphony conductor, has planned a program of Russian music which will include the much heralded symphony by the world-famous Soviet composer.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

APR 14 1944

Boston Orchestra Introduces Harris' Gettysburg Work

Boston—(AP)—The world premier of Roy Harris' Sixth or "Gettysburg" Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

The tall, angular, Middle-Western composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school wa dismissed Feb. 12th because it wa his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadov of Abe Lincoln has hovered ove me," he said, in a Symphony Ha interview.

"The Blue Network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an idea for freedom, which had to b fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I wok up about 3 a. m. and I seemed t see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using th customary musical designations fo the movements, he wrote in sim ple words. The first movement h called "Awakening," reflecting th opening phrases of Lincoln' speech. Then came "conflict," "dedication," and "affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said, crossing long legs and adjusting a startling green necktie.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg Address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'let freedom ring'."

Harris wrote this Sixth Symphony in Colorado Springs, where he is composer in residence to Colorado College. The new work will have its first radio performance Saturday night, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
Apr 16 1944

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Again

By BETSY WARREN

It was really good to have Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall this week. After some weeks of guest conductors, one is ready to re-appreciate Koussevitzky—a fact which he probably knows better than the rest of us.

The program arrangement, as is frequent nowadays, was compiled to please the two elements in present day symphony audiences, with something romantic, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, something new, Roy Harris' Symphony No. 6 (first performance), and something from the classic or thoroughbass period, (in this instance, Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 3, No. 6) guaranteed to delight all but the itinerant attendant.

With all the pros and cons about the title "Scottish" given to Mendelssohn's third symphony, (which is no more Scotch than a pretzel) the many Brahms-like passages in the first movement, also at the very beginning of the first theme of the third, and the horn theme in the fourth have all passed unnoticed. Only in the second movement, do we hear the clear sound of the fairy feet of Mendelssohn. The fairy feet, as usual, raced through a terrific presto.

Why Roy Harris chose to call his four tone pictures a symphony can only have sprung from the out-symphony-the-rest race which is now with us. For although these four movements of the symphony characterize the material from Lincoln's Gettysburg address in the best silent movie manner, there is very little in their form of procedure which would give even an impression of symphonic development. Throughout the piece, the music goes on, it neither builds up or fades out, but goes on. The second movement, called Conflict, recalls devices from the last movement of his third symphony cut-off end. There were also a few Stravinsky dinosaurs for good measure. There was an interesting orchestral arrangement in the third movement; pedal in the 'cellos, melody in the double bass, plus a few solo-violin injections.

The next pair of concerts will contain Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 8, and Khatchatourian, Piano Concerto with William Kapell as soloist.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
APR 15 1944

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL
APR 14 1944

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR
APR 14 1944

STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
APR 14 1944

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 14 1944

Premiere of Gettysburg Symphony

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, April 14 (AP)—The world premiere of Roy Harris' sixth or "Gettysburg" symphony by the Boston symphony orchestra today brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

The tall, angular, middle-western composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school was dismissed February 12th because it was his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadow of Abe Lincoln has hovered over me," he said, during a Symphony Hall interview.

"The Blue Network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an ideal for freedom, which had to be fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I woke up about three a. m. and I seemed to see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using the customary musical designations for the movements, he wrote in simple words. The first movement he called "Awakening," reflecting the opening phrases of Lincoln's speech. Then came "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said, crossing long legs and adjusting a startling green necktie.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg Address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'Let freedom ring.'"

Harris wrote this sixth symphony in Colorado Springs where he is composer in residence to Colorado college. The new work will have its first radio performance Saturday night, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 14 1944

COLUMBIA, S. C.
RECORD
APR 14 1944

ris Symphony day At Hub

y in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, h

New Symphony Is A Tribute To Lincoln

opening phrases of Lincoln's h. Then came "Conflict," ication" and "Affirmation." did not attempt to express ally the meaning of the

---

OMAHA, NEB.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD
APR 14 1944

'Gettysburg' Symphony Premiere Tonight; On Network Saturday

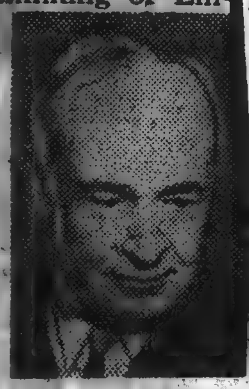
Boston (AP)—The world premiere of Roy Harris' Sixth or "Gettysburg" symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday night brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

Roy Harris

The tall, angular, middlewestern composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school was dismissed February 12 because it was his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadow of Abe Lincoln has hovered over me," he said, during a symphony hall interview.

"The Blue network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.



Koussevitzky

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an ideal for freedom, which had to be fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I woke up about 3 a. m. and I seemed to see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using the customary musical designations for the movements, he wrote in simple words. The first movement he called "Awakening," reflecting the opening phrases of Lincoln's speech. Then came "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'Let freedom ring.'"

Harris wrote this Sixth symphony in Colorado Springs where he is composer in residence to Colorado college. The new work will have its first radio performance over the Blue Network Saturday night, at 7:30, Omaha time, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 15 1944

BOSTON ACCLAIMS HARRIS SYMPHONY

Boston, April 15 (A. P.).—The new Roy Harris Sixth or "Gettysburg" Symphony was performed for the first time anywhere last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was acclaimed by critics to be by far the most exciting American musical work to come out of this war—a work perhaps destined to equal the famous Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony.

The noted composer was present and returned to the stage several times with Conductor Serge Koussevitzky to acknowledge prolonged applause.

The first part of the symphony, entitled "Awakening," reflected the opening words of President Lincoln's speech, with muted strings echoing the famous "four score and seven years ago" beginning. The second movement, "Conflict," concerned the civil war portion of the address, while the last two sections were entitled "Dedication" and "Affirmation."

The subject of Lincoln was imbued in Harris's blood from the very day he was born, forty-six years ago on Lincoln's birthday, in Lincoln county, Oklahoma.

MUSIC

Apr. 22

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Boston performance of Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony, yesterday afternoon, and a large question mark grew smaller. This Gargantuan work formed the balance of a nearly all-Soviet program that included Aram Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto, again with young William Kapell as soloist; the new Soviet National Anthem by Anatole Alexandroff, and "The Star Spangled Banner."

After hearing the Western Hemisphere premiere of the Shostakovich Eighth, over the air nearly three weeks ago, one had only scattered impressions of a vast musical canvas. A second hearing indeed reduces the size of one's mental question mark, and also an individual estimate of the work.

Apart from the more or less philosophical and sociological aspects of the Eighth—which have nothing whatever to do with intrinsic musical value—the Eighth now seems overblown and pretentious. One had expected more of a very gifted artist who has given us great pages in his previous symphonies and other music.

Mr. Koussevitzky traveled the score in one hour and three minutes. Such exhausting length does make a certain impression, just as a large man is more conspicuous than a small one. But sheer length cannot conceal the tiring reiteration of ideas which in themselves are hardly significant.

Where Shostakovitch's Seventh was vital and melodic, the Eighth is inclined to dryness and lack of motion. There is no memorable tune like that of the brilliant march in the Seventh. No advance in style or idiom is apparent; the composer seemed to have little new to state, and he said it in terms of his Fifth, Sixth and Seventh symphonies. It is true, however, that there are magnificent sounds and some terrific dynamic climaxes. No one will deny Shostakovich's orchestral mastery or his remarkable facility in establishing and extending musical moods.

The Friday audience received the Eighth Symphony quite cordially, recalling Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage several times, but they reserved their warmest applause for the Khatchatourian Concerto, which seemed a plenary masterpiece by comparison. Last October Mr. Kapell was most cordially applauded when he first played the Concerto with the Boston Symphony. His brilliant, muscular performance yesterday aroused no less approval. He is indeed a greatly talented musician.

Many beautiful orchestral effects abound in the Concerto, although it is fabricated in a mixture of styles recalling both Rachmaninoff and the Oriental touches of Rimsky-Korsakoff, as well as numerous touches of dissonant modernism. The main virtues are the work's vitality and condensation.

C. W. D.

[73]

PASTE OVER

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Premiere Broadcast of New Harris Symphony

AN EVENT of prime importance to the world of music takes place when the new Symphony No. 6 of Roy Harris, based on Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, is given its world premiere by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at 5:30 p.m. tomorrow over KGO and the Blue Network.

The Sixth Symphony, which was commissioned by the Blue Network last May as a contribution to American culture, is dedicated to the men and women of America in the armed services all over the world. It will be performed on the sixty-ninth anniversary of Lincoln's death by Booth's bullet on April 15, 1865.

The first movement of the work, entitled "Awakening," is a prelude embodying the opening passage of Lincoln's speech. The second movement, "Conflict," is a fantasy dramatizing war. The third movement is a long chorale of eulogy to the dead, called "Dedication." The final movement, "Affirmation," is a fugue reflecting the note of firm faith ringing forth from the closing paragraph of the Gettysburg speech.

Of interest to a people now familiar with the Gettysburg Address since childhood are some of the comments made by newspapers within twenty-four hours after the address was given on November 19, 1863:

Said a writer in nearby Harrisburg "... We pass over the silly remarks of the President; for the credit of the nation we are willing that the veil of oblivion shall be droppeed over them and that they shall no more be repeated or thought of."

An editorial in a Chicago paper reported: "... The cheek of every American must tingle with shame as he reads the silly, dish-watery utterances of the man who has to be pointed out to intelligent foreigners as the President of the United States."

A writer for a Richmond, Va., newspaper said: "... Kings are usually made to speak in the magniloquent language supposed to be suited to their elevated position. On the present occasion, Lincoln acted the clown."

Today few people can even remember the names, much less the words, of those whose speeches were so highly praised by the reporters present that day, and it comes as a shock to be reminded of the abuse and humiliation Lincoln suffered because of that speech. However, the martyred President has been vindicated and in the Harris Symphony is paid a measure of the tribute he has so long deserved.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1944

Harris's Sixth Symphony

Koussevitzky Leads Bostonians in Work by U. S. Composer

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, April 14.—Commissioned by the Blue Network last May, Roy Harris's Sixth Symphony was given its premiere in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

The composition, in four movements representing, according to the composer, "the great cycle of the intellectual or spiritual growth of people" as exemplified in Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, had as subtitles "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation."

Dedicated "with respect, to the Armed Forces of our nation," the symphony was received with moderate approval by the audience. The composer was present to take a bow on the stage.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
~~JOURNAL-COURIER~~

APR 16 1944

ENVOY TO VISIT BOSTON

Boston, April 15.—(AP)—Andrei Gromyko, Soviet ambassador to the United States, will make his first visit to Boston next Saturday, when he will be special guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a performance of the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, symphony conductor, has planned a program of Russian music which will include the much heralded symphony by the world-famous Soviet composer.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

APR

Boston Orchestra Introduces Harris' Gettysburg Work

Boston—(AP)—The world premier of Roy Harris' Sixth or "Gettysburg" Symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

The tall, angular, Middle-Western composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school was dismissed Feb. 12th because it was his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadow of Abe Lincoln has hovered over me," he said, in a Symphony Hall interview.

"The Blue Network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg Address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an ideal for freedom,' which had to be fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I woke up about 3 a. m. and I seemed to see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using the customary musical designations for the movements, he wrote in simple words. The first movement he called "Awakening," reflecting the opening phrases of Lincoln's speech. Then came "conflict," "dedication," and "affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said, crossing long legs and adjusting a startling green necktie.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg Address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'let freedom ring'."

Harris wrote this Sixth Symphony in Colorado Springs, where he is composer in residence to Colorado College. The new work will have its first radio performance Saturday night, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Apr 16 1944

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts Again

By BETSY WARREN

It was really good to have Dr. Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Friday afternoon concert at Symphony Hall this week. After some weeks of guest conductors, one is ready to re-appreciate Koussevitzky—a fact which he probably knows better than the rest of us.

The program arrangement, as is frequent nowadays, was compiled to please the two elements in present day symphony audiences, with something romantic, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3, something new, Roy Harris' Symphony No. 6 (first performance), and something from the classic or thoroughbass period, (in this instance, Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 3, No. 6) guaranteed to delight all but the itinerant attendant.

With all the pros and cons about the title "Scottish" given to Mendelssohn's third symphony, (which is no more Scotch than a pretzel) the many Brahms-like passages in the first movement, also at the very beginning of the first theme of the third, and the horn theme in the fourth have all passed unnoticed. Only in the second movement, do we hear the clear sound of the fairy feet of Mendelssohn. The fairy feet, as usual, raced through a terriffic presto.

Why Roy Harris chose to call his four tone pictures a symphony can only have sprung from the out-symphony-the-rest race which is now with us. For although these four movements of the symphony characterize the material from Lincoln's Gettysburg address in the best silent movie manner, there is very little in their form of procedure which would give even an impression of symphonic development. Throughout the piece, the music goes on, it neither builds up or fades out, but goes on. The second movement, called Conflict, recalls devices from the last movement of his third symphony, including the cut-off end. There were also a few Stravinsky dinosaurs for good measure. There was an interesting orchestral arrangement in the third movement: pedal in the 'cellos, melody in the double bass, plus a few solo-violin injections.

The next pair of concerts will contain Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 8, and Khatchatourian, Piano Concerto with William Kapell as soloist.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR

APR 15 1944

KEENE, N. H.
SENTINEL

APR 14 1944

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

APR 14 1944

STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE

APR 14 1944

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 14 1944

Premiere of Gettysburg Symphony

By TOM CHASE

BOSTON, April 14 (AP)—The world premiere of Roy Harris' sixth or "Gettysburg" symphony by the Boston symphony orchestra today brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

The tall, angular, middle-western composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school was dismissed February 12th because it was his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadow of Abe Lincoln has hovered over me," he said, during a Symphony Hall interview.

"The Blue Network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an ideal for freedom, which had to be fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I woke up about three a. m. and I seemed to see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using the customary musical designations for the movements, he wrote in simple words. The first movement he called "Awakening," reflecting the opening phrases of Lincoln's speech. Then came "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said, crossing long legs and adjusting a startling green necktie.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg Address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'Let freedom ring.' "

Harris wrote this sixth symphony in Colorado Springs where he is composer in residence to Colorado college. The new work will have its first radio performance Saturday night, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

APR 14 1944

…ris Symphony …oday At Hub

…ay in Lincoln County, Oklahoma, he …ent some of his earliest years be-

…opening phrases of Lincoln's …h. Then came "Conflict," …ication" and "Affirmation." …did not attempt to express …ally the meaning of the

---

COLUMBIA, S. C.
RECORD

…944

New Symphony Is A Tribute To Lincoln

OMAHA, NEB.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD

APR 14 1944

'Gettysburg' Symphony Premiere Tonight; On Network Saturday

Boston (AP)—The world premiere of Roy Harris' Sixth or "Gettysburg" symphony by the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday night brings to fulfilment a musical life uniquely associated with Abraham Lincoln.

Roy Harris

The tall, angular, middlewestern composer long has felt the influence of Lincoln. Born on Lincoln's birthday in Lincoln county, Oklahoma, he spent some of his earliest years believing that school was dismissed February 12 because it was his own birthday.

In later life, too, "the shadow of Abe Lincoln has hovered over me," he said, during a symphony hall interview.

"The Blue network commissioned me to compose a symphony of historic nature and dedicate it to the armed forces," he explained, as Serge Koussevitzky led the orchestra through a final rehearsal of the score.

Koussevitzky

"I had been thinking of Lincoln's Gettysburg address and realizing that Lincoln was the personification of a human ideal, an ideal for freedom, which had to be fought, bled and lived for.

"Suddenly one morning I woke up about 3 a. m. and I seemed to see the address divided into four logical parts. They seemed exactly right."

From that one thought the new work developed into its present form, he said. Instead of using the customary musical designations for the movements, he wrote in simple words. The first movement he called "Awakening," reflecting the opening phrases of Lincoln's speech. Then came "Conflict," "Dedication," and "Affirmation."

"I did not attempt to express musically the meaning of the words," Harris said.

"Rather I felt that the Gettysburg address was as pertinent a comment on world conditions today as one could find anywhere. For that reason, too, I used bell-like harmonies in some sections of the score, suggesting symbolically the words 'Let freedom ring.' "

Harris wrote this Sixth symphony in Colorado Springs where he is composer in residence to Colorado college. The new work will have its first radio performance over the Blue Network Saturday night, at 7:30, Omaha time, exactly 79 years after the death of Lincoln.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 15

BOSTON ACCLAIMS HARRIS SYMPHONY

Boston, April 15 (A. P.).—The new Roy Harris Sixth or "Gettysburg" Symphony was performed for the first time anywhere last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was acclaimed by critics to be by far the most exciting American musical work to come out of this war—a work perhaps destined to equal the famous Shostakovitch Seventh Symphony.

The noted composer was present and returned to the stage several times with Conductor Serge Koussevitzky to acknowledge prolonged applause.

The first part of the symphony, entitled "Awakening," reflected the opening words of President Lincoln's speech, with muted strings echoing the famous "four score and seven years ago" beginning. The second movement, "Conflict," concerned the civil war portion of the address, while the last two sections were entitled "Dedication" and "Affirmation."

The subject of Lincoln was imbued in Harris's blood from the very day he was born, forty-six years ago on Lincoln's birthday, in Lincoln county, Oklahoma.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first Boston performance of Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony, yesterday afternoon, and a large question mark grew smaller. This Gargantuan work formed the balance of a nearly all-Soviet program that included Aram Khatchatourian's Piano Concerto, again with young William Kapell as soloist; the new Soviet National Anthem by Anatole Alexandroff, and "The Star Spangled Banner."

After hearing the Western Hemisphere premiere of the Shostakovich Eighth, over the air nearly three weeks ago, one had only scattered impressions of a vast musical canvas. A second hearing indeed reduces the size of one's mental question mark, and also an individual estimate of the work.

Apart from the more or less philosophical and sociological aspects of the Eighth—which have nothing whatever to do with intrinsic musical value—the Eighth now seems overblown and pretentious. One had expected more of a very gifted artist who has given us great pages in his previous symphonies and other music.

Mr. Koussevitzky traveled the score in one hour and three minutes. Such exhausting length does make a certain impression, just as a large man is more conspicuous than a small one. But sheer length cannot conceal the tiring reiteration of ideas which in themselves are hardly significant.

Where Shostakovitch's Seventh was vital and melodic, the Eighth is inclined to dryness and lack of motion. There is no memorable tune like that of the brilliant march in the Seventh. No advance in style or idiom is apparent; the composer seemed to have little new to state, and he said it in terms of his Fifth, Sixth and Seventh symphonies. It is true, however, that there are magnificent sounds and some terrific dynamic climaxes. No one will deny Shostakovich's orchestral mastery or his remarkable facility in establishing and extending musical moods.

The Friday audience received the Eighth Symphony quite cordially, recalling Mr. Koussevitzky to the stage several times, but they reserved their warmest applause for the Khatchatourian Concerto, which seemed a plenary masterpiece by comparison. Last October Mr. Kapell was most cordially applauded when he first played the Concerto with the Boston Symphony. His brilliant, muscular performance yesterday aroused no less approvel. He is indeed a greatly talented musician.

Many beautiful orchestral effects abound in the Concerto, although it is fabricated in a mixture of styles recalling both Rachmaninoff and the Oriental touches of Rimsky-Korsakoff, as well as numerous touches of dissonant modernism. The main virtues are the work's vitality and condensation.

C. W. D.

[73] nphony

t Hub

County, Oklahoma, he his earliest years be-

Tribute
Lincoln

rases of Lincoln's came "Conflict," nd "Affirmation." attempt to express meaning of the Premiere

Saturday

the movements, simple words. The nt he called "Awak- cting the opening Lincoln's speech, Conflict," "Dedica- ffirmation." attempt to express meaning of the s said.

felt that the Get- ss was as pertinent n world conditions could find any- hat reason, too, I harmonies in some e score, suggesting the words 'Let "

e this Sixth sym- Colorado Springs composer in resi- rado college. The have its first ra- nce over the Blue urday night, at ex- time, exactly 79 death of Lincoln.

SIC Apr 22
NY HALL
hony Orchestra
S DURGIN

zky conducted the y Orchestra in the rmance of Shosta- Symphony, yester- d a large question ler. This Gargan- d the balance of a program that in- Khatchatourian's again with young as soloist; the new Anthem by Anatole "The Star Spang- the Western Hemi- f the Shostakovich air nearly three had only scattered vast musical can- hearing indeed re- one's mental ques- also an individual ork.

more or less nd sociological as- ighth—which have r to do with in- value—the Eighth blown and preten- expected more of a t who has given us his previous sym- r music.

itzky traveled the r and three minutes. length does make a on, just as a large nspicuous than a sheer length can- tiring reiteration of emselves are hardly akovitch's Seventh melodic, the Eighth ryness and lack of no memorable tune brilliant march in o advance in style erent; the composer little new to state, terms of his Fifth, th symphonies. It that there are mag- and some terrific dy- No one will deny rchestral mastery or facility in establish- ling musical moods. dience received the y quite cordially, re- vitzky to the stage but they reserved applause for the Concerto, which ary masterpiece by ast October Mr. Ka- cordially applauded layed the Concerto n Symphony. His o less approval. He ly talented musician. ul orchestral effects Concerto, although it a mixture of styles Rachmaninoff and the s of Rimsky-Korsa- numerous touches of rism. The main vir- k's vitality and con- C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Victor Presents Recording of Foote's 'Suite for Strings' Among April Albums

MILES KASTENDIECK

Some 20th century American music finds an immediate udience, a fact which Serge Koussevitzky has duly appre- ated on numberous occasions when he has programmed rthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E." By present-day ndards this work might be read- classified as old-fashioned, and n Old World music. Still, it nas a great deal of pleasure and no ready to be shelved because les have somewhat changed. It representative of an important ase in our cultural development, it belongs to the flowering of usical New England, representing e traditions of Paine, Chadwick d Parker.

Victor might well have made its lease of this suite as played by e Boston Symphony Orchestra's ing section its feature set for pril. That it did not do so is rious, for both the work and the rformance merit that designation.

An appraisal of Foote points out at: "Of his compositions as a hole it may be said that they are tonishingly original in an age hich has found it all but impos- ble to escape imitation. He is, like ost of the great composers, largely lf-taught, and yet there is scarcely trace of mannerisms, nor—what even more remarkable—of the mannerisms of others. His music the pure and perfectly formed xpression of a nature at once re- ined and imaginative. In these ays of startling innovations, the ncerity of which may not be un- esitatingly trusted, it sounds none he less spirited because it is un- uestionably genuine and relatively imple. It stands forth as a sub- tantial proof that delicate poetry nd clear-cut workmanship have not yet failed to charm."

All this is exemplified in his "Suite for Strings." Though refer- nces will be made to its being sug- gestive of Tchaikowsky and others, the music nevertheless retains its own individuality. Thanks to Kous- sevitzky it will not soon be forgotten, for he has seen to that matter through an excellent performance.

The feature set for April is a collection of transcriptions for orchestra of works by Bach and Palestrina, done almost inevitably by Leopold Stokowski. His training for organ has made it possible for him to do a great deal for this particular kind of music through transcriptions, thus giving people the opportunity to hear music that might otherwise be pigeon-holed. This kind of transcription, unlike a great many others, seems completely justified. The album contains Bach's "Sonata in E Flat Major for Pedal Clavier, First Movement"; "Ich Ruf' zu Dir, Herr Jesu Christ"; "Prelude and Fugue in E Minor"; "Es Ist Vollbracht" from the St. John Passion, and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te"; all o them notable works. Though playe by the Philadelphia Orchestra, they have evidently been recorded a different times, for there is considerable variation in tonal values The album is thus a serviceabl rather than a distinctive one.

Another April album of Victor i a collection of Welsh Traditiona Songs, sung in Welsh by the bari tone, Thomas L. Thomas, appro priately accompanied on the har by Edward Vito. The authenticit of tune, of text and of perform ance by a native Welshman ha resulted in an appealing album. Un fortunately, no English version o the text is provided with the rec ords, but the songs have a charm all their own and carry themselve accordingly. Mr. Thomas has th quality of voice to enhance thi charm and is usually at his bes when singing his native songs.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 17 1944

MUSIC Composers Trying To Repeat History?

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

THIS column is unable to report on the new Roy Harris symphony, his sixth, which was premiered Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but one doesn't have to hear it to discover a trend in modern composition. This one is called the "Gettysburg" Symphony, is in four movements called "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation," into which, according to the composer, Lincoln's immortal address divides.

It is probably not mere chance that the Associated Press in reporting the premier sees in it "a work perhaps destined to equal the famous Shostakovich Seventh Symphony." Maybe even Harris had his eye on the extraordinary reclame with which the young Russian's successive works have recently been attended, but let us hope not.

There would be no need to worry about it except for recurring evidences that we are in for a wave of documentary music. The German assault culminating at Stalingrad produces the Seventh Symphony; the rolling back of the Nazi tide inspires the Eighth, and haven't there been hints that a Ninth would be based on Russia's postwar operations on Germany?

On this side of the water we have Virgil Thomason's documentary music for films, Ives "Concord Sonata," Douglas Moore's "Devil and Daniel Webster," Hanson's "Merrymount" and didn't somebody write a tone poem based on Lindbergh's flight?

Some of these may be estimable compositions—maybe al of them are (this isn't a review—but it's still the wrong way t write music. The tonal art, fortunately, isn't worth a dime as a propaganda agent. And it hasn' much more use as a chronicle of history choir director had some 50 singers like these at his disposal, and in such enviable balance?

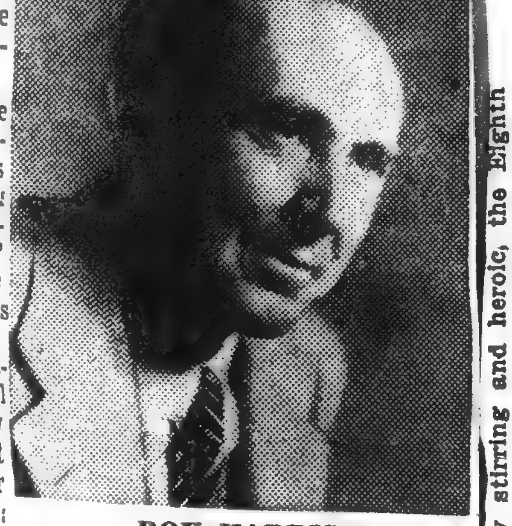
Second, in announcing a date for the forthcoming performance by the same group of Bach's St. Matthew Passion the one given here was May 7 instead of May 20.

But now it so happens that error doesn't count anyway because the performance has been postponed until next season. This was decided in order to afford better preparation and to insure the services of an orchestra.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

PR



ROY HARRIS

Harris Symphony Premiere Tonight

An event of prime importanc to the world of music takes plac tonight when the new Symphon No. 6 of Roy Harris, based on Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, is give its world premiere by Dr. Serg Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra over the Blue network and station WGH at 8:30.

The Sixth Symphony, which was ommisisoned last May by the Blue etwork as a contribution to Amerian culture, is dedicated to the men nd women of America in the rmed services all over the world.

The first movement of the work ntitled "Awakening," is a prelude mbodying the opening passage of Lincoln's speech. The second movement, "Conflict," is a fantasy dramatizing war. The third movement a long chorale of eulogy to the ead called "Dedication." The final movement, "Affirmation," is a fugue eflecting the note of firm faith nging forth from the closing paragraph of the Gettysburg speech.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 16 1944

Boston Symphony's Program Changed for Concert Tuesday

Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne Substituted for Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration".—Other Events

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Vill honor Rachmaninoff's meme

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its Providence season to a close Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. A change has been made in the program originally announced.

Instead of "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, "La Procession Nocturne," a Symphonic Poem (after Lenau), by Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1918 and 1919, has been substituted. This work, the first Rabaud wrote upon the completion of his studies in Italy as a Prix de Rome winner, was played at a Colonne Concert in 189 and received with enthusiasm.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony which he will conduct in memory of the composer who was his friend. Koussevitzky and Rachmaninoff, who died a year ago last month, were colleagues in Russia where the conductor published some of the composer's scores. Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" will complete the program which now stands as follows:

Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op 27 .... Rachmaninoff
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) .... Rabaud
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet, Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite) ...... Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

◆ ◆ ◆

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Eighth Symphony of Shostakovitch was well received in its Boston premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, but the cheers with which the Seventh, or "Leningrad" Symphony, was hailed a year and a half ago were missing. These came, however, at the end of the concert when William Kapell repeated his brilliant performance of the Khatchatourian Piano Concerto. This last is a taking piece, but a bit on the superficial side.

While the Shostakovitch Eighth has not lacked for publicizing, it has had no such build-up as its predecessor, nor were its origins so picturesque and appealing. If the Seventh is predominantly stirring and heroic, the Eighth is for the most part contemplative and ends in peaceful calm. Both works are too long for the amount of real interest they contain. The opening Adagio of the Eighth, for instance, lasting close on half an hour, could well be cut in two, and some might favor scrapping it altogether.

Were this amputation effected, the remaining four movements would constitute a very good symphony, complete with a slow movement—the fourth division is a Largo and a better slow movement than the first one. Most immediately effective is number three, a sort of martial moto perpetuo that could well stand alone. The second movement is also march-like, but makes considerably less impression on the listener. The pastoral finale may owe its origin to the fact that the symphony was completed in rural surroundings.

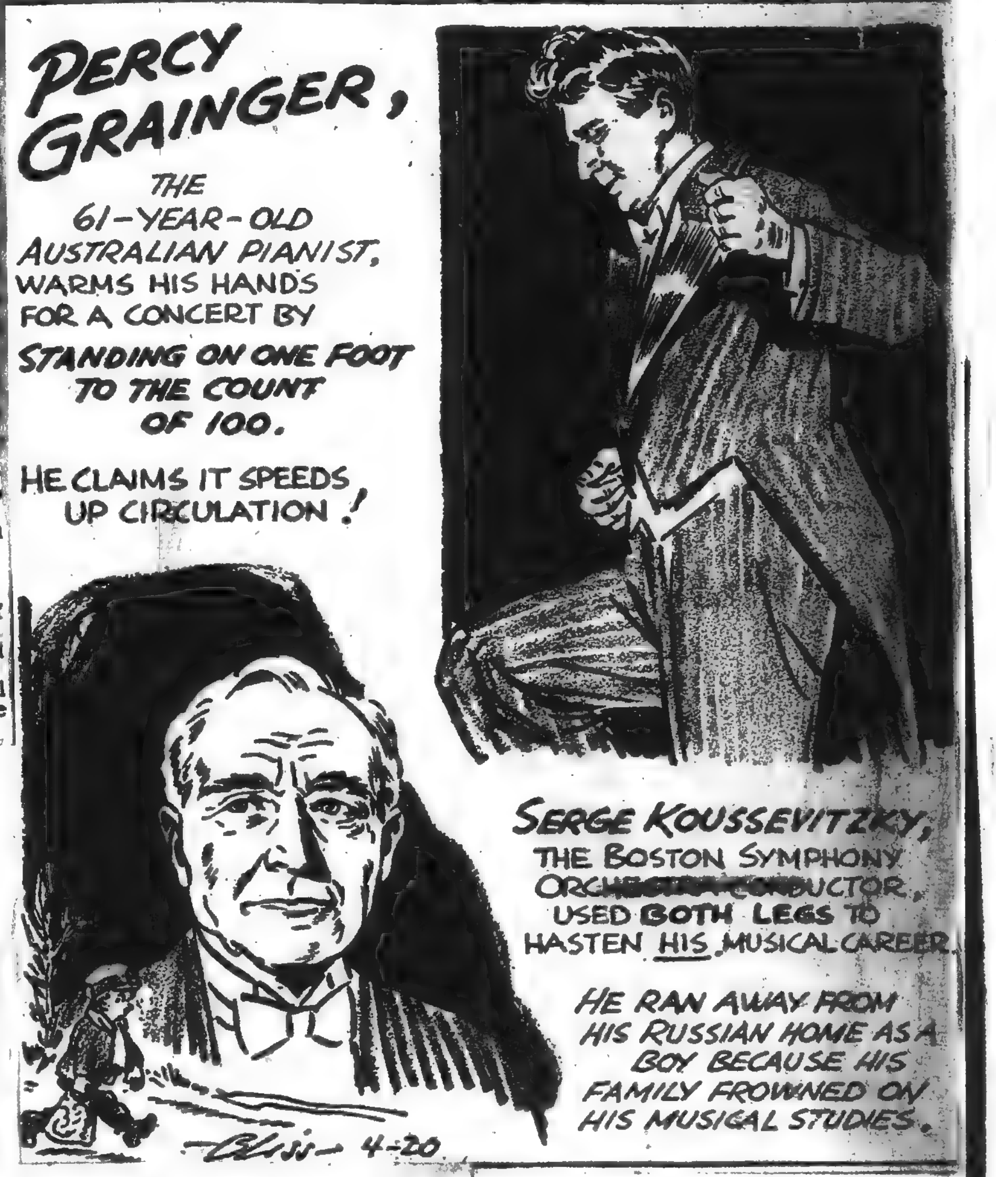
Not yet 40, Shostakovitch is too young a man to have written himself out. However, there are indications that he has done that very thing. He tends more and more to repeat himself, to rely on formulas; though since these last are of his own creating, they give his work the stamp of individuality. We must also acknowledge the sureness of his technique and his masterly way of putting things, even when he has nothing in particular to say. For hese reasons alone he towers over most f his contemporaries, and perhaps hen he stops writing symphonies to rder, when he begins again to create ithout the intention to propagandize, e will seem more the artist, less the xpert rhetorician.

At the conclusion of this all-Soviet rogramme there came for the first me at the Symphony Concerts the new ational anthem of Soviet Russia, a la- ored and perfunctory tune, as it eemed yesterday. "The Star-Spangled anner," and for once Dr. Koussevitz- y did not drag it, appropriately came st.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 20 1944

RIVATE LIVES By Paul For



PERCY GRAINGER, THE 61-YEAR-OLD AUSTRALIAN PIANIST, WARMS HIS HANDS FOR A CONCERT BY STANDING ON ONE FOOT TO THE COUNT OF 100.
HE CLAIMS IT SPEEDS UP CIRCULATION!
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, USED BOTH LEGS TO HASTEN HIS MUSICAL CAREER.
HE RAN AWAY FROM HIS RUSSIAN HOME AS A BOY BECAUSE HIS FAMILY FROWNED ON HIS MUSICAL STUDIES.
Bliss 4-20

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1944

RECENT RECORDINGS OF ART MUSIC

By JEROME D. BOHM

WITH the Petrillo ban on new recordings still in force, Victor's April list is again a lean one, including but three sets and four single disks. Included is an album of Stokowski transcriptions of J. S. Bach, W. F. Bach and Palestrina, containing the former's "Es ist vollbracht," from the "St. John Passion"; the chorale prelude, "Ich ruf zu Dir, Herr"; the Prelude and Fugue in E minor, No. 3, from the Eight Little Preludes and Fugues for organ; W. F. Bach's Sonata in E flat for Pedal Klavier and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te." These are played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski's direction.

Mr. Stokowski's skill in making transcriptions of this kind is undeniable, even if one cannot always agree with his sentimentalization of some of them in his interpretations thereof. His discourses of "Es ist vollbracht" and "Ich ruf zu Dir, Herr" are particularly disaffecting. Fortunately, the remaining arrangements are more honestly treated. The first side of "Es ist vollbracht" is recorded off center with disastrous results to the pitch; otherwise, the recording is good.

Other Victor Sets

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Op. 63, is performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This is the workman-like product of an eclectic composer who makes unabashed use of such familiar masterpieces as the Fugue from Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Handel and the Pizzicato movement from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The performance is a superb one and the recording is excellent.

Eight traditional Welsh songs are sung by Thomas L. Thomas to harp accompaniments by Edward Vito. The songs, which Mr. Thomas sings in the original tongue, are "David of the White Rock," "Idle Days in Summertime," "Counting the Goats," "Adieu to Dear Cambrai," "The Dove," "Farewell, Mary," "All Through the Night" and "Men of Harlech." The texture of Mr. Thomas's uncommonly persuasive barytone voice has been recorded with remarkable felicity and his interpretations of these songs of his native land bear the stamp of his musical sensibility. Mr. Vito's harp accompaniments add to the effectiveness of these poetic songs.

Single Victor Twelve-Inch Disks

Ernest Bloch's "Nigun" from his "Baal Shem" Suite for violin, is set expressively forth by Mischa Elman with able assistance at the piano from Vladimir Padwa. Richard Crooks sings Schubert's "Ave Maria" in Latin and Samuel Liddle's "How Lovely Are Thy Dwellings" with "white" tones, employing his tenor voice at full strength throughout both numbers. The accompaniments are by the Victor Symphony Orchestra, Nathaniel Shilkret, conducting.

From its treasury of old vocal recordings, Victor has culled Lucrezia Bori's delivery of "Sempre libera" from Verdi's "Traviata" and Caruso's "Recondita Armonia," from Puccini's "Tosca" and reissued them on one disk. Miss Bori's "Sempre libera" reveals her elegance of style, although she has not hesitated to simplify two of the florid passages. Caruso's "Recondita Armonia" remains unequalled in its tonal beauty and warmth of feeling.

On a ten-inch record, Eleanor Steber sings Griffes's "By a Lonely Forest Pathway" and John Sacco's "Rapunzel" agreeably although her soprano voice has not been recorded to the best advantage. John Quillan provides the piano accompaniments.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 23 1944

Koussevitzky Wins Honor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen by the Essex County Symphony Society of Newark, N. J., of which Mrs. Parker C. Griffith is president, for its annual Achievement Award this year. The award will be presented at a luncheon in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday, May 5, at Essex House, Newark. Among the guests expected are the Russian Ambassador, Eugene Droymko, and Mrs. Droymko.

nphony
t Hub

County, Oklahoma, he his earliest years be-

Tribute
Lincoln

hrases of Lincoln came "Conflict," nd "Affirmation."
attempt to express meaning of the Premiere

Saturday

the movements, simple words. The nt he called "Awak-
cting the opening
Lincoln's speech.
Conflict," "Dedica-Affirmation." attempt to express
e meaning of the s said.
felt that the Get-ss was as pertinent n world conditions
e could find any-hat reason, too, I harmonies in some e score, suggesting the words 'Let
."
te this Sixth sym-
Colorado Springs
composer in resirado college. The l have its first ra-nce over the Blue urday night, at time, exactly 79
death of Lincoln.

SIC Apr. 22
NY HALL
hony Orchestra
S DURGIN

tzky conducted the Orchestra in the rmance of Shosta-Symphony, yester-d a large question
ler. This Gargan-d the balance of a program that in-Khatchatourian's
again with young s soloist; the new Anthem by Anatole
"The Star Spang-

he Western Hemi-of the Shostakovich
air nearly three had only scattered vast musical can-hearing indeed re-one's mental ques-also an individual ork.
he more or less d sociological asghth—which have r to do with in-value—the Eighth blown and pretenexpected more of a t who has given us his previous sym-
r music.
tzky traveled the r and three minutes.
length does make a on, just as a large onspicuous than a sheer length can-tiring reiteration of emselves are hardly akovitch's Seventh melodic, the Eighth ryness and lack of no memorable tune brilliant march in o advance in style rent; the composer

little new to state,
terms of his Fifth,
th symphonies. It that there are mag-nd some terrific dy-
No one will deny rchestral mastery or facility in establishing musical moods.
dience received the y quite cordially, re-sevitzky to the stage but they reserved
applause for the Concerto, which ary masterpiece by st October Mr. Kacordially applauded layed the Concerto on Symphony. His lar performance yes-no less approvel. He ly talented musician.
ul orchestral effects
Concerto, although it a mixture of styles achmaninoff and the s of Rimsky-Korsanumerous touches of nism. The main vir-k's vitality and con-
C. W. D.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Victor Presents Recording of Foote's 'Suite for Strings' Among April Albums

MILES KASTENDIECK

Some 20th century American music finds an immediate udience, a fact which Serge Koussevitzky has duly appreated on numberous occasions when he has programmed rthur Foote's "Suite for Strings in E." By present-day [illegible] work might be read- [illegible] old-fashioned, and [illegible] music. Still, it [illegible] deal of pleasure and [illegible] to be received because [illegible] prevailing changes. It [illegible] of an important [illegible] development, [illegible] the flowering of [illegible] representing [illegible] Paine, Chadwick [illegible] Parker.

[illegible] played by [illegible] Orchestra's [illegible] feature set for [illegible] and the [illegible] estimation, [illegible] Foote points out: "An appraisal [illegible] "Of his compositions as a [illegible] be said that they are [illegible] in an age [illegible] impos- [illegible] to escape imitation. He is, like [illegible] of the great composers, largely self-taught, and yet there is scarcely a trace of mannerisms, nor—what is even more remarkable—of the mannerisms of others. His music is the pure and perfectly formed expression of a nature at once re-fined and imaginative. In these days of startling innovations, the [illegible] of which may not be un-[illegible] twisted, it sounds none [illegible] spurred because it is [illegible] genuine and rela[illegible] It stands forth as a [illegible] proof that delicate poetry and clear-cut workmanship have not yet failed to charm."

All this is exemplified in his "Suite for Strings." Though references will be made to its being suggestive of Tchaikowsky and others, the music nevertheless retains its own individuality. Thanks to Koussevitzky it will not soon be forgotten, for he has seen to that matter through an excellent performance.

The feature set for April is a collection of transcriptions for orchestra of works by Bach and Palestrina, done almost inevitably by Leopold Stokowski. His training for organ has made it possible for him to do a great deal for this particular kind of music through transcriptions thus giving people the opportunity to hear music that might otherwise be pigeon-holed. This kind of transcription, unlike a great many others, seems completely justified. The album contains Bach's "Sonata in E Flat Major for Pedal Clavier, First Movement": "Ich Ruf' zu Dir, Herr Jesu Christ"; "Prelude and Fugue in E Minor"; "Es Ist Vollbracht" from the St. John Passion, and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te"; all of them notable works. Though played by the Philadelphia Orchestra, they have evidently been recorded at different times, for there is considerable variation in tonal values. The album is thus a serviceable rather than a distinctive one.

Another April album of Victor is a collection of Welsh Traditional Songs, sung in Welsh by the baritone, Thomas L. Thomas, appropriately accompanied on the harp by Edward Vito. The authenticity of tune, of text and of performance by a native Welshman has resulted in an appealing album. Unfortunately, no English version of the text is provided with the records, but the songs have a charm all their own and carry themselves accordingly. Mr. Thomas has the quality of voice to enhance this charm and is usually at his best when singing his native songs.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 16 1944

Boston Symphony's Program Changed for Concert Tuesday

Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne Substituted for Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration".—Other Events

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Will honor Rachmaninoff's memo

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its Providence season to a close Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. A change has been made in the program originally announced.

Instead of "Death and Transfiguration," by Strauss, "La Procession Nocturne," a Symphonic Poem (after Lenau), by Henri Rabaud, conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1918 and 1919, has been substituted. This work, the first Rabaud wrote upon the completion of his studies in Italy as a Prix de Rome winner, was played at a Colonne Concert in 1899 and received with enthusiasm.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony which he will conduct in memory of the composer who was his friend. Koussevitzky and Rachmaninoff, who died a year ago last month, were colleagues in Russia where the conductor published some of the composer's scores. Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" will complete the program which now stands as follows:

Symphony in E-minor, No. 2, Op 27 .... Rachmaninoff
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) .... Rabaud
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet, Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite) .... Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

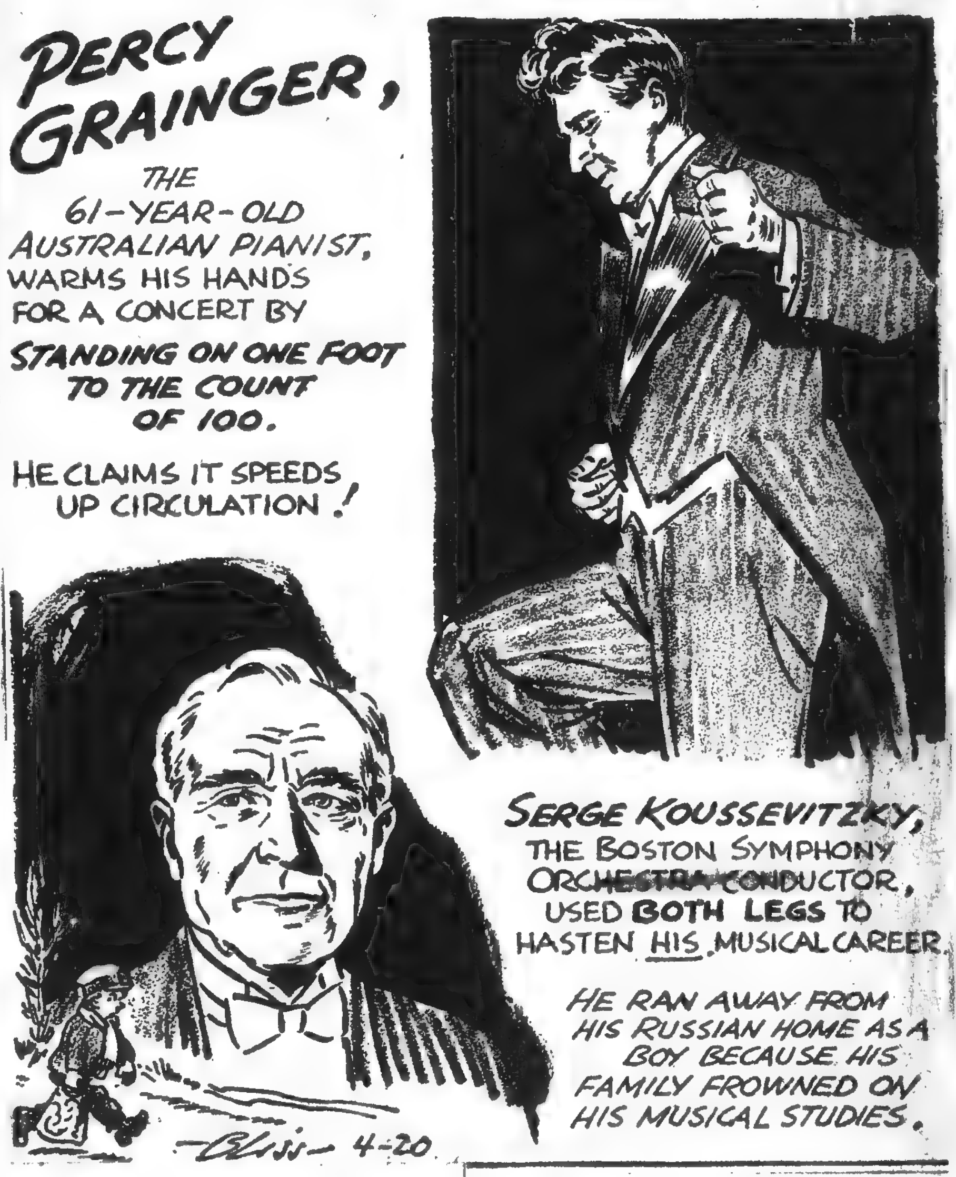
◆ ◆ ◆

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 2 1944

RIVATE LIVES

By Paul For



PERCY GRAINGER,
THE 61-YEAR-OLD AUSTRALIAN PIANIST, WARMS HIS HANDS FOR A CONCERT BY STANDING ON ONE FOOT TO THE COUNT OF 100.
HE CLAIMS IT SPEEDS UP CIRCULATION!
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, USED BOTH LEGS TO HASTEN HIS MUSICAL CAREER.
HE RAN AWAY FROM HIS RUSSIAN HOME AS A BOY BECAUSE HIS FAMILY FROWNED ON HIS MUSICAL STUDIES.
Bliss 4-20

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 1 1944

MUSIC Composers Trying To Repeat History?

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

THIS column is unable to report on the new Roy Harris symphony, his sixth, which was premiered Friday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but one doesn't have to hear it to discover a trend in modern composition. This one is called the "Gettysburg" Symphony, is in four movements called "Awakening," "Conflict," "Dedication" and "Affirmation," into which, according to the composer, Lincoln's immortal address divides.

It is probably not mere chance that the Associated Press in reporting the premier sees in it "a work perhaps destined to equal the famous Shostakovich Seventh Symphony." Maybe even Harris had his eye on the extraordinary reclame with which the young Russian's successive works have recently been attended, but let us hope not.

There would be no need to worry about it except for recurring evidences that we are in for a wave of documentary music. The German assault culminating at Stalingrad produces the Seventh Symphony; the rolling back of the Nazi tide inspires the Eighth, and haven't there been hints that a Ninth would be based on Russia's postwar operations on Germany?

On this side of the water we have Virgil Thomason's documentary music for films, Ives "Concord Sonata," Douglas Moore's "Devil and Daniel Webster," Hanson's "Merrymount" and didn't somebody write a tone poem based on Lindbergh's flight?

Some of these may be estimable compositions—maybe all of them are (this isn't a review)—but it's still the wrong way to write music. The tonal art, fortunately, isn't worth a dime as a propaganda agent. And it hasn't much more use as a chronicle of history.

choir director had some 50 singers like these at his disposal, and in such enviable balance?

Second, in announcing a date for the forthcoming performance by the same group of Bach's St. Matthew Passion the one given here was May 7 instead of May 20.

But now it so happens that error doesn't count anyway because the performance has been postponed until next season. This was decided in order to afford better preparation and to insure the services of an orchestra.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

ROY HARRIS

Harris Symphony Premiere Tonight

An event of prime importance to the world of music takes place tonight when the new Symphony No. 6 of Roy Harris, based on Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, is given its world premiere by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra over the Blue network and station WGH at 8:30.

The Sixth Symphony, which was commissioned last May by the Blue Network as a contribution to American culture, is dedicated to the men and women of America in the [illegible] all over the world.

The first movement of the work, called "Awakening," is a prelude announcing the opening passage of Lincoln's speech. The second movement, "Conflict," is a fantasy dramatizing war. The third movement is a long chorale of eulogy to the dead called "Dedication." The final movement, "Affirmation," is a fugue reflecting the note of firm faith ringing forth from the closing paragraph of the Gettysburg speech.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Eighth Symphony of Shostakovitch was well received in its Boston premiere at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, but the cheers with which the Seventh, or "Leningrad" Symphony, was hailed a year and a half ago were missing. These came, however, at the end of the concert when William Kapell repeated his brilliant performance of the Khatchatourian Piano Concerto. This last is a taking piece, but a bit on the superficial side.

While the Shostakovitch Eighth has not lacked for publicizing, it has had no such build-up as its predecessor, nor were its origins so picturesque and appealing. If the Seventh is predominantly stirring and heroic, the Eighth is for the most part contemplative and ends in peaceful calm. Both works are too long for the amount of real interest they contain. The opening Adagio of the Eighth, for instance, lasting close on half an hour, could well be cut in two, and some might favor scrapping it altogether.

Were this amputation effected, the remaining four movements would constitute a very good symphony, complete with a slow movement—the fourth division is a Largo and a better slow movement than the first one. Most immediately effective is number three, a sort of martial moto perpetuo that could well stand alone. The second movement is also march-like, but makes considerably less impression on the listener. The pastoral finale may owe its origin to the fact that the symphony was completed in rural surroundings.

Not yet 40, Shostakovitch is too young a man to have written himself out. However, there are indications that he has done that very thing. He tends more and more to repeat himself, to rely on formulas; though since these are of his own creating, they give his work the stamp of individuality. We must also acknowledge the sureness of his technique and his masterly way of putting things, even when he has nothing in particular to say. For these reasons alone he towers over most of his contemporaries, and perhaps when he stops writing symphonies to order, when he begins again to create without the intention to propagandize, he will seem more the artist, less the expert rhetorician.

At the conclusion of this all-Soviet programme there came for the first time at the Symphony Concerts the new national anthem of Soviet Russia, a labored and perfunctory tune, as it seemed yesterday. "The Star-Spangled Banner," and for once Dr. Koussevitzky did not drag it, appropriately came last.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1944

RECENT RECORDINGS OF ART MUSIC

By JEROME D. BOHM

WITH the Petrillo ban on new recordings still in force, Victor's April list is again a lean one, including but three sets and four single disks. Included is an album of Stokowski transcriptions of J. S. Bach, W. F. Bach and Palestrina, containing the former's "Es ist vollbracht," from the "St. John Passion"; the chorale prelude, "Ich ruf zu Dir, Herr"; the Prelude and Fugue in E minor, No. 3, from the Eight Little Preludes and Fugues for organ; W. F. Bach's Sonata in E flat for Pedal Klavier and Palestrina's "Adoramus Te." These are played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Mr. Stokowski's direction.

Mr. Stokowski's skill in making transcriptions of this kind is undeniable, even if one cannot always agree with his sentimentalization of some of them in his interpretations thereof. His discourses of "Es ist vollbracht" and "Ich ruf zu Dir, Herr" are particularly disaffecting. Fortunately, the remaining arrangements are more honestly treated. The first side of "Es ist vollbracht" is recorded off center with disastrous results to the pitch; otherwise, the recording is good.

Other Victor Sets

Arthur Foote's Suite for Strings, Op. 63, is performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This is the workman-like product of an eclectic composer who makes unabashed use of such familiar masterpieces as the Fugue from Brahms's Variations on a Theme of Handel and the Pizzicato movement from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony. The performance is a superb one and the recording is excellent.

Eight traditional Welsh songs are sung by Thomas L. Thomas to harp accompaniments by Edward Vito. The songs, which Mr. Thomas sings in the original tongue, are "David of the White Rock," "Idle Days in Summertime," "Counting the Goats," "Adieu to Dear Cambrai," "The Dove," "Farewell, Mary," "All Through the Night" and "Men of Harlech." The texture of Mr. Thomas's uncommonly persuasive barytone voice has been recorded with remarkable felicity and his interpretations of these songs of his native land bear the stamp of his musical sensibility. Mr. Vito's harp accompaniments add to the effectiveness of these poetic songs.

Single Victor Twelve-Inch Disks

Ernest Bloch's "Nigun" from his "Baal Shem" Suite for violin, is set expressively forth by Mischa Elman with able assistance at the piano from Vladimir Padwa. Richard Crooks sings Schubert's "Ave Maria" in Latin and Samuel Liddle's "How Lovely Are Thy Dwellings" with "white" tones, employing his tenor voice at full strength throughout both numbers. The accompaniments are by the Victor Symphony Orchestra, Nathaniel Shilkret, conducting.

From its treasury of old vocal recordings, Victor has culled Lucrezia Bori's delivery of "Sempre libera" from Verdi's "Traviata" and Caruso's "Recondita Armonia," from Puccini's "Tosca" and re-issued them on one disk. Miss Bori's "Sempre libera" reveals her elegance of style, although she has not hesitated to simplify two of the florid passages. Caruso's "Recondita Armonia" remains unequalled in its tonal beauty and warmth of feeling.

On a ten-inch record, Eleanor Steber sings Griffes's "By a Lonely Forest Pathway" and John Sacco's "Rapunzel" agreeably although her soprano voice has not been recorded to the best advantage. John Quillan provides the piano accompaniments.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 2 194

Koussevitzky Wins Honor

Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen by the Essex County Symphony Society of Newark, N. J., of which Mrs. Parker C. Griffith is president, for its annual Achievement Award this year. The award will be presented at a luncheon in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday, May 5, at Essex House, Newark. Among the guests expected are the Russian Ambassador, Eugene Droymko, and Mrs. Droymko.

Youth Concert Season En

Monitor Apr. 29 '44

Final Program From Haydn To Honegger

More influential in the cause of musical art than any college president or other high educational official should be Wheeler Beckett, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Youth Concerts, closing yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

For the academic administrator gets hold of the matter too late; Mr. Beckett stands in at the source. The impulse to compose the piece of music that gives America distinction among the nations is back in childhood, probably, rather than in maturity. Otherwise the thing would have been done long ago.

Mr. Beckett may not be a very obvious force in the community of today. He does not do great things with an institutional group of performers like the artists of the Boston Symphony, but he can win the enthusiastic interest of young folks from upper high school age away down the grades, calling them to town from everywhere round about to hear presentations of music such as grown-up audiences of a generation ago regarded as exacting.

The start is made where the last composer left off, and that could be understood at the final meeting of the season, when Honegger's "Pacific 231" came to notice. No boy or girl who listened to the interpretation of that by Mr. Beckett has got to be educated up to it some time. "Pacific" goes for music, that is all, just like the Andante of the "Clock" Symphony of Haydn, which followed it on the program.

For a moment of diversion, the conductor offered his own version of the story of the glass slipper, and no missing the clink of it when it fell off Cinderella's foot on the stair. Into another realm of the imagination, Mr. Beckett took his listeners with Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Then for a good showy finish, Grieg's Piano Concerto, with a fairy figure in the character of soloist—Hazel Hallet.

GALVESTON, TEX
NEWS
4/23/44

We read with enthusiasm in the current issue of the magazine "Life" an article on American composers by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky is one of the most ardent supporters of music by native American composers. His opinions on music in America are sound and worth listening to.

The conductor says that "if we in America want to produce perhaps as great a genius as Beethoven, we must give to the great body of people the elements of musical education. This is more important than the education of professionals." He also believes that music must be brought closer to the people. "The artificial barrier between the initiated and the uninitiated must be broken down."

One opinion which Koussevitzky expresses applies, we believe, to many things we undertake. How often must a necessary pill be sugar-coated, or an enticing material award be offered before the undertaking of a duty can be brought about? However, the conductor speaks specifically of our education.

The bane of American education is the overemphasis on "having a good time." Much that is offered to the American public in the guise of art is in reality momentary entertainment. Too many of those responsible for bringing music to people apologize for mediocre standards with the excuse: "We have to give the public what it wants."

Trying to discover what the public wants has brought gray hairs to many a man. Giving the public what they thought the public should have has plunged other men into despair and cynicism. The surest way to overcome this is, we believe, through sound education given by highly qualified teachers. We do not argue for a teaching philosophy based only on the belief that virtue alone is its own reward, but we do believe that it should be forcefully demonstrated to our children that little of worth is accomplished that doesn't entail some hard work.

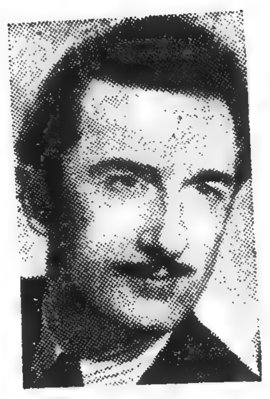
Health and happiness are both elusive in our life, especially the latter. When a child is blessed with both then is its mind most receptive. Unless our teachers are able to take advantage of this receptivity, then they become ciphers in the process of education. Education, one writer said, is really the possession of method. We can not believe that method in education plays a part of very great importance with the teacher referred to above. Sound method in the education of children is more important now than ever before. The child growing up in the postwar world will need the strongest equipment to meet and conquer conditions da capo al segno. . . . tgR.

David Nilsson

Arthur Fiedler

Conductor of the Pops, beginning a new season at Symphony ...lay evening.

BRYN MAWR, PA
HOME NEWS
4/21/44



IN THE WORLD OF RECORDED MUSIC

By Joseph E. Barone, Mus. D.

Director, Bryn Mawr Conservatory of Music

Current Recordings

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, is represented on Victor's April list with "Suite for Strings in E Major, Opus 64," by Arthur Foote. Dr. Koussevitzky leads the famous string choirs of the Boston Symphony in a glimmering and brilliant exposition of some of the finest of the early twentieth century American music.

Arthur Foote saw the flowering of New England musical culture in his lifetime, and he himself composed eight major orchestral works, innumerable songs, eight major chamber group works, and many choral selections, some of which were written while he was director of the Harvard Glee Club.

The "Suite for Strings" was composed in 1907, and it was dedicated to Max Fiedler, who gave it its debut performance in April, 1909, with the Boston Symphony. No doubt, due to Foote's training in choral work, the harmony in the "Suite for Strings" is close and the range is limited. It is rather Tschaikovskian in vein, is logically and clearly integrated, and is a tribute to a man, who in spite of the promiscuous samplings by his contemporaries of many schools and styles, maintained in his music a thorough craftsmanship coupled with a creative energy which has made his works lasting contributions to the musical literature of New England.

The Boston Symphony performs the work with great skill and evident devotion.

On Victor's single Red Seal record list for April is probably the most revered selection of religious music—Schubert's "Ave Maria." Richard Crooks has chosen to record this both because he knows and loves devotional music, of which this is a unique example, and because the graceful and lovely strains of the song are so admirably suited to his rich lyric tenor voice. The second selection on this disc is "How Lovely Are Thy Dwellings," by Samuel Liddle, which also receives excellent projection by this great artist.

MUSIC

22 '44

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 23d concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. William Kapell, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:
Symphony No. 8, Op. 65.....Shostakovitch
Piano Concerto ....Khatchatourian

It is a little to be regretted that so many eyes are focussed upon Mr. Shostakovitch's labors in the symphonic vineyard. The poor fellow can write a fine symphony, that no one will deny, but if there were ever the signs of the uneasiness which goes with being a "great" composer whose every scratch of the pen is reported to the public in a sort of awed whisper, those signs are apparent in the Eighth Symphony.

This is not to say it doesn't have its moments. Time and again there are pages of soaring beauty as each voice strives to rise to greater heights of expression, all combining at last in a passage of great nobility. And then, as if haunted by the vision of the musical world breathlessly buzzing "what will he do next?" he either launches into the most gigantic concatenation of orchestral sonorities ever achieved at the expense of the brass and percussion players, or he repeats the whole thing twice as slowly, or he extends it through incredibly diverse manipulation of contrapuntal devices. For the symphony is an extraordinary example of thematic unity. In short, and to be perfectly blunt about it, it amounts to what the New Yorker so wonderfully labels Infatuation With the Sound of One's Own Words department.

It is clear that Shostakovitch, whose every new symphony requires more time than the last, is leaning ever more heavily on sheer length to reinforce the grandeur of his conceptions. It is as though he felt the audience believes that the longer anything is, the greater it is. Mahler, to some extent, felt this, and 30 years after his death he is far more discussed than performed. Yet he, too, wrote some of the finest and most moving passages in music. Shostakovitch, whose kinship with Mahler goes far deeper than the deployment of his forces, seems headed in the same direction. Thus, in the Ninth (on which the composer is now employed), we shall doubtless have a work two hours in length and, if the war is won by then, a chorus of 5000.

The tendency, too consistent to be coincidence, is a pity, for Shostakovitch, whether all of us are bowled over by him or not, is a very fine composer. He is writing for his times and his people, and this honestly cannot but be admired. It may be that he is writing for posterity, too, but first, he wants to speak to his contemporaries. The fact that he does succeed so well in this is attributable to the glorious miniatures with which his symphonies abound despite the elaborately cyclical nature of the whole.

In the Eighth, for example, the whole second movement is in reality a miniature march-scherzo. It is extended beyond its logical limits, but it is on the whole most effec-tive. The closing moments of the first movement are very beautiful as are the final moments of the las movement. And in the meantim there are exquisite solos for Englis horn, witty solos for piccolo, and sorts of crashing climaxes whic whatever their musical merit, paralyzing to hear. Occasiona passages reminiscent of ear Shostakovitch works and, enough, this listener found him wishing he were listening to earlier work, such as the First Sy phony or the Piano Concerto, wh are much less self-conscious.

The Symphony was give feverish performance by the orch tra, Dr. Koussevitzky astonis all by the intensity of his re The concert, which was a gest Russian-American goodwill, to an end with a spectacular formance by William Kap Khatchatourian's Piano Co (which is a sort of Soviet Rh in Blue), and the national of Russia and the United

---

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

APR 23 1944

Boston Symphony Records Foote's "Suite for Strings"

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Performance of Classic First Heard Under Fiedler's Baton

By Col. L. R. Boals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, undoubtedly one of the greatest musical organizations in existence, is presented on Victor's April list in "Suite for Strings in E Major, Op. 63," by Arthur Foote. It seems appropriate that the Bostonians should have recorded the work, as it was given its first public performance by that orchestra in April, 1909, under Max Fiedler, to whom it was dedicated.

Foote was New England through and through. Born in Salem, Mass., in 1853, he studied theory with Stephen Emery, and entered Harvard, where he studied music under John Knowles Paine. He conducted the Harvard Glee Club until he received his M. A. in 1873. He became organist of the First Unitarian Church in 1878, and retained that position 32 years.

Unlike Paine and Chadwick, Foote did not go to Europe for instruction, but received all of his training in New England. He saw the flowering of New England musical culture in his lifetime. He composed eight major orchestral works, innumerable songs, eight major chamber group works, and many choral pieces, some written while he was director of the Harvard Glee Club.

The fact that Foote composed so much choral music is reflected in his Suite for Strings, in that the harmony is close and the range is limited. While it is music "Made in America," it is not without influence of European composers.

But in spite of such exhibitions as the Peace Jubilee of 1869, where an orchestra of 1,000 players and a chorus of unbelievable size were directed by Johann Strauss, and in spite of the tremendous impression of Wagner's earth-shaking chords and lush orchestral color, Foote's music remained serene, lovely and unaffected.

The prelude of the Suite, structurally and idiomatically, is evidence of Foote's tasteful craftsmanship. The second movement, with its plucked strings, is reminiscent of Tschaikowsky in his Fourth Symphony. The third movement is a brilliant Fugue worked out logically and clearly.

The performance of the outstanding string section of the Boston orchestra is superb and the recording is excellent. It is said of Kouseevitzky that he seems to infuse every composition which he performs with an almost magic-like quality—extracting the full measure of the work's content and spirit. This applies to his reading of Foote's Suite for Strings. The work is released in the two-disk album DM-962, price 2.50.

Welsh Songs by Thomas

An unusual addition to the Vic- r album list of Musical Master- eces is being made this month th the release of a collection of elsh Traditional Songs by Thomas Thomas.

Thomas was born and spent his arliest years in Wales, but was rought to the United States when 2 years old. While he studied and rained here, and attained great popularity on the concert stage and on the radio, as well as at the Metropolitan Opera House, he has retained a love for the music of his native country. It is from this great store of traditional Welsh songs that the pieces recorded in this album were chosen.

The quality of Mr. Thomas's he- man baritone voice is recorded with remarkable fidelity, and his interpretation of the songs bears the stamp of his musicianship. He sings the songs in the original language. The accompaniments are played on that national instrument of Wales, the harp, by Edward Vito.

The English title of the eight songs are "David of the White Rock," "Idle Days in Summertime," "Counting the Goats," "Adieu to Dear Camb[illegible]" "The Dove," "Farewell, Mary," "All Through the Night," and "Men of Harlech." They are recorded on four 10-inch disks, in album M-9[illegible] price $3.50.

Popular Records

The Sentimental Gentleman, Tommy Dorsey, upholds his title of the "Number One Sweet Band of the Land" with a coupling of two tunes which are setting themselves up as standard ballads. Both tunes, "I'll Be Seeing You" and "Let's Just Pretend," are played in the smoothe style of the Dorsey band and feature former Dorsey vocalists, Frank Sinatra and Jo Stafford. Both found their fame with the Dorsey band.

Last month Artie Shaw received an honorable discharge from the U. S. Navy after one year of overseas service with an all-star navy band. He toured the South Pacific area, entertaining servicemen wherever the band was able to play. In a salute to Artie's grand morale job among the fighting men, Victor releases a coupling of two of his best-known arrangements, "Any Old Time" and "My Heart Stood Still."

"Any Old Time" is played in Shaw's distinctive sweet-swing dance style, the vocal chorus being taken by Helen Forrest, who found a good share of her success with Artie's band. "My heart Stood Still" is strictly instrumental, featuring the entire band. Artie comes in for solo work on both sides of the record.

Bluebird has coupled two of the best records ever made by Lena Horne in its new release of "Good for Nothin' Joe" and "Haunted Town," with Charlie Barnet and his orchestra. Lena has established herself in the last two years as one of the greatest torch singers in the country. In "Good for Nothin' Joe," she sings a blues-lament with the expressive sincerity which sets the mood for excellent blues. "Haunted Town" is taken in much the same vein, and could even be a sequel to that number. This is Lena in her best voice and in tunes which bring out her ability to the limit. Barnet's band plays in the weird Ellington manner.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

[illegible] 1944

Luncheon to Honor Serge Koussevitzky

The annual award luncheon of Essex County Symphony Society, to be held May 5 at Essex House, will honor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor for 20 years of the Boston Symphony. The society, of which Mrs. Parker O. Griffith is president, in making the announcement called Koussevitzky the "guiding hand and spirit of a great organization, a native son of our ally, Russia and American by choice and an internationalist in his aspirations for peace for the peoples of all nations."

Leaders of organizations co-operating with the society and several of the stars of the forthcoming opera festival at the Mosque will be among the guests.

[75]

y Records
r Strings"

rmance of Classic er's Baton

under the direction of f the greatest musical on Victor's April list
," by Arthur Foote. It should have recorded c performance by that edler, to whom it was

nbral," "The Dove," "Fare-ry," "All Through the nd "Men of Harlech." They ded on four 10-inch disks,
M-965, price $3.50.

Popular Records

entimental Gentleman, Dorsey, upholds his title of nber One Sweet Band of
" with a coupling of two ich are setting themselves ndard ballads. Both tunes,
Seeing You" and "Let's Just
" are played in the smoothe the Dorsey band and fea-ner Dorsey vocalists, Frank nd Jo Stafford. Both found ne with the Dorsey band.
nonth Artie Shaw received rable discharge from the vy after one year of over-vice with an all-star navy e toured the South Pacific tertaining servicemen
r the band was able to play.
te to Artie's grand morale ng the fighting men, Vic-ses a coupling of two of known arrangements, "Any ne" and "My Heart Stood

Old Time" is played in distinctive sweet-swing yle, the vocal chorus being y Helen Forrest, who found share of her success with band. "My heart Stood Still" ly instrumental, featuring re band. Artie comes in for rk on both sides of the ird has coupled two of the cords ever made by Lena n its new release of "Good thin' Joe" and "Haunted with Charlie Barnet and his

a. Lena has established n the last two years as one reatest torch singers in the
In "Good for Nothin' Joe," gs a blues-lament with the ive sincerity which sets the or excellent blues. "Haunted is taken in much the same d could even be a sequel to mber. This is Lena in her ce and in tunes which bring ability to the limit. Barnet's lays in the weird Ellington

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

PR 20 1944

ncheon to Honor rge Koussevitzky

annual award luncheon of County Symphony Society, to d May 5 at Essex House, will Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, con-for 20 years of the Boston hony. The society, ~~of which~~ Parker O. Griffith is presi-n making the announcement Koussevitzky the "guiding nd spirit of a great organiza-native son of our ally, Rus-American by choice and an ationalist in his aspirations ce for the peoples of all na-ers of organizations co-op-with the society and several stars of the forthcoming festival at the Mosque will ong the guests.

---

is on the whole most effec-
The closing moments of the movement are very beautiful, the final moments of the last ment. And in the meantime are exquisite solos for English witty solos for piccolo, and all of crashing climaxes which, ever their musical merit, are yzing to hear. Occasionally ages reminiscent of earlier akovitch works and, oddly gh, this listener found himself ing he were listening to an er work, such as the First Sym-y or the Piano Concerto, which much less self-conscious.
e Symphony was given a rish performance by the orches-
Dr. Koussevitzky astonishing y the intensity of his reading.
concert, which was a gesture to sian-American goodwill, came n end with a spectacular per-mance by William Kapell of tchatourian's Piano Concerto ich is a sort of Soviet Rhapsody lue), and the national anthems
Russia and the United States.

ON DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their last Friday concert yesterday afternoon. With a repetition of the program tonight, the 63d season of the orchestra will be ended. To Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the scheduled music, Mr Koussevitzky added the Largo from the D minor Orchestral Concerto of Vivaldi, in memory of Cardinal O'Connell.

The Friday subscribers left with magnificent sounds in their ears. The Symphony in E minor of Brahms and Beethoven's "V for Victory" are music that kindle and then intensify the conductor's emotions. His readings of them are personal and fervid, admitting no distortions of anything in the printed score, but which heighten what the composers set down.

Following the scores of each, yesterday afternoon, one noted places here and there where the rush and flow of the music obscured bits of orchestral detail. All that was trifling, of course, and is here noted merely as observation and not as picayune criticism of trifles. In line, sweep, style and expression, both symphonies were done with that precision and distinction attainable only by a great orchestra bending to the will of a great conductor. For richness and depth of tone, the orchestra never sounded better.

There are certain traditional amenities observed at the beginning and end of each season. Foremost among them is the gracious custom of the audience rising, along with the orchestra, when Mr. Koussevitzky enters the stage. Yesterday a standing throng applauded him lengthily until he signalled for "The Star-Spangled Banner." Another custom is that of opening and closing a season with familiar music, to the usual exclusion of anything new or requiring a soloist. This final program is thus quite correct.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players again take a leave knowing, along with the rest of us, that the Boston Symphony is still securely in its Golden Age. The conductor's 20 years among us will, it is said, be appropriately honored tonight. Those ceremonies will symbolize the regard held for Mr. Koussevitzky both as a man and as a musician whose genius and energies have brought a long-continuing richness to Boston's musical life. The ministrations of Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra which he has led to such perfection were never more needed than today, when the flame of culture must be more carefully guarded than ever. It is always a little melancholy to leave a 24th program at Symphony Hall, even with the realization that a pension fund performance remains ahead. Yet there is compensation and reassurance in thinking that when the leaves turn brown, the musicians and the public that make the Boston Symphony concerts what they are once more will be in their accustomed places.

APRIL 24, 1944

Guest at Symphony

Associated Press

Soviet Envoy to United States

Andrei Gromyko, left, Russia's Ambassador to the United States, chats, after the performance, with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was a special guest at Saturday night's concert on his first visit to Boston.

NEW YORK, N.Y. TIMES

TURDAY, APRIL 29, 19

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 24th concert of its 63d season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 — Brahms
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 — Beethoven

The first and last concerts of the symphony season are always sort of special; the first in promise; the last in fulfillment. And so it was yesterday afternoon as Serge Koussevitzky brought his 20th anniversary season to a close with as tremendous a realization of Beethoven's Fifth as anyone is ever likely to hear. Thus the concert was a perfect fulfillment to what has been a fine; indeed, a great symphony season.

Everything has combined to make it so. In the first place, Dr. Koussevitzky, in his full maturity as the greatest all-around conductor now living, has striven far harder to make his 20th season his most memorable than he really should have at an age when most men would consider a little coasting justifiable. Those of us who have been privileged to attend rehearsals have seen that, and have been astonished at the painstaking, arduous preparation of such a familiar work as the Beethoven Fifth.

Then there's the orchestra. True Dr. Koussevitzky has made it what it is, and surely (as we have had occasion to see this year) only he fully commands its secret. Yet it is to be doubted if there is a more marvelously gifted ensemble of individual artists anywhere in this world; and men, moreover, of the greatest artistic sincerity and integrity. Few of us realize the terrific emotional strain and the technical responsibility of orchestral playing, while none can quite comprehend the nullification of the individual urge for self-expression or recognition which the orchestra, by its very nature, must forcibly exact.

Finally, there was the year. There never has been a time that music has been more necessary to the spiritual replenishment of the people than this, and surely there was never a time when the music of the masters spoke so clearly to so many.

All these things, then, combined to make yesterday's concert a particularly impressive event, and then tension was increased by the performance, in memory of William Cardinal O'Connell, of the largo from Vivaldi's D major concerto. The audience repeatedly called the conductor back to the stand to give him acclaim following his illuminated performance of the Beethoven, and so the season came to an end. Nor could anyone dream of saying "just another" season. It was magnificent, and unique.

APR 24 1944

~~Koussevitzky~~ Wins Honor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been chosen by the Essex County Symphony Society of Newark, N. J., of which Mrs. Parker C. Griffith is president, for its annual Achievement Award this year. The award will be presented at a luncheon in honor of Dr. Koussevitzky on Friday, May 5, at Essex House, Newark. Among the guests expected are the Russian Ambassador, Eugene Droymko, and Mrs. Droymko.

RAHWAY, N.J.
RECORD
4/27/44

Boston Symphony Conductor Awarded Annual Citation of Essex Co. Society

Mrs. Parker Griffith

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky

Following in the footsteps of other distinguished personalities, including Lily Pons, to whom the Essex County Symphony Society of Newark, Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president, has presented its annual Achievement Award, is Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony who has been selected to receive the Society's citation this year.

The award will be made at a luncheon honoring Dr. Koussevitsky on Friday, May 5, at 12:15 o'clock at Essex House; and among the eminent guests expected to attend are the Soviet ambassador and Mme. Eugene Dromyko.

Many of the operatic stars who are to appear during National Music Week (May 8 through 13) in the Symphony Society's Grand Opera Festival, to be held at the Mosque Theatre, will also be among the honored guests at the luncheon.

The Essex County Symphony Society, announces that due to the overwhelming demand for seats for the performance of Humperdinck's fairy tale opera "Hansel and Gretel," to be presented at the Mosque Theatre on Saturday afternoon, May 13, a repeat performance will be given the following afternoon, Sunday, May 14.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
Apr. 30 - 1944

Final Concert In Symphony Series

By BETSY WARREN

The final symphony concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in ~~Symphony Hall Friday~~ afternoon went out like a lamb, so to speak, with Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98 and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67. Vivaldi's Largo from the Orchestral Concerto in D minor was added at the beginning of the concert in memory of William Cardinal O'Connell.

When one hears two master's symphonies played with all the skill that one of the world's greatest orchestras and conductors together can yield, we again attempt to grasp just what it is that makes a masterpiece. It cannot be a series of nouns such as melody, orchestration, contrapuntal vigor. Because the whole is not mathematically the sum of its parts, but in art becomes magically something infinite. But if one cannot define the work of genius, one can try to describe it.

Such a series of statements embracing the term perfection, as exemplified by these two symphonies, may also serve as a measuring rod for modern music:

First, the music is fundamental, normal. It is endowed with reason. It embodies the essential. It partakes of the spiritual. It is alive. It progresses earnestly and unfeignedly. And almost more important than all, it warms the heart.

To see an audience sit back and absorb such qualities without the tempting frills of soloist, exotic guest conductor, xylophone, or electric beam, and then to hear long and hearty applause speaks well and joyfully for the musical future of America.

[illegible] Monitor April [illegible] # of Art, Music and the Theater

A Saturday Page

ucker

Serge Koussevitzky

Twenty Years of Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

With the final concerts this week of the sixty-third season, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rounds out 20 years of continuous service as director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Next fall he will begin a new season, for which he already has ambitious plans.

The season now closing has held an interest not merely sentimental. It has been stimulating enough to be counted a good year if there had been no anniversary to celebrate. The conductor's powers seem not only undiminished but enlarged. His artistic curiosity seems to have increased. The programs have included more novelties than usual, and a fair proportion of them have made a good impression.

* * *

The conductor has grown with the orchestra. After two decades he displays the same energy, the same vividness of imagination, catholicity of taste and passion for perfection; and he has curbed his native tendency to exaggeration. He still is essentially dramatic in his interpretations, but nowadays he seldom slips over into the theatrical. He likes sharp contrasts of tempo and dynamics, but he is less given to distortion than he once was. His excesses are the consequence of his enthusiasm.

As a program maker Dr. Koussevitzky has always excelled. He devotes himself to all schools, classic, romantic, impressionist, modernist. He has fewer blind spots than most conductors, and his are minor ones. He does not find the music of Vaughan Williams, for example, congenial, and he is not fond of most of the other modern Englishmen. This is not surprising; the Russian temperament is as far as the Irish from the English, and perhaps only an Anglo-Russian like Albert Coates can reconcile them.

But Dr. Koussevitzky plays Bach and Tchaikovsky, Corelli and Mendelssohn, Haydn and Debussy, Beethoven and Stravinsky, Brahms and Honegger, Sibelius and Shostakovitch, Strauss and Hindemith, Ravel and Mahler—each as if this were the composer he really loved. It is true that he is inclined to treat some eighteenth-century music as if it had been written by Tchaikovsky, but that is a result of his temperament and not of wilfulness.

* * *

He has been exceptionally receptive to American music. Harris, Copland, Barber, Schuman, Piston, Hanson, Berezowsky are a few of the younger men who are indebted to him. Nor has he neglected such representatives of the older generation as Chadwick, Foote, Converse, Loeffler, Hill.

Even in wartime, the conductor has held the orchestra to the highest standards. The loss in personnel has been small so far, and the unionization of the orchestra appears to have had no bad effects on discipline or performance. There has been talk of filling the few vacant desks with women players next year. This would be a departure. There have been several women second harpists at various times, but no other women players.

* * *

During the past season 13 works, by 11 composers, have had their first concert performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thirteen more have been performed for the first time "at these concerts." The most notable of these novelties have been Barber's Second Symphony, Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings and his Second Symphony, Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Bernstein's Symphony "Jeremiah," and Shostakovitch's Eighth.

The final program of the season comprised Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth. The Largo from Vivaldi's Orchestral Concerto in D minor was played also, in memory of William Cardinal O'Connell, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Boston.

Dr. Koussevitzky was greeted on his entrance by a standing and applauding audience and orchestra, and there was an ovation at the conclusion of each of the familiar symphonies.

[76]

LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 24 1944

Koussevitzky conducting puts on facial expressions which the orchestra sees but the audience doesn't. These are from March of Time film, Upbeat in Music, taken at rehearsal. The conductor goes along with various expressions of pleasure, pauses midway, goes on, then stops, raps baton and pleads: "I would like to ask you, gentlemen, to crescendo more."

AMERICAN COMPOSERS

BOSTON'S GREAT CONDUCTOR DISCUSSES THE MUSIC HE HAS SO STOUTLY CHAMPIONED FOR 20 YEARS

by SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

I was interested in American music before I came to America.

In Russia, where I received my musical education, I studied the past and contemporary music of many countries including that of America. From the moment I first began to play and then to conduct, I played new music as well as old.

In 1924 the trustees of the Boston Symphony invited me to become conductor of the orchestra. They accorded me absolute freedom to play whatever music I wanted. They also gave me entire responsibility for the success or failure of the concerts. After a while some of the older subscribers complained about the modern music on my programs. Some of them said they would cancel their subscriptions. I explained my artistic policies and why I played new music. There were no cancellations.

Upon beginning my work, my first desire was to know who were the new American composers. I already knew the music of Paine, MacDowell, Chadwick, Foote, Loeffler and Griffes. Most of them were New Englanders but they were greatly influenced either by the French and German composers or by a Russian, Tschaikovsky. There were a few other composers whose music I found either uninteresting or else impossible to play because it was not organized. And so I might say that in the early 1920s American creative music was barely alive. Its pulse was very, very weak.

The first new composer I found in Boston was Edward Burlingame Hill, head of the music department at Harvard University. Hill had composed very little for orchestra. I played what he had written and he began to compose some more. Now he has written many orchestral works. I think that some day they will be recognized as American classics. Unfortunately, his music is little known outside of Boston. That's partly because he's so modest. He never takes a step to promote what he writes; he doesn't even try to have it published. But some day his music will come out by itself.

Another composer I found in Boston was Walter Piston. He had composed only a single orchestral work. I asked him why he hadn't composed another.

"Why should I?" he replied. "Nobody would play it."

"I would," I said.

Four months later Piston brought me a suite for orchestra. Not all of it was good, but the second movement was extraordinarily fine. I performed it. A year later he wrote another new work, a much better one in every way. We played that one too. Piston wrote a third work, a concerto for orchestra. With that concerto he established his name as one of the leading composers in America. When Hill retired as head of the music department at Harvard, Piston took his place.

Only a composer knows what a composer suffers when he hasn't the chance to hear his music. Schubert never heard his own great seventh symphony. The first performance was given 12 years after his death. When a composer knows he can hear his music, he has a greater incentive to write.

When a few American composers saw that I did what I promised to do—perform their works—others brought their compositions to me. During the first few months of my work in America, I met a New York composer, George Gershwin. He had already composed the Rhapsody in Blue. I went to the première given by Paul Whiteman. For me, it was a big musical surprise. Although then he lacked great technical knowledge, Gershwin was a composer who brought a new idea in the expression of music. He showed the whole gaiety and gusto of American life.

I confess that I did not then think the Rhapsody in Blue suitable for concert performance by a great symphony orchestra. I was wrong. Later I became aware of this and asked Gershwin to compose a piece for the Boston Symphony. He wrote the Second Rhapsody and we gave its first performance in Boston. The rhapsodies were fresh and healthy. They were proof that there would be a real American music.

I would like now to explain what I mean by American music.

Mus[illegible] art is an expression of life and nature. It follows their evolution. Just as each country has its own particular aspects of life and nature, so its music has a national coloring. That is what makes Russian music Russian, French music French, German music German. Although all musical art derives from the same fundamental sources, its manifestation in each country is in accordance not only with that country's spiritual riches but also with its natural riches—its mountains, its rivers, its fertile land. We in this coun-

5, 1/4 X

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

and pleads:
do more."

MUSIC

YEARS

w that I ir works
me. Dur-America, ershwin.
in Blue.
hiteman.
lthough
, Gersh-idea in e whole

Rhapsody ce by a
g. Later shwin to ony. He its first ies were at there mean by d nature.

country
d nature,
t is what h music ough all damental try is in spiritual its mounhis coun-

AGE 55

land, 43, of Brooklyn, writes symphonic music, theater music, ballet musi Kid), movie music and first-rate books about American music

AN COMPOSERS (continued)

xt evening I played Copland's work on the first half of at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. At intermission th of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, an elderly man, cam essing room.
Koussevitzky," he said, "I must protest against that musi played. It was awful, terrible! If you play such music, ic will stop coming to the concerts."
I said, "I played that music especially for you—to pay my to you. We are in Brooklyn. The composer was born in n."
esident was too indignant to pay attention to what I said.
les, Mr. Koussevitzky, I want you to know that we engaged e Boston Symphony. There were only 24 musicians on the e, gentlemen, have patience," I replied. "Since you count

I invite you to count the musicians on the stage after the sion. We will play Strauss's Alpine Symphony. There will usicians. They will all be busy!"
years later we were in Brooklyn one evening when again sited by the president (a new one) with two members of d.
Koussevitzky," he began, "some years ago you played a y our Brooklyn composer, Copland. Would you be kind to play it for us this season?"
o!" I said. "I will certainly play it."
y Music for the Theatre is in the standard repertoire of every ymphony orchestra in the U.S. But the story is not finished.
season, among the new American works I performed wa n Schuman's Symphony for Strings. It was well received i and New York. But in Brooklyn the public was so cold tha o hurry in order to bring Schuman to the stage in time t is bow before the applause died out.
Schuman was in the audience. When her husband appeare stage with me she heard one dissatisfied listener in the nex y to a dissatisfied companion: "Who is that man wit vitzky?"
ust be Aaron Copland," was the reply.
ure that until today some people in Brooklyn have the ide l the modern music they don't like is written by Coplan mposers have technique

tive music in America has grown up in a different way tha in Europe. In music there is both creative and interpretiv
I call "auxiliary") art. European creative art appeared lon European interpretive art. The interpreter was a result of th
. To illustrate: Beethoven created music which demande i and great orchestras. Eventually these interpretive artist ed, but only after the music which they were to interpre composer I've ever worked with ha things. Stravinsky will never permit anyone to alter a no usic. On the other hand, Prokofieff has said to me: "If yo music too long—cut it!" Some American composers accept ions. Others reject them. e constantly ask me to express my opinion of this or that an composer. A judge of American music needs more perspec-n he has today. But looking back at my 20 years' intimate tion with American composers, there is one thing I can judge:

tegrity and courage! For these qualities I revere them. They ntinued to work and fight for recognition even in the face ical and spiritual starvation.
d Diamond is a composer who studied composition and ut never had enough money to buy an instrument. He has ur major scholarship awards for composition. But each pro-oney for only one, or at most two years' undisturbed creative When Diamond wrote his concerto for violin and orchestra working as a soda jerker on the night shift at a drugstore.
ars ago Mark Warnow, who conducts the Hit Parade orches-ught him a violin and gave him an allowance for food and til he could gain sufficient technique to play professionally.
e earns his living playing in the Lucky Strike All Time Hit Orchestra. I say this is an outrage. Such a gifted American er should not have to earn his livelihood in this way. Amer-uld not permit it!
what of Diamond's attitude? He is grateful for work which ow him to continue composing. He has just completed a new own emotions. That is not unusual. Beethoven had difficulties with some people who did not understand that he was expressing their emotions. And the critics of his time did not like his music.

Roy Harris, 46, born in Oklahoma, teaches at Colorado College, is here shown at New York's Henry Street Settlement. His new symphony is based on Gettysburg Address.

Anyway, is it necessary to understand everything in music? Can any musician fully explain just what determines his approach to music? What is music? It's a mystery, a science, a dream. There is probably not a single living musician who understands Einstein's fourth dimension. Yet the discovery that a fourth dimension could exist has powerfully stimulated musical artists' imaginations, broadened their artistic horizons and deepened their inspiration. I know that the music I make now is different from that I made before I knew about Einstein. I may not understand the first thing about his fourth dimension, but I know I'm influenced by it.

Our composers have courage

Each musician has his own individual approach to musical art. Each American composer is different from the other. I always bear this in mind. Usually, my relationship and dealings with American composers—whether John Alden Carpenter or Howard Hanson or Samuel Barber, to name three representatives of three generations—has been the same as with European composers—pleasant and friendly.

Last week I gave the first performances of Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony. Roy Harris is perhaps the most typically American composer. Copland in his book Our New Music wrote of Harris' music:

"... It is enormously important to us in the immediate scene. This is true, above all, because it is music of vitality and personality. ... We can let posterity concern itself with the eternal aspect of Harris' music, if any. The important thing is that it has something for us here and now."

Roy Harris is said to have a difficult temperament. I have never had trouble working with him. We enjoy the most friendly and intimate collaboration.

William H. Schuman, 33, born in New York City, won the Pulitzer Prize for music in 1943. He earns living teaching music to girls at progressive Sarah Lawrence College.

AMERICAN COMPOSERS (continued)

was already there. It was the same with Wagner. He created his operas—then had to hunt for and often train himself the singers, instrumentalists, stage managers and producers to carry out his ideas.

In the U.S. things have been just the opposite. Interpretive art came first, creative art after. When American composers appeared on the musical scene, they found already perfected instruments with which to carry out their ideas. Never before in musical history have so many great instrumentalists congregated in one country as here in the U.S. The presence of these virtuosi as well as the greatest orchestras the world has ever known offers an unlimited opportunity for fulfilment to the American composer. It is this opportunity which has led to his extremely proficient writing technique. Any composer can hear any day what are the actual technical possibilities in music. Therefore, sometimes a composer's technical development precedes his inspiration. In other words, he has the means to express a musical idea even before he has an idea. He can find the words before the thought.

Naturally, it has taken time for American composers to acquire their great technique and they have done so only in the past decade.

In 1930-31 the Boston Symphony celebrated its 50th anniversary. Among the works commissioned for the occasion was one whose music was so complicated that after looking over the score, I said: "This cannot be performed."

The composer argued: "But I tried to be as simple as possible."

I replied: "Then you didn't accomplish what you set out to do."

He was very much upset, so I made him a proposition:

"I tell you what I'll do: You study your own music and learn to conduct your own score. When you're ready, send me word. I'll arrange a rehearsal especially for you."

Six weeks later he arrived in Boston. I asked him what was the work's performing time.

"Sixteen minutes."

"All right," I said. "I give you the orchestra for an hour. You can prove to me that I'm wrong. But I warn you. At the end of an hour you have to stop. I must rehearse this week's program."

I went to the balcony to listen. After a while, I went to my office to do some work. When the hour was up, I came to the stage.

The composer was only at the fourth bar of his music.

Then he was convinced. He changed the unplayable places. We performed the work in Boston and New York.

Our composers have energy

Nearly always when I play American works, people come to me and say: "Yes, the composer has a fine command of orchestral technique but he has nothing to say. His music doesn't touch my emotions as Mozart's or Beethoven's or Tschaikovsky's."

The composer of today reveals in us different emotions than the composer of yesterday. Americans have tremendous energy, extraordinary gaiety, a passionate love for freedom of thought and activity. The American composer must express new facets of the fundamental emotions. We don't always understand exactly what are our the Saturday-at-8:30 P. M. spot on WJZ-Blue this week the Bos "Pops" succeeds that city's symphony for the summer. Herewith lightly informal impression of Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct.

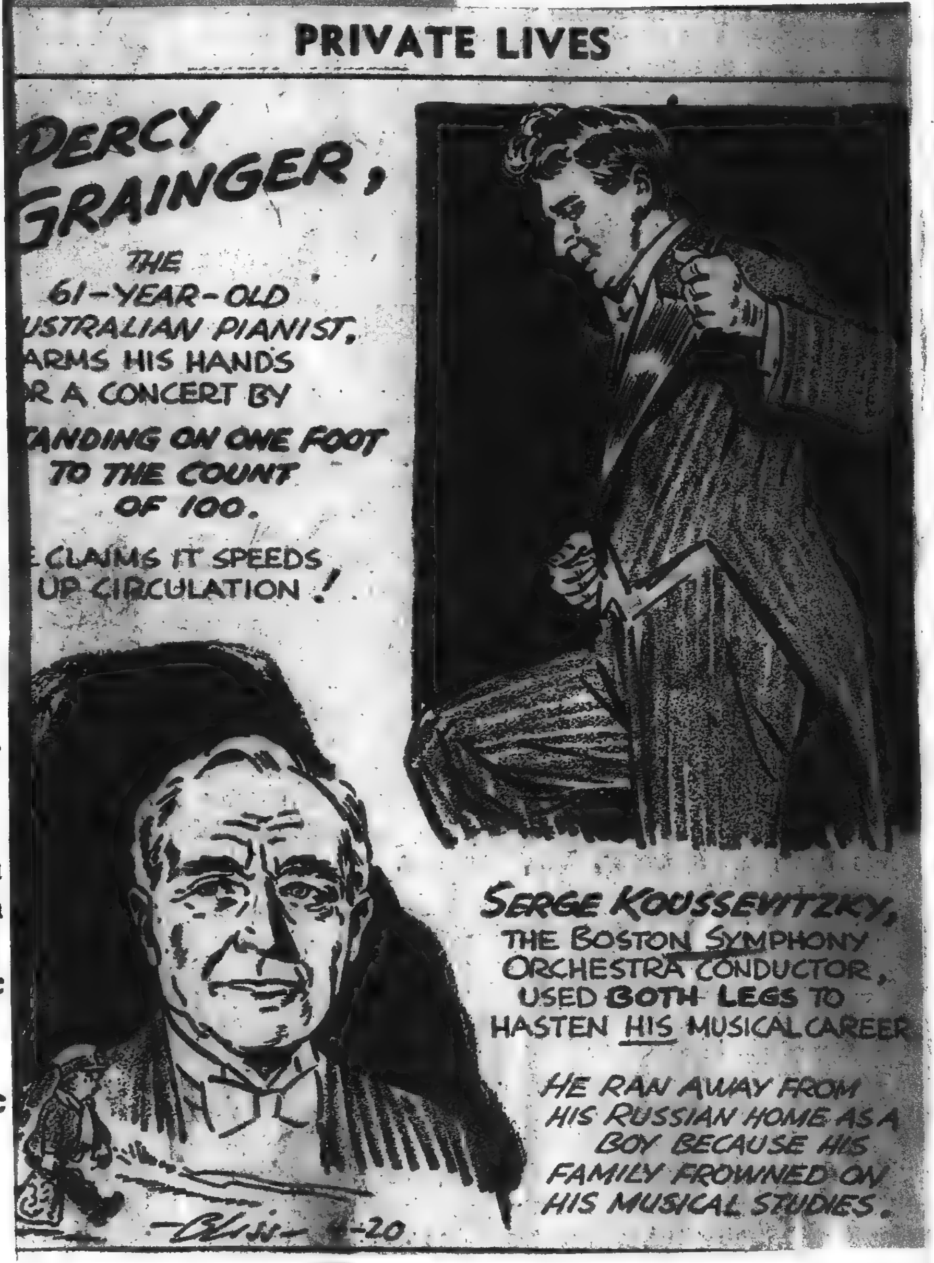
WATERLOO, IOWA
COURIER
P 20 1944



PRIVATE LIVES
PERCY GRAINGER,
THE 61-YEAR-OLD AUSTRALIAN PIANIST, WARMS HIS HANDS FOR A CONCERT BY STANDING ON ONE FOOT TO THE COUNT OF 100.
HE CLAIMS IT SPEEDS UP CIRCULATION!
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, USED BOTH LEGS TO HASTEN HIS MUSICAL CAREER
HE RAN AWAY FROM HIS RUSSIAN HOME AS A BOY BECAUSE HIS FAMILY FROWNED ON HIS MUSICAL STUDIES.
4-20

[78]

aton and pleads:
crescendo more."

HE MUSIC
O YEARS

rs saw that I m their works
hs to me. Dur-k in America, ge Gershwin.
psody in Blue.
ul Whiteman.
ise. Although vledge, Gersha new idea in ed the whole

k the Rhapsody
ormance by a wrong. Later
l Gershwin to ymphony. He e gave its first apsodies were oof that there hat I mean by ife and nature.

each country
ife and nature,
. That is what
French music
Although all e fundamental n country is in ntry's spiritual hes—its moun-
Ve in this coun-

EXT PAGE

d, 43, of B ... eater music, ballet musi ), movie ... about American music evening I pl ... n the first half of the Brookly ... At intermission th the Institute ... n elderly man, cam ng room.

COMPOSERS

ssevitzky," he ... protest against that musi yed. It was awful ... If you play such music vill stop coming to the co id, "I played that music especially for you—to pay my you. We are in Brooklyn. The composer was born in ent was too indignant to pay attention to what I said.

Mr. Koussevitzky, I want you to know that we engaged oston Symphony. There were only 24 musicians on the entlemen, have patience," I replied. "Since you count vite you to count the musicians on the stage after the

. We will play Strauss's Alpine Symphony. There will ians. They will all be busy!"
s later we were in Brooklyn one evening when again l by the president (a new one) with two members of sevitzky," he began, "some years ago you played a r Brooklyn composer, Copland. Would you be kind lay it for us this season?"

I said. "I will certainly play it."
sic for the Theatre is in the standard repertoire of every hony orchestra in the U.S. But the story is not finished. on, among the new American works I performed was uman's Symphony for Strings. It was well received in New York. But in Brooklyn the public was so cold that rry in order to bring Schuman to the stage in time to w before the applause died out.
man was in the audience. When her husband appeared with me she heard one dissatisfied listener in the next a dissatisfied companion: "Who is that man with ky?"
be Aaron Copland," was the reply.
that until today some people in Brooklyn have the ide modern music they don't like is written by Copland

ers have technique

music in America has grown up in a different way tha urope. In music there is both creative and interpretiv l "auxiliary") art. European creative art appeared lon pean interpretive art. The interpreter was a result of th o illustrate: Beethoven created music which demande d great orchestras. Eventually these interpretive artist but only after the music which they were to interpre mposer I've ever worked wi ... ha ngs. Stravinsky will never p ... yone to alter a no . On the other hand, Prok ... said to me: "If yo ic too long—cut it!" Son ... n composers accept Others reject them.

nstantly ask me to expres ... nion of this or that mposer. A judge of Ameri ... needs more perspec-has today. But looking ba ... y 20 years' intimate with American comp ... ers, th ... ne thing I can judge:
ity a d courage! For these q ... I revere them. They ued to work and fight for re ... gnition even in the face and spiritual starvation.
am nd is a composer wh studied composition and ever had enough money to buy an instrument. He has ajor scholarship awards for composition. But each profor only one, or at most two years' undisturbed creative Diamond wrote his co certo for violin and orchestra king as a soda jerker on ... e night shift at a drugstore.
go Mark Warnow, who c nducts the Hit Parade orches-him a violin and gave h an allowance for food and could gain sufficient tec ... ique to play professionally.
ns his living playing in ... Lucky Strike All Time Hit estra. I say this is an ou ... ge. Such a gifted American ould not have to earn his ... elihood in this way. Amer-ot permit it!
of Diamond's attitude? ... is grateful for work which m to continue composin ... He has just completed a new

Roy Harris, 46, born in Oklahoma, teaches at Colorado College, is here shown at New York's Henry Street Settlement. His new symphony is based on Gettysburg Address.

William H. Schuman, 33, born in New Y
943. He earns living teaching music to g

AMERICAN COMPOSERS (cont

was already there. It was the s operas—then had to hunt for a instrumentalists, stage managers ideas.

In the U.S. things have been came first, creative art after. Whe the musical scene, they found a which to carry out their ideas. N so many great instrumentalists co the U.S. The presence of these orchestras the world has ever kno for fulfilment to the American com has led to his extremely proficient can hear any day what are the actu Therefore, sometimes a composer his inspiration. In other words, he idea even before he has an idea thought.

Naturally, it has taken time f their great technique and they ha

In 1930–31 the Boston Sympho
Among the works commissioned music was so complicated that af
"This cannot be performed."

The composer argued: "But I t
I replied: "Then you didn't ac
He was very much upset, so I
"I tell you what I'll do: You s conduct your own score. When arrange a rehearsal especially for Six weeks later he arrived in work's performing time.
"Sixteen minutes."
"All right," I said. "I give y can prove to me that I'm wrong hour you have to stop. I must r
I went to the balcony to listen to do some work. When the hou
The composer was only at the Then he was convinced. He c performed the work in Boston a

Our composers have energy

Nearly always when I play A and say: "Yes, the composer ha nique but he has nothing to sa tions as Mozart's or Beethoven
The composer of today revea composer of yesterday. Americ dinary gaiety, a passionate lov
ity. The American composer m mental emotions. We don't al own emotions. That is not unusual. Beethoven had difficulties with some people who did not understand that he was expressing their emotions. And the critics of his time did not like his music.

Anyway, is it necessary to understand everything in music? Can any musician fully explain just what determines his approach to music? What is music? It's a mystery, a science, a dream. There is probably not a single living musician who understands Einstein's fourth dimension. Yet the discovery that a fourth dimension could exist has powerfully stimulated musical artists' imaginations, broadened their artistic horizons and deepened their inspiration. I know that the music I make now is different from that I made before I knew about Einstein. I may not understand the first thing about his fourth dimension, but I know I'm influenced by it.

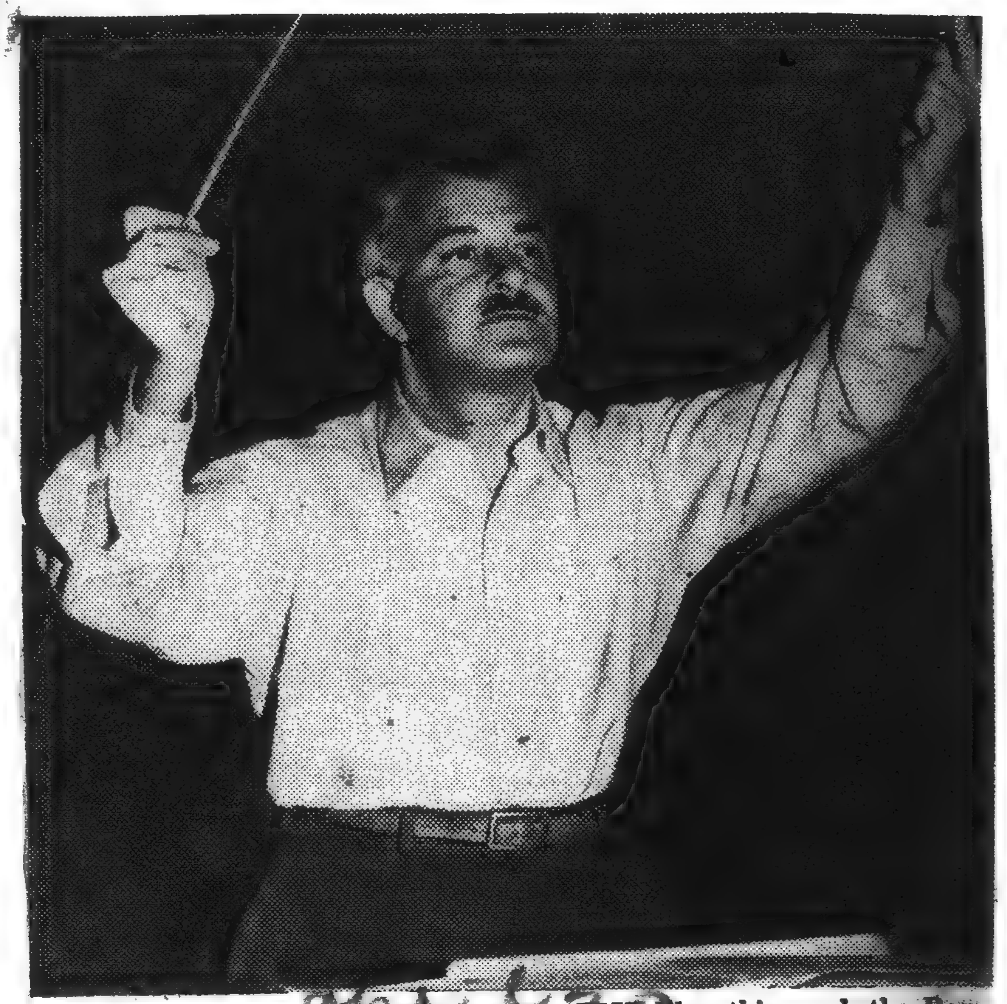
Our composers have courage

Each musician has his own individual approach to musical art. Each American composer is different from the other. I always bear this in mind. Usually, my relationship and dealings with American composers—whether John Alden Carpenter or Howard Hanson or Samuel Barber, to name three representatives of three generations—has been the same as with European composers—pleasant and friendly.

Last week I gave the first performances of Roy Harris' Sixth Symphony. Roy Harris is perhaps the most typically American composer. Copland in his book Our New Music wrote of Harris' music:

"... It is enormously important to us in the immediate scene. This is true, above all, because it is music of vitality and personality. ... We can let posterity concern itself with the eternal aspect of Harris' music, if any. The important thing is that it has something for us here and now."

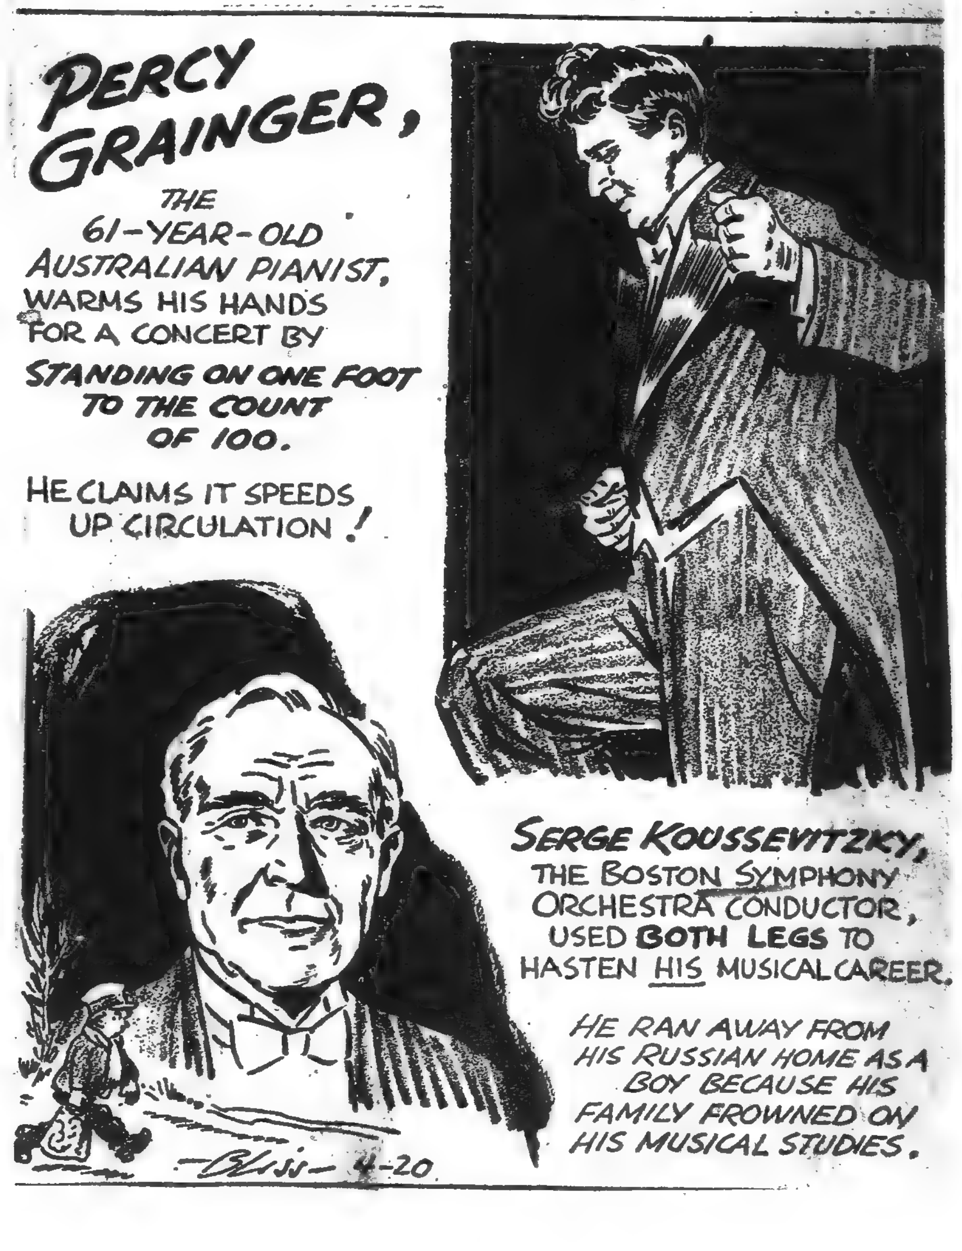
Roy Harris is said to have a difficult temperament. I have never had trouble working with him. We enjoy the most friendly and intimate collaboration.



In the Saturday-at-8:30 P. M. spot on WJZ-Blue this week the Boston "Pops" succeeds that city's symphony for the summer. Herewith a slightly informal impression of Arthur Fiedler, who will conduct.

WATERLOO, IOWA
COURIER
APR 20 1944

PRIVATE LIVES



PERCY GRAINGER, THE 61-YEAR-OLD AUSTRALIAN PIANIST, WARMS HIS HANDS FOR A CONCERT BY STANDING ON ONE FOOT TO THE COUNT OF 100.
HE CLAIMS IT SPEEDS UP CIRCULATION!
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR, USED BOTH LEGS TO HASTEN HIS MUSICAL CAREER.
HE RAN AWAY FROM HIS RUSSIAN HOME AS A BOY BECAUSE HIS FAMILY FROWNED ON HIS MUSICAL STUDIES.
Bliss 4-20

Assisting as flower vendors at the Grenfell Pops on Tuesday evening at Symphony Hall will be Miss Phyllis Long (left) and Miss Virginia Palfrey.

The New England Grenfell Association has chosen the opening night of the Pops on Tuesday to raise funds for the great work of the Grenfell Mission on the lonely Labrador coast. The work of the Mission is even more important in wartime and the five Grenfell hospitals are crowded with patients. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard of Newton Center is chairman of the committee planning the benefit and attractive members of the younger set will sell corsages, maple sugar from the Dog Team Tavern in Vermont, and Grenfell correspondence cards to the large audience in Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening.

ALISON ARNOLD

(Left) Miss Natalie Marston and her sister, Mrs. Peter Hayden Clark, will be among those who will sell corsages, Vermont maple sugar and Grenfell correspondence cards at the Pops on Tuesday evening.

(Right) Miss Rebecca Farnsworth, Miss Patricia Collens and Mrs. Frederick A. Archibald, Jr., will also assist at the benefit Pops on Tuesday.

(Left) Mrs. Roger W. Converse, Jr., and her sister, Miss Leslie Chase, examine an embroidered suede mitten made at the Grenfell Mission in Labrador.

Three more attractive sisters who will assist at the Grenfell Pops are (left to right) Miss Helen Mitchell, Miss Anne Mitchell and Miss Barbara Mitchell.

BACH TAKES HIS TIME

April 30

Tonight under the beams of a half moon is Witches' Sabbath. On April 30, so mediaeval legend has it, the secret black and midnight hags ride their broomsticks on a raging stormwind to the hellish sacrament with Satan on a desolate mountain top. But Walpurga's Night, as this is called, is also a symbol of hope, being evil's last stand in a fight already lost, for the morrow is Spring, May Day.

Faith in a morrow—on that note Walpurga's Night is being observed in our midst by the performance of a musical work which has had to wait two centuries for its comprehension by the public. This afternoon and evening at Symphony Hall, Bach's B-Minor Mass will be sung by the Harvard and Radcliffe Choirs with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Were this event to be translated from music into architecture, it would be somewhat as though the cathedral of Chartres—stained glass, sculpture and all—had been lifted out of France and set down at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues from 4:30 in the afternoon until 9:30 in the evening, with time out for dinner. No one could take in the full grandeur of either the music or the cathedral in so short a space, but Chartres or the B-Minor Mass, both are something to have seen or heard even once.

* * *

Bach himself never heard his work in its entirety. He composed it two hundred years ago; it was not printed in full until a hundred years after his death; and it has taken another hundred years for the world to grasp its magnitude. This may sound like rather a poor record for our world, but in the assimilation of such achievements by the general public two centuries is about the normal running-time, and we may be said to have done fairly well.

It was composed in five years, 1733 to 1738. That, however, is only in a manner of speaking, as a homely illustration from close at hand will explain. Out in Concord, Massachusetts, a century ago lived an ex-parson, Mr. Emerson, who read, hoed his garden, walked in the woods, and reflected. These reflections he wrote down in his Journals, from his Journals they went into his public lectures, and from his lectures into their final form, Emerson's Essays.

In the beginning is a lifetime of hard work. What was the weekly routine of Sebastian Bach? As organist and choirmaster of two Leipzig churches, St. Thomas' and St. Nicholas' (besides being Head Master of the Thomas School of fifty-five boys who were up at 6 a. m. in Winter and 4 a. m. in Summer), he must train two choirs to perform one cantata a week at each church on alternate Sundays with organ and orchestra. These cantatas he must himself compose. Counting feast days this means fifty-nine cantatas annually, and a yearly Passion Music for Good Friday. Bach comes to Leipzig in 1723 at the age of thirty-five with thirty cantatas already written and in the next twenty years he writes 265 more. Only one of this whole collection, 295 in all, is published in his lifetime; they are now treasures of musical literature which choral societies are organized expressly to sing. As Emerson's Journals are to his Essays, so are Bach's weekly cantatas to his major works—out of these immense quarries of practice, experiment, and steadily ripening mastery Bach hews his colossi, the "Matthew Passion Music" and the B-Minor Mass.

* * *

Now any man who has spent the better part of a lifetime developing a powerful dynamo of talent in his head and heart finally asks himself, "What would happen if I turned on the juice full force?" He turns it on. What happens is the last Quartets of Beethoven, Wagner's "Tristan" and Bach's B-Minor Mass. The public is bewildered? What of it? We can wait; we have all the time there is.

Bach died blind in 1750, aged sixty-five. He was buried in an unmarked grave; his fellow-Leipzigers never suspected that they had lost anything more than a crochety, if celebrated, virtuoso organist; the fashion in music, including that of his own sons, abandoned his style of composition; quantities of his manuscript were destroyed; and the very location of his grave was lost.

But Time is nothing if not ironist. Years, decades later, Carl Zelter, worthy musician and a friend of Goethe, came upon the manuscript of the "Matthew Passion Music" put up as waste paper at an auction of the goods of a deceased cheese-monger; and the music of this masterwork by a devout Christian was again performed exactly one hundred years after its first performance, again at Leipzig, again on Good Friday (this time in 1829), thanks to the devotion of that fine composer and great gentleman, Felix Mendelssohn, a Jew.

"Disiecti membra poetae," sings Horace of Orpheus torn to pieces by mad Maenads, and "dismembered limbs of a poet" describes the condition of the B-Minor Mass for a century after Bach's death. Its fragments having been gradually reassembled, the work was finally published in its complete form by the Bach Society in 1856. The first complete performance was in Berlin, 1861; yet as recently as twenty years ago the only place on this continent where it could be heard in its entirety was at Bethelehem, Pennsylvania, performed by the Bach Choir which is descended from the 18th century religious colony of Moravian German settlers. It was there brought to full performance for the first time in 1900. The Cecilia Society in Boston followed in 1901, and since the year 1931 we have had six performances of the Mass in Symphony Hall and one at Tanglewood—although the Handel and Haydn Society had sung much of it here as early as 1887. During the past decade it has been performed in many of the leading cities of the United States, and in college towns; occasionally it could be heard by radio broadcast and until recently was obtainable in phonograph recordings. On May 6 it will be performed in St. Louis, and later in the Spring, as annually, at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. Thus is Bach's greatest work being domesticated by us.

* * *

Man lives by imagination. Those who have more of it help those who have less. Artists are masters of this mysterious force, and it is they who create imaginary worlds which are seen and loved by others, and these others are then not content until they have made the worlds of imagination over into substantial realities. Thus the human race and its civilizations are largely the creation of its men of genius. These win their way by the belief that their way is won. When the founders of the American Republic were still schoolboys wearing their hair in pigtails tied with bow ribbons, Bach's B-Minor Mass was already written; two centuries later we are ready for it. This is a sociological fact of prime significance; for however destructive men may be, the point to grasp is that there also exists a certain type of man who contrives somehow to save much, perhaps most, of what is precious in our common heritage and to transmit this from one age to another.

On Walpurga's Night, April 30, 1944, at the height of Witches' Sabbath, Bach's B-Minor Mass, sung in this city, is an act of faith in a morrow. For a morrow will surely come, and it will be Spring, and May Day.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Further Ruminations on The Season Gone by

April 30 '44

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is curious (to continue last week's discussion of the new music given by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season) that modern musical audiences are so docile in the acceptance of what might be called "difficult" music. In no instance this year was a first performance—and there were 18 all together—received coolly. On the contrary, every one of the premieres was followed by the most extraordinary demonstration of approval.

Sometimes this was due to the presence in the audience of the composer—and one cannot imagine an American audience failing to give a composer a cordial reception—and sometimes it was due to an especially rousing performance by the orchestra. Indeed, sometimes it was due to the fact that the audience actually did like the music it heard, and liked it very much.

(For it is a curious fact that the amount of applause a new composition receives indicates in no measures the audience's actual like or dislike of the music it hears. It is not at all unusual to observe a symphony subscriber applauding like mad and even emitting a "bravo" or two, then turning to his seat neighbor and saying "wasn't that the most ghastly thing you ever heard?" The fact is, the American audience is too kind-hearted not to applaud anything or anybody making a try at something or other, reserving its candid opinion for the walk or drive home.)

Be it as it may, there were many things during the second half of the season deserving of all the applause they got. Chiefest of these, unquestionably, was Leonard Bernstein's "Jeremiah" Symphony, perhaps the only new composition which could be called wholly honest, wholly unpretentious and wholly beautiful. Mr. Bernstein was writing music for the musical public and not for the connoisseurs. He was expressing himself, first of all, but he sought recognition from the people, not from other composers. And it is this last thing, this haunting fear present-day composers ers have of the sneers or intellectual snobberies of other composers, that results in the horrible "cleverness" and remoteness that plagues our contemporary music. For 99 out of 100 composers are not writing for the public but for themselves and for other composers. And as every composer naturally polishes the apple for his composing friends to achieve similar buttering up when he composes something, it's a vicious and stupid circle. Bernstein, I am convinced, sought no compliments on his scholastic cleverness from the League of Composers; he sought public recognition honestly, and he got it. And more power to him!

Consider Mr. Harris, on the other hand. As he possesses one of the most formidable orchestral technics of any contemporary American, he employs it for all he's worth, and no serious musician could but admire his scoring, his clever use of the most modern contrapuntal devices and so forth. But this is pure technic and the audience is not interested in technic. Results are what count. However, the audience can be led to believe that something is not what it is if there is a label of sufficient drama or emotional significance. To Mr. Harris, what could be more suitable to this than something about Lincoln? Indeed, yes, and the Gettysburg Address in particular, which we all admire and love. The first movement, then, shall be "Awakening." As this is a highly illustrative subject, he begins with one orchestral voice and ends with all, triple forte. Very suggestive, of course. "Conflict" comes next, and that is easy to portray in music; Beethoven, everyone has done it. But how, precisely, can he musically represent such abstractions as "Dedication" and "Affirmation" in terms we can instantly recognize? Baffled, Mr. Harris turns to a chorale and fugue and hopes that nobody will notice. Well, it seems to me that anyone with half an ear could recognize the whole as empty and pretentious bombast, suitable only for classroom discussion.

Another controversial item was the Shostakovitch Eighth Symphony, a work depending for its impressiveness chiefly on its length. That it had some moments of great, illuminated beauty no one could deny, but on the other hand no one could say that the extension of material designed for 40 minutes into a symphony lasting 63 minutes is easily forgiven, no matter how good it was.

To take the others is order, there was Hanson's Fourth, a symphony of some immediate appeal but a bit on the facilely emotional side; Martinu's Violin Concerto, a composition of unchallenged mastery; Stravinsky's inconsequential but attractive Norwegian Moods; Barber's very acceptable Air Force Symphony; Creston's brief but most eloquent "Frontiers;" Gretchaninoff's Oecumenical Mass (which could hardly be termed modern music), and Walter Piston's Second Symphony. At the time this didn't seem to effect me one way or the other, and I'm afraid I was a little cavalier with it, as I heard it the following night and couldn't believe I had not gone all out for it. It proved to be, on second hearing, music of warmth, sustained beauty and of a certain nobility or gentleness of spirit that quite overcame the first impression of scholastic austerity or, if you will, music for other composers.

As for the standard repertoire on the season's program, it was just that, and little more. We did have Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a "new" Haydn Symphony and Roussel's F major Suite; the rest were chiefly yearly offerings. But it was the new music (as much as the way the old was performed) which made the season so notable, and for that we can only say "hats off to Serge Koussevitzky!"

Pops Begin at Symphony Hall Tuesday Night

Ap 30

With the month of May comes High Spring and also the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famous musical entertainments, the Pops Concerts, which begin their 59th season in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening. At the same time Arthur Fiedler commences his 15th season as conductor of the 90 Boston Symphony men who play at these concerts.

As in the past, Symphony Hall will have been redecorated in green and gold, there will be tables on the floor, refreshments will be served, the pleasant clink of glasses and the light buzz of conversation will accompany the music.

Mr. Fiedler has chosen some especially interesting programs for the opening week. Wednesday evening Leo Litwin will be the soloist in Richard Addinsell's "Warsaw" Piano Concerto; Denise Bacon will play Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto Friday, and Leonard Bernstein will appear both as conductor and soloist (in Ravel's Piano Concerto, which Louis Speyer will conduct) Sunday evening next. All concerts begin at 8:30. The program through Monday, May 8, follow:

Tuesday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; Overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Gavotte from "Classical Symphony," March from "Love of Three Oranges," Prokofieff; "Voices of Spring," Strauss; "Facade" Suite, Walton; "Wachet Auf," from Cantata 160, Bach; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "Oklahoma" selections, Rodgers; Holiday for Strings, Rose; Salute to Our Fighting Forces, Arr. by Bodge.

Wednesday—Washington Post March, Sousa; Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Berlioz; Circus Polka, Stravinsky; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Valse Triste, Sibelius; Overture, "William Tell," Rossini; Warsaw Concerto, (soloist, Leo Litwin, piano) Addinsell; Waltz of the Flowers, Tchaikovsky; Night and Day, Porter; Knightsbridge March, Eric Coates.

Thursday—March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," Arr. by Pochon; Waltz Scene from "Faust," Gounod; Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Pavane for a Dead Infanta, Ravel; Finale, Symphony No. 4, Tchaikovsky; "Espana" Waltzes, Waldteufel; "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," Morton Gould; Farandole from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet.

Friday—"Day of Victory" March, Persis Cox; Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Glinka; Prelude, minuet and Fugue for Strings, Katharine Conning; Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky; Piano Concerto No. 1 in G minor (soloist: Denise Bacon), Mendelssohn; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss; "As Time Goes By," Hupfeldt; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," Valerius.

POPS CONDUCTOR—Arthur Fiedler commences his 15th season as conductor of the Pops Concerts which begin in Symphony Hall Tuesday evening.

Saturday—"Rakoczy" March, Berlioz; Overture to "Die Fledermaus," Strauss; Suite of English Folk Songs, Vaughan Williams; "Girls of Baden" Waltzes, Komzak; Salute to Our Fighting Forces, arr. by Bodge. Regis College Glee Club, conducted by Mary Louise Gallen: Americana, Gibb; Agnus Dei, Bizet; "Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life," Herbert; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Bolero, Ravel; "Semper Fidelis," Sousa.

Sunday, May 7 (Leonard Bernstein Conducting)—Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; Suite from "Our Town," Copland; "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikovsky; Piano Concerto, Ravel (soloist, Leonard Bernstein; conductor, Louis Speyer); Overture to "The Bat," Strauss; "Emperor" Waltzes, Strauss; Hungarian Dances Nos. 5 and 6, Brahms.

Monday, May 8—"Calling All Workers," March, Coates; Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Country Gardens, Grainger; Soviet Iron Works, Mossolov; Cottillon, Benjamin; Scherzo from "A Midsummernight's Dream," Mendelssohn; Overture to "Rienzi, Wagner; "Oklahoma" Selections, Rodgers; Ballet, "The Golden Age," Shostakovitch; "Up the Street," March, Morse.

[80]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, shown leading Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed 20 years as its conductor yesterday.

Globe April 23, '44

Koussevitzky Honored

Conductor 20 Years With Symphony

When Serge Koussevitzky returned to the stage of Symphony Hall last night to acknowledge applause that followed the conclusion of the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 63d season, players, audience and trustees joined in a tribute to the conductor's completion of 20 years as director of the orchestra. It was the longest period that any man has held the baton of the organization.

Mr. Koussevitzky took up the direction of Boston Symphony in 1924 and has held the baton continuously since then. The longest previous tenures of the conductor's podium were those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck, each of eight years, Mr. Muck having served two terms, one of two and the other of six years.

Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stepped forward last night to greet Mr. Koussevitzky's return to the platform, motioning to the orchestra and audience for silence.

Receives Silver Bowl

Calling attention to "one of the most significant anniversaries in the long history of the orchestra, Mr. Greene called on Richard Bu gin, associate conductor and concert master, who presented M Koussevitzky with a silver bow modeled on one of the finest specimens of early American craftsmanship, as a tribute from the musicians of the orchestra.

Mr. Greene presented the conductor a commemorative albu bearing the signatures of mor than 1200 friends and their gift o $16,000 to the Koussevitzky Musi Foundation, the fund which he ha formed in 1942 in memory of hi wife for furthering musical compo sition in this country.

The last entry in the album wa a print of the photograph taken b a Globe photographer as Mr. Kou sevitzky opened last night's co cert, the musicians and audien standing as he raised his baton t lead the playing of the nationa anthem.

Pops to Open Next Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler will begin his 15th successive year as conductor of the Pops. This will be the 59th season of the famous Pops concerts.

Mr. Fiedler will conduct the Pops orchestra through at least his usual large repertory of Pops favorites, old and new, in the course of the season to come.

Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony Hall.

TUESDAY, MAY 2
March, "Pomp and Circumstance"—Elgar
Overture to "Der Freischutz"—Weber
Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony"
March from "The Love of Three Oranges"—Prokofieff
"Facade" Suite—Walton
"Wachet Auf" from Cantata 160—Bach
Marche Slave—Tchaikovsky
"Voices of Spring" Straus
"Oklahoma," Selection—Rodgers and Har
Arranged by Peter Bodge
Holiday for Strings—Rose
Salute to Our Fighting Forces

WEDNESDAY MAY 3
Washington Post March Sous
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" Berli
Circus Polka Stravinsk
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" Bize
Valse Tiste Sibeliu
Overture, "William Tell" Rossir
Warsaw Concerto Addinse
Piano—Leo Litwin
Waltz of the Flowers from "Nutcracker Suite" Tchaikovsk
Night and Day Porte
Knightsbridge (March) from "London Suite" Eric Coate

SYMPHONY HALL—COM. 1492

OPENING NIGHT

of the 59th season

TUES., MAY 2 at 8:30

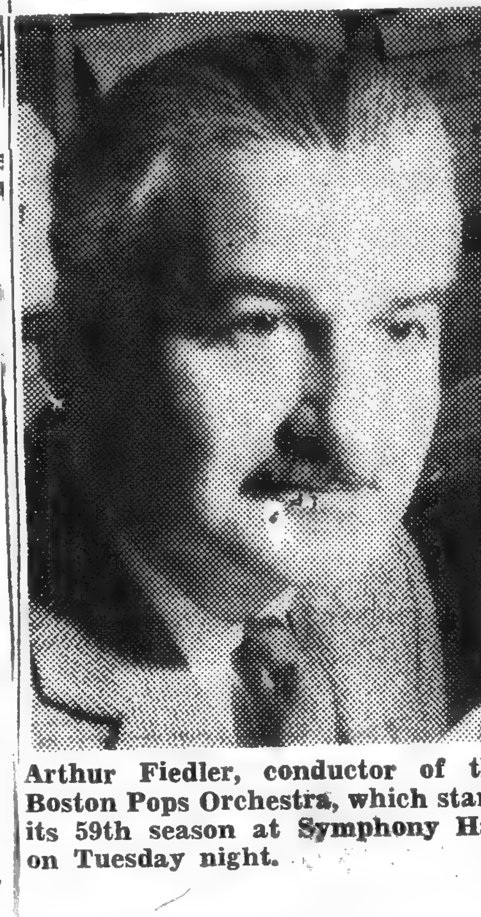
POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE

Tickets .35, .60, $1.00, $1.50

Inc. Tax



Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which starts its 59th season at Symphony Hall on Tuesday night.

POP CONCERTS OPEN

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Arthur Fiedler began last evening his 15th season as conductor of the Symphony Hall Pop Concerts.

One reason for Mr. Fiedler's great success in this capacity, and for the unprecedented success of these cheerful occasions under his direction, has been his felicitous programmes. The one in question began with Elgar and climbed to Bach via Weber, Prokofieff and William Walton, and then slid rapidly down till it landed on "Pistol Packin' Mamma," or rather a confection that purported to describe the shooting of that dangerous damsel.

In point of fact, this number, which made the expected hit, and was itself encored, appeared as an extra following a potpourri of tunes from Rodger's "Oklahoma," the outstanding musical comedy hit of the past season. There was variety even in these extras, since they included Bach's "Fugue a la Gigue," the Minuet from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" and Stravinsky's "Circus Polka."

All this is just as it should be. The Pops must contain substantial fare since for those who sit in the balconies and for some who frequent the tables they are a source of legitimate musical entertainment. But above all else, they must be gay. There is plenty of serious music in the wintertime.

By the looks of things there will be few concerts in this 59th Pops season that do not sell out. Outwardly, last evening things were much the same, with the red of the lower walls again replaced by spring-like green. The prying eye could, however, discern a novel detail, namely, the presence in the orchestra of a woman player who was not a harpist. This comely addition to the ranks was Miss Anne de Guichard, the capable bassoonist, a familiar figure in other local orchestras.

The Symphony Season: A Slight Backward Glance

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Perhaps it is not quite time to summarize the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; to tell of its guest conductors, soloists and so forth, but it is time to point out here and now that this has been a great year in Symphony Hall and to state unequivocally (while there's still time to give him the summer farewell he deserves next Friday and Saturday) that the reason for this greatness lies mainly upon the shoulders of Serge Koussevitzky.

The season ending this week, you know, is his 20th anniversary year as conductor and musical director of the orchestra, and he (and we) may well be very proud of his achievement. He has been magnificent, no doubt about it, and if there have been those too conservative to concede that he is the foremost living all-around orchestral conductor (and one of the greatest who ever lived), then this was the season to force adjustment of such a faulty impression.

At the moment, however, it is his record this season as a champion of new music which concerns us here. For Dr. Koussevitzky has brought out this year 18 compositions never heard before in Boston, and most of them never previously heard anywhere. True, he did not conduct them all himself, but even so it is incontrovertible evidence of his awareness of his obligation to living composers, of his extraordinary musical vitality and, most of all to his great physical courage in preparing music of so exacting a nature when most conductors of equal years feel they have earned a well-deserved right to coast along, intellectually speaking, on box-office favorites.

The first concert of the season brought us the first performance of Stravinsky's "Ode." It was charming, intimate music, quickly caught at first hearing. It seemed to me to have been conceived more for chamber orchestra than for a full symphonic ensemble, and that it was a pity so many fine musicians had to be sitting around doing practically nothing most of the time, but this is, I suppose, a secondary consideration. The music, very transparently scored, was attractive and often delicately evocative.

The second concert brought the premiere of Lukas Foss' "The Prairie." This I didn't like at all, and I seem to have boxed Mr. Foss' ears rather more sharply than was perhaps necessary. Still, I recall it with no pleasure, especially for its indications of the abominable Walt Whitman-Abe Lincoln-Wide-Open-Spaces cult of American composers of which Ray Harris is the prophet.

Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony came next, the composer conducting. Its appeal was immediate, its melodic contours gracious, and its technic sound sincere. That is, the composer never displayed his orchestral command at the expense of his musical ideas; he gave us music, not a lesson in laying one musical brick atop another. It would have sounded better, I think, if Dr. Koussevitzky had conducted it, but it was enjoyable in any case.

One of the really memorable new pieces was Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings." It was miraculously traversed by the orchestra with E. Power Biggs as soloist, and it proved beyond question Mr. Piston's great gift as a composer. (Incidentally, I feel I went astray on Mr. Piston's Second Symphony a fortnight or so ago. I heard it a second time on the radio, and found it most attractive, but of this more later.) Samuel Barber's Commando March was a stunt, and not a very good one at that, but his Air Force Symphony was music of much excellence; not important, perhaps, but good, and of a most advanced technical nature.

Schuman's Symphony for Strings was certainly another of the season's high points.

It was a composition of great character with fine, plastic writing for strings, a certain nobility of spirit and a lovely, fresh melodic quality. Hanson's Fourth Symphony (conducted by the composer), on the other hand was pretty generally a pretentious bore, with, so far as I was concerned, virtually no redeeming features. Mr. Hanson is a romantic melodist at heart, and he can, it is true, write engaging and pretty tunes, not all of which sound like Sibelius or Brahms or somebody else. The trouble is, as a rule, there is too much intellectual pretention; too much striving to make things what they are not.

A surprise came with the premiere of Gardner Read's Second Symphony, also conducted by the composer. This struck me as possibly the season's most unusual new musical composition. It was crude in many ways; ugly, overly dissonant, too violent and too patchy to be a perfect work of art, but it had a tension and a driving compulsion which is, to my way of looking at it, certain evidence of a powerful creative urge. And this urge or, if you will, inspiration is more to be desired in music than the sleekest or most formidable technical assurance. Whether or not the composer has expressed himself in polished, balanced or highly cultivated musical language matters little indeed; any hack can be taught how to put notes on paper. What does matter is the intensity or the urgency of the undefinable thing which goes on in the composer's inner ear. Many contemporary composers, notably Stravinsky, do not find it fashionable to put much faith in inspiration these days, as they prefer (probably because they're equipped for little else) to depend upon their ability to accomplish prodigies of technical manipulation. With Mr. Read, I felt it was the other way around. He had something important and urgent to say, but he didn't quite know how to say it. I have no doubt that when he does bring his creative force under control we shall hear much more of Gardner Read. (To be continued next week).

MUSIC

B Minor Mass

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave Johan Sebastian Bach's B minor Mass yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was the 99th Pension Fund concert of the orchestra. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor); Rose Dirman, soprano; Hertha Glaz, contralto; William Hain, tenor; Robert Hall Collins, baritone; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; Willem Valkenier, horn; Georges Luarent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; and Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichord.

If there's any composition in the entire musical literature which requires all or nothing at all in the discussion of it then that composition is Bach's B minor Mass. given yesterday afternoon and evening at the 99th annual Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

You can discuss if you have elbow room, its position in history as a gigantic conception of religious expression in music; you can discuss the strange anomaly of its being the ultimate expression of the Catholic liturgy although composed by a fiercely pious Protestant; you can talk about its odd structure as a random collection of graceful duets in the operatic vein, tremendous double choruses and coloratura arias with solo instrumental obbligato, none of them actually having close musical relationship one with another. Or you can mention the considerable difficulties involved in grasping or realizing its marvels in one hearing, not the least of which are its great length (even when divided) and its almost constant center of tonality.

To do all this, however, is to bore those who know all about it, and baffle those who do not. And so the chief point of interest in yesterday's performance was its performance. That, to put it mildly, was magnificent, and it was magnificent principally because of the chorus and the marvelous unanimity of its singing.

Each year it seems the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe improve in these matters. There is no doubt that this season's has the edge on all but one or two of its recent predecessors, even to the tenors and basses, which is notable in these times. The attack was smart, the negotiation of the florid counterpoint exeellent and the intonation faultless. Moreover, the choruses responded to the conductor's subtlest nuance to achieve additional tonal and dynamic coloring. They did a great job of singing, no doubt about it.

The soloists were very good, but seldom up to the quality of the general performance level. Only Robert Hall Collins and Hertha Glaz reached a sufficiently high dynamic level to be really well heard, but all of them, to their very considerable credit, sang with the utmost clarity, for there was never any fuzzy traversal of melodic line. Theirs was, actually, a very creditable accomplishment, but drawn to a small scale. The instrumental soloists were fine, and the whole was conducted with great intensity by Dr. Koussevitzky. The large audience was vastly impressed, and gave the entire ensemble the warmest sort of reception.

At the conclusion, Koussevitzky was given the greatest ovation of his career. During the applause a mysterious admirer appeared on the stage and presented Koussevitzky a wreath, but fled before his identity could be learned. G. Wallace Woodworth, who directed the Harvard choral groups, was presented a set of hurricane lamps by the members of the orchestra.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Mass in B minor by Johann Sebastian Bach was presented at Symphony Hall yesterday for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Rose Dirman, soprano; Hertha Glaz, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. E. Power Biggs was organist, and the harpsichord was played by Ralph Kirkpatrick.

Bach's Mass had last previously been heard here at the pension fund concert of 1940. Yesterday's performance followed the practical tradition of beginning at 4:30, with a break at 6:30, and resuming at 8.

This performance again brought to the fore what Bostonians well know but are apt to take for granted: that the city is fortunate in the long-standing and cordial relationship between Symphony Hall and Harvard. Such a great and difficult work can be so well given only by a great orchestra and conductor in collaboration with young choral singers prepared by such an expert as Mr. Woodworth.

And it was well sung. Whatever passing errors or uncertainties occurred in the choral work, the standard was very high. The voices sounded fresh and vigorous. There could have been more tenors and basses, but in volume these sections held their own most of the time. The Radcliffe girls produced a solid, homogeneous tone.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of the Mass has deepened and mellowed over the years. It was highly emotional when the character of the music indicated, and he indulged his liking for very broad allargandos at the ends of sections. But his reading was also profound and in some respects austere.

Miss Dirman and Mr. Collins, of the soloists, showed the best style, the highest accuracy and sustained weight of tone. Miss Glaz' performance occasionally seemed insecure. The aria of the Agnus Dei, quite difficult in the matter of pitch—and perhaps the most expressive of all the arias in the Mass—Miss Glaz nevertheless carried through with sound competence. Mr. Hain also did well, but his tones ought to have been more robust, especially in the "Domine Deus" with the soprano.

By setting the tenor aria "Benedictus qui venit" before the choral "Osanna," Mr. Koussevitzky ob-

Rose Dirman, soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bach's B-minor Mass, to be given for the orchestra's Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon and evening, April 30.

Koussevitzky Receives Tribute

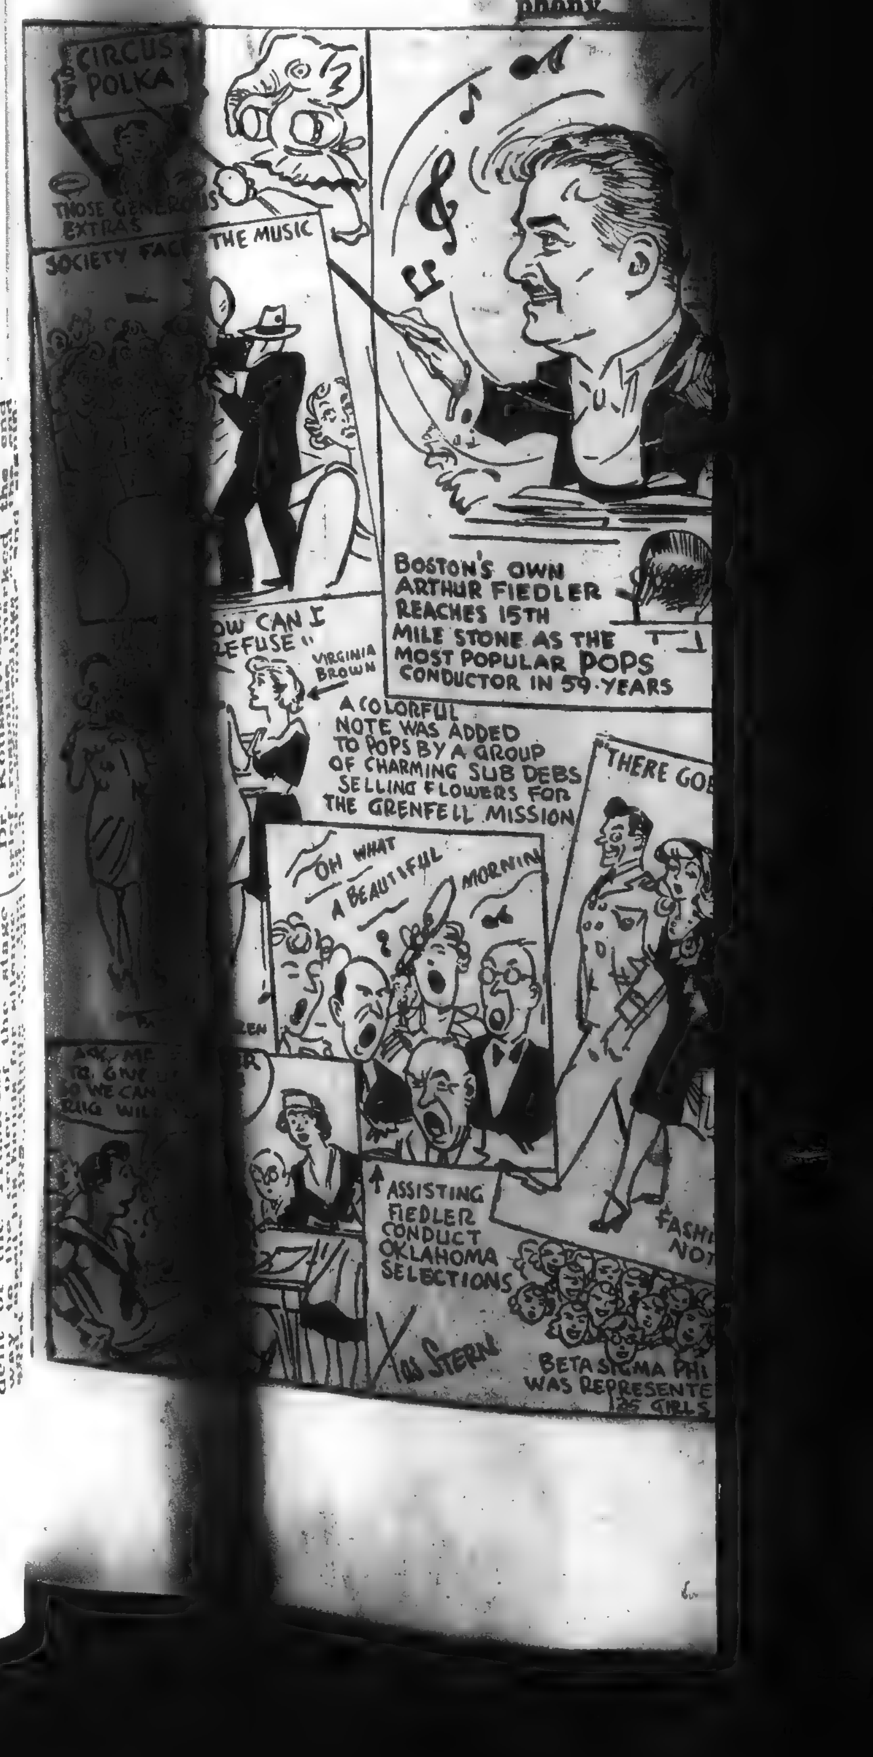
(Continued from front page)

One would not have imagined that this was an orchestra and conductor at the end of a strenuous season: in freshness, vigor and imagination. Koussevitzky surpassed even himself. From a musical standpoint nothing further was needed this was, in every possible and conceivable way, the last word.

But the feeling in the hearts of all still had to find expression. The barrage of applause was still rolling undiminished when Jerome D. Greene, president of the Trustees, made his way to the center of the stage [illegible] presented his leader with a silver cup on behalf of the personnel. He read to the audience the inscription.

Then Mr. Greene expressed to Dr. Koussevitzky the warm gratitude of Boston's musical public. He presented the conductor with a testimonial book, engrossed by J. R. Rosen and containing pages of inscribed names of admirers, and announced that, as a suitable memorial to the event, over $16,000 had been contributed by friends of the orchestra to the Koussevitzky Foundation.

Dr. Koussevitzky's simple and brief [illegible] marked the end [illegible]



CIRCUS POLKA
THOSE GENEROUS EXTRAS
SOCIETY FACES THE MUSIC
OW CAN I EFUSE
VIRGINIA BROWN
A COLORFUL NOTE WAS ADDED TO POPS BY A GROUP OF CHARMING SUB DEBS SELLING FLOWERS FOR THE GRENFELL MISSION
BOSTON'S OWN ARTHUR FIEDLER REACHES 15TH MILE STONE AS THE MOST POPULAR POPS CONDUCTOR IN 59 YEARS
OH WHAT A BEAUTIFUL MORNIN'
ASSISTING FIEDLER CONDUCT OKLAHOMA SELECTIONS
THERE GOE
FASHI NOT
BETA SIGMA PHI WAS REPRESENTE
Stern

[81]

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, shown leading Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed 20 years as its conductor yesterday.

Globe April 23 '44

Koussevitzky Honored

Conductor 20 Years With Symphony

When Serge Koussevitzky returned to the stage of Symphony Hall last night to acknowledge applause that followed the conclusion of the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 63d season, players, audience and trustees joined in a tribute to the conductor's completion of 20 years as director of the orchestra. It was the longest period that any man has held the baton of the organization.

Mr. Koussevitzky took up the direction of Boston Symphony in 1924 and has held the baton continuously since then. The longest previous tenures of the conductor's podium were those of Wilhelm Gericke and Karl Muck, each of eight years, Mr. Muck having served two terms, one of two and the other of six years.

Jerome D. Greene, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stepped forward last night to greet Mr. Koussevitzky's return to the platform, motioning to the orchestra and audience for silence.

Receives Silver Bowl

Calling attention to "one of the most significant anniversaries in the long history of the orchestra, Mr. Greene called on Richard Burgin, associate conductor and concert master, who presented Mr. Koussevitzky with a silver bowl modeled on one of the finest specimens of early American craftsmanship, as a tribute from the musicians of the orchestra.

Mr. Greene presented the conductor a commemorative album bearing the signatures of more than 1200 friends and their gift of $16,000 to the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, the fund which he had formed in 1942 in memory of his wife for furthering musical composition in this country.

The last entry in the album was a print of the photograph taken by a Globe photographer as Mr. Koussevitzky opened last night's concert, the musicians and audience standing as he raised his baton to lead the playing of the national anthem.

Pops to Open Next Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler will begin his 15th successive year as conductor of the Pops. This will be the 59th season of the famous Pops concerts.

Mr. Fiedler will conduct the Pops orchestra through at least his usual large repertory of Pops favorites, old and new, in the course of the season to come.

Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of Symphony Hall.

TUESDAY, MAY 2

March, "Pomp and Circumstance" —Elgar
Overture to "Der Freischutz"—Weber
Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony"
March from "The Love of Three Oranges"—Prokofieff
"Facade" Suite—Walton
"Wachet Auf" from Cantata 160 —Bach
Marche Slave—Tchaikovsky
"Voices of Spring" Straus
"Oklahoma," Selection—Rodgers and Har
Arranged by Peter Bodge
Holiday for Strings—Rose
Salute to Our Fighting Forces

WEDNESDAY MAY 3

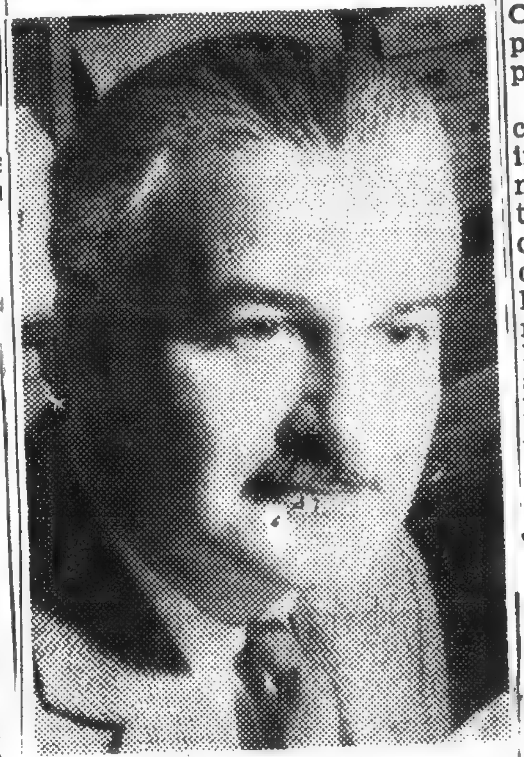
Washington Post March Sous
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" Berli
Circus Polka Stravinsk
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" Bize
Valse Tiste Sibeliu
Overture, "William Tell" Rossi
Warsaw Concerto Addinse
Piano—Leo Litwin
Waltz of the Flowers from "Nutcracker Suite" Tchaikovsk
Night and Day Porte
Knightsbridge (March) from "London Suite" Eric Coate

SYMPHONY HALL—COM. 1492

OPENING NIGHT
of the 59th season
TUES., MAY 2 at 8:30

POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE
Tickets .35, .60, $1.00, $1.50
Inc. Tax



Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which starts its 59th season at Symphony Hall on Tuesday night.

POP CONCERTS OPEN

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Arthur Fiedler began last evening his 15th season as conductor of the Symphony Hall Pop Concerts.

One reason for Mr. Fiedler's great success in this capacity, and for the unprecedented success of these cheerful occasions under his direction, has been his felicitous programmes. The one in question began with Elgar and climbed to Bach via Weber, Prokofieff and William Walton, and then slid rapidly down till it landed on "Pistol Packin' Mamma," or rather a confection that purported to describe the shooting of that dangerous damsel.

In point of fact, this number, which made the expected hit, and was itself encored, appeared as an extra following a potpourri of tunes from Rodger's "Oklahoma," the outstanding musical comedy hit of the past season. There was variety even in these extras, since they included Bach's "Fugue a la Gigue," the Minuet from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" and Stravinsky's "Circus Polka."

All this is just as it should be. The Pops must contain substantial fare, since for those who sit in the balconies and for some who frequent the tables they are a source of legitimate musical entertainment. But above all else, they must be gay. There is plenty of serious music in the wintertime.

By the looks of things there will be few concerts in this 59th Pops season that do not sell out. Outwardly, last evening things were much the same, with the red of the lower walls again replaced by spring-like green. The prying eye could, however, discern a novel detail, namely, the presence in the orchestra of a woman player who was not a harpist. This comely addition to the ranks was Miss Anne de Guichard, the capable bassoonist, a familiar figure in other local orchestras.

The Symphony Season: A Slight Backward Glance

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Perhaps it is not quite time to summarize the 63d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; to tell of its guest conductors, soloists and so forth, but it is time to point out here and now that this has been a great year in Symphony Hall and to state unequivocally (while there's still time to give him the summer farewell he deserves next Friday and Saturday) that the reason for this greatness lies mainly upon the shoulders of Serge Koussevitzky.

The season ending this week, you know, is his 20th anniversary year as conductor and musical director of the orchestra, and he (and we) may well be very proud of his achievement. He has been magnificent, no doubt about it, and if there have been those too conservative to concede that he is the foremost living all-around orchestral conductor (and one of the greatest who ever lived), then this was the season to force adjustment of such a faulty impression.

At the moment, however, it is his record this season as a champion of new music which concerns us here. For Dr. Koussevitzky has brought out this year 18 compositions never heard before in Boston, and most of them never previously heard anywhere. True, he did not conduct them all himself, but even so it is incontrovertible evidence of his awareness of his obligation to living composers, of his extraordinary musical vitality and, most of all to his great physical courage in preparing music of so exacting a nature when most conductors of equal years feel they have earned a well-deserved right to coast along, intellectually speaking, on box-office favorites.

The first concert of the season brought us the first performance of Stravinsky's "Ode." It was charming, intimate music, quickly caught at first hearing. It seemed to me to have been conceived more for chamber orchestra than for a full symphonic ensemble, and that it was a pity so many fine musicians had to be sitting around doing practically nothing most of the time, but this is, I suppose, a secondary consideration. The music, very transparently scored, was attractive and often delicately evocative.

The second concert brought the premiere of Lukas Foss' "The Prairie." This I didn't like at all, and I seem to have boxed Mr. Foss' ears rather more sharply than was perhaps necessary. Still, I recall it with no pleasure, especially for its indications of the abominable Walt Whitman-Abe Lincoln-Wide-Open-Spaces cult of American composers of which Ray Harris is the prophet.

Berezowsky's Fourth Symphony came next, the composer conducting. Its appeal was immediate, its melodic contours gracious, and its technic sound sincere. That is, the composer never displayed his orchestral command at the expense of his musical ideas; he gave us music, not a lesson in laying one musical brick atop another. It would have sounded better, I think, if Dr. Koussevitzky had conducted it, but it was enjoyable in any case.

One of the really memorable new pieces was Walter Piston's "Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings." It was miraculously traversed by the orchestra with E. Power Biggs as soloist, and it proved beyond question Mr. Piston's great gift as a composer. (Incidentally, I feel I went astray on Mr. Piston's Second Symphony a fortnight or so ago. I heard it a second time on the radio, and found it most attractive, but of this more later.) Samuel Barber's Commando March was a stunt, and not a very good one at that, but his Air Force Symphony was music of much excellence; not important, perhaps, but good, and of a most advanced technical nature.

Schuman's Symphony for Strings was certainly another of the season's high points.

It was a composition of great character with fine, plastic writing for strings, a certain nobility of spirit and a lovely, fresh melodic quality. Hanson's Fourth Symphony (conducted by the composer), on the other hand was pretty generally a pretentious bore, with, so far as I was concerned, virtually no redeeming features. Mr. Hanson is a romantic melodist at heart, and he can, it is true, write engaging and pretty tunes, not all of which sound like Sibelius or Brahms or somebody else. The trouble is, as a rule, there is too much intellectual pretention; too much striving to make things what they are not.

A surprise came with the premiere of Gardner Read's Second Symphony, also conducted by the composer. This struck me as possibly the season's most unusual new musical composition. It was crude in many ways; ugly, overly dissonant, too violent and too patchy to be a perfect work of art, but it had a tension and a driving compulsion which is, to my way of looking at it, certain evidence of a powerful creative urge. And this urge or, if you will, inspiration is more to be desired in music than the sleekest or most formidable technical assurance. Whether or not the composer has expressed himself in polished, balanced or highly cultivated musical language matters little indeed; any hack can be taught how to put notes on paper. What does matter is the intensity or the urgency of the undefinable thing which goes on in the composer's inner ear. Many contemporary composers, notably Stravinsky, do not find it fashionable to put much faith in inspiration these days, as they prefer (probably because they're equipped for little else) to depend upon their ability to accomplish prodigies of technical manipulation. With Mr. Read, I felt it was the other way around. He had something important and urgent to say, but he didn't quite know how to say it. I have no doubt that when he does bring his creative force under control we shall hear much more of Gardner Read. (To be continued next week).

MUSIC

B Minor Mass

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, gave Johan Sebastian Bach's B minor Mass yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It was the 99th Pension Fund concert of the orchestra. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor); Rose Dirman, soprano; Hertha Glaz, contralto; William Hain, tenor; Robert Hall Collins, baritone; Richard Burgin, violin; Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore; Willem Valkenier, horn; Georges Luarent, flute; E. Power Biggs, organ; and Ralph Kirkpatrick, harpsichord.

If there's any composition in the entire musical literature which requires all or nothing at all in the discussion of it then that composition is Bach's B minor Mass, given yesterday afternoon and evening at the 99th annual Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

You can discuss if you have elbow room, its position in history as a gigantic conception of religious expression in music; you can discuss the strange anomaly of its being the ultimate expression of the Catholic liturgy although composed by a fiercely pious Protestant; you can talk about its odd structure as a random collection of graceful duets in the operatic vein, tremendous double choruses and coloratura arias with solo instrumental obbligato, none of them actually having close musical relationship one with another. Or you can mention the considerable difficulties involved in grasping or realizing its marvels in one hearing, not the least of which are its great length (even when divided) and its almost constant center of tonality.

To do all this, however, is to bore those who know all about it, and baffle those who do not. And so the chief point of interest in yesterday's performance was its performance. That, to put it mildly, was magnificent, and it was magnificent principally because of the chorus and the marvelous unanimity of its singing.

Each year it seems the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe improve in these matters. There is no doubt that this season's has the edge on all but one or two of its recent predecessors, even to the tenors and basses, which is notable in these times. The attack was smart, the negotiation of the florid counterpoint exeellent and the intonation faultless. Moreover, the choruses responded to the conductor's subtlest nuance to achieve additional tonal and dynamic coloring. They did a great job of singing, no doubt about it.

The soloists were very good, but seldom up to the quality of the general performance level. Only Robert Hall Collins and Hertha Glaz reached a sufficiently high dynamic level to be really well heard, but all of them, to their very considerable credit, sang with the utmost clarity, for there was never any fuzzy traversal of melodic line. Theirs was, actually, a very creditable accomplishment, but drawn to a small scale. The instrumental soloists were fine, and the whole was conducted with great intensity by Dr. Koussevitzky. The large audience was vastly impressed, and gave the entire ensemble the warmest sort of reception.

At the conclusion, Koussevitzky was given the greatest ovation of his career. During the applause a mysterious admirer appeared on the stage and presented Koussevitzky a wreath, but fled before his identity could be learned. G. Wallace Woodworth, who directed the Harvard choral groups, was presented a set of hurricane lamps by the members of the orchestra.

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Bach's B Minor Mass

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Mass in B minor by Johann Sebastian Bach was presented at Symphony Hall yesterday for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The soloists were Rose Dirman, soprano; Hertha Glaz, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. E. Power Biggs was organist, and the harpsichord was played by Ralph Kirkpatrick.

Bach's Mass had last previously been heard here at the pension fund concert of 1940. Yesterday's performance followed the practical tradition of beginning at 4:30, with a break at 6:30, and resuming at 8.

This performance again brought to the fore what Bostonians well know but are apt to take for granted: that the city is fortunate in the long-standing and cordial relationship between Symphony Hall and Harvard. Such a great and difficult work can be so well given only by a great orchestra and conductor in collaboration with young choral singers prepared by such an expert as Mr. Woodworth.

And it was well sung. Whatever passing errors or uncertainties occurred in the choral work, the standard was very high. The voices sounded fresh and vigorous. There could have been more tenors and basses, but in volume these sections held their own most of the time. The Radcliffe girls produced a solid, homogeneous tone.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of the Mass has deepened and mellowed over the years. It was highly emotional when the character of the music indicated, and he indulged his liking for very broad allargandos at the ends of sections. But his reading was also profound and in some respects austere.

Miss Dirman and Mr. Collins, of the soloists, showed the best style, the highest accuracy and sustained weight of tone. Miss Glaz' performance occasionally seemed insecure. The aria of the Agnus Dei, quite difficult in the matter of pitch—and perhaps the most expressive of all the arias in the Mass—Miss Glaz nevertheless carried through with sound competence. Mr. Hain also did well, but his tones ought to have been more robust, especially in the "Domine Deus" with the soprano.

By setting the tenor aria "Benedictus qui venit" before the choral "Osanna," Mr. Koussevitzky obtained more contr[illegible] to the fabric of [illegible] in the original [illegible] "Osanna" is fo[illegible] arias.

The M [illegible] towering master[illegible] may prefer Be[illegible] Solemnis as a [illegible] pression of fai[illegible] that some of [illegible] Bach's Kyrie a[illegible] dry and acade[illegible] moments of the [illegible] opening of Kyrie [illegible] magnificent [illegible] the Credo and Sa[illegible] overwhelming

Rose Dirman, soprano soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bach's B-minor Mass, to be given for the orchestra's Pension Fund at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon and evening, April 30.

Koussevitzky Receives Tribute

(Continued from front page)

One would not have imagined that this was an orchestra and conductor at the end of a strenuous season: in freshness, vigor and imagination, Koussevitzky surpassed even himself. From a musical standpoint nothing further was needed than this was, in every possible and conceivable way, the last word.

But the feeling in the hearts of all still had to find expression. The barrage of applause was still rolling undiminished when Jerome D. Greene, president of the Trustees, [illegible] presented his leader with a silver cup on behalf of the personnel. He read to the audience the inscription.

Then Mr. Greene expressed to Dr. Koussevitzky the warm gratitude of Boston's musical public. He presented the conductor with a testimonial book, engrossed by J. R. Rosen and containing pages of inscribed names of admirers, and announced that, as a suitable memorial to the event, over $16,000 had been contributed by friends of the orchestra to the Koussevitzky Foundation. [illegible]

[81]

Monitor - May 1

[illegible]hony and College[illegible] [illegible] Bach's Mass in [illegible]

By L. A. Sloper

[illegible] Symphony Orches[illegible] [illegible]ssevitzky conducting, [illegible]ch's Mass in B minor [illegible]ternoon and evening [illegible] Hall for the bene[illegible] [illegible]nsion Fund. The or[illegible] assisted as usual [illegible]arvard and Radcliffe [illegible]repared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

The soloists were Rose Dirman, soprano, Hertha Glaz, contralto, William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. Messrs. Burgin, Speyer, Devergie, Valkenier and Laurent played the instrumental solos. E. Power Biggs was at the organ and Ralph Kirkpatrick at the harpsichord.

This concert served also as an extra climactic event in the celebration of Dr. Koussevitzky's twentieth season in Boston. On Saturday night he had received an album containing the names of 1,200 admirers, with a gift of $16,000 to the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation. He was also the recipient of a silver bowl from the members of the orchestra.

Last night he was accorded an ovation at the close of the Mass, and was presented with a large wreath. All these rites and gifts bore witness to the admiration and gratitude he has won for his two decades of able service to the community and to the cause of music in America.

The performance of the migh[illegible] B minor Mass constituted in [illegible] sense an epitome of our condu[illegible]tor's art. It was charged w[illegible] the dramatic quality which mar[illegible] his interpretations. The impact [illegible] the tremendous choruses was ove[illegible]whelming. There were the chara[illegible]teristic sudden dynamic chang[illegible] the typical lagging, approachi[illegible] immobility, in the slow section[illegible]

It is possible to prefer a m[illegible] lyrical reading of this work, [illegible] which would convey its devotio[illegible] message with more restraint [illegible] with more emphasis on the flo[illegible]ing line and less on the [illegible] angle. The "Et incarnatus" sec[illegible] of the Credo, for example, w[illegible] profit by such treatment. And [illegible] final chorus, "Dona nobis pac[illegible]" could be made to express mo[illegible] religious aspiration; for [illegible] chorus is a supplication, n[illegible] declamation, and was designe[illegible] be sung in a church, not [illegible] theater.

There can be no doubt of [illegible] effectiveness of Dr. Kousse[illegible]ky's way with th[illegible] voked a storm [illegible] cheers. But was [illegible] achieved under a[illegible] the essential nat[illegible]

The chorus sa[illegible] with full, firm t[illegible] tion, good bala[illegible] thusiasm that ga[illegible] everything he as[illegible]

The arias and [illegible] even in quality [illegible] them the instru[illegible] ments were ra[illegible] man, after so[illegible] pitch in the [illegible] sang accuratel[illegible] Glaz, who has [illegible] ing color, also [illegible] her intonation. [illegible] Hain also sho[illegible] tiveness, seem[illegible] make themselv[illegible] lins had his vo[illegible] trol, and sang [illegible] and musical [illegible] though the pa[illegible] him.

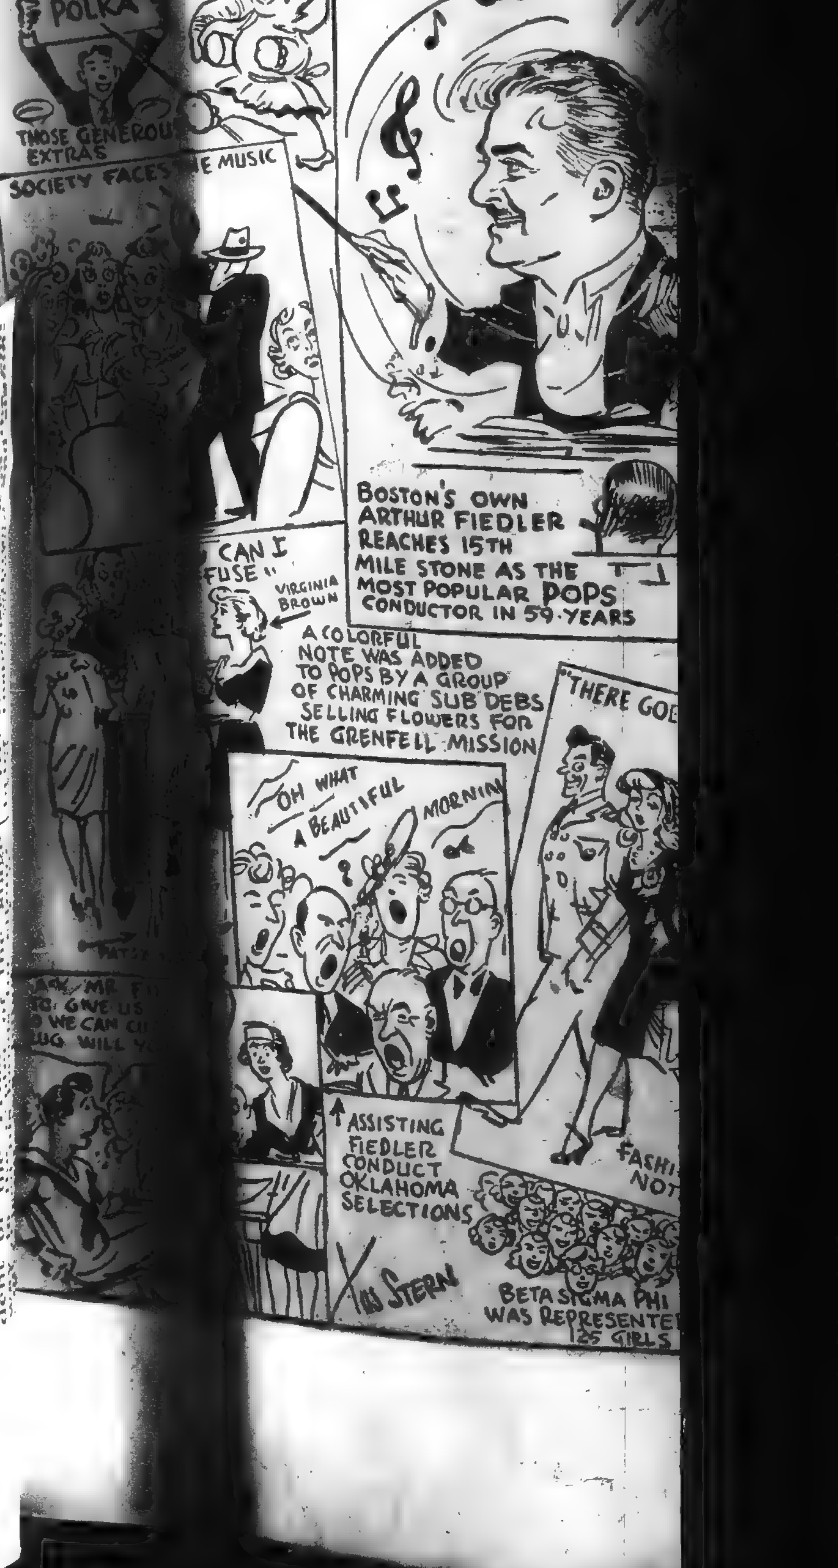
Neat Tric[illegible] Written [illegible]

BOSTON, [illegible] of "Pistol Pac[illegible]

As if the [illegible] cous tune in [illegible] Hall Tuesday [illegible] enough there[illegible] softly—a wo[illegible] chestra at th[illegible] twenty-ninth [illegible]

She was [illegible] and she playe[illegible]

Except for [illegible] the first wo[illegible] with the hit[illegible] chestra, larg[illegible] members of [illegible] phany.



CIRCUS POLKA
THOSE GENEROUS EXTRAS
SOCIETY FACES THE MUSIC
BOSTON'S OWN ARTHUR FIEDLER REACHES 15TH MILE STONE AS THE MOST POPULAR POPS CONDUCTOR IN 59 YEARS
CAN I [illegible]FUSE
VIRGINIA BROWN
A COLORFUL NOTE WAS ADDED TO POPS BY A GROUP OF CHARMING SUB DEBS SELLING FLOWERS FOR THE GRENFELL MISSION
"THERE GOE[illegible]
OH WHAT A BEAUTIFUL MORNIN
ASSISTING FIEDLER CONDUCT OKLAHOMA SELECTIONS
FASHI[illegible] NOT[illegible]
BETA SIGMA PHI WAS REPRESENTE[illegible] 125 GIRLS [illegible] STERN

PASTE OVER

Monitor - May 1, 1944

ymphony and College Singers Give Bach's Mass in B Minor

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orches-, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, esented Bach's Mass in B minor esterday afternoon and evening Symphony Hall for the bene- of its Pension Fund. The or- hestra was assisted as usual y the Harvard and Radcliffe horuses, prepared by G. Wallace Voodworth.

The soloists were Rose Dirman, oprano, Hertha Glaz, contralto, Villiam Hain, tenor, and Robert Iall Collins, bass. Messrs. Burgin, Speyer, Devergie, Valkenier and Laurent played the instrumental solos. E. Power Biggs was at the organ and Ralph Kirkpatrick at the harpsichord.

This concert served also as an extra climactic event in the celebration of Dr. Koussevitzky's twentieth season in Boston. On Saturday night he had received an album containing the names of 1,200 admirers, with a gift of $16,000 to the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation. He was also the recipient of a silver bowl from the members of the orchestra.

Last night he was accorded an ovation at the close of the Mass, and was presented with a large wreath. All these rites and gifts bore witness to the admiration and gratitude he has won for his tw decades of able service to community and to the cause music in America.

The performance of the mig B minor Mass constituted in sense an epitome of our cond tor's art. It was charged w the dramatic quality which ma his interpretations. The impact the tremendous choruses was ov whelming. There were the char teristic sudden dynamic chang the typical lagging, approachi immobility, in the slow sections

It is possible to prefer a m lyrical reading of this work, which would convey its devotio message with more restraint with more emphasis on the fl ing line and less on the sl angle. The "Et incarnatus" sec of the Credo, for example, w profit by such treatment. And final chorus, "Dona nobis pac could be made to express mo religious aspiration; for chorus is a supplication, n declamation, and was designe be sung in a church, not theater.

There can be no doubt of effectiveness of Dr. Kousse ky's way with this score. It provoked a storm of applause and cheers. But was not this success achieved under a misconception of the essential nature of the music?

The chorus sang magnificently, with full, firm tone, pure intonation, good balance, and an enthusiasm that gave the conductor everything he asked.

The arias and duets were less even in quality, and in some of them the instrumental accompaniments were ragged. Miss Dirman, after some difficulty with pitch in the "Christe eleison," sang accurately thereafter. Miss Glaz, who has a voice of interesting color, also had trouble with her intonation. Both she and Mr Hain also showed an odd tentativeness, seeming reluctant to make themselves heard. Mr. Collins had his voice under good control, and sang with forthrightness and musical expressiveness, although the part lay a little low for him.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAY 3 1944

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS
MAY 3 - 1944

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA
MAY 3 - 1944

PALO ALTO, CAL.
TIMES
MAY 3 - 1944

FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM
MAY 3 1944

Neat Trick--History Written With Bassoon

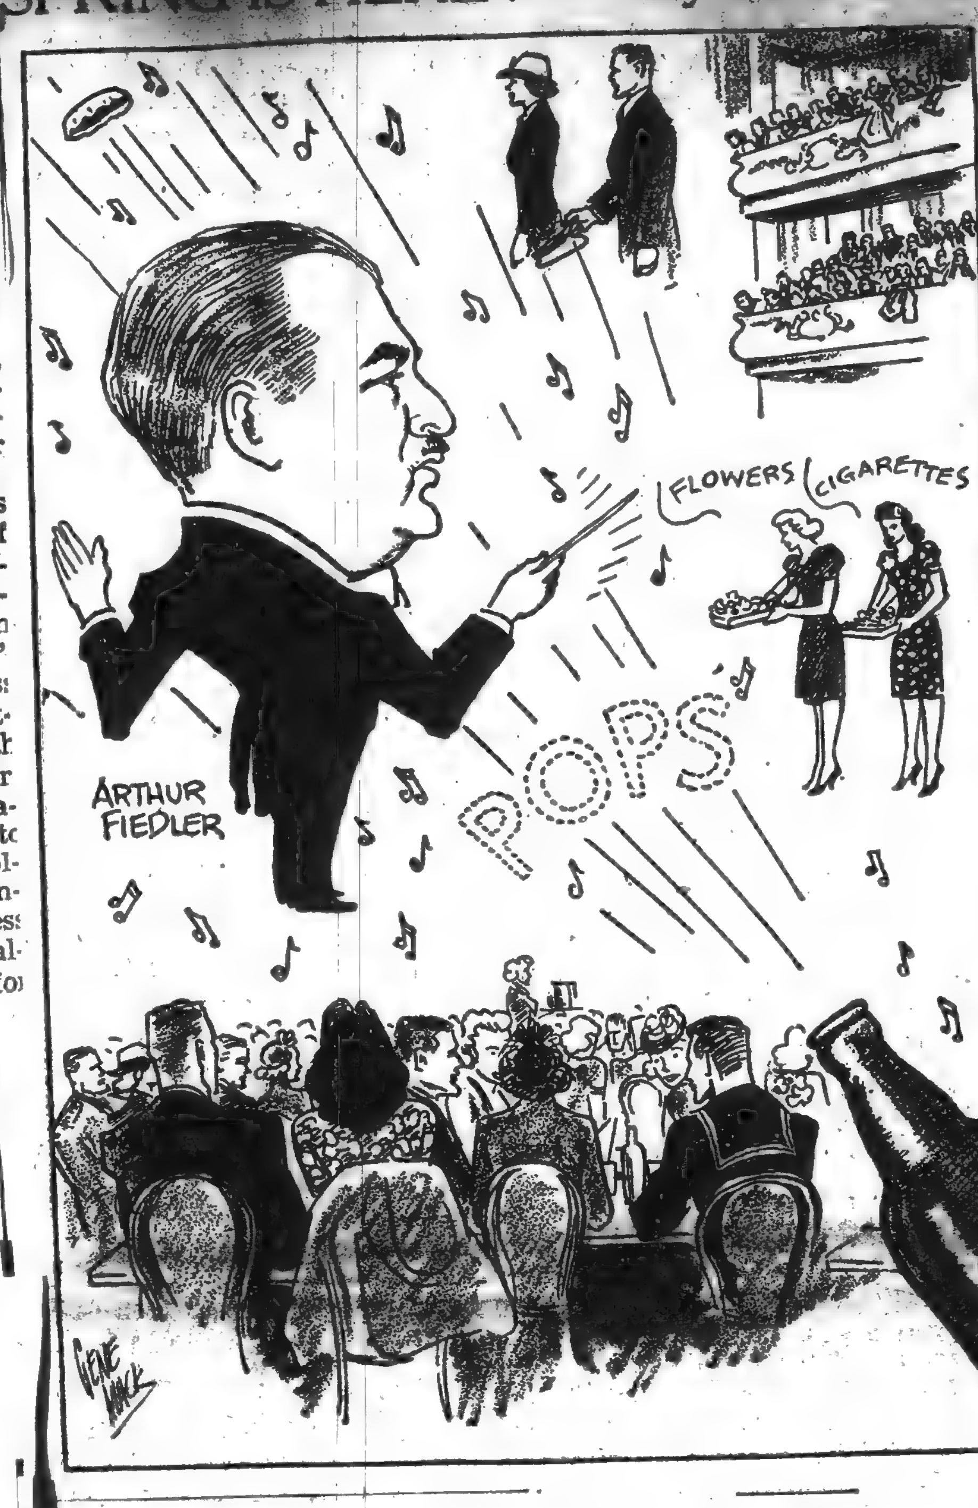
BOSTON, May 3 (AP).—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall Tuesday night was not enough there was — breathe it softly—a woman in the Pops Orchestra at the opening of the twenty-ninth season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

SPRING IS HERE . . . By Gene Mack



NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 3 1944

Woman Plays Basson As 'Pops Orchestra' Blares 'Pistol' Song

Boston, May 3.—(AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall last night was not enough there was —breathe it softly—a woman in the Pops Orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard, and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

The opening program also marked the start of Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor and presented the customary assortment of semi-classical and popular selections.

The atmosphere once again was informal, with the audience sitting at tables on the floor, drinking beer and wine and smoking during the concert.

Gala Audience Greets Pops as It Opens for Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

At Symphony Hall on the troke of 8:30 last night a tanned Arthur Fiedler stood up between his music rack and an inclosure banked with gladioli and other flowers; bowed and then launched into Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March. Thus began the 59th season of the Pops, which are as dependable and pleasant as Spring herself.

This is also the 15th year as conductor of Mr. Fiedler, under whose enterprising guidance the Pops have reached the highest popularity in all their history. Capacity audiences have been the rule ever since he took over in 1930. His conducting has always been distinctive for its crisp vitality, and his programs have never failed to combine the recurring Pops favorites with as many novelties and modernities as he is able to fit into his schedule.

See POPS Page 9

PASADENA, CALIF.
POST
MAY 1 1 1944

CONDUCTOR'S KIN DEAD

NEW YORK, May 10. (INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was saddened today by news that his brother, Nicholas, died in Leningrad in 1941 "at the hands of the Fascist butchers."

Pops

Continued from the First Page

Transformation of Hall

This year, as always at the beginning of May, the interior of Symphony Hall has undergone swift transformation. On Sunday past at Bach's B minor Mass, the lower part of the hall was rowed with seats and the walls were red. Last night the walls were a coolish green and green tables and gilt chairs had sprouted on the floor. On the stage the big chandelier and the wall brackets have been restored to diffuse their soft light.

Thus as Pop's audiences enter the hall is quietly attractive. Later on as the concerts get under way those tables are filled with bottles and plates of light refreshments. A haze of tobacco smoke drifts leisurely toward the ceiling.

Elgar was followed by Weber's "Der Freischuetz" Overture last evening and Weber by two excerpts from works by Prokofieff: the Gavotte out of the "Classical" Symphony and the March from "The Love of Three Oranges." Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring," wound up the first third of the program.

Woman Bassoon Player

There was droll and slightly acid modernity in the five quasi-depictive pieces of William Walton's "Facade" Suites, and a contrasting devotional flavor in the "Wachet Auf" arranged from a Bach Cantata. Theatrical Broadway was represented by a potpourri of lush tunes from "Oklahoma." Marche Slave," that rousing half-brother of the "1812 Overture," was Tchaikovsky's contribution to the evening (and a Pops opening must certainly make a bow to Peter Ilitch). The strings had their innings with Rose's "Holiday." The program ended, as each opening Pops concert had for two years previously, with Peter Bodge's assemblage of military service tunes, "Salute to Our Fighting Forces."

Sharp eyes may have espied something new in the personnel of the Pops Orchestra: a woman at the desk of second basoon. She is Anne de Guichard. There have been other women members of the orchestra in former years, but Miss de Guichard is the only one to have played any instrument except the harp.

Yes, the Pops are with us again, and it is very pleasant that they are.

NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD
MAY 6 - 1944

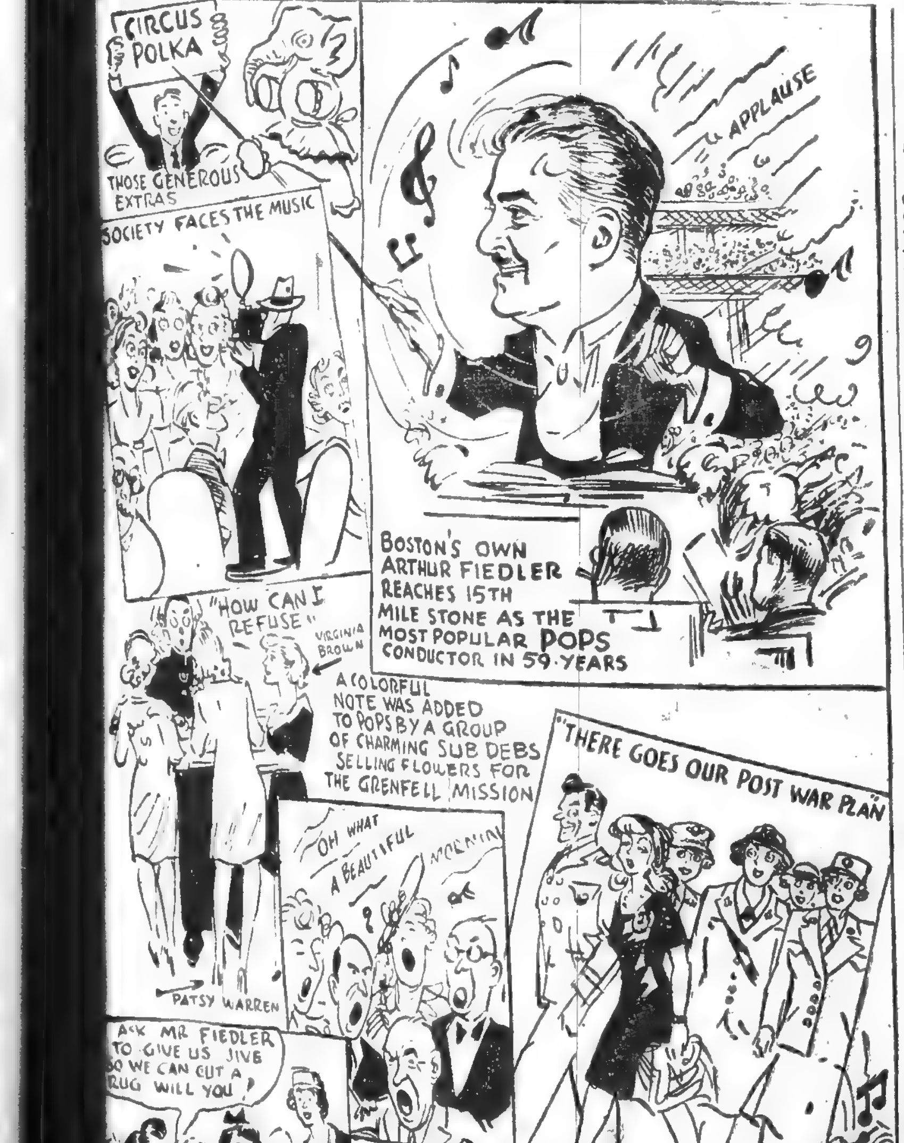
As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will offer a testimonial dinner on May 16 to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past twenty years.

The ceremonies will be heard over the BLUE Network, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony, on Tuesday, May 16, from 11:30 to 12:00 midnight.

Aaron Copland, acting as master of ceremonies during the dinner, in the ballroom of New York's historic Lotus Club, will introduce Dr. Howard Hanson who will offer a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in behalf of all the composers represented. Some of the other eminent composers include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein, Vladimir Dukelsky, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter Piston.

For many years, Dr. Koussevitzky has displayed extraordinary efforts in behalf of the composer, and has been unusually conscious of the fact that performing musicians make their fame and fortune because of composers' music.

In 1942, recognizing the need of substantial aid and appropriate recognition for the composer, Dr. Koussevitzky established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc., in memory of his wife, Natalie. This foundation is empowered to "aid the development of musical talent in every way possible." One of its principal functions is to make financial grants to composers and thus to enrich the world's musical literature.



CIRCUS POLKA
THOSE GENEROUS EXTRAS
SOCIETY FACES THE MUSIC
APPLAUSE
BOSTON'S OWN ARTHUR FIEDLER REACHES 15TH MILE STONE AS THE MOST POPULAR POPS CONDUCTOR IN 59 YEARS
"HOW CAN I REFUSE"
VIRGINIA BROWN
A COLORFUL NOTE WAS ADDED TO POPS BY A GROUP OF CHARMING SUB DEBS SELLING FLOWERS FOR THE GRENFELL MISSION
PATSY WARREN
"OH WHAT A BEAUTIFUL MORNIN"
"THERE GOES OUR POST WAR PLAN"
ASK MR FIEDLER TO GIVE US JIVE SO WE CAN CUT A RUG WILL YOU?
ASSISTING FIEDLER CONDUCT OKLAHOMA SELECTIONS
FASHION NOTE
UP IN CROWS NEST INTOXICATED BY THE MUSICAL WAVES
BETA SIGMA PHI SORORITY WAS REPRESENTED BY 125 GIRLS
LOU STERN

Herald May 3

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops Orchestra, consisting of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, gave the first program of the 59th season of the Pops concerts in Symphony Hall last night. The program was as follows:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony," and March from "The Love of Three Oranges"	Prokofieff
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes	Strauss
"Facade" Suite	Walton
"Wachet Auf" from Cantata 160	Bach
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Oklahoma," Selection	Rodgers
Holiday for Strings	Rose
Salute to Our Fighting Forces	Arranged by Peter Bodge

Well, it must be that spring is here after all.

They've got the swan boats out; they've got the frog pond full of water; they've got the boardwalks up and the jonquils down and, as of last night, they've got the Pops under way again, so I guess we've got to make believe it's spring even if our fingers are still blue of the cold.

Or maybe it wasn't the chill in the air that lent the Pops opener its serious tone last night. It may have been the generally more constrained attitude which the public adopts in public places these days; in any case, there was a more sober atmosphere last night than has been apparent since Mr. Fiedler undertook just 15 years ago to make the Pops the jolly affairs they are.

This is not to say the opening concert was grim; on the contrary It just didn't have the spontaneous gayety of other years, and it was even possible to hear a cork drop during the performance of some of the pieces on the program. And that, as a matter of fact, wasn't too regrettable an event at all since the program was splendidly balanced (although possibly too restrained for an opener) and the performance was fine all the way through. Morevover, by the time the orchestra got into the "Oklahoma" medley and the "Pistol Packin' Mama" encore, the audience had warmed up considerably, and the evening ended on a really old-time Pops level of merriment.

As always, Mr. Fiedler managed to spring something pretty novel in the way of music. The chief novelties were the Walton "Facade" Suite, an amusing satire, the two Prokofieff pieces (whose wit didn't quite get over), Stravinsky's "Circus Polka" (whose wit did) and, of all things, Bach's exceedingly beautiful chorale "Sleepers Awake" in an anonymous but unusually good orchestral arrangement. Indeed, the Bach even drew an encore.

The opening also was notable for the fact that Anne de Guichard, who played second bassoon, was the only woman except for a harpist to take a place in the hitherto all-male orchestra.

As always, too, Mr. Fiedler conducted with sparkle and authority to give the orchestral performance just the right tang. The hall was resplendent in its traditional Pops set-up with the chandeliers, green walls and the green and gold tables and chairs, and the audience, much of it in uniform, was large and cordially disposed. And so again the Pops are with us and so again it must be spring. Or is it?

PASTE OVER

MUSIC

ALL
Mass GIN

by Johann resented at lay for the fund of the stra. Serge
The chor-
Glee Club
ociety, pre-
Woodworth.
Dirman, sotralto; Wil-
Robert Hall
Biggs was sichord was trick.
previously pension fund erday's perractical tra-4:30, with a ing at 8.
ain brought onians well e for grant-unate in the ial relation-y Hall and t and diffi-l given only d conductor oung choral h an expert

Whatever rtainties oc-work, the
The voices rous. There tenors and hese sections he time. The ed a solid,

onducting of ed and melt was highly racter of the indulged his allargandos
ns. But his ound and in

r. Collins, of e best style, nd sustained s Glaz' per-seemed in-Agnus Dei, matter of e most ex-s in the Mass less carried competence.
but his tones
more robust, omine Deus"

aria "Benee the choral sevitzky obtained more contrast, without to the fabric of the work, than in the original order in which "Osanna" is followed by two arias.

The M minor Mass is one towering masterpieces in music may prefer Beethoven's Solemnis as a more direc
pression of faith and one m that some of the counterpo Bach's Kyrie and Gloria b dry and academic. But the moments of the B minor Ma opening of Kyrie and Glor magnificent "Cum Sancto S the Credo and Sanctus are overwhelming.

oloist with rchestra in o be given sion Fund
nday after-30.

Koussevitzky the warm gratitude of Boston's musical public. He presented the conductor with a testimonial book, engrossed by J. R. Rosen and containing pages of inscribed names of admirers, and announced that, as a suitable memorial to the event, over $16,000 had been contributed by friends of the orchestra to the Kousse-vitzky Foundation.
Dr. Koussevitzky's simple and brief response marked the end of the proceedings and the end of a season notable and significant.

surpassed even himself. From a musical standpoint nothing further was needed—this was, in every possible and conceivable way, the last word.
But the feeling in the hearts of all still had to find expression. The barrage of applause was still rolling undiminished when Jerome D. Greene, president of the Trustees, made his way to the center of the stage and raised his hands for silence.
First came the tribute of the players: associate-conductor and concertmaster Richard Burgin

---

ymphony and College Singers Give Bach's Mass in B Minor

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orches-
Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, esented Bach's Mass in B minor esterday afternoon and evening
Symphony Hall for the beneof its Pension Fund. The orhestra was assisted as usual y the Harvard and Radcliffe horuses, prepared by G. Wallace
Woodworth.
The soloists were Rose Dirman, oprano, Hertha Glaz, contralto,
William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. Messrs. Burgin, Speyer, Devergie, Valkenier and Laurent played the instrumental solos. E. Power Biggs was at the organ and Ralph Kirkpatrick at the harpsichord.
This concert served also as an extra climactic event in the celebration of Dr. Koussevitzky's twentieth season in Boston. On Saturday night he had received an album containing the names of 1,200 admirers, with a gift of $16,- 000 to the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation. He was also the recipient of a silver bowl from the members of the orchestra.
Last night he was accorded an ovation at the close of the Mass, and was presented with a large wreath. All these rites and gifts bore witness to the admiration and gratitude he has won for his two decades of able service to community and to the cause music in America.
The performance of the mig
B minor Mass constituted in sense an epitome of our cond tor's art. It was charged w the dramatic quality which ma his interpretations. The impact the tremendous choruses was ov whelming. There were the char teristic sudden dynamic chang the typical lagging, approachi immobility, in the slow sections
It is possible to prefer a m lyrical reading of this work, which would convey its devotio message with more restraint with more emphasis on the fl ing line and less on the sl angle. The "Et incarnatus" sec of the Credo, for example, w profit by such treatment. And final chorus, "Dona nobis pac could be made to express mor religious aspiration: for chorus is a supplication, n declamation, and was designe be sung in a church, not theater.
There can be no doubt of effectiveness of Dr. Kousse ky's way with this score. It provoked a storm of applause and cheers. But was not this success achieved under a misconception of the essential nature of the music?

The chorus sang magnificently, with full, firm tone, pure intonation, good balance, and an enthusiasm that gave the conductor everything he asked.

The arias and duets were less even in quality, and in some of them the instrumental accompaniments were ragged. Miss Dirman, after some difficulty with pitch in the "Christe eleison,' sang accurately thereafter. Miss Glaz, who has a voice of interesting color, also had trouble with her intonation. Both she and Mr Hain also showed an odd tentativeness, seeming reluctant to make themselves heard. Mr. Collins had his voice under good control, and sang with forthrightness and musical expressiveness, although the part lay a little low for him.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

3 1944

NEWPORT, VT.
EXPRESS

MAY 3 - 1944

LANCASTER, PA.
NEW ERA

PALO ALTO, CAL.
TIMES

3 - 1944

FORT WORTH, TEX.
EVENING STAR TELEGRAM

MAY 3 1944

Neat Trick--History Written With Bassoon

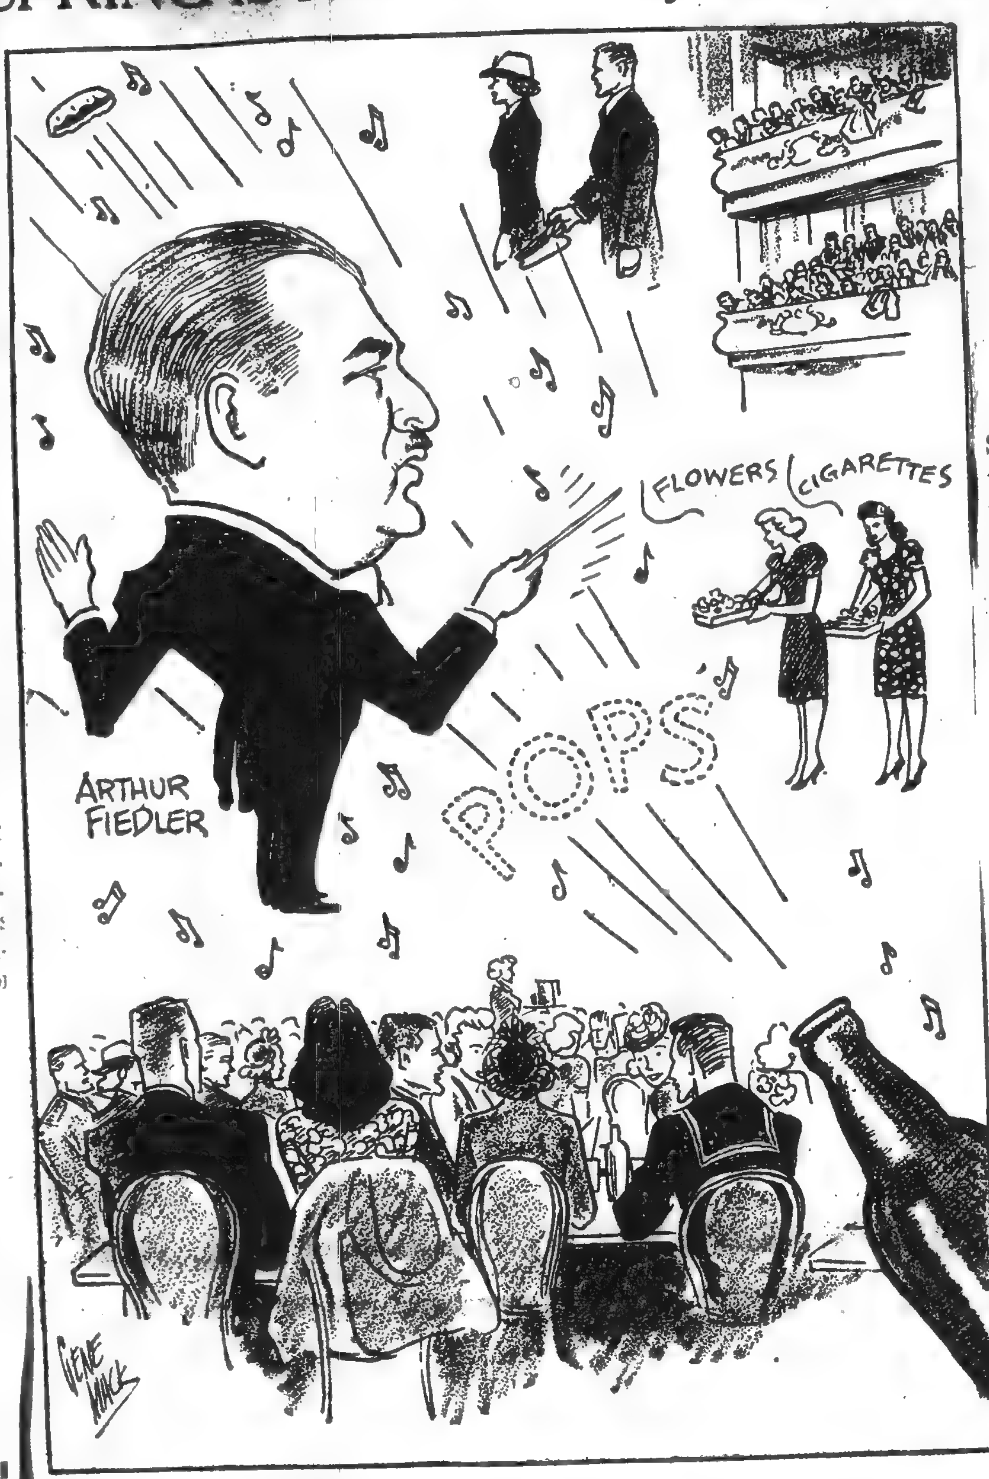
BOSTON, May 3 (AP).—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall Tuesday night was not enough there was — breathe it softly—a woman in the Pops Orchestra at the opening of the twenty-ninth season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

SPRING IS HERE . . . By Gene Mack



NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAY 3 1944

Woman Plays Basson As 'Pops Orchestra' Blares 'Pistol' Song

Boston, May 3.—(AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall last night was not enough there was —breathe it softly—a woman in the Pops Orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard, and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

~~The~~ opening program also marked the start of Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor and presented the customary assortment of semi-classical and popular selections.

The atmosphere once again was informal, with the audience sitting at tables on the floor, drinking beer and wine and smoking during the concert.

Gala Audience Greets Pops as It Opens for Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

At Symphony Hall on the stroke of 8:30 last night a tanned Arthur Fiedler stood up between his music rack and an inclosure banked with gladioli and other flowers; bowed and then launched into Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" March. Thus began the 59th season of the Pops, which are as dependable and pleasant as Spring herself.

This is also the 15th year as conductor of Mr. Fiedler, under whose enterprising guidance the Pops have reached the highest popularity in all their history. Capacity audiences have been the rule ever since he took over in 1930. His conducting has always been distinctive for its crisp vitality, and his programs have never failed to combine the recurring Pops favorites with as many novelties and modernities as he is able to fit into his schedule.

See POPS Page 9

PASADENA, CALIF.
POST

MAY 1 1 1944

CONDUCTOR'S KIN DEAD

NEW YORK, May 10. (INS)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was saddened today by news that his brother, Nicholas, died in Leningrad in 1941 "at the hands of the Fascist butchers."

Pops

Continued from the First Page

Transformation of Hall

This year, as always at the beginning of May, the interior of Symphony Hall has undergone swift transformation. On Sunday past at Bach's B minor Mass, the lower part of the hall was rowed with seats and the walls were red. Last night the walls were a coolish green and green tables and gilt chairs had sprouted on the floor. On the stage the big chandelier and the wall brackets have been restored to diffuse their soft light.

Thus as Pop's audiences enter the hall is quietly attractive. Later on as the concerts get under way those tables are filled with bottles and plates of light refreshments. A haze of tobacco smoke drifts leisurely toward the ceiling.

Elgar was followed by Weber's "Der Freischuetz" Overture last evening and Weber by two excerpts from works by Prokofieff: the Gavotte out of the "Classical" Symphony and the March from "The Love of Three Oranges." Strauss' waltz, "Voices of Spring," wound up the first third of the program.

Woman Bassoon Player

There was droll and slightly acid modernity in the five quasi-depictive pieces of William Walton's "Facade" Suites, and a contrasting devotional flavor in the "Wachet Auf" arranged from a Bach Cantata. Theatrical Broadway was represented by a potpourri of lush tunes from "Oklahoma." Marche Slave," that rousing half-brother of the "1812 Overture," was Tchaikovsky's contribution to the evening (and a Pops opening must certainly make a bow to Peter Ilitch). The strings had their innings with Rose's "Holiday." The program ended, as each opening Pops concert had for two years previously, with Peter Bodge's assemblage of military service tunes, "Salute to Our Fighting Forces."

Sharp eyes may have espied something new in the personnel of the Pops Orchestra: a woman at the desk of second basoon. She is Anne de Guichard. There have been other women members of the orchestra in former years, but Miss de Guichard is the only one to have played any instrument except the harp.

Yes, the Pops are with us again, and it is very pleasant that they are.

NEWPORT, R. I.
HERALD

MAY 6 - 1944

As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will offer a testimonial dinner on May 16 to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past twenty years.

The ceremonies will be heard over the BLUE Network, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony, on Tuesday, May 16, from 11:30 to 12:00 midnight.

Aaron Copland, acting as master of ceremonies during the dinner, in the ballroom of New York's historic Lotus Club, will introduce Dr. Howard Hanson who will offer a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in behalf of all the composers represented. Some of the other eminent composers include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein, Vladimir Dukelsky, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter Piston.

For many years, Dr. Koussevitzky has displayed extraordinary efforts in behalf of the composer, and has been unusually conscious of the fact that performing musicians make their fame and fortune because of composers' music.

In 1942, recognizing the need of substantial aid and appropriate recognition for the composer, Dr. Koussevitzky established the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, Inc., in memory of his wife, Natalie. This foundation is empowered to "aid the development of musical talent in every way possible." One of its principal functions is to make financial grants to composers and thus to enrich the world's musical literature.

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

may 3

Pops Concert

The Boston Pops Orchestra, consisting of 80 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting, gave the first program of the 59th season of the Pops concerts in Symphony Hall last night. The program was as follows:

March, "Pomp and Circumstance"	Elgar
Overture to "Der Freischutz"	Weber
Gavotte from the "Classical Symphony," and March from "The Love of Three Oranges"	Prokofieff
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes	Strauss
"Facade" Suite	Walton
"Wachet Auf" from Cantata 160	Bach
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Oklahoma," Selection	Rodgers
Holiday for Strings	Rose
Salute to Our Fighting Forces	Arranged by Peter Bodge

Well, it must be that spring is here after all.

They've got the swan boats out; they've got the frog pond full of water; they've got the boardwalks up and the jonquils down and, as of last night, they've got the Pops under way again, so I guess we've got to make believe it's spring even if our fingers are still blue of the cold.

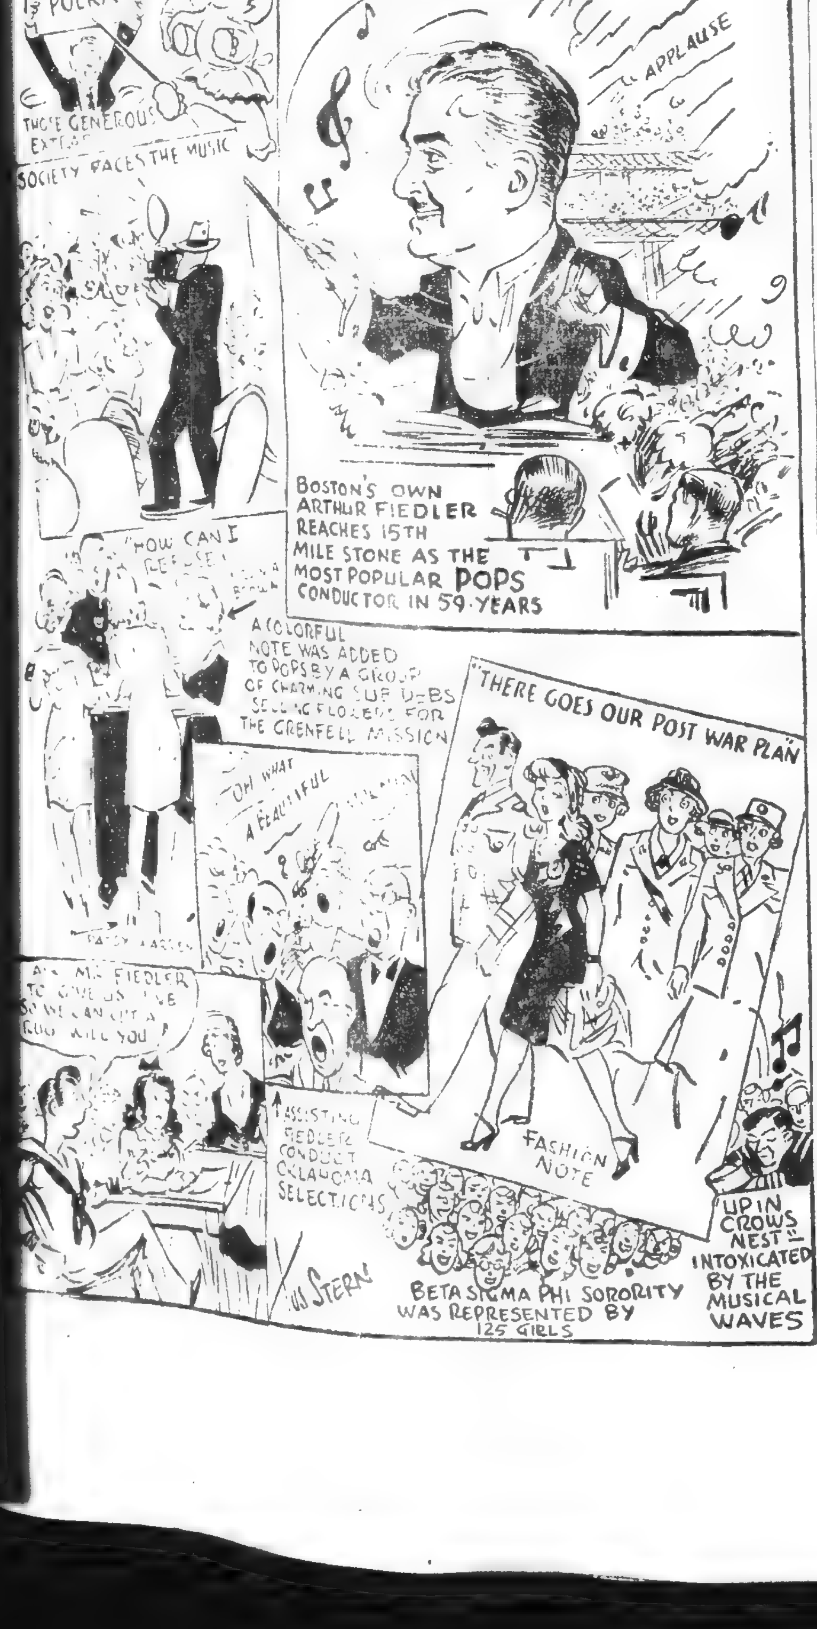
Or maybe it wasn't the chill in the air that lent the Pops opener its serious tone last night. It may have been the generally more constrained attitude which the public adopts in public places these days; in any case, there was a more sober atmosphere last night than has been apparent since Mr. Fiedler undertook just 15 years ago to make the Pops the jolly affairs they are.

This is not to say the opening concert was grim; on the contrary. It just didn't have the spontaneous gayety of other years, and it was even possible to hear a cork drop during the performance of some of the pieces on the program. And that, as a matter of fact, wasn't too regrettable an event at all since the program was splendidly balanced (although possibly too restrained for an opener) and the performance was fine all the way through. Morevover, by the time the orchestra got into the "Oklahoma" medley and the "Pistol Packin' Mama" encore, the audience had warmed up considerably, and the evening ended on a really old-time Pops level of merriment.

As always, Mr. Fiedler managed to spring something pretty novel in the way of music. The chief novelties were the Walton "Facade" Suite, an amusing satire, the two Prokofieff pieces (whose wit didn't quite get over), Stravinsky's "Circus Polka" (whose wit did) and, of all things, Bach's exceedingly beautiful chorale "Sleepers Awake" in an anonymous but unusually good orchestral arrangement. Indeed, the Bach even drew an encore.

The opening also was notable for the fact that Anne de Guichard, who played second bassoon, was the only woman except for a harpist to take a place in the hitherto all-male orchestra.

As always, too, Mr. Fiedler conducted with sparkle and authority to give the orchestral performance just the right tang. The hall was resplendent in its traditional Pops set-up with the chandeliers, green walls and the green and gold tables and chairs, and the audience, much of it in uniform, was large and cordially disposed. And so again the Pops are with us and so again it must be spring. Or is it?



CIRCUS POLKA
THOSE GENEROUS EXTRAS
SOCIETY FACES THE MUSIC
APPLAUSE
BOSTON'S OWN ARTHUR FIEDLER REACHES 15TH MILE STONE AS THE MOST POPULAR POPS CONDUCTOR IN 59 YEARS
HOW CAN I REFUSE
A COLORFUL NOTE WAS ADDED TO POPS BY A GROUP OF CHARMING SUB DEBS SELLING FLOWERS FOR THE GRENFELL MISSION
"THERE GOES OUR POST WAR PLAN"
OH WHAT A BEAUTIFUL
ASK MR FIEDLER TO GIVE US LIVE SO WE CAN CUT A RUG WILL YOU
ASSISTING FIEDLER CONDUCT OKLAHOMA SELECTIONS
FASHION NOTE
UP IN CROWS NEST INTOXICATED BY THE MUSICAL WAVES
BETA SIGMA PHI SORORITY WAS REPRESENTED BY 125 GIRLS
W STERN

[82]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

First Woman Player in Pops Orchestra

Globe
May 44

Dog Barks If She Hits a Sour Note

"If I hit one wrong note Mowgli barks."

By PHYLLIS WATTS

Breaking a precedent of long standing, Ane de Guichard of 922 Hyde Park av., Hyde Park, poised, blond bassoon player, became the first woman ever to play with the Boston Pops Orchestra when she walked on the stage at the opening of the Pops.

"I'm the first woman except for harpists, of course. Lady harpists don't count because they are generally women and are not rated as regular nstrumentalsts," said Miss de Guichard, who traces her ancestry back to the Dukes of Burgandy and the famous Robert de Guiscard, as the name was then spelled, who invaded Sicily at the time of William the Conqueror.

"The name de Guichard means that my family came from a town in Lorraine, but the de Guichards came to this country soon after 1900 and have been here ever since. I live in Hyde Park with my mother and my two dogs, now."

"Mowgli, my Shetland sheep dog, is my severest critic," explained the attractive musician, laughing. He sits and howls if I play too much sustained music when I'm practicing at home, and if I hit one wrong note he barks. He approves of staccato pieces, though. Terry, my smooth-haired fox terrier, seems to be indifferent about music altogether. He can take it or leave it alone."

When she plays second bassoon with the Boston Pops Orchestra during its 12 weeks' season in Symphony Hall, Miss de Guichard wears a simple well cut black suit with a tailored white blouse and no ornaments.

"The idea is to look as much like the rest of the orchestra as possible. Miss de Guichard explained. "The trouble with the few women who have tried to play with symphony orchestras is that they can't forget that they are women. They expect special attention and they fly off the handle easily. You can't be a prima donna and play in a symphony orchestra. A woman pays the same union dues as men and is subject to the same regulations and privileges.

"Bassoon players are as scarce as hen's teeth, really. For one thing, the instrument is so expensive. A bassoon like mine would cost $900 today if you could get it, which you couldn't," she said as she assembled the four pieces of her instrument. Then, too, it's a difficult instrument to play. Anything can happen and usually does.

"I remember one time trying to play a note and having no sound come out at all. I was desperate, because a solo entrance was coming up, until I discovered that a piece of skin had come off my lip and was keeping the reed from vibrating. If there is a draught, moisture collects in the tone-holes and you sound as though you were gargling instead of playing a bassoon.

"You can't wear make-up when you play a reed instrument if you want your reed to stay in decent condition." Asked if she didn't have to stay in good condition herself to play a bassoon, she said: "Yes. Most women find it difficult to play a wind instrument. When I play in theatres during the Winter time I have to be a contortionist to get into the theatre pit. It's discouraging to play between the acts, too, because people don't pay much attention. The theatres have to hire five musicians but sometimes they just pay them and don't have them play."

Miss de Guichard started her concert career at 5. Daughter of Arthur de Guichard, author and music critic for the Paris Press Association, she started playing the violin, but decided to change to the bassoon.

"I was playing one night with 18 other violinists and I thought it would be nicer to play a part which there weren't so many others playing so I could hear myself, so I began to study the bassoon with Abdon Laus and Rosario Mazeo."

Miss de Guichard has since played with the Portland Symphony Orchestra, the Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner's Orchestra, and the People's Symphony in Boston, and the Providence Symphony.

She broadcasts daily over WHDH, rehearses several times a week and plays at Pops every night currently. Outside music, her main interests are sporting events and cooking.

"Pies are my specialty," she said, admitting that it made her hungry to think of them. "Any kind of pies, but like most people of French descent I am an all-round cook, too."

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

MAY 3 1944

Yes---Woman Plays Bassoon In Boston Pops Orchestra

Boston, May 3 (AP)—Shades of 'Pistol Packin' Mama'—

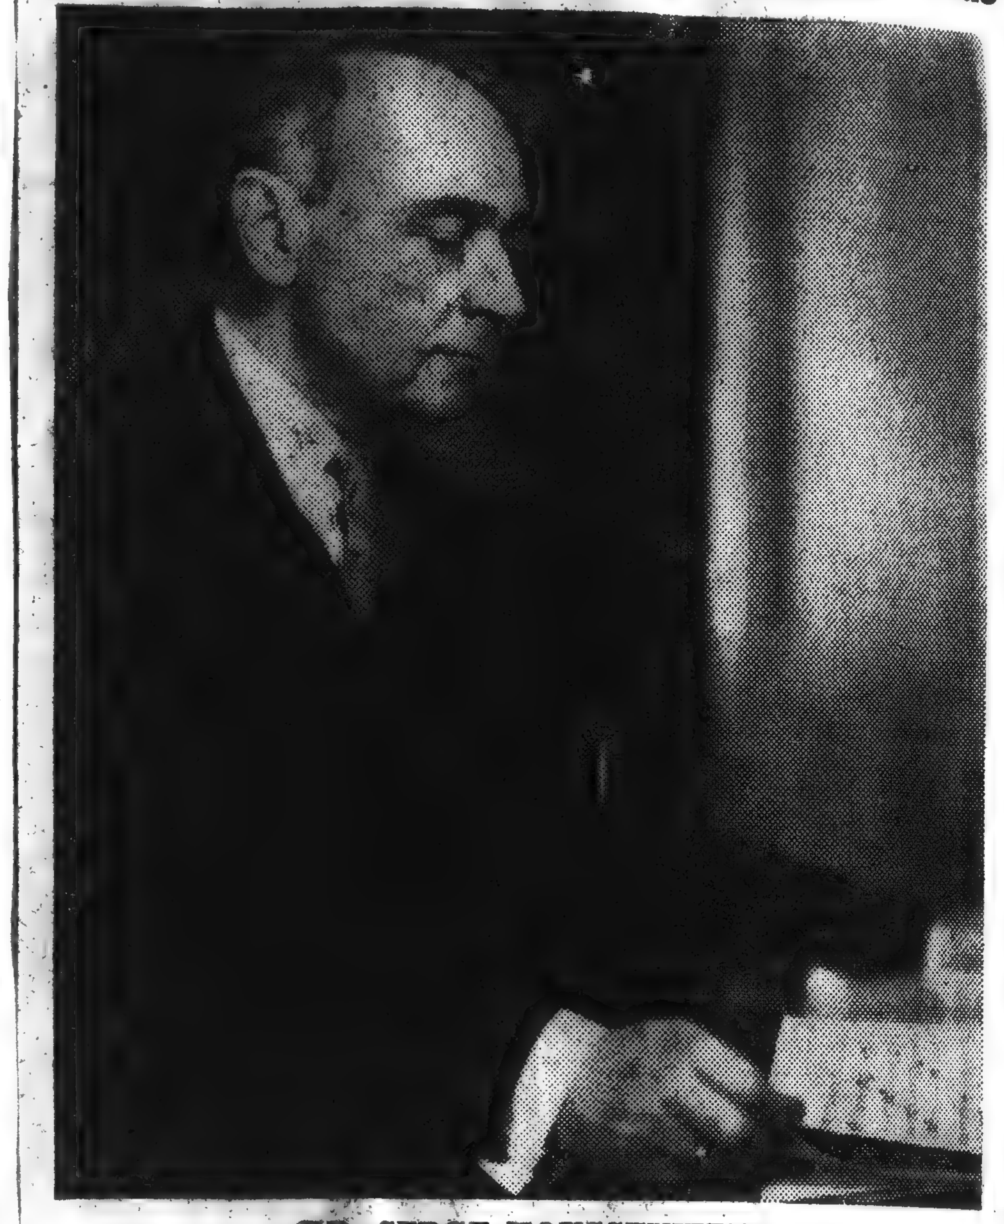
As if the playing of [illegible] raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall last night was not enough there was—breathe it softly [illegible] woman in the Pops Orchestra [illegible] opening of the twenty-ninth season.

She was Anne delGuichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

Jewish Advocate [illegible]

Koussevitzky Receives Tribute As 20th Symphony Season Ends



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By JULES WOLFFERS

(SEE EDITORIAL)

Never were honors more well-deserved than those paid to the great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Symphony Hall last Saturday night as the eminent leader rounded out twenty years of Boston conductorship. These twenty years have seen the growth of the orchestra to an unrivalled position: these twenty years have also seen the growth of Koussevitzky to the point where he transcends the limits of his position. He has become far more than the conductor of the Boston Symphony; he is a leader and a symbol for all creative forces striving for a better world.

The concert itself, 24th and last of the season, was indicative of the joint genius of leader and players. After opening commemorative music in remembrance of Cardinal O'Connell, the audience heard a remarkable performance of the Brahms Fourth and an extraordinary reading of the Beethoven Fifth.

(Continued on page 10)

MUSIC

Composers' Goal

In passionate bursts of Russian, French, and English, Serge Koussevitzky is one of the great enthusiasts for American music. It isn't all talk. In his twenty years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, he has not only championed American compositions but played them and —unlike some conductors who think once is enough—played them again and again. He has conducted 123 works by 44 American composers, and 53 of these performances were world premières.

"To find and understand great music," says the dynamic little conductor, "one must hear it."

Last week American composers said a formal thank-you to Koussevitzky at a testimonial dinner in New York, which also celebrated his twentieth anniversary with the Boston Symphony. The sponsoring committeemen—among them Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Dr. Howard Hanson, Sam Barber, William Schuman, and Leonard Bernstein*—all know what a tremendous boost a performance by "Koussie" can bring.

Volga Boatman: The fight to give modern music a hearing is not a new one for Koussevitzky. Back in his native Russia, Sergei Alexandrovitch pioneered in introducing the works of Scriabin, Stravinsky, and Prokofieff. He had abandoned his career as a bull-fiddle virtuoso (although he was the world's finest) to tour Russia with a symphony orchestra. To bring all the music to all the people, he chartered a side-wheeler and took his 85 musicians up and down the Volga to remote towns which had never heard an orchestra before. And through his own publishing firm, he brought out controversial works such as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." (From Russia last fortnight the conductor learned of the death of his brother Nicholas. Their sister Anna wrote that he "perished in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Fascist butchers.")

When Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924 to become conductor of the Boston Symphony, he asked the names of America's coming composers before he had even stepped off the boat. The Edward MacDowells and George Chadwicks were too imitative, they did not have "the aroma, the flavor of America, lamented the maestro. Nevertheless he programmed their works and jolted conservative Boston with modernism sandwiched between exquisite readings of the classics. There were disconcerted flurries on Beacon Street, but Boston kept coming.

Americana: Real American symphonic creation began with Copland, says Koussevitzky; "In heem you feel de soil of America." Harris, Walter Piston, and Roger Sessions form the second generation of composers. The third, younger group, he says, includes Schuman, Nicolai Berezowsky, and David Diamond.

"Koussie" has helped these men financially as well as artistically through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, organized in memory of his wife Nathalie after her death in 1942. His earlier efforts culminated in the founding of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., in 1938. Here the maestro and members of the Boston Symphony taught the musician and the greenhorn, and staged festivals rivaling those of Salzburg and Bayreuth. (The festivals were suspended for the duration after the summer of 1942.)

Koussevitzky, 70 next July, is probably better equipped to sell the American composer to the American public than any other musician in the country. He has the prestige and the money to back his dark horses, and in the Boston Symphony he has one of the finest orchestras in the world to present their music.

In the two decades that he has been in Boston, he has avoided tours de force or flashy showmanship à la Stokowski to put across a new composition. To the composer he has become a goal. Aaron Copland remarked at the dinner last week: "Just the way every 10-year-old boy used to dream of being President, now every 20-year-old composer dreams of being played by Koussevitzky."

"Koussie" took a bow after twenty

---

*Bernstein, 25-year-old composer, conductor, and pianist (NEWSWEEK, April 10), last week won the honorary award of the Music Critics Circle of New York for his "Jeremiah" symphony No. 1, voted the best symphonic work by an American composer during the past year.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

First Woman Player in Pops Orchestra

Globe
May 4

Dog Barks If She Hits a Sour Note

"If I hit one wrong note Mowgli barks."

By PHYLLIS WATTS

Breaking a precedent of long standing, Ane de Guichard of 922 Hyde Park av., Hyde Park, poised, blond bassoon player, became the first woman ever to play with the Boston Pops Orchestra when she walked on the stage at the opening of the Pops.

"I'm the first woman except for harpists, of course. Lady harpists don't count because they are generally women and are not rated as regular nstrumentalsts," said Miss de Guichard, who traces her ancestry back to the Dukes of Burgandy and the famous Robert de Guiscard, as the name was then spelled, who invaded Sicily at the time of William the Conqueror.

"The name de Guichard means that my family came from a town in Lorraine, but the de Guichards came to this country soon after 1900 and have been here ever since. I live in Hyde Park with my mother and my two dogs, now."

"Mowgli, my Shetland sheep dog, is my severest critic," explained the attractive musician, laughing. He sits and howls if I play too much sustained music when I'm practicing at home, and if I hit one wrong note he barks. He approves of staccato pieces, though. Terry, my smooth-haired fox terrier, seems to be indifferent about music altogether. He can take it or leave it alone."

When she plays second bassoon with the Boston Pops Orchestra during its 12 weeks' season in Symphony Hall, Miss de Guichard wears a simple well cut black suit with a tailored white blouse and no ornaments.

"The idea is to look as much like the rest of the orchestra as possible. Miss de Guichard explained. "The trouble with the few women who have tried to play with symphony orchestras is that they can't forget that they are women. They expect special attention and they fly off the handle easily. You can't be a prima donna and play in a symphony orchestra. A woman pays the same union dues as men and is subject to the same regulations and privileges.

"Bassoon players are as scarce as hen's teeth, really. For one thing, the instrument is so expensive. A bassoon like mine would cost $900 today if you could get it, which you couldn't," she said as she assembled the four pieces of her instrument. Then, too, it's a difficult instrument to play. Anything can happen and usually does.

"I remember one time trying to play a note and having no sound come out at all. I was desperate, because a solo entrance was coming up, until I discovered that a piece of skin had come off my lip and was keeping the reed from vibrating. If there is a draught, moisture collects in the tone-holes and you sound as though you were gargling instead of playing a bassoon.

"You can't wear make-up when you play a reed instrument if you want your reed to stay in decent condition." Asked if she didn't have to stay in good condition herself to play a bassoon, she said: "Yes. Most women find it difficult to play a wind instrument. When I play in theatres during the Winter time I have to be a contortionist to get into the theatre pit. It's discouraging to play between the acts, too, because people don't pay much attention. The theatres have to hire five musicians but sometimes they just pay them and don't have them play."

Miss de Guichard started her concert career at 5. Daughter of Arthur de Guichard, author and music critic for the Paris Press Association, she started playing the violin, but decided to change to the bassoon.

"I was playing one night with 18 other violinists and I thought it would be nicer to play a part which there weren't so many others playing so I could hear myself, so I began to study the bassoon with Abdon Laus and Rosario Mazeo."

Miss de Guichard has since played with the Portland Symphony Orchestra, the Civic Symphony Orchestra, Joseph Wagner's Orchestra, and the People's Symphony in Boston, and the Providence Symphony.

She broadcasts daily over WHDH, rehearses several times a week and plays at Pops every night currently. Outside music, her main interests are sporting events and cooking.

"Pies are my specialty," she said, admitting that it made her hungry to think of them. "Any kind of pies, but like most people of French descent I am an all-round cook, too."

[illegible]

Koussevitzky Receives Tribute As 20th Symphony Season Ends

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By JULES WOLFFERS

(SEE EDITORIAL)

Never were honors more well-deserved than those paid to the great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at Symphony Hall last Saturday night as the eminent leader rounded out twenty years of Boston conductorship. These twenty years have seen the growth of the orchestra to an unrivalled position: these twenty years have also seen the growth of Koussevitzky to the point where he transcends the limits of his position. He has become far more than the conductor of the Boston Symphony; he is a leader and a symbol for all creative forces striving for a better world.

The concert itself, 24th and last of the season, was indicative of the joint genius of leader and players. After opening commemorative music in remembrance of Cardinal O'Connell, the audience heard a remarkable performance of the Brahms Fourth and an extraordinary reading of the Beethoven Fifth.

(Continued on page 10)

MUSIC

Composers' Goal

In passionate bursts of Russian, French, and English, Serge Koussevitzky is one of the great enthusiasts for American music. It isn't all talk. In his twenty years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, he has not only championed American compositions but played them and —unlike some conductors who think once is enough—played them again and again. He has conducted 123 works by 44 American composers, and 53 of these performances were world premières.

"To find and understand great music," says the dynamic little conductor, "one must hear it."

Last week American composers said a formal thank-you to Koussevitzky at a testimonial dinner in New York, which also celebrated his twentieth anniversary with the Boston Symphony. The sponsoring committeemen—among them Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Dr. Howard Hanson, Sam Barber, William Schuman, and Leonard Bernstein*—all know what a tremendous boost a performance by "Koussie" can bring.

Volga Boatman: The fight to give modern music a hearing is not a new one for Koussevitzky. Back in his native Russia, Sergei Alexandrovitch pioneered in introducing the works of Scriabin, Stravinsky, and Prokofieff. He had abandoned his career as a bull-fiddle virtuoso (although he was the world's finest) to tour Russia with a symphony orchestra. To bring all the music to all the people, he chartered a side-wheeler and took his 85 musicians up and down the Volga to remote towns which had never heard an orchestra before. And through his own publishing firm, he brought out controversial works such as Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." (From Russia last fortnight the conductor learned of the death of his brother Nicholas. Their sister Anna wrote that he "perished in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Fascist butchers.")

When Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924 to become conductor of the Boston Symphony, he asked the names of America's coming composers before he had even stepped off the boat. The Edward MacDowells and George Chadwicks were too imitative, they did not have "the aroma, the flavor of America," lamented the maestro. Nevertheless he programmed their works and jolted conservative Boston with modernism sandwiched between exquisite readings of the classics. There were disconcerted flurries on Beacon Street, but Boston kept coming.

Americana: Real American symphonic creation began with Copland, says Koussevitzky; "In heem you feel de soil of America." Harris, Walter Piston, and Roger Sessions form the second generation of composers. The third, younger, group, he says, includes Schuman, Nicolai Berezowsky, and David Diamond.

"Koussie" has helped these men financially as well as artistically through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, organized in memory of his wife Nathalie after her death in 1942. His earlier efforts culminated in the founding of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., in 1938. Here the maestro and members of the Boston Symphony taught the musician and the greenhorn, and staged festivals rivaling those of Salzburg and Bayreuth. (The festivals were suspended for the duration after the summer of 1942.)

Koussevitzky, 70 next July, is probably better equipped to sell the American composer to the American public than any other musician in the country. He has the prestige and the money to back his dark horses, and in the Boston Symphony he has one of the finest orchestras in the world to present their music.

In the two decades that he has been in Boston, he has avoided tours de force or flashy showmanship à la Stokowski to put across a new composition. To the composer he has become a goal. Aaron Copland remarked at the dinner last week: "Just the way every 10-year-old boy used to dream of being President, now every 20-year-old composer dreams of being played by Koussevitzky."

"Koussie" took a bow after twenty yea

---

*Bernstein, 25-year-old composer, conductor, and pianist (NEWWEEK, April 10), last week won the honorary award of the Music Critics Circle of New York for his "Jeremiah" symphony No. 1, voted the best symphonic work by an American composer during the past year.

[9]

BINGHAMPTON, N. Y.
PRESS

MAY 3 1944

Yes---Woman Plays Bassoon In Boston Pops Orchestra

Boston, May 3 (AP)-Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"-

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony Hall last night was not enough there was—breathe it softly—a woman in the Pops Orchestra the opening of the twenty-ninth season.

She was Anne delGuichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston Symphony.

A Slight Financial Report And Another Little List

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

As nearly as I can judge from the necessarily incomplete and unreliable data on the subject, approximately 546 musical events were given in Boston in the season 1943-44 beginning the first of October and ending this week.

Also as nearly as I can determine from the even more incomplete records on the subject (and with the invaluable assistance of Aaron Richmond), the people of Boston have spent approximately $1,200,000 for musical entertainment during the same period. This includes the entire series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra (excepting the Pops), the Celebrity Series, the three operatic engagements, the ballet and all other musical events, large and small, held in the in-town music halls.

(Incidentally, the same research turned up the fact that the people of Boston spent approximately $2,000,000 in legitimate theaters and approximately $7,000,000 in first-run movie houses during the same period for an over-all total well over $10,000,000—and this, of course, only in the important downtown entertainment and musical centers.)

This figure of $1,200,000 for music in the flesh, so to speak—and "art" music at that—is really rather staggering in its implications. On the surface, at any rate, it means what few would have suspected a bare couple of years ago: that there has been a large but relatively dormant musical public all along which merely awaited the wherewithal to arise and storm the concert halls. It has not been disinterest in fine music which has kept the people away as many had supposed, but the plain fact that they could not hitherto afford to go to expensive concerts.

Thus it seemed at times this season that almost any kind of musical event but a debut recital would draw a large house. Indeed, of the 107 musical events that I attended this season, less than a third have not drawn near-capacity houses and only one or two have been what could be called poorly attended. And, as a matter of fact, all but a handful of Aaron Richmond's 30-odd "name" concerts have been completely sold out well in advance.

As notable as the size of the new audiences (and veteran concert-goers could not but notice this newness), was the degree of their musical cultivation. It became obvious from the outset that the new customers were no mere curious out to try anything once. They were distinctly musical people who knew what they wanted, what they liked, and why. They were interested in modern music and often singularly understanding and appreciative of it. They were, moreover, courteous and well-behaved, and even old Sir Thomas Beecham, who usually enlivens things by ticking off the audience on one thing or another in stentorian tones, could find no fault with us this year.

Will this new audience continue to be faithful to good music after the prosperity of the war years subsides? I rather think it will, although perhaps not quite on the scale of the present. It is a strange thing that once a person discovers the unique beauties of actual performance music, it is with the greatest reluctance he returns to the radio or the phonograph for his chief musical pleasures. In fact, he usually steps forward into the actual amateur performance of music himself in one way or another in the only true musical self-expression (and this tendency is already much in evidence). Yes, the new musical public will most certainly maintain the impetus of its first heady outing, and the horizons for Boston's musical life are aglow with future promise.

In line of duty, as I said, I "covered" 107 of the 546 concerts given in in-town Boston (as contrasted with the countless suburban events in and about the Metropolitan area). The general quality was exceedingly high, but rather than summarizing at length, I submit the following last round-up just for fun:

Most memorable event: Koussevitzky's 20th anniversary season, all of it.

Best orchestral concert: Boston Symphony, April 28-29 (Beethoven Fifth).

Best piano recital: Claudio Arrau, Feb. 22.

Best vocal recital: Lotte Lehmann, Feb. 13.

Best violin recital: Ruth Posselt, Feb. 3.

Best Quartet recital: London Quartet, Dec. 6.

IN DEFENSE OF THE OLDER GENERATION OF U. S. COMPOSERS

Post - May 8 '44

REPLY TO AN ARTICLE BY DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

MOTIVATED partly by sentiment and partly by a sense of justice and fair play, the desire to give the devil his due, this department feels called upon from time to time to come to the defense of the elder generation of American orchestral composers. The present crop has plenty of boosters. These gentlemen sing each other's praises in the columns of Modern Music and elsewhere, and some of them are pretty good at tooting their own horns.

Now it is all to the good that we have a flourishing native school. There is more creative activity here than anywhere else outside Russia. There are more competent composers today than at any other time in this country's history, but there is no way of proving that the best of them are any better than the best of their predecessors. There are those who seriously wonder if they are really as good. And that the majority of the works of Paine, Chadwick, MacDowell, Converse, Gilbert and the rest have passed into oblivion does not mean that the compositions of Copland, Harris, Piston, Schuman, et al. will escape that fate. Many of these elder pieces enjoyed a popularity, a degree of public esteem that has fallen to the lot of but few contemporary productions, and some of them have suffered an undeserved eclipse.

Our conductors, all but a few of them foreign-born, have their hands full trying to keep up with the times. The pieces they play are but a fraction of those they are importuned to play. They get no acclaim for playing an older work, something they almost never do, but they are widely publicized when they can appear as champions of the living composer. The shining exception to this general rule is Fabien Sevitzky who, whether in Boston or in Indianapolis, where he now functions, has seen American music as a whole. And more honor to him.

The immediate provocation for this outburst of musical patriotism is an article by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the April 24 issue of Life. Rendered into "consistent English" by Alice Berezowsky, and illustrated with photographs of the Maestro in action and of the Messrs. Copland, Schuman, Harris and David Diamond (the last-named is on the cards for next season), the article is a propaganda attempt to prove that now for the first time we have a representative and thoroughly capable American school ("Naturally, it has taken time for American composers to acquire their great technique and they have done so only in the past decade"), and in the course of these protestations and enconiums a judicious amount of reflected glory is permitted to fall upon the head of the author. "And so I might say that in the early 1920's American creative music was barely alive. Its pulse was very, very weak." More likely it was its lungs.

Technique, before we let that one go, is the ability to express what you want to express. By a certain process of reasoning it could be claimed that Mozart was deficient in that respect because he couldn't possibly have written "Wozzeck" or the "Symphonia Domestica."

At the outset Paine, McDowell, Chadwick, Foote, Loeffler and Griffes are lumped as men "mostly New Englanders," who were "greatly influenced by the French and German composers or by a Russian, Tchaikovsky (?)" There is no mention of that 100 per cent American, Henry F. Gilbert or of F. S. Converse, though the conductor did bring out the former's "Symphonic Piece," shortly before his death, and the latter's "American Sketches," "California" and "Flivver Ten Million," pieces more authentically American, one might humbly suggest, than some of the second-hand Stravinsky-plus-Hindemith of the Doctor's special pets. Incidentally, before he came to enlighten us with his discoveries, the Boston Symphony in its regular concerts had given some 210 performances of works by 36 Americans. Since he included the Alsatian-born Loeffler, he is included here, Finally, the case of Hill, who had "composed very little for orchestra" is misrepresented. His "Fall of the House of Usher," "Parting of Lancelot and Guinevere," the two "Stevensoniana" suites and the Waltzes for Orchestra had all been brought out by Muck, Rabaud or Monteux. Dr. Koussevitzky has done handsomely by him, of course.

* * * *

THE BACH MASS

To turn to less controversial matters, the performance of Bach's B minor Mass, with which Dr. Koussevitzky fittingly concluded his 20th season here, served to remind us of his great service in giving choral music its rightful place in the repertory. Despite the handicaps imposed by the war, Mr. Woodworth's Harvard and Radcliffe singers covered themselves with glory and the whole performance was fired by the Koussevitzkyan eloquence.

The 14th annual Festival of American Music at the University of Rochester's Eastman School, under the general direction of Howard Hanson, brought to a hearing chamber or symphonic works by these Boston composers, past or present: Chadwick, Hadley, Loeffler, Hill, Joseph Wagner, Quincy Porter and Mabel Daniels. These festivals, as may be inferred, are representative in the fullest sense.

SYMPHONY HALL

Herald May 8

Bernstein at Pops

Last night at Symphony Hall the Boston Pops Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting and acting as soloist in the Ravel Concert (for which Louis Speyer conducted, presented the following program:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 .... Beethoven
Suite from "Our Town" .... Copland
Romeo and Juliet, Overture-Fantasia .... Tchaikovsky
Piano Concerto .... Ravel
Overture to "Die Fiedermaus" ("The Bat") .... Strauss
*Emperor Waltzes .... Strauss
*Hungarian Dances, Nos. 5 and 6, Brahms

The first Sunday night Pops of the season, which took place last night te Symphony Hall as a benefit for the South End Music School, proved to be an extremely rewarding occasion and something of a personal triumph for Leonard Bernstein, brilliant young composer, conductor and pianist. Mr. Bernstein not only conducted the orchestra in a program that was definitely more Symphonic than Pops, and conducted it with great fire and skill, but also played the solo part in Maurice Ravel's seldom heard Piano Concerto, and played it so wel that he earned a substantial ovation at the close. (And one of the most evidently gratified spectators was Serge Kousevitsky, who joined his enthusiasm to that of the delighted audience.)

The Ravel concerto is the only composition of this kind (barring the one for left hand alone) that this composer ever wrote, and it was completed only five years before his death. The first and third movements have something of a jazz tempo and Gershwinesque dissonances; the second is crystal clear, lyrical and poetic, like a calm stretch in a river full of rapids. Mr. Bernstein negotiated the complexities of the opening and closing movements with intelligence and great technical skill and played the second section with real poetic feeling. Louis Speyer conducted the orchestra with admirable success for this number, and led the musicians and audience in a rapid-fire rendering of the "Star Spangled Banner."

The other novelty on the program was Aaron Copland's score for the film of "Our Town," which was quiet, dignified and pleasant, taking its thematic material from old hymn tunes and sounding generally more like background music than an independent work. The "Leonore" overture and the Romeo and Juliet overture-fantasia were excellently done and heartily applauded.

E. L. H.

Globe May 8

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Pops

By CYRUS DURGIN

Leonard Bernstein was guest conductor and piano soloist last evening at the first Sunday Pops of the season. It was a benefit for the South End Music School, which took the floor of Symphony Hall. A large and socially distinguished audience was present, including Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Bernstein assembled a fairly solid program of familiar pieces and two novelties. The latter were Aaron Copland's Suite from his music to the film "Our Town," and Ravel's infrequently played Piano Concerto. For the last, the conductor was Louis Speyer, who gave a dignified and highly capable performance.

This Piano Concerto should not be confused with the one for left hand that Ravel wrote about the same time for Paul Wittgenstein. The two-handed Concerto is a more gracious if less spectacular work than its fellow, with two witty and slightly cynical fast movements separated by an adagio whose Gallic lyricism makes you think a little of D'Indy.

For the screen version of "Our Town," Mr. Copland wrote a pleasant, easily assimilated score with a definite—and appropriate—hymn-tune flavor. The concert excerpts, reminiscent of Hindemith to some degree, are effective enough, but divorced from the visual action they accompany they do seem repetitive. But they are good music, and interesting.

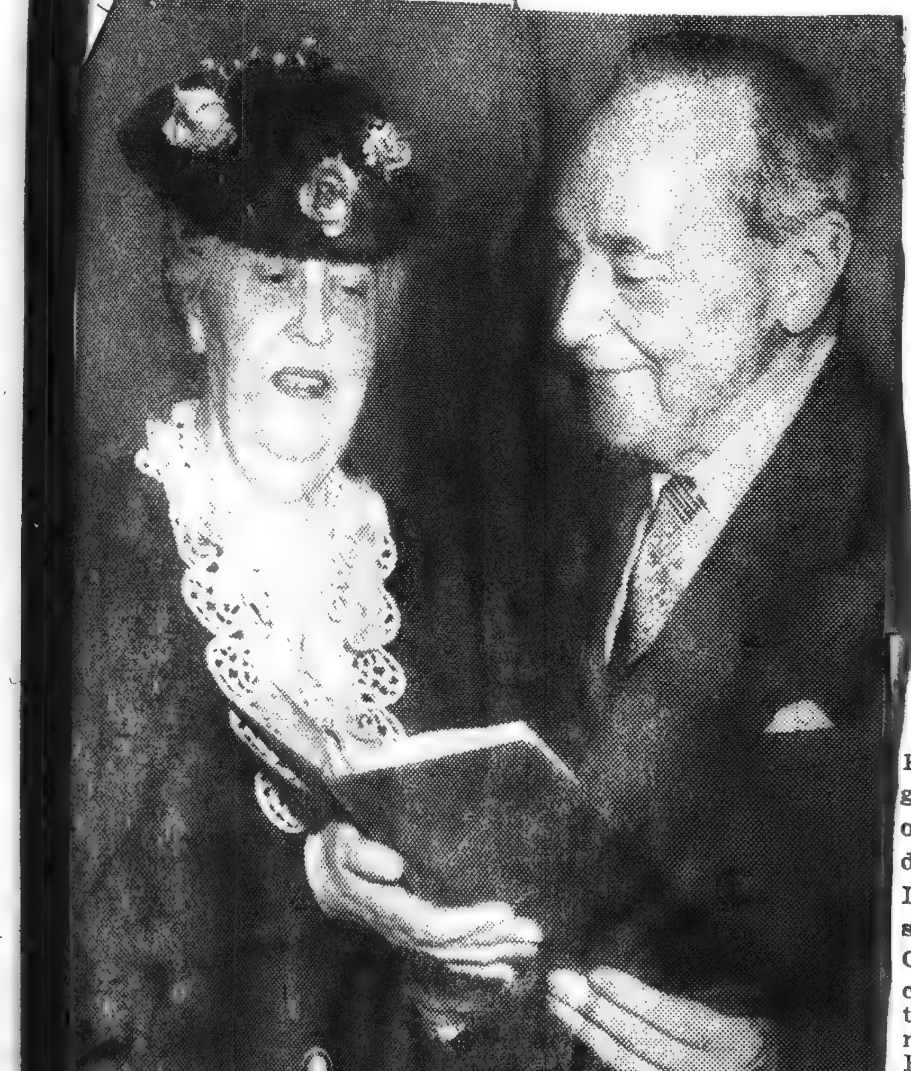
Passion, speed, energy and yet more passion are now the determining characteristics of Mr. Bernstein. He has a temperament that boils over. He conducts as befits a young man with great talent and enthusiasm for his art. His feeling is unrestrained and is communicated to those about him. An orchestra plays for him up to the hilt, whatever the tempo, and an audience sits transfixed.

Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and the "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky went much too fast, but they were electrifying. Eventually Mr. Bernstein will earn that the same effects can be gained with about one-third less energy, and that speed is not always synonymous with intensity. Nevertheless he is an extraordinarily gifted young man, and gave a splendid account of himself both as conductor and at the keyboard.

The Overture to "The Bat" and the "Emperor" Waltzes, by Johann Strauss, and the Fifth and Sixth Brahms Hungarian Dances ended the evening.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

MAY 6 1944



SYMPHONY AWARD—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor o the Boston Symphony, receives the Essex County Sym phony Society's achievement award for 1944 from Mrs Parker O. Griffith, society president, at annual luncheon at the Essex House.

(ASSOCIATED PRESS)

BERNSTEIN CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Versatile Leonard Bernstein, the Boston boy who so suddenly made good both in New York and here, took over last evening's Pop Concert in the dual capacity of conductor and pianist. In the latter role he performed the seldom-heard and altogether fascinating Concerto of Ravel, with Louis Speyer conducting the modest orchestra that the score requires. The first and last movements give the impression that the French master was trying to tell Gershwin how he should have done it, and Mr. Bernstein played them with plenty of snap. The second movement, which he played equally well, is of songful, romantic beauty.

From Bernstein, the conductor, we had previously heard his own and remarkably fine "Jeremiah" Symphony and Copland's "El Salon Mexico." Last evening he proved himself at home in various styles. On the programme were Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, a pleasant Suite from Copland's music for "Our Town," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," Strauss' "Fledermaus" Overture and "Emperor" Waltz and two Brahms Hungarian Dances. Despite his youth, Mr. Bernstein is a masterly leader. He displays both temperament and authority and the performances under his direction had all the finish that we expect of the orchestra in the Symphony Concerts proper.

P. May 8

HANNIBAL, MO.
COURIER-POST & JOURNAL

MAY 6 - 1944

THE BOSTON POPS CONCERTS will have the premier concert over KHMO-Blue tonight at 7:30, under the baton of Arthur Fiedler. The program will include Berlioz's "Rakoczy March," and "Roman Carval Overture;" Komzak's "Girls of Baden" waltzes and a "Salute to Our Fighting Forces." The POPS CONCERTS are in distinct contrast to the regular winter season of the Boston Symphony. Although the Pops present serious classical music, they are more likely to emphasize the lighter classics of the symphonic and operatic repertoire. In addition, much music that is "popular" is performed, including Strauss waltzes, light overtures, operetta selections, and current hit tunes. Keep your Saturday night listening habit at 7:30 over KHMO-Blue.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAY 8 1944

Burgin Leads Local Symphony; 2600 Listeners Applaud Concert

Conductor Alexander Leslie's unfortunate illness gave more than 2600 listeners at the Municipal auditorium last night the chance to hear and see the collaboration of a famous man and his equally-noted wife. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted the Springfield Symphony orchestra and his wife, Ruth Posselt, the internationally known violinist, was the assisting artist.

Leslie has done an outstandingly fine job in building the orchestra in the few short months he has been working with the musicians and it is more than a pity that he could not share with them the well deserved applause last evening.

Burgin, who had planned to be in the audience to hear his wife play, graciously consented to substitute for his friend and did his usual excellent job. He is no stranger to Springfield audiences who have listened to and watched him play with and lead the Boston group.

Miss Posselt, who is as attractive to the eye as to the ear, did the extremely difficult Tschaikowsky violin concerto in D major with such assurance and mastery that its technical intricacies were almost lost sight of in the sheer pleasure of the rhythmic variety, sensitive coloring and opulence of tone with which she played.

The "Overture to Russlan and Ludmilla," of Glinka, with which the program opened and the "Overture to Oberon," of Weber, with which it closed, are both based on the airs of the operas which they precede and gave the orchestra a good chance to display the progress it has made in the two months since the first concert.

Haydn's Symphony No 102 (B&H) in B flat major, also known as the "London, No 9," was given an excellent performance with the lovely adagio movement and the swift moving final movement showing the flexibility of the group even under the less familiar baton of the temporary conductor.

After many rounds of applause during which the leader, the concertmaster and the entire orchestra responded with bows, Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" was presented as an encore.

R. L. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

MAY 10 1944

Musicians to Honor Koussevitsky

As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will offer a testimonial dinner on May 16 to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past twenty years.

The ceremonies will be heard over the Blue Network, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony, on Tuesday, May 16, from 11:30 to 12 midnight, EWT.

Aaron Copland, acting as master of ceremonies during the dinner, in the ballroom of New York's historic Lotus Club, will introduce Dr. Howard Hanson who will offer a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in behalf of all the composers represented. Some of the other eminent composers include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein. Vladimir Dukelsky, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter Piston.

For many years, Dr. Koussevitzky has displayed extraordinary efforts in behalf of the composer, and has been unusually conscious of the fact that performing musicians make their fame and fortune because of composers' music.

TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

MAY 8 - 1944

Times Are Changing

BOSTON, May 8.—(AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony hall was not enough, there was—breathe it softly—a woman in the orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 11 1944

Koussevitzky's Brother Killed by Nazi Invaders

Perished in Leningrad in 1941, Sister Writes Conductor

LENOX, Mass., May 10 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, said today he had learned through a letter from his eighty-year-old sister, Anna Bach, living in Russia, of the death of his only brother, Nicholas, "at the hands of Fascist butchers" in Leningrad in 1941.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia but became an American citizen the year of his brother's death, said that Nicholas had operated a piano factory and was a musician.

The letter written by Mrs. Bach was forwarded to Dr. Koussevitzky through the government museum of Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. It said in part:

"Thanks to the care of our government we were happily evacuated from Leningrad to the Urals, where I am now living with my family. Our family has had plenty of trouble. Our dear Nicholas perished in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Fascist butchers. Only thou and I are left, by beloved brother.

"I have heard that thou, with thy work, also art helping our common cause, the destruction of our common enemy. This cursed enemy burst, like a wild beast, into our good, pleasant life.

"Our valiant Red Army is giving him his just deserts."

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

MAY 4 - 1944

PLAYS IN ORCHESTRA

Anne de Guichard Operates Bassoon in Boston Symphony

Boston, May 4 (AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old symphony hall Tuesday night was not enough there was — breathe it softly — a woman in the Pops orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston symphony.

The opening program also marked the start of Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor and presented the customary assortment of semi-classical and popular selections.

The atmosphere once agian was informal, with the audience sitting at tables, on the floor, drinking beer and wine and smoking during the concert

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 16 1944

Dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky

Dorothy Maynor, soprano; William Kapell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale directed by Robert Shaw will participate in the musical program offered at a dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the Hotel Plaza tonight. The dinner is sponsored by a committee of American composers, including the following: Samuel Barber, Howard Hanson, Nicolai Berezowzky, Roy Harris, Leonard Bernstein, Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Vladimir Dukelsky, William Schuman and Deems Taylor.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAY 15 1944

DOROTHY MAYNOR, eminent American soprano, who will sing at the testimonial dinner in honor of Serge Koussevitzky Tuesday evening at the Hotel Plaza. The dinner is being held to celebrate Dr Koussevitzky's 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his distinguished service to contemporary music. Miss Maynor made her debut with the Boston Symphony under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky in 1939. William Kapell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale, under Robert Shaw's direction, will also take part in the musical program at the dinner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 16 1944

MUSIC INTERCHANGE PLAN

Koussevitzky Speaks Here in Aid of U. S.-Soviet Proposal

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spoke last night at the Hotel Astor to some 400 musicians on proposals for an extensive program of musical interchange between the United States and the Soviet Union. The meeting was held under the auspices of the music committee, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is chairman, of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

"In the interchange of music," Dr. Koussevitzky declared, "we must give two things: the spirit of help and actual material assistance. This means money, and if we can get the money, both from our musicians and the rest of our people, this committee will find the means of getting it to the Russians. And Russia will not remain in our debt."

Eugene D. Kisselev, Russian Consul General in New York, brought greetings from Soviet musicians and Corliss Lamont welcomed the musicians present on behalf of the National Council, of which he is chairman.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

MAY 14 1944

Testimonial Dinner for Noted Conductor

As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will attend a testimonial dinner on May 16 for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra for the last 20 years.

The ceremonies will be heard over KSCJ, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston symphony on Tuesday from 10:30 to 11 p. m. The symphony is heard on KSCJ Saturdays at 7:30 p. m.

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

MAY 1 7 1944

AUDIENCE TAKES A BOW

BOSTON — So attentive were children during a performance of Beethoven's Eroica symphony that Boston Symphony orchestra members concluded by applauding the youthful audience.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 15 1944

Koussevitzky To Be Feted In New York

Elite Of Musical World Will Honor Boston Conductor

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 15—With the wind-up of the musical season so near, last week was primarily one of repeat performances of opera and ballet, with the only outstanding event the opening of Martha Graham and Company for a week of repertory at the National Theater. With the interest in the dance running so high this season, large audiences were a foregone conclusion. A varied repertoire, ranging from such suggestive titles as Punch and Judy to Deaths and Entrances gave the versatile artist full scope and was well interpreted both by her and by her supporting company.

Tuesday evening will see one of the most distinguished musical gatherings held in New York in many moons. It will be a tribute dinner honoring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the completion of his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The elite of the musical world—at least all of those who are within traveling distance of New York—will be there, and there will be entertainment by a distinguished group of musical artists, among them Dorothy Maynor, the negro soprano. The Collegiate Chorale, conducted by Robert Shaw, will perform. Originally designed as a small dinner given by a few close friends, the affair has expanded, by public demand, to an event which will fill to overflowing the Plaza Ballroom. Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland, National Federation of Music Clubs president, will be there in her official capacity as head of this organization and also as a member of the Koussevitzky Foundation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 11 1944

HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Interest in Forthcoming Dinner Necessitates Revising Plans

Such widespread interest has been created in the dinner planned in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, to be held at the Plaza Hotel next Tuesday at 8 P. M., that it has been found necessary to enlarge the guest list. Instead of the small affair, as originally planned by a group of American composers, the dinner guests will now include composers from throughout the country, notables in the field of music and admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky. Applications are being filled at the offices of the sponsoring Composers Committee which has headquarters at 136 East Sixty-fourth Street.

Additional artists have been added to the evening's musical program. These include Dorothy Maynor, soprano; William Kapell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale directed by Robert Shaw.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

MAY 14 1944

AS A TRIBUTE

. . . to the aid and encouragement he has extended to American composers and musicians, a group of the nation's musical artists will give a testimonial dinner for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony for the past 20 years, on Tuesday, May 16. The ceremonies will be heard over the Blue network from 10:30 to midnight. Aaron Copland will act as master of ceremonies and Dr. Howard Hanson will be the chief speaker. Other composers to be present include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schumann, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 14 1944

Tribute to Koussevitzky

WQXR to Carry Program at Testimonial Dinner

A testimonial dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last twenty years, given by a group of American composers in appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzy's aid and encouragement of composers, will be broadcast at 10 p. m. Tuesday over WQXR. The program will also be heard by transcription at 11:30 p. m. on W… In addition to addresses by Dr. Howard Hanson and Dr. Koussevitzky, the broadcast will include selections by the Collegiate Chorale, directed by Robert Shaw, and the performance on the piano of several compositions written for the occasion by Leonard Bernstein. Aaron Copland will be master of ceremonies.

Other composers in the group will include Roy Harris, William Shuman, Deems Taylor, Samuel Barber, Nicolai Berezowsky, Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston and Vladimir Dukelsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 16 1944

MUSIC CRITICS PRIZE WON BY BERNSTEIN

'Jeremiah' Symphony Chosen as Season's Best Orchestral Work by an American

Leonard Bernstein's "Jeremiah" Symphony No. 1 was voted the outstanding orchestral work by an American composer introduced in New York concert halls during the season just ended, by the Music Critics Circle of New York, at a meeting yesterday afternoon. The symphony by the young composer-conductor won a majority vote on the first ballot. Runners-up were William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Norman Dello Joio's "Magnificat."

The three works, which were nominated from a list of more than twenty new compositions introduced during the season, were played at a broadcast-concert of the NBC Symphony under the direction of Dr. Frank Black last Thursday evening. It was from this concert, which was attended by the membership of the Circle headed by Oscar Thompson, music critic of The New York Sun, that the final award was voted yesterday afternoon.

The "Jeremiah" symphony was introduced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under the composer's baton earlier this season. The Schuman work was first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall and the Dello Joio "Magnificat" by the National Orchestral Association under the direction of Leon Barzin.

After the 1941-42 season, the first of the Circle's existence, William Schuman's Third Symphony won the award and last year's winner was Paul Creston's Symphony No. 1. The awards are presented officially in the form of certificates.

A second award will be made by the Circle for the season's most distinguished new chamber work by an American composer. The Circle will attend on May 21 a concert of four works, part of which will be aired by the National Broadcasting Company beginning at 12 noon. These four works, from which the final award in the chamber music category will be made, are string quartets by Randall Thompson and LeRoy Robertson, which will be played by the Roth Quartet; a string quartet by Sgt. Andrew Imbrie, which will be played by the Bennington Quartet, and Aaron Copland's Sonata, which will be performed by Mischa Mischakoff, concertmaster of the NBC Symphony, and Lukas Foss, young composer. The chamber music award will be voted at the Circle's final meeting of the season next week.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

MAY 17 1944

Koussevitzky Asks Help for Music

NEW YORK, May 17.—(AP)—An extraordinary audience of the country's most important musical and social figures last night heard Serge Koussevitzky call upon America to help music build a new world.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke at a dinner given in celebration of the completion of his first 20 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dinner began as a small affair, organized by a group of 11 American composers in recognition of the great conductor's propaganda for American music.

It quickly outgrew its frame, and the Plaza ballroom overflowed with more than 400 men and women.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAY 8 1944

Burgin Leads Local Symphony; 2600 Listeners Applaud Concert

Conductor Alexander Leslie's unfortunate illness gave more than 2600 listeners at the Municipal auditorium last night the chance to hear and see the collaboration of a famous man and his equally-noted wife. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted the Springfield Symphony orchestra and his wife, Ruth Posselt, the internationally known violinist, was the assisting artist.

Leslie has done an outstandingly fine job in building the orchestra in the few short months he has been working with the musicians and it is more than a pity that he could not share with them the well deserved applause last evening.

Burgin, who had planned to be in the audience to hear his wife play, graciously consented to substitute for his friend and did his usual excellent job. He is no stranger to Springfield audiences who have listened to and watched him play with and lead the Boston group.

Miss Posselt, who is as attractive to the eye as to the ear, did the extremely difficult Tschaikowsky violin concerto in D major with such assurance and mastery that its technical intricacies were almost lost sight of in the sheer pleasure of the rhythmic variety, sensitive coloring and opulence of tone with which she played.

The "Overture to Russlan and Ludmilla," of Glinka, with which the program opened and the "Overture to Oberon," of Weber, with which it closed, are both based on the airs of the operas which they precede and gave the orchestra a good chance to display the progress it has made in the two months since the first concert.

Haydn's Symphony No 102 (B&H) in B flat major, also known as the "London, No 9," was given an excellent performance with the lovely adagio movement and the swift moving final movement showing the flexibility of the group even under the less familiar baton of the temporary conductor.

After many rounds of applause during which the leader, the concertmaster and the entire orchestra responded with bows, Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" was presented as an encore.

R. L. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

MAY 10 1944

Musicians to Honor Koussevitsky

As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will offer a testimonial dinner on May 16 to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past twenty years.

The ceremonies will be heard over the Blue Network, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony, on Tuesday, May 16, from 11:30 to 12 midnight, EWT.

Aaron Copland, acting as master of ceremonies during the dinner, in the ballroom of New York's historic Lotus Club, will introduce Dr. Howard Hanson who will offer a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky in behalf of all the composers represented. Some of the other eminent composers include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schuman, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein. Vladimir Dukelsky, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter Piston.

For many years, Dr. Koussevitzky has displayed extraordinary efforts in behalf of the composer, and has been unusually conscious of the fact that performing musicians make their fame and fortune because of composers' music.

This Clipping

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 11 1944

Koussevitzky's Brother Killed by Nazi Invaders

Perished in Leningrad in 1941, Sister Writes Conductor

LENOX, Mass., May 10 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, said today he had learned through a letter from his eighty-year-old sister, Anna Bach, living in Russia, of the death of his only brother, Nicholas, "at the hands of Fascist butchers" in Leningrad in 1941.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia but became an American citizen the year of his brother's death, said that Nicholas had operated a piano factory and was a musician.

The letter written by Mrs. Bach was forwarded to Dr. Koussevitzky through the government museum of Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky. It said in part:

"Thanks to the care of our government we were happily evacuated from Leningrad to the Urals, where I am now living with my family. Our family has had plenty of trouble. Our dear Nicholas perished in Leningrad in 1941 at the hands of the Fascist butchers. Only thou and I are left, by beloved brother.

"I have heard that thou, with thy work, also art helping our common cause, the destruction of our common enemy. This cursed enemy burst, like a wild beast, into our good, pleasant life.

"Our valiant Red Army is giving him his just deserts."

TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

MAY 8 - 1944

Times Are Changing

BOSTON, May 8.—(AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old Symphony hall was not enough, there was—breathe it softly—a woman in the orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston symphony.

DANBURY, CONN.
NEWS-TIMES

MAY 4 1944

PLAYS IN ORCHESTRA

Anne de Guichard Operates Bassoon in Boston Symphony

Boston, May 4 (AP)—Shades of "Pistol Packin' Mama"—

As if the playing of that raucous tune in staid old symphony hall Tuesday night was not enough there was — breathe it softly — a woman in the Pops orchestra at the opening of the 29th season.

She was Anne de Guichard and she played second bassoon.

Except for a harpist, she was the first woman ever to play with the hitherto all-male orchestra, largely composed of members of the Boston symphony.

The opening program also marked the start of Arthur Fiedler's 15th season as conductor and presented the customary assortment of semi-classical and popular selections.

The atmosphere once agian was informal, with the audience sitting at tables, on the floor, drinking beer and wine and smoking during the concert

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 16 1944

Dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky

Dorothy Maynor, soprano; William Kapell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale directed by Robert Shaw will participate in the musical program offered at a dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, at the Hotel Plaza tonight. The dinner is sponsored by a committee of American composers, including the following: Samuel Barber, Howard Hanson, Nicolai Berezowzky, Roy Harris, Leonard Bernstein, Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, ladimir Dukelsky, William Schuman and Deems Taylor.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

MAY 15 1944

DOROTHY MAYNOR, eminent American soprano, who will sing at the testimonial dinner in honor of Serge Koussevitzky Tuesday evening at the Hotel Plaza. The dinner is being held to celebrate Dr Koussevitzky's 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and his distinguished service to contemporary music. Miss Maynor made her debut with the Boston Symphony under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky in 1939. William Kapell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale, under Robert Shaw's direction, will also take part in the musical program at the dinner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 16 1944

MUSIC INTERCHANGE PLAN

Koussevitzky Speaks Here in Aid of U. S.-Soviet Proposal

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spoke last night at the Hotel Astor to some 400 musicians on proposals for an extensive program of musical interchange between the United States and the Soviet Union. The meeting was held under the auspices of the music committee, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is chairman, of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

"In the interchange of music," Dr. Koussevitzky declared, "we must give two things: the spirit of help and actual material assistance. This means money, and if we can get the money, both from our musicians and the rest of our people, this committee will find the means of getting it to the Russians. And Russia will not remain in our debt."

Eugene D. Kisselev, Russian Consul General in New York, brought greetings from Soviet musicians and Corliss Lamont welcomed the musicians present on behalf of the National Council, of which he is chairman.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA
JOURNAL

MAY 14 1944

Testimonial Dinner for Noted Conductor

As a fitting tribute to the inestimable aid and encouragement he has extended to numerous American composers and musicians, a noted group of this nation's musical artists will attend a testimonial dinner on May 16 for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra for the last 20 years.

The ceremonies will be heard over KSCJ, which also carries weekly concerts by the Boston symphony on Tuesday from 10:3 to 11 p. m. The symphony is hear on KSCJ Saturdays at 7:30 p. m

---

WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

MAY 12 1944

AUDIENCE TAKES A BOW

BOSTON — So attentive were children during a performance of Beethoven's Eroica symphony that Boston Symphony orchestra members concluded by applauding the youthful audience.

[85]

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 15 1944

Koussevitzky To Be Feted In New York

Elite Of Musical World Will Honor Boston Conductor

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 15—With the wind-up of the musical season so near, last week was primarily one of repeat performances of opera and ballet, with the only outstanding event the opening of Martha Graham and Company for a week of repertory at the National Theater. With the interest in the dance running so high this season, large audiences were a foregone conclusion. A varied repertoire, ranging from such suggestive titles as Punch and Judy to Deaths and Entrances gave the versatile artist full scope and was well interpreted both by her and by her supporting company.

Tuesday evening will see one of the most distinguished musical gatherings held in New York in many moons. It will be a tribute dinner honoring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the completion of his 20th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The elite of the musical world—at least all of those who are within traveling distance of New York—will be there, and there will be entertainment by a distinguished group of musical artists, among them Dorothy Maynor, the negro soprano. The Collegiate Chorale, conducted by Robert Shaw, will perform. Originally designed as a small dinner given by a few close friends, the affair has expanded, by public demand, to an event which will fill to overflowing the Plaza Ballroom. Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland, National Federation of Music Clubs president, will be there in her official capacity as head of this organization and also as a member of the Koussevitzky Foundation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 11 1944

HONOR FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Interest in Forthcoming Dinner Necessitates Revising Plans

Such widespread interest has been created in the dinner planned in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, to be held at the Plaza Hotel next Tuesday at 8 P. M., that it has been found necessary to enlarge the guest list. Instead of the small affair, as originally planned by a group of American composers, the dinner guests will now include composers from throughout the country, notables in the field of music and admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky. Applications are being filled at the offices of the sponsoring Composers Committee which has headquarters at 136 East Sixty-fourth Street.

Additional artists have been added to the evening's musical program. These include Dorothy Maynor, soprano; William Kappell, pianist, and the Collegiate Chorale directed by Robert Shaw.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

MAY 14 1944

AS A TRIBUTE

. . . to the aid and encouragement he has extended to American composers and musicians, a group of the nation's musical artists will give a testimonial dinner for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony for the past 20 years, on Tuesday, May 16. The ceremonies will be heard over the Blue network from 10:30 to midnight. Aaron Copland will act as master of ceremonies and Dr. Howard Hanson will be the chief speaker. Other composers to be present include Samuel Barber, Nickolai Berezowsky, Roy Harris, William Schumann, Deems Taylor, Leonard Bernstein, Edward Burlingame Hill and Walter

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 14 1944

Tribute to Koussevitzky

WQXR to Carry Program at Testimonial Dinner

A testimonial dinner in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the last twenty years, given by a group of American composers in appreciation of Dr. Koussevitzy's aid and encouragement of composers, will be broadcast at 10 p. m. Tuesday over WQXR. The program will also be heard by transcription at 11:30 p. m. on WJZ.

In addition to addresses by Dr. Howard Hanson and Dr. Koussevitzky, the broadcast will include selections by the Collegiate Chorale, directed by Robert Shaw, and the performance on the piano of several compositions written for the occasion by Leonard Bernstein. Aaron Copland will be master of ceremonies.

Other composers in the group will include Roy Harris, William Shuman, Deems Taylor, Samuel Barber, Nicolai Berezowsky, Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston and Vladimir Dukelsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY [illegible] 1944

MUSIC CRITICS PRIZE WON BY BERNSTEIN

'Jeremiah' Symphony Chosen as Season's Best Orchestral Work by an American

Leonard Bernstein's 'Jeremiah' Symphony No. 1 was voted the outstanding orchestral work by an American composer introduced in New York concert halls during the season just ended, by the Music Critics Circle of New York, at a meeting yesterday afternoon. The symphony by the young composer-conductor won a majority vote on the first ballot. Runners-up were William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Norman Dello Joio's "Magnificat."

The three works, which were nominated from a list of more than twenty new compositions introduced during the season, were played at a broadcast-concert of the NBC Symphony under the direction of Dr. Frank Black last Thursday evening. It was from this concert, which was attended by the membership of the Circle headed by Oscar Thompson, music critic of The New York Sun, that the final award was voted yesterday afternoon.

The "Jeremiah" symphony was introduced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under the composer's baton earlier this season. The Schuman work was first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall and the Dello Joio "Magnificat" by the National Orchestral Association under the direction of Leon Barzin.

After the 1941-42 season, the first of the Circle's existence, William Schuman's Third Symphony won the award and last year's winner was Paul Creston's Symphony No. 1. The awards are presented officially in the form of certificates.

A second award will be made by the Circle for the season's most distinguished new chamber work by an American composer. The Circle will attend on May 21 a concert of four works, part of which will be aired by the National Broadcasting Company beginning at 12 noon. These four works, from which the final award in the chamber music category will be made, are string quartets by Randall Thompson and LeRoy Robertson, which will be played by the Roth Quartet; a string quartet by Sgt. Andrew Imbrie, which will be played by the Bennington Quartet, and Aaron Copland's Sonata, which will be performed by Mischa Mischakoff, concertmaster of the NBC Symphony, and Lukas Foss, young composer. The chamber music award will be voted at the Circle's final meeting of the season next week.

SEATTLE, WASH.
TIMES

MAY 1[illegible] 1944

Koussevitzky Asks Help for Music

NEW YORK, May 17.—(AP)—An extraordinary audience of the country's most important musical and social figures last night heard Serge Koussevitzky call upon A[illegible] a to help music build a new world.

Dr. Koussevitzky spoke at a dinner given in celebration of the completion of his first 20 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dinner began as a small affair, organized by a group of 11 American composers in recognition of the great conductor's propaganda for American music.

It quickly outgrew its frame, and the Plaza ballroom overflowed with more than 400 men and women.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 16 1944

IC CRITICS PRIZE
N BY BERNSTEIN

ah' Symphony Chosen ason's Best Orchestral rk by an American

rd Bernstein's "Jeremiah" ny No. 1 was voted the out-orchestral work by an n composer introduced in k concert halls during the ust ended, by the Music Circle of New York, at a yesterday afternoon. The y by the young composer-r won a majority vote on ballot. Runners-up were Schuman's Symphony for and Norman Dello Joio's cat."
ree works, which were d from a list of more than new compositions introuring the season, were t a broadcast-concert of Symphony under the dif Dr. Frank Black last evening. It was from ert, which was attended nembership of the Circle
y Oscar Thompson, music
The New York Sun, that award was voted yesternoon.
eremiah" symphony was d by the New York Phil-Symphony under the baton earlier this sea-Schuman work was first y the Boston Symphony
under Dr. Serge Kousse-Carnegie Hall and the "Magnificat" by the Nachestral Association unrection of Leon Barzin.
he 1941-42 season, the e Circle's existence, Wil-man's Third Symphony ward and last year's winaul Creston's Symphony
he awards are presented in the form of certifil award will be made by for the season's most dis-new chamber work by n composer. The Circle on May 21 a concert of , part of which will be e National Broadcasting beginning at 12 noon, works, from which the

in the chamber music will be made, are string Randall Thompson and bertson, which will be the Roth Quartet; a tet by Sgt. Andrew Im-will be played by the Quartet, and Aaron Sonata, which will be by Mischa Mischakoff, er of the NBC Sym-
Lukas Foss, young
The chamber music be voted at the Circle's ng of the season next

LE, WASH.
TIMES

7 1944

zky Asks p for Music

May 17.—(AP)—An dience of the coun-
tant musical and night heard Serge upon A[illegible]a to a new world.
ky spoke at a din-oration of the com-t 20 years as con-
Boston Symphony inner began as a nized by a group
mposers in recoggreat conductor's merican music.
ew its frame, and m overflowed with en and women.

Dr. Kousse-t will include ollegiate Choert Shaw, and the piano of s written for eonard Bern-will be mas-n the group rris, William ylor, Samuel ezowsky, Ed-

Hill, Walte Dukelsky.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 2[illegible] 1944

2 Young Musicians Win Honors In New York Concert Field

Koussevitzky Dinner A Huge Success; Ballet Theater Ends Popular Season

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 22—Youth ver definitely had its innings in Ne York this past week. Leonard Bern stein, the young ex-assistant conduc tor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, who has scarce arrived at his mid-twenties, won th award of the Music Critics Circle New York for the outstanding ne orchestral work premiere in the cit this season. Lukas Foss, who about the same age, was showere with critical approval after premiere of his dramatic cantata The Prairie, by Robert Shaw and th Collegiate Chorale. Both are Serg Koussevitzky's "bright young men, Mr. Bernstein having had his train ing under the distinguished conduc tor, while Mr. Foss, is slated to be come pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season.

The Bernste[illegible] w[illegible] which won the critics' award was the symphony Jeremiah, first heard in New York in March with the composer conductin Nan Merriman, the Nation Federa tion of Music Clubs' Young Artist Winner of 1943, sang the solo part of the symphony for the re-hearing of the three top contenders in the famous Studio 8-H at NBC, and won almost as many encomiums as th gifted young composer—which will b good news to all her Portland ad mirers.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

MAY 1[illegible]

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDED AT DINNER

Boston Symphony Conductor Is Honored for His Service to American Music

A dinner honoring Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the twenty years he has been conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for his distinguished service to music in America, was held at the Plaza Hotel last night. The dinner, attended by several hundred friends and admirers of Dr. Koussevitzky, was tendered by a composers' committee which included Samuel Barber, Howard Hanson, Nicolai Berezowsky, Leonard Bernste Roy Harris, Edward Burlinghar Hill, Aaron Copland, Walter P ton, William Schuman, Vladim Dukelsky and Deems Taylor.

The program, which was broac cast over station WQXR from 1 P. M. to 10:30 and rebroadcast b transcription over the Blue Net work at 11:30, was headed by Mr Copland who, as master of ceremonies, paid tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky and his espousal of the causes of American music.

"Dr. Koussevitzky has a profound understanding not only of music," he said, "but of what it means to be a composer. He loves music; but he never forgets the men who make it."

Dr. Koussevitzky pleaded the case of young American composers and their place in the sun. "We owe a debt to our composers," he said, warning of the way that they had been neglected in other eras "The coming generation of musicians should not have to blush for the failure of this generation in its treatment of composers. We should watch the example of Russia, who offers every means of protectio to her young creative artists. Th cause of justice to the composer i in line with the American tra dition."

The musical portion of the pro gram, provided by the Collegiat Chorale, directed by Robert Shaw, included performances of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia" and William Schuman's "Holiday Song," and as an encore, four short songs of Hindemith.

Messages congratulating Dr. Koussevitzky came from all parts of the world and included telegrams from the Moscow Conservatory and the Moscow Philharmonic signed by Shostakovich, Prokoffief, Khatchaturian and Shebalin, and others from Vaughn Williams in London, Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud, Roger Sessions, William Walton, Eugene Goosens, Carlos Chavez, Dr. and Mrs. Artur Rodzinski.

The guests at the dinner included hundreds of distinguished figures from all phases of America's musical life.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
REGISTER-REPUBLIC

MAY 1[illegible] 1944

Koussevitsky Is Honored

Ceremonies Broadcast By WROK Tonight

WROK HIGHLIGHTS
Tonight

6:00—News.
6:30—Green Hornet (B).
7:20—U. S. E. S.
7:30—Let Yourself Go (B).
8:30—Spotlight Bands (B).
9:30—Creeps By Night (B).
10:00—News.
10:30—Koussevitsky Dinner (B).

Wednesday

6:00 a. m.—Musical Clock.
8:00 a. m.—Breakfast Club (B).
9:15 a. m.—My True Story (B).
10:00 a. m.—Breakfast at Sardi's (B).
10:45 a. m.—Victory Food Club
12:15 p. m.—Column Left.

